TO

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS

FREDERICK,

PRINCE of WALES.

May it pleaſe Your Royal Highneſs,

I PRESUME to approach Your ROYAL HIGHNESS with a complete Engliſh Edition of a Performance, which was thought by its Author not unworthy the Patronage of the King of France: an Honour to which it was the rather entitled, as the Maps, and Collection of Edicts, that make the principal Part of it, are the Work of a great Chineſe Monarch, the late admirable Kang hi, by whoſe expreſs Orders they were executed.

THE firſt is a vaſt Improvement in Geography, a Science which can never be brought to Perfection without the Encouragement of Princes; and the other is a Fund of excellent Politics, which joined to the Treatiſes on the Government and Morality of the Chineſe, may deſerve Your Royal Highneſs's Attention, as they come from a People, who wiſely make thoſe Studies the Top of all Science, and have perhaps arriv'd to a greater Proficiency therein than all other Nations.

NO Laws or Inſtitutions appear in the general ſo well contrived as the Chineſe to make both King and People happy. By them the People are taught to look on the Sovereign as their Father, and the Sovereign on all Occaſions to conſider his Subjects as his Children. By the Force of this ſingle Principle the moſt deſpotic Emperors on Earth govern with the ſame Mildneſs as the moſt limited Monarchs; and Nations as numerous as the Sands of the Sea are reſtrained within the Bounds of the moſt perfect Submiſſion. Hence it is that their Hiſtory hitherto furniſhes more remarkable Inſtances of intrepid Virtue, as well as of Fidelity in Subjects to their Sovereigns, and of Affection in Princes to their People, than that of Great-Britain itſelf, which as yet has but faintly admitted the Parental Scheme (the beſt and ſureſt Baſis of Government) into its Politics: Hence likewiſe China has but ſeldom experienced Revolutions, which have ſo often overturned other States; and were it not for the ſuperſtitious Sects that have been ſuffer'd to propagate themſelves, had probably never felt any.

In Conſequence of this excellent Maxim, a Chineſe Emperor is perpetually labouring to merit the Name of Father of the People. He lays up his Revenues only for the public Service: Whenever any Tax bears too heavy he immediately remits it; the Moment his Governors give him Notice of any public Calamity, he opens his Treaſuries to relieve the Diſtreſſed. He looks into all Affairs with his own Eyes, and his Ears are open to hear all Complaints. He permits no Set or Profeſſion of Men to impoſe on, or make a Prey of, the reſt. He redreſſes Grievances in the Law, Religion and Government, the Inſtant he is inform'd of them. If an Edict appears to have an ill Effect, he cauſes it to be revoked before it does farther Miſchief. He lets no Magiſtrate run on to oppreſs, or Foreign Power to injure, his Subjects, but calls them to Account on the firſt Remonſtrance. He rejects every Project tending to their Detriment, tho' ever ſo much to his own private Intereſt; and purſues every Scheme which conveys the ſmalleſt Advantage to the Nation. He is particularly attentive to encourage the Manufactures; and ſuffers no Branch of Commerce to ſink or languiſh for want of applying a ſpeedy Remedy. In ſhort, he never does any Thing contrary to the Inclinations of the People, to which he always conforms himſelf; and for Fear he ſhould deviate in the leaſt Particular from his Paternal Character, he invites his faithful Miniſters to examine his Conduct, and apprize him of his Miſtakes.

This is the glorious Light in which the Chineſe Hiſtory preſents their Monarchs to our View; and this is the Light in which the Inhabitants of theſe Iſlands figure to themſelves Your Future Reign. They can do no leſs in Juſtice than think thus advantageouſly of Your Royal Highneſs, who ſo profeſſedly make the Britiſh Princes, moſt renowned for their Benevolence, Generoſity and Diſintereſtedneſs, the Patterns of Your Imitation. Thoſe ſublime Qualities, which have always diſtinguiſh'd the greateſt Monarchs, and ſhine ſo conſpicuouſly in every Action of Your Life, afford an Earneſt to them that they will not be deceived in their Expectations; nor can your Poſterity ever want the Hearts of their Subjects, (the only ſure Support of Sovereigns) ſo long as they tread in Your Steps.

That Your Royal Highneſs, in Conjunction with Your moſt Amiable Conſort, may continue long to bleſs theſe Iſlands with Your Preſence, and ſecure their laſting Happineſs by a Numerous Race of Princes, who ſhall ſit on the Britiſh Throne to Lateſt Time, is the ardent Wiſh of

Your Royal Highness's

Moſt Dutiful,

Moſt Faithful, and

Moſt Humble Servant,

The Tranſlator.

THE

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

PERE DU HALDE having in his Preface given a copious Account of the Materials of this Work, it remains only to ſay ſomething concerning the Manner in which it has been executed, and what we have done on our Side to improve it. Remarks on the preſent Work,

In order to this, I ſhall conſider the Deſcription of each Country ſeparately: And as this Volume, with Half of the other, relates almoſt entirely to CHINA, I ſhall confine my Remarks at preſent, chiefly to this Part of the Work, which for the Hiſtory, Natural and Civil, is abundantly more complete than any thing before publiſhed; or indeed, than all the Relations that have been hitherto written, put together: Whoſe Authors, ſuch as Samedo, Magalhanes, Navarette, le Comte &c. having only ſeen ſome ſmall Part of the Country, could not be qualified to treat ſo fully or accurately of Matters, as thoſe who had travelled over all China, and being employed by the Emperor to ſurvey his Dominions, had an Opportunity of coming to the Knowledge of a Multitude of Things, which muſt have remain'd hidden from other Travellers. So that, notwithſtanding the Deſcription of Chineſe Tartary, Korea and Tibet is alſo exceeding curious, and may be eſteemed by many as the more valuable Part of the Work, on Account of the ample Diſcoveries it contains of thoſe Spacious Countries, whereof little more than the Names were known to us before, yet if P. du Halde had treated ſolely of China, his Labour muſt needs have been acceptable to the beſt Judges in this Sort of Literature. Epecially ſince this Part is enriched with Tranſlations of ſeveral Chineſe Books relating to their Religion, Medicine, Politics and Morality; among which the Declarations, Edicts, Speeches, &c. of Emperors and Miniſters, beſides giving Light into many of the Cuſtoms and Laws of China to be met with no where elſe, may be affirmed to be as noble Eſſays upon Liberty and Government, as ever appeared in any Country of Europe, not excepting Great Britain itſelf, the only Nurſery of ſound Politics, and Aſſerter of the common Rights of Mankind, on this Side of the Globe. Preferable to any former of the Kind.

In ſhort, this Performance is valuable, if it was only for collecting into one Body what occurs moſt material in former Accounts of China; a Work very much wanted, eſpecially as the Books treating of this Country were become very numerous, and ſeveral of them not eaſily to be procured. 'Tis true, certain Topics may be found which are not handled ſo minutely as in other Writers, ſome whereof I have taken notice of, and frequently ſupplied as I went along: But poſſibly the Author had his Reaſons for not enlarging on thoſe Subjects, either becauſe they had not been confirmed by his Correſpondents in China, or that they appeared not to be exact; which in general he obſerves is the Caſe with moſt former Relations, without pointing out the particular Authors, who were chiefly of his own Society. Objections anſwer'd.

It muſt be confeſſed likewiſe, that his geographical Deſcription of China is not near ſo copious as that publiſhed by P. Martini in his Atlas Sinenſis: but then it may be preſumed to be far more accurate; the Miſſionaries having been at every City they deſcribe, and indeed ſometimes not ſparing to correct Martini's Performance, which is compiled almoſt wholely from the Chineſe Geographers, who, as P. du Halde obſerves, are very apt to exaggerate Matters that relate to themſelves or their Country. Beſides, as the Author, in his Account of every Diſtrict or County in each Province, has inſerted whatever is moſt remarkable with Reſpect to the Trade and natural produce thereof; and as a particular Deſcription of the Situation of every Chew and Hyen would have ſwelled the Work to a very great Bulk, and might be learned very juſtly from the provincial Maps and Plans, he might deem it needleſs to enter into a farther Detail. Indeed, we ſhould have been very well pleaſed, if inſtead thereof he had inſerted an Itinerary of the Roads through China, out of ſome of their Books publiſhed in every City for the Uſe of Travellers, or elſe the Journals of the Miſſionaries in their Progreſs through the Provinces, while they were making the Maps: Which would have been more proper than the Travels he has inſerted of other Miſſionaries, and, with the Maps, would have furniſhed Materials to render the Geography of China in a manner complete.

Tho' this Work comes out under P. du Halde's Name, yet many of the Pieces were confeſſedly the Performance of the Miſſionaries, whoſe Names are prefixed: Nay, he ſeems to have had little Share in any of them, farther than to prepare and ſometimes abridge them. In the Letter of P. Regis, inſerted in the Author's Preface in the Name of the Miſſionaries concerned with him in drawing the Maps, we meet with ſome Expreſſions which ſeem to favour this Opinion; as, the Work which WE offer the public, — WE did not think fit to inſert them, meaning their Obſervations of the Variation of the Needle, in this Piece of Geography. Now tho' the firſt of theſe Paſſages ſeems to relate only to the Maps, yet the laſt plainly refers to a diſtinct Geographical Treatiſe ſent to Pere du Halde, as well as the Maps, with a deſign to be made public: Beſides, we often find the Miſſionaries ſpeaking in their own Perſons, in the Articles not given under any Name. But Nobody, I preſume, will have the worſe Opinion of the Work, for the Miſſionaries having had the greateſt Share therein: It were only to be wiſhed, that the The Work of the Miſſionaries, rather than of P. du Halde.

Editor had given us the Pieces intire just as they came from the Hands of his Correspondents, because it is to be feared some of them may have suffered by a too severe Castigation, as I have observed wherever I found occasion.

State of the present Translation.

THUS much may suffice with Regard to the Original: I come next to acquaint the Reader with the State of the present Translation. In the first Place, I have endeavoured to give a faithful Version of the Author's Sense in the fewest Words, and to avoid a disagreeable Stile; hoping, however, that the Reader will make allowance for small Slips in both, which are inevitable in Works of such various Matters and Length. If there be any thing better than ordinary in either of those Respects, perhaps it may be found in that Part between p. 349 and 638; which, all but about five Sheets and a few Notes, was done by other Hands.

Proper Names reduced to the English Orthography.

Secondly, I have taken a good deal of Care to reduce the proper Names from the French to the English Idiom; tho' in doing it, I met with no small Difficulty, chiefly occasioned by the same Word being written divers Ways: For instance, we meet with Yong, Yung, and sometimes Hiong and Hiung; Kou, Kia and Hia; Khi and Ki; Couan, Coan, and Koan; Koen, Quen and Quan; Koei, Kouei, Kuey and Quei; Khing and King, Nhing and Ning; Ngan and Gan; Cien, Tcien, Tçien and Tsien; Tse, tze, tse, tsie, tçe and çe; Van, Voan and Ouan; Tsin, tçin, tcin, and a great number of the like. In short, the several Authors of the Pieces that compose the Work, have often different ways of writing the same Words: Besides, now and then, Names occur written according to the Portuguese and other Languages. By this various Orthography, it appears that the French have not yet one settled manner of writing the Chinese Names, owing doubtless in great measure to the Scantiness and Ambiguity of their Alphabet, which to me seems the worst of all others for expressing the Sounds in foreign Languages.

However, I have endeavoured to adjust them in the best manner I could, and believe I have succeeded pretty well, excepting in a very few Instances. Without this Improvement, the Work would have been very uncouth and defective; since the French Orthography must give an English Reader a very false Idea of the Chinese Language, by conveying wrong Sounds and making the Words, which are all Monosyllables, to appear of two or three Syllables. This is so obvious in itself from the above Instances, and has been so fully demonstrated of late by Letters inserted in the public Papers, in Defence of this Work and on other Occasions, that it would be needless to mention any thing farther in Defence of this Alteration. I shall therefore only observe, that P. du Halde, for the same Reason, condemns the French for using the Portuguese Orthography: And indeed, if all Translators would reduce proper Names to the Idiom of their own Language, it would render their Performances exceedingly more useful, as well as prevent a World of Confusion in Geography and History arising from the Neglect of it.

Notes.

I have frequently marked the Variation of the Orthography by a Note at the Bottom of the Page; which Course I have taken to supply, illustrate, or correct the Original whenever a proper Occasion offered. If at any time I appear in Opposition to the Missionaries religious Notions, it is because I judged it not honest to spread their Poison in a Protestant Country without the Antidote along with it. Nor will the well-meaning Romish Laity, I presume, be offended with me for shewing the great Conformity there is between the Doctrines and Practices of their Clergy and those of the Religion of Fo, called Bonzas; since it is visibly done with a benevolent design to free them, by means of the Parallel, from that deplorable Bondage of Mind which they lye under to their deceitful Guides, who palm on them, as so many religious Duties and Precepts of the Gospel, the same gainful Artifices, which they charge the Bonzas with inventing merely to enslave and pick the Pockets of their Followers.

Other Ornaments.

I have distinguished the Original Notes by Symbols, and my own by Capital Letters of the Alphabet, excepting when they are tacked to the Authors, and then they are inserted between Hooks: I have observed the same Method as to Words now and then inserted for Illustration into the Text. Farther to improve the Translation, I have suited the Running Title at the Top of the Pages to the different Subjects treated of; and have added Marginal or Side Notes to give the Reader a summary View of the Matters handled in each Page. Parentheses and long Digressions that interrupt the Relation in the French, are thrown into the Notes (A), and large Paragraphs sometimes transposed for sake of bringing Arguments on the same Subject together (B). The four Indexes of Matters are brought into one at the End of the Second Volume, to prevent looking in three or four Places for the same thing. Lastly, the two Tables explaining the Chinese and Tartarian Words that occur in the Work, are likewise brought into one, and augmented by a great Number of Terms out of the Text. In short, a good deal of Pains has been bestowed to render this Edition commodious and correct; altho' it must be confessed, notwithstanding all our Care, several Errors have escaped the Press, especially in the Proper Names, for which we crave the Indulgence of our Readers, who will find the most material of them rectified in the Table of Errata.

The particular Maps, their Excellencies.

HAVING given this Account of the Body of the Performance, I proceed next to consider the Maps, Plans, and Cuts that accompany it. The Maps are of two Kinds, general and particular; the particular Maps being 38 in Number, are published just as they came from the Missionaries; and however complete the rest may be, must be allowed to be the most valuable Part of the Work, which indeed seems to have been compiled chiefly with a View to usher them into the World. These Maps are an immense Treasure in Geography; and in fact, the procuring of them cost the Emperor of China immense Sums. Eight Missionaries were employed no less than nine Years in making of them. To this Purpose they travelled over the whole Empire, furnished with various Mathematical Instruments, Carriages, Provisions, and all other Conveniencies at the Emperor's Expence: The very Mandarins of every District were ordered to attend them, to give their Assistance in all the ways they were able; so that nothing was wanting to render them accurate. Many of the Originals were fifteen or twenty Foot long, and consequently very minute in their Description: This appears also in some Measure from the great Number of Boroughs or Towns inserted in these Maps, besides the Cities; tho' for want of Room, the Names are omitted, excepting a few of the most remarkable Places, as King te ching, a Town of Kyang si, famous for making the China-Ware; Fo shan, another Town near Kan ton, eminent for its great Trade and Number of Inhabitants, &c. In short, these Maps may be truly affirmed to be the greatest Geographical Work that ever was performed by the Orders of a single Monarch; whether we consider the vast Space of Earth they describe, or the great Number of accurate Observations that were made for determining the Situation of Places. However, it cannot be sayed that they are all equally exact, for some Part of the Maps of Eastern Tartary are laid down from the Report of the Natives; and it does not appear that any Observations vations were made for those of Tibet: But the Maps of China seem to be drawn with very great Care throughout; and yet it is not to be presumed that every Mountain and River was actually surveyed by the Jesuits. It appears by the Table of Longitudes and Latitudes at the End of this Book, that they passed through all the Cities of the first Rank in every Province: They took the Latitudes of all these Capitals, and determined their Distances from one another by a Chain of Triangles; for the rest probably making Use of the topographical Surveys they found in every District. And this Method doubtless was sufficient to produce accurate Maps of any Country.

(B) See p. 131. Note (a)

Their Defects in the French,

However, it must be confessed, these Maps are defective in some Particulars; (1) As wanting the Subdivisions whereby we cannot distinguish the Chew or Hyen that belong to each Fu or Capital in a Province. (2) For want of the Roads, so that Places seem to lye in Confusion, and one loses the Satisfaction of travelling with the Eye over the Country. (3) Being exhibited on the plain Projection with inclining Meridians Countries are thrown out of their natural Figure and Proportion: Whence this Deformity, tho' scarce discernable in the Maps of Pe che li, Shan tong, Kyang nan and Kyang si, thro' which the Meridian of Pe king passes, is yet very perceptible in those of Shen si, Se chwen and Yun nan, which lye furthest from it.

As to Orthography, the Maps abound more with Faults than the Texts: For besides those already mentioned which they have in common with it, many of the Names contained in them are written according to two or three different Orthographies: For instance, half of those in the Maps of Pe che li and Quey chew are after the Portuguese Manner, and half after the French; nay, what is still more incongruous and perplexing, often the Words or Syllables of which a Name is composed are written according to different Idioms. Thus in Pe che li we find Tom tcheou, Tom mim hien, Khim tcheou, Tcim tcheou, Tim tcheou, &c. instead of Tong tcheou, Tong ming hien, Khing tcheou, Tsing tcheou, Ting tcheou &c. in the Map of Ho nan, we meet with Yo xan hien, Lo xan hien, Koang xan hien, for Yo chan, Lo chan, Koang chan, &c.

It is probable, that the Originals have both the Divisions and Roads; but as they are omitted in the Copies sent from China, it was not in our Power to supply them. 'Tis true, P. Martini's Maps of the Provinces are divided according to the Fu: But as Places are exhibited for the most Part in a very different Manner from what they are in P. du Halde's; and we find in one Set many Hyen which are not in the other, or at least have neither the same Names nor Situations, we durst not venture to insert those Divisions, any more than the Names of several Places which are inserted without sufficient Authority in the Dutch Maps, from the Travels of the Jesuits, published in the Work. However, P. Martini's Maps have been of Use often in determining us as to the Choice of the Names, when we found a Difference between the Maps, Tables and Text of du Halde, which frequently happened.

It was no less out of our Power to add the Roads, for want of the Itineraries already mentioned. Indeed, the Places in the Table of Latitudes and Longitudes at the End of this Work, seem to be set down in the Order the Missionaries travelled through them, and thereby we are able to trace their Progress through all the Capital Cities of each Province: But as one cannot from thence lay down the Course of the Roads through the intervening Places, and this Defect may possibly be supplied hereafter by the Communications of the Jesuits themselves, I thought it better to let the Maps remain without the Roads, than draw them at random.

My Intention was to have remedied the third Defect, by drawing all the Maps anew according to a circular Projection, or Dilatation of the Polar Planisphere; but some Gentlemen having been of Opinion that it was better to engrave them immediately after the French Edition, and much Time having been spent in considering what to do, that Resolution was layed aside: However, I have brought the Orthography of the local Names to the English Idiom, and consequently have introduced Uniformity in that Respect between the Maps and the Text, as well as among themselves.

and in the Dutch Edition.

As this was a Matter of no small Importance towards rendering the Maps correct and useful, the Dutch Editors tell us, they have rectified an infinite Number of corrupt Names. But on Examination, it will appear that they have left most of them in the Condition they found them: Thus in their Map of Pe che li, we meet with Tim him hien, Yom tcim hien, Yom tchim hien, Ham tchim hien, Hiam ho hien, Kiam hoam keou, and Numbers of other Names according to the Portuguese Orthography, instead of Ting hing hien, Yong tsing hyen, Yong tching hien, Hang tching hien, Hiang ho hien, Kiang hoang keou, &c. in short, often where they have changed the Orthography, they have done it but by halves; thus we find Tcien for Tsien, Thao for Chao, Tchuang and Tchuam, Tcim, Tcing and Tsing, Tom and Tong, Leam and Leang, Tcham and Tchang, Hoam and Hoang. So that by giving the Names sometimes one way, sometimes another, they have introduced even more Confusion in the Maps than there was before (A).

How improved in this.

Besides this Improvement as to Orthography, I have endeavoured to give the Maps some others, by inserting certain Particulars out of the Text, which ought of right to accompany them as they serve for Illustration, and to confirm their Authority. (1) In the Title of each Map, I have instanced by whom and when it was made, as far as I could gather from P. du Halde's Preface. (2) The upper Scale is adapted to the Longitude of Paris, that the Reader may know the Distance of the several Places of China from thence, which is more interesting to Europeans, as well as more consistent with their Geography, than to reckon Longitude only from Pe king; and I have chosen the Observation which places this last City 114 Degrees East of Paris, for Sake of its being the Middle, as well as a round, Number. (3) To the Scale of Measures, I have added the Content of a Degree in English Miles, according to the Determination of the Academy of Paris, rather than that of Mr. Norwood, which makes it about 69 Miles and a Half, because the former is the Result of several repeated Operations, performed by more exact Methods. (4) All Cities, whose Latitudes were taken, have a single Line drawn under the Name, and a double distinguishes those, where both the Longitude and Latitude have been observed; that the Reader may discover at one View, all the Places where celestial Observations have been made, and pass a Judgment off Hand on the Correctness of the Map. (5) For his farther Satisfaction, I have inserted a Table of the Observation themselves,

(A) Indeed it appears plainly from what the Dutch Editors have done, that they were not able to reduce the Orthography to a Uniformity; and as they were themselves sensible of this, or at least that they had not done it, they express themselves in their Preface very cautiously on the Occasion. Their Words are: P. du Halde, in his Preface speaking of the Maps belonging to the Paris Edition, acknowledges that Defect with Regard to the Orthography, which he imputes to the Difference between the Chinese [it should be French] and Portuguese Pronunciation. This Confession moved us to apply a Remedy wherever we judged it might be done with Safety. From hence it appears, First, that they did not discover this Defect themselves; Secondly, that they have only remedied it in Part, which as I have shewn is a very inconsiderable one. But how they came, after making any Correction, not to pursue it, for instance, to correct Tom or Kim once, and leave it five times uncorrected, I cannot readily account for; only I should rather impute it to their Diffidence than want of taking Pains, since they have in several other Respects spared no Labour, even when there was no occasion for it, and it had been better let alone.

themſelves, that he may ſee the Authorities whereon the Map is grounded: for both in copying, and engraving Errors will unavoidably creep in (as ſeems to have been the Caſe with the Jeſuits Maps themſelves;) and if there did not, the Situations cannot be taken ſo preciſely from a Map as from a Table. The Capital of each Province is diſtinguiſhed in a different Character, and the moſt remarkable Variations in the Name, Latitude or Longitude (which amount often to two or three Minutes) from the Map, are marked by a Star.

Advantages of ſuch Improvements in Maps.

I think every Map ought to have theſe five Requiſites, eſpecially the laſt, without which, the beſt has nothing to recommend it more than the worſt, except the Author's Name, which is of no Authority unleſs with a few who are acquainted with his Merit: But when ſuch Vouchers are inſerted, a Map carries its own Credentials along with it, and demands a Preference among a Crowd of others which differ from it. By this means the Curious would be directed to a right Choice, and many hindered from propagating Errors by following falſe Maps, for want of knowing how to diſtinguiſh the good from the bad. To this Defect, doubtleſs, is to be imputed the little Eſteem, or rather great Contempt, that Maps are in here; for Engliſh-men require Certainty, and are apt to deſpiſe any Art where they meet with ſuch endleſs Difference, without being able to diſcover where the Truth lies. In ſhort, if this Method was duly purſued, I am perſuaded Geography would ſoon recover the Credit it has loſt among us, and be delivered from the Danger of relapſing into Error, by putting a Stop to thoſe ſpurious Compoſitions which are daily obtruded on the Public by ignorant or mercenary Hands; becauſe in ſuch Caſe, nobody would buy Maps for Uſe which wanted Vouchers, or did not agree with them: For which Reaſon, I would earneſtly recommend this Practice to all Geographers, and thoſe who wiſh well to this Science, whoſe Perfection is of ſuch vaſt Importance to Commerce and Navigation.

The general Maps.

I intended likewiſe to have inſerted in every Map a large Table explaining the Geographical Terms, which would have been of great Uſe, tho' much the ſame in all; but wanting Room in moſt of them, the Reader is deſired to have Recourſe on Occaſion to the Table in the General Map of China, which will ſupply that Defect. This General Map is drawn anew according to a circular Projection, and accompanied with Vouchers, &c. like the particular Maps; from whence it was copied, and not from Mr. D'Anville's: But the General Map of all (including China, Korea, Tibet, and all Tartary from the Eaſtern Ocean to the Caſpian Sea) is engraven from his Original, without any Variation, except reducing the Names to the Engliſh Orthography. I have not altered them in any other Reſpect, altho' they frequently differ from thoſe in the Jeſuits Maps: Whether it was that ſo much Care was not taken in correcting theirs as his own, or whether he had ſome particular Informations concerning certain Names, as he ſeems to have had with Reſpect to the Diviſion of Korea, and ſome ſmall Additions below the 40th Degree of Latitude, which are omitted in the Jeſuits Maps. But tho' for theſe Reaſons I thought it proper to give the Names in the General Map as I found them written by Mr. D'Anville, yet I did not think them ſufficient to warrant my changing thoſe in the Jeſuits Maps, or inſerting ſeveral things in them on his Authority, as the Dutch Editors have done on a bare Preſumption that they were changed, or omitted thro' the Careleſſneſs of the Engravers: (A) For that would have been to give Mr. D'Anville's Work for the Jeſuits, or confound them together, and, for ought we know, to inſert Errors in Place of Truth. I muſt own, I think it very ſtrange that ſuch conſiderable Variations ſhould appear between the General and Particular Maps, without being accounted for either in P. du Halde's Preface, or Mr. D'Anville's Diſſertation concerning his General Map, inſerted in the geographical Obſervations on Tibet towards the End of the laſt Volume.

In this Map Mr. D'Anville differs from the Jeſuits not only with Regard to the Names, but alſo the Situation of Plans, as will appear by the comparative Table inſerted in our Copy; and has altered that of Aſtrakhan (tolerably well ſettled by help of aſtronomical Obſervations:) But upon what Grounds, I ſhall examine in a particular Diſſertation at the Cloſe of this Preface, and therefore ſhall ſay no more of it here.

Plans and Cuts.

The Plans of Cities, which are thirty eight, may be conſidered as ſo many Topographical Maps deſigned to afford us an Inſight into the Chineſe Manner of Fortification, and the Care they have taken to give their Towns the moſt advantageous Situation for Trade as well as Defence, in which few Nations can compare with, and none excell them. I need not mention the Plans of Temples and other Cuts, farther than to obſerve that they are very curiouſly deſigned, and furniſh a lively Idea of the Things they are intended to repreſent.

Upon the whole, this Work of P. du Halde, or rather the Chineſe Miſſionaries, is a moſt noble and valuable Performance: For tho' we are ſenſible it is not in all Reſpects ſo complete as could have been wiſh'd, and that it might have been executed more to Advantage by a Perſon leſs taken up with the Functions of his Religion, and more inured to Works of this Nature than P. du Halde; yet is it richly intitled to the Eſteem of the Public with all its Faults, which were they much more conſiderable than they are, would be recompenſed by the Maps alone; theſe being a whole Atlas of Diſcoveries at once, and in ſhort, the greateſt Improvement in Geography that ever was publiſhed in any Age at one time. As to this Engliſh Edition, it was the Undertaker's Deſign to rival the French for Beauty of Printing, Goodneſs of Paper, and Elegance of Engravings in half the Number of Volumes, and at a fourth Part of the Price to Subſcribers: In a Word, it is a moſt expenſive Work to the the Undertaker, but to thoſe who Subſcribe to him one of the cheapeſt that has been publiſh'd in this Century.

WHAT has been ſay'd may ſuffice to give the Reader an Idea of the preſent Performance. But before I conclude, it will be proper to add ſome Remarks for juſtifying, as well as illuſtrating the Orthography of the proper Names; with an Explanation of the Coins and Meaſures mentioned in this Work.

(A) Tho' I cannot but blame the Dutch Editors for corrupting as I may ſay the Jeſuits Maps, by inſerting Things out of Mr. D'Anville's, or the Journals of the other Miſſionaries to be found in the Work, without any Certainty of their being in the Right, yet they are to be commended for ſome other Additions or Alterations which are grounded on the Text, particularly for inſerting ſome Places out of the Tables of Longitude and Latitude. By this means they have ſupplied a few Places of Moment which ſeem to have been omitted by Miſtake, as Myen yâng chew in Hû quâng, and Ping ywen chew in Quey chew. However, I cannot ſee why in putting in the Name of Myen yâng chew, they ſhould expunge that of U yâng hyen, which in the Original ſtood in Place of the former; for poſſibly this laſt Name may belong to one of the Situations to be found very near it in the Map. I wonder they were not governed in this, as in moſt things elſe by Mr. D'Anville's Map of China, where the laſt Name is retained, and the former omitted as in the Original. They have committed the like Fault in the Map of Che kyang, where they have inſerted Nhin hia kean, and left out Nan Fuen, in Quâng ſi, they have made 13 Fû inſtead of 12 by inſerting Tû yâng, which in the Table by miſtake is denominated Fû, tho' by its ſquare Situation in the Map, it ſhould be no more than ſome Forts, ſeveral Errors of this kind are to be met with.

The following TABLE ſhews the Engliſh Characters anſwering to the French, which are ranged on the Outſide; with the Manner of pronouncing the Chineſe Words as printed in this Work.

The Vowels.

A. This Vowel is commonly pronounced broad like a in all, call, &c. tho' often like a in Father; but the Variation is not diſtinguiſhed in the Original. In our Notes the broad a is marked by a Circumflex â.

e. Is commonly ſounded like e in Venal. When it comes before a, it is changed by us into y; thus for Leang, Leao, I write Lyang, Lyau, to make the Word a Monoſyllable; only in the Pronunciation, more of the e than the i may be ſounded between the L and y, if there be any Occaſion for it.
ê. In the French is expreſſed in our Tranſlation by ê, and is pronounced like a in Father. ê or ee is expreſſed by ë, and pronounced long.

i. Is ſounded commonly cloſe as in ſing; ſometimes open as in ſign, when at the End of Words, and a Conſonant goeth before. Sometimes like ee in ſeen, and then it is marked with a Circumflex in the Notes. At the End of Words, when it comes after a Conſonant and before a Vowel, it is changed into y. Thus Tai, mai, are written Tay, may; alſo for Kiang, ſiang, we put Kyang, Syang. Sometimes we have omitted the i; thus for Siue, Siuen, Hiuen, we write Sue, Suen, huen.

o. Is commonly ſounded as in bone, open, tho'(A) ſometimes, but rarely, it is obſcure, as in pvon, tvon, where it is pronounced ſoft like e, and very quick. Sometimes we have changed it into w; for oei, writing Wey; for Foe, Fwe, and at the End of Words after a into u, See ao.

u. Is commonly ſounded like u, ſometimes it is changed into w. Thus for Yuen, tchuen, we write Ywen, chwen. 'Tis often confounded with v Conſonant, as in Siue, Siuen, Hiuen abovementioned, which are ſometimes written Sive, Siven, and Hiven in the French: Frequently tis put indifferently for o; thus we meet with Yong and Yung, Kong and Kung &c.

ou. Before a Vowel at the Beginning of Words, or after a Vowel at the End of a Word, is expreſſed by us with w. Thus for Ouan and Keou we write Wan and Kew.
Coming after a Conſonant, it has the Sound of oo, as in good, and is expreſſed by a Circumflex u: Thus for Fou, Nou, &c. we write Fû, Nû, &c.

ao. This is a Portugueſe Character retained by the French, and is expreſſed by au, which muſt be pronounced quick, and thro' the Noſe. Thus for Tao, Leao, Miao, we write Tau, Lyau, Myau.

Conſonants.

C. Is always expreſſed with us by K to prevent the equivocal Sound before e and i, except in ſome particular Words made Uſe of in Europe, as Confuçius.
Sometimes we have changed it into Tſ, thus for Cien we write Tſyen: Sometimes into S, thus for Tcing we write Tſing. See Tſ among the double Conſonants.
ç. We commonly expreſs by Tſ, ſometimes by S.

g. Before a, o and u, hard as in God. Before e and i, 'tis always changed into j Conſonant, to prevent the equivocal Sound; thus for gin, we write jin

h. Is ſounded pretty ſtrong as in Engliſh. But before o and u like a W. See ho among the double Letters.

j. This Letter is expreſſed very exactly in Engliſh by zh, but it is doubtful whether ever it ought to be expreſſed by this Character, or whether it ſtands for our J Conſonant or Y. Sometimes in the Maps it ſeems to be put inſtead of our ch.

k. Is ſometimes uſed indifferently for c. Sometimes as q. Thus for Koei, Koue, we write Quey, que.

m. At the Beginning of Words is expreſſed by m. But at the End of Words by ng. Thus for Tom, Tim, mim, we write Tong, ting ming. Thus m final is the Portugueſe Character, and is found in a great Number of Names eſpecially in the Maps. For the Pronunciation of ng final, ſee the double Letters.

n. Before the Vowels as our n; before g after another Manner, ſee ng.

q. As q in Quang tong.

s. Is pronounced ſometimes as s with us, ſometimes as ts. Thus for se we frequently write tſe.

v. Is put frequently in the Original inſtead of ou, the Character by which the French expreſs our W, which they want in their Language: Thus we find Van and Ouan, &c.

x. Occurs frequently in Chineſe Names, eſpecially in the Maps, and is the Portugueze Character anſwering to the French Ch and our Sh.

y. Is commonly uſed inſtead of i Vowel at the Beginning of Words, but we always conſider it as a Conſonant. When put ſingly, or for a whole Word, we change it into a Vowel. Thus for Ytchang and Yang y, we write I chang, Yang i. All other Letters are pronounced like the Engliſh.

Double Conſonants.

Ch. This French Character is expreſſed by ſh, having the ſame Sound.

ds. By ds, which is ſounded nearly like ts, or rather ſeems to be uſed by ſome Miſſionaries inſtead thereof.

ho. Is a Portugueze Character retained by the French, and is expreſſed by wh: Thus for Hoang, huon, we write Whang, whon. Huan and hoan are both written by us whan; the o and u being frequently uſed promiſcuouſly for each other. If there be any Difference, it is only that the w carries ſomewhat of the Sound of o in the one, and of the u in the other.

ko, ku, kou, are uſed in the French for our qu; thus they write Koan, Kuan, kouan for quan.

ng. Is expreſſed by us with ng; at the Beginning of Words it is ſounded like the Portugueze n, in a peculiar Manner thro' the Noſe. At the End of Words it ſounds like n in ſeen, queen, being lengthened out with a ringing Tone; the g being added not to be ſounded, but only to indicate that ringing Tone, or diſtinguiſh this ſort of n from the common n.

ss. This Character we expreſs by ts.

tch. This is a Character made by the French to expreſs the Sound of our Ch, which is put inſtead thereof.

ts, tſ, tz, and ſometimes tc, are uſed indifferently by the Miſſionaries for ts, which laſt Character I have retained. Some uſe th for ts; and others ds as before obſerved.

vo. Is expreſſed ſometimes by Vvo: Thus for Voë we write Vvoë; tho' perhaps a w would be ſufficient, as for Voan we write Wan.

'Tis difficult to aſcertain the Characters ſometimes when two or three different Sorts are employed to expreſs the ſame Sound, as in this laſt Caſe, ou being the Character commonly uſed by the French inſtead of w; and what a confuſed Medley muſt we have made, had we retained the various Characters uſed in the Original to expreſs the Sound of ts, being no leſs than 9. viz. c, ç, s, ss, th, tc, tſ, ts, tz.

The Tranſlator's PREFACE.

From the foregoing Table, we may likewiſe perceive the Barrenneſs both of the Chineſe and French Alphabet; the former wants the a, b, d, r, x, z, which they expreſs by ya, p, t, l, ſh, ch. The latter wants the ch, j Conſonant, w, and indeed properly the K and Q, which the Chineſe, and moſt other Oriental Nations have, wherefore it is very unfit for expreſſing the Sounds of moſt foreign Languages.

That the Reader may have a more thorough and regular View of our Method of writing the Chineſe Names, I have ſubjoined a Comparative Table of all the Words which compoſe the Chineſe Language, written according to the Portugueze, French and Engliſh Idioms. The Portugueze Column is taken from Kircher's Chineſe Grammar, in his Muſeum Sinicum, and the French from Pere le Comte's Travels; only I have changed the m final which the latter uſed, into ng, to make the Words more agreeable to the Orthography of the latter French Miſſionaries. I have alſo marked the â with a Circumflex, in thoſe Words where I conceive it ought to be pronounced broad, as it is in all, fall, &c. I have alſo diſtinguiſhed the other Vowels according to the Rules already layed down, ſo far as I found them marked in P. le Comte's Table, which is defective both in that and other reſpects.

An Alphabetical Table of all the Words which compoſe the Chineſe Language according to the Portugueſe, French, and Engliſh Pronunciation.

(A) This is alſo written kong, the like happens in other Words of this Form, where the o and u are uſed promiſcuouſly by the Miſſionaries.

(B) This Word and the four following may be written and pronounced with a w Conſonant, Chwa, chwang, &c, but I take the w to be the true Pronunciation, only it may have more of the u in this chua, and of the e in the former, according to what I have remarked before. The like is to be obſerved of all Words in theſe Forms, throughout the following Letters.

(C) This Word and the next may be pronounced hiv, hivn; but as the v is of the obſcure kind, and the other Letters which are not obſcure, are pronounced clearly, I take hve and hven to be the true Orthography.

(C) In the Words of this Form, which generally come at the End of each Letter, the o is ſo obſcure or mute, that it ſeems to be an e. Hence ſome might pronounce when, hoon or hu'n; but I think it beſt to keep to the general Rules of Orthography; and if the wh be pronounced very ſoft, and the o both ſoft and quick, the Pronunciation will, I preſume, be ſufficiently juſt.

This Table would have been more Regular, had the Chineſe Words, reduced to the Order of the Engliſh Alphabet as well as Idiom, been placed in the firſt Column. However the Reader may obſerve by it three Things. 1. That the Words contained under the ſeveral Letters are formed agreeable to one common Rule in the Chineſe Language, tho' they are not equally numerous under each. 2. That according to the Portugueze and French way of writing, many of them appear to be of two or three Syllables, and muſt be ſo pronounced according to the Engliſh Orthography; whereas according to our way of writing them, they are all Monoſyllables, agreeable to the Genius of the Chineſe Language. 3. That the Change of Orthography is natural as well neceſſary; nor ſo difficult and uncertain as many are apt to think.

The chief Difficulty is in pronouncing certain Characters conſiſting of double Conſonants, which are not uſed in our Language; but as we have ſeveral other double and even ſome trèble Conſonants, a little Practice muſt make this eaſy. For Inſtance, it cannot be very difficult for an Engliſhman, who can ſay bran, fling, prong, ſwing, ſtrong, &c. to pronounce in one Sound, ſwen, ywen, Syang, Kyang, Hyang, ſven, lwi, tsyen; for the ſame Rule is to be obſerved in pronouncing fw, yw, ſy, &c together, that is obſerved in pronouncing br, fl, &c. that is, to pronounce them as if they were but one Letter; which is learned by putting a Vowel between, and pronouncing it very quick, ſo as by degrees to throw it quite out.

The Chineſe Coins, Weights and Meaſures, being aſcertain'd in this Work, by thoſe of the Portugueze and French, it will be neceſſary for the Reader's Information, to reduce the Latter to the Engliſh.

Coins. COINS and WEIGHTS. (E)

Portugueze Taël —— Value an Ounce of Silver, which in China is equivalent to 7 Livres, 10 Sols. But it goes only for 6 Shillings and 8 pence Engliſh.

French Livre —— About eleven pence Engliſh. 23 Livres at preſent are equivalent to a Guinea.

Sol or Sou —— The 20th part of a Livre, ſomewhat more than a Half-penny.

Denier —— The 12th part of a Sol.

Meaſures. MEASURES.

The Paris Foot —— To the Engliſh as 1068 is to 1000 or $12,\frac{816}{1000}$ Inches.

Toiſe or Fathom —— 6 Paris Feet, or 6 Feet 4,896 Inches Engliſh.

Great French League, 20 to a degree —— Contains 18,282 Engliſh Feet, or is equal to 3 Engliſh Miles, 3 Furlongs and 462 Feet.

Common French League, 25 in a degree —— Contains $14625\frac{3}{5}$ Engliſh Feet, or is nearly $2\frac{3}{4}$ Engliſh Miles.

Geometrical or Geographical Mile, 60 to a Degree —— Contains 5000 Geometrical Feet, each equal to $14,\frac{628}{1000}$ Inches Engliſh.

Engliſh Miles, of which $69\frac{1}{2}$ according to Norwood, and $69\frac{1}{4}$ according to the Academy of Paris go to a Degree. —— Contains 8 Furlongs, or 5280 Engliſh Feet.

(D) I take the French chua and chua to have the ſame Pronunciation, the rather becauſe the Portugueze has no Word in the Table anſwering to the latter. And perhaps the French Word anſwering Xoa, ſhould not be choua, but chua; as in the Letter Ch in the French Column oppoſite to Choa, we find tchoa, not tchoua.

A DISSERTATION concerning Mr. d'Anville's General Map; wherein the Situation given by him to Aſtrakhan, and his Method of graduating the ſaid Map, are examin'd, and ſhewn to be erroneous.

Deſign of Mr. d'Anville's General Map.

THE Deſign of this General Map is, not only to give us a general View of the Countries included in the particular Maps, but likewiſe of all the other Countries Weſtward to the Caſpian Sea. This we are told was done purſuant to the Requeſt of the Miſſionaries, who had provided ſome Materials for the Purpoſe †, and indeed had made a Map of the Whole themſelves, as appears from the Copy ſent into France by P. Regis, which was drawn from the Memoirs of the Tartars and Mandarins §: But thoſe Materials not being ſufficient to ſet the Geography of the Countries Weſt of Kâſhgar in a proper Light, they recommended the adjuſting that Part to the French Geographers. Accordingly Mr. d'Anville, Geographer in ordinary to the King, being apply'd to, readily undertook the Taſk, and having finiſhed it, to ſupport his Performance drew up a Memoir, which is inſerted in the Obſervations on Tibet at the end of this Work.

His Determination of the Longitude of Aſtrakhân

As the moſt important Point to be ſettled for regulating the reſt was the Longitude of Aſtrakhân, Mr. d'Anville examined the Diſtance very carefully between Paris and that City, by an uninterrupted Series of Meaſures, and found it to be 47 Degrees, 18 Minutes, according to the ordinary Method of projecting or graduating Maps: But on the Suppoſition that the Degrees of Longitude are one thirtieth part larger than they ought, he determined the Longitude of Aſtrakhân to be 48°. 55′. which are the extended Degrees reduced to contracted Degrees. Conſidering the Doctrine of the Contraction of the Degrees of Longitude in the Manner he ſuppoſes was at beſt uncertain, methinks it would have been Mr. d'Anville's ſafeſt way to have adhered to the Determination of 47°. 18′. according to the extended Graduation; eſpecially as it agreed within 18 Minutes of the Situation given Aſtrakhân by Mr. de l'Iſle in his Maps made for the Uſe of the preſent King of France, where it is put at 67 Degrees of Longitude Eaſt of Ferro, and conſequently 47 Eaſt of Paris.

'Tis true, there is no determining the Number of the Degrees of Longitude between two diſtant Places by Itinerary Meaſures alone, and as Mr. d'Anville (uncertain as to the due Content of the Degrees) made uſe only of ſuch, he could not determine whether the Longitude of Aſtrakhân ought to be 47°. 18′. or 48°. 55′. But if he had gone another way to work, and made uſe of Obſervations, as it may be preſumed Mr. de l' Iſle did, he might have been able to determine the Matter.

grounded on uncertain Principles, and erroneous.

The Obſervations I mean are thoſe made in Ruſſia, whereof the Principal is, that of the Longitude of Moskow, which places this City in 36°. 20′. Now ſuppoſing this Obſervation to be tolerably exact, as there is good Reaſon to believe it is (A), we ſhall have the Longitude of 4 Parts in 5 of the Space between Paris and Aſtrakhân determined to our Hands; and conſequently to determine the Longitude of Aſtrakhân, it remains only to ſettle the Meridian Diſtance between it and Moskow, which Mr. de l' Iſle (who has placed Moskow according to the above Obſervation) has adjuſted to 10°. 40′: So that Aſtrakhân muſt lie in about 47 Degrees Eaſt of Paris, as he places it; and there is the more Reaſon to believe his Determination to be pretty juſt, becauſe in that Space he had the Latitude of Aſtrakhân, and ſeveral of the intervening Places, beſides Olearius's Map of the Wolga and other helps, to guide him.

Thus it appears that the Longitude of Aſtrakhân is but about 47 Degrees, whether there be a Contraction of the Degrees or not: For in determining the Meridian Diſtance aſtronomically no Regard is had to the Content of the Degrees. If it be objected that the Meridian Diſtance between Moskow and Aſtrakhân determined by Meaſures is adjuſted according to the extended Graduation; I anſwer, that will cauſe but a ſmall Difference in the Situation, ſince, if it be ſettled according to the contracted Graduation, it will make the Longitude of Aſtrakhân but 47°. 21′. 20″: The Difference between contracted and extended Degrees amounting, in a Space of 10°. 40′. to no more than 21 Minutes 20 Seconds.

As therefore the Longitude of Aſtrakhân, regulated by that of Moskow, agrees ſo nearly with what Mr. d' Anville had determined it by Itinerary Meaſures according to the extended or common Graduation, I think it ought to be a convincing Proof with him, that 47°. 18′. or thereabouts, and not 48°. 55′. is the true Longitude of that City. And indeed if Mr. d'Anville was acquainted with the Longitude of Moskow, as it may be preſumed he was, I cannot conceive why he did not chooſe to make uſe of it in ſettling the Longitude of Aſtrakhân, rather than to depend wholly on Meaſures, eſpecially when he found his Computation in extended Degrees tally'd ſo well with Mr. de l' Iſle's Computation (according to the ſame Graduation) grounded on the Longitude of Moskow; unleſs it may be that he was ſo ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favour of his Hypotheſis of the Contraction that he would not admit of any Obſervation to be exact which ſeem'd to oppoſe it.

What probably occaſion'd his Miſtake.

I am of Opinion that what chiefly induced Mr. d'Anville to give Aſtrakhân ſo great an eaſterly Situation was, the Jeſuits Maps of Tartary, where ſeveral Parts ſeem to be placed at a Diſtance, not reconcilable with the Poſition given by the European Geographers to Aſtrakhân and the Caſpian Sea. But if the Lake of Aral in Khowârazm or Karezm has the Poſition and Extent given it in Mr. Kyrilow's Map of the Ruſſian Empire, there will not be ſo much Room to ſpare as Mr. d'Anville imagines. Beſides as this Geographer, by frequently varying from them, ſeems to have had ſufficient Cauſe not to think their Determinations infallible with reſpect to the Situation of Places, he ought as well to have concluded concluded the Fault lay on their Side, in placing those Parts many Degrees too far East ward(B), as to have supposed that our Geographers have either removed Astrakhân too much Westward, or extended the Space between Astrakhân and Pe king several Degrees beyond the Truth, in consequence of giving too great an Extent to the Degrees of Longitude.

(A) That the Longitude of Moskow, or rather Moskwâ, is tolerably exact, appears by comparing it with that of Peterſburg, lately found by Mr. de l'Iſle, the Aſtronomer (a Member of the Academy in this laſt City,) to be 27° 57′ 30″ Eaſt of Paris; which deducted from that of Moskow gives 8° 22′ 30″ for the Meridian Diſtance, differing about half a Degree in defect from the Map of Mr. de l'Iſle, who places Peterſburg ſo much more to the Weſt than it ought to be; but agreeing preciſely with Mr. Kyrilow's Map of the Ruſſian Empire publiſhed at Peterſburg in 1734, which, with regard at leaſt to the Situation of thoſe two Capitals, may be preſumed to be exact.

1st Conjecture enquired.

In effect, notwithstanding Mr. d'Anville has advanced Astrakhân so much Eastward, to bring the Caspian Sea nearer China, yet he was obliged to bring Kishgar two Degrees nearer the Caspian Sea than the Jesuits have placed it, in order to adjust its Situation to his own Notions of the Geography of those Parts. And in this perhaps he has not done amiss, the rather because the Situation of Kishgar was determined from Itineraries alone without Observations of the Latitude: But I believe he is to blame in placing Mount Altay one Degree more Eastward than the Jesuits have done; it should in all likelihood rather be removed so much more to the West if either way. This he has in some measure been forced to, by placing Astrakhân so much Eastward.

He varies from his Determination in the Map.

After all, I will not pretend to say the Longitude of Astrakhân, as computed by Mr. de l'Isle, is absolutely exact; on the contrary, I judge it ought to be put at least half a Degree more Eastward: However I do not impute his Mistake, if he has really committed any, to the common Method of graduating Maps, but the difficulty of settling the Longitude to any Degree of Certainty by Itinerary Measures, even when assisted with the Latitudes (C).

On the other hand, as nothing but an Observation made at Astrakhân can fully determine which Situation is the right, I will not presume absolutely to assert that Mr. d'Anville's Conclusion is wrong, tho' his Premisses be false: But whether it be so or not, this I will venture to affirm, that he was in the wrong to vary from himself, by giving that City a different Situation in his Map from what he had determined it by Computation.

The Meridian Difference between Paris and Pe king being 113°. 51'. according to the Observation of P. Gaubil, which Mr. d'Anville follows, Astrakhân, according to the above Determination of 48°. 55'. ought to lie in 64°. 56'. West of the Meridian of Pe king; whereas Mr. d'Anville has placed it in 62°. 46', which makes its Longitude from Paris 51°. 5'. This may appear very strange to other Geographers, but if we examine his Motives they will appear still stranger.

His Motives in converting extended into contracted Degrees by altering their Number.

Mr. d'Anville had but two ways rationally of exhibiting Places, that is, by graduating his Map either according to extended or contracted Degrees, without altering their Longitudes, at least as he had determined them himself: But neither of those Methods would serve his Purpose. As the Jesuits had projected their Maps after the ordinary Graduation, he considered that if he vary'd therefrom to follow his own Hypothesis of the Contraction of Degrees, the Countries included in the Part taken from them would want $\frac{1}{30}$ of the Dimensions given them therein; and if he lay'd the Situations down according to the extended Graduation, the Countries added by him would be as much extended beyond their true Dimensions. Mr. d'Anville therefore, desirous to avoid both these Inconveniencies, has taken a Method, which I believe was never employ'd, or indeed ever entered into the Head of any Geographer, before. For to conform to the Practice of the Jesuits, he projects his Map according to the ordinary extended Graduation: But that the Countries which he has added might not be too much extended, he reduced the Difference of Longitude between Astrakhân and Pe king in contracted Degrees to extended Degrees, by deducting 2°. 10'. for the 30th Part, according to his Hypothesis of the Contraction; whence Astrakhân comes to lie in 62°. 46'. instead of 64°. 56'. In consequence of this extraordinary proceeding, Mr. d'Anville has not only placed Astrakhân 2°. 10'. more East than he had determined it, but cut off 3°. 47'. of the Meridian Distance between Astrakhân and Pe king determined by numerous Observations, and admitted by himself to be just.

The first of these two Errors appears manifestly enough from the State of the Question: But on what Grounds such a Change can be justifiable is hard to discover. He cannot pretend that 62°. 46'. is the true Longitude, because he determined it to be 64° 56': 'Tis in vain to allege that 62° 46'. of the usual Graduation are equivalent to 64°. 56'. of his contracted Degrees; since, let that be as it will, there is still a Difference of 2°. 10'. in the Longitude. 'Twill be as little to the Purpose to say that the Countries have the same Extent as they would have in the other way of Graduation, since still they have not the same Situation: Unless he will maintain that a Geographer is at liberty to alter the Situations of Places as often as he alters the Manner of graduating his Maps; or that if Countries be lay'd down according to their true Extent, it matters not how wrongly they are situated as to Longitude and Latitude, which no Geographer I presume will pretend to assert.

3°. 47'. retrenched in the Distance between Paris and Pe king.

That Mr. d'Anville has retrenched 3° 47' from the Meridian Distance between Paris and Pe king is no less obvious: For whereas he places Astrakhân in 47°. 18'. of extended Graduation East of Paris, and in 62°. 46'. West of Pe king, these two Sums added together make but 110°. 4'. which deducted from 113°. 51'. (the Difference of Longitude between Paris and Pe king) there remain 3°. 47'. If Mr. d'Anville should still imagine, that he has made allowance for that Defect, by substituting 110°. 4'. of extended Degrees in place of 113°. 51'. of contracted Degrees, he is greatly mistaken; for tho' 110° 4'. of extended Degrees should be equal in Quantity to 113°. 51 of contracted, according to his way of reckoning, yet they are not equal in Number to them; which Number had been determined and admitted by him for the true Difference of Longitude between Paris and Pe king, and consequently could not be altered.

I

(B) On this occasion it may be proper to observe, that the Missionaries finding Astrakhân marked (by what mistake I know not) in Mr. de l'Isle's Chart of the Caspian Sea, at 67 Degrees East of Paris, instead of Forse, which is 20 Degrees more Westward, P. Gaubil sends P. Souciet Word in November 1725, that they were mightily embarrassed at Pe king, on account of a Map (possibly the Original of that sent to France as mentioned before) made in the Palace from the Report of certain Tartars who came from the Caspian Sea; and concludes that in Case Mr. de l'Isle has no good Observation made at Astrakhân, or some Place whose Distance from it is known, he is of Opinion, that City should be placed 7 or 8 Degrees more to the West †. Hence it appears, that in the Map just mentioned, Astrakhân is put 59 or 60 Degrees East of Paris, that is, about 54 or 55 Degrees West of Pe king, which is 10 Degrees nearer the Meridian of Pe king than Mr. d'Anville computes it, and 12 nearer than Mr. de l'Isle puts it. Now I will not say, that erroneous Situation given Astrakhân in the said Chart had influenced the Geographical Determinations of the Jesuits, and induced them to place Kâshgar and Mount Altay more Eastward than ordinary, because their Maps were made before Mr. de l'Isle's Chart came to their Hands: But I am of Opinion their General Map above mentioned, and Memoirs relating to the Distance from Kâshgar and Harkas to the Caspian Sea, might have influenced Mr. d'Anville in his Opinion of the Contraction of the Degrees of Longitude, and consequently in the Situation he has given Astrakhân.

(C) For Instance, Mr. Kyrilow, in his Map of the Russian Empire before mentioned, places Archangel in Russia, above 16 Degrees East of the Meridian of Petersburg, altho' Mr. de l'Isle, of the Academy there, found the Meridian Distance between those two Cities no more than 8°. 30'. which is an Error of 7°. 30'. in so short a Space. And there is the more Reason to believe that Observation is not very remote from the Truth, because his Brother in his latter Maps places it not above 10 Degrees to the East.

I grant that Degrees of Longitude may be ſuppoſed greater or leſſer in Quantity, and that Maps may be graduated with either Sort; I grant alſo that they may be converted one into the other by increaſing or diminiſhing the Quantity: But I deny that a leſſer Number of Degrees can be ſubſtituted in place of a greater, when the greater Number has been determined by exact Obſervations for the Difference of Longitude between two Places; becauſe that would be to alter the very Nature of the Longitude, which conſiſts properly in the Number, not the Quantity of Degrees: As in determining the Difference of Longitude between two Meridians, Aſtronomers determine the Number of Degrees independent of their Quantities, which differ in every Parallel; ſo that let the Quantities contained in the Degrees to be chang'd be what they will, their Number muſt be ſtill the ſame. It is obvious, therefore, that Mr. d'Anville's Notion of converting extended into contracted Degrees, and vice verſa, is abſurd, erroneous, and repugnant to the fundamental Principles of Geography, as making the Longitude variable and uncertain; and in effect after all he has not chang'd contracted into extended Degrees, as he imagines, but only contracted or reduced the Dimenſions of Countries by putting Places under wrong Meridians.

Longitude conſiſts in the Number not the Quantity of Degrees.

Mr. d'Anville has therefore impoſed on himſelf, and introduced Error and Confuſion to no purpoſe into his Map, which by this means is ſuch an odd Compoſition, that, according to his Method of graduating, Places in the Part added by him fall under wrong Meridians; and if it be graduated according to the contracted Degrees, Places, in the Parts taken from the Jeſuits Maps, whoſe Longitudes are determined by Obſervation, will fall under wrong Meridians, as will appear from the Map it ſelf, which I have graduated both ways: So that while one Part errs in reſpect of Dimenſions, the other Part errs interchangeably in reſpect of Situations. In ſhort, there is only one way of mending this Map, and that is by graduating the Part added by Mr. d'Anville, or perhaps rather all to the Weſt of China, with contracted Degrees, according to his Senſe of them, and the reſt in extended Degrees(D): And indeed this Courſe would have been much better than that which he has taken; for tho' the Projection would not have been uniform and regular, yet Places would have had their true Poſitions, which is the moſt eſſential End of Maps.

Other Errors incurred in conſequence of altering the Longitude.

To conclude: Mr. d'Anville was no more under a neceſſity of conforming to the Jeſuits Manner of Graduation, ſince he thought it falſe, than to their Manner in projecting his Map, in which he varies from them; and the rather, ſince he has not ſcrupled to alter the Poſitions as determined by them ſometimes 3 or 4 Degrees in his other Maps, as will be obſerved elſewhere: By which means he renders the Manner of Graduation uſeleſs, by altering the Dimenſions as well as Situations which Countries had in conſequence thereof.

From what has been urged I think it is evident that, ſuppoſing the Degrees of Longitude were leſs than they are commonly eſteemed, Mr. d'Anville had no reaſon to graduate his General Map in the Manner he has done. This is all I ſhall ſay to it at preſent: But in the Part of the Work above mentioned, where Mr. d'Anville is introduced giving an Account of it, I ſhall conſider the Situations of Places in the Countries added by him, and how far the Tables of the Oriental Geographers, which he has made uſe of, are to be rely'd upon. I ſhall alſo, in my Preface to the Second Volume, or before the Deſcription of Tartary, examine his General Maps of Tartary and Tibet, which differ both from the Jeſuits Maps, and his own General Map of all, which has been the Subject of our preſent Remarks. In the mean time, I muſt do Mr. d'Anville the Juſtice to declare that, however faulty his Map or Maps may be in the Particulars mentioned, he has notwithſtanding in other Reſpects diſcovered a great Capacity for Geography; that he has taken no ſmall Pains to conſult Authors, and adjuſt the Situation of Places, which is a very difficult Taſk where Obſervations are wanting; that he has put the Countries between the Rivers Amil and Sir in a much better Light for the general than they were in before; and in ſhort, that the Science is greatly obliged to him for his Endeavours to reform the Geography of thoſe Parts, which, as he obſerves, lie in great Confuſion.

Concluſion.

(D) The Map will anſwer both theſe Views tolerably well, if the Reader, in determining the Longitudes of Places, will make uſe of the pricked-line Meridians, from the 20th Weſtward of Peking for the Weſtern Parts, and the black-line Meridians for the Parts to the Eaſt of the 20th Meridian.

P. Du Halde's PREFACE

TO HIS

Deſcription of CHINA, CHINESE-TARTARY, &c.

CHINA has for a long Time paſt excited the Curioſity of Europeans; altho' the firſt Accounts they had of it gain'd very little Credit among them. The Narrative publiſh'd by the Venetian (A) who travelled over ſome Provinces of that Empire, in the Retinue of the Tartars, paſs'd for a Romance. All he recounts concerning the Antiquity of this Monarchy, the Wiſdom of its Laws and Government, the Fertility of its Lands, and Richneſs of its Trade, as well as the prodigious Multitude of its Inhabitants, the Politeneſs of their Manners, their Induſtry to promote Arts and Husbandry, their Taſte and Zeal for the Sciences; all this, I ſay, was look'd on as mere Fiction, which had not ſo much as the Air of Probability. We cou'd not believe that beyond ſo many half-barbarous Nations, and at the very Extremity of all Aſia, a powerful Nation was to be found ſcarce inferior to any of the beſt-govern'd States of Europe.

First Relations of China ſuſpected.

But by degrees theſe Prejudices diminiſhed, and that Author's Veracity began to be acknowledged, eſpecially when it appeared that what he had advanced agreed with the Accounts of the firſt Miſſionaries, who towards the End of the 15th Century found Admittance into China, which till then, out of a Principle of Policy, had been deny'd to Strangers. One cannot avoid giving Credit to the Teſtimony of Perſons whoſe Condition, Integrity, Capacity and Diſintereſtedneſs take away all Grounds of Suſpicion.

Verify'd by the Miſſionaries.

This awaken'd the Curioſity of People, and changed the Indifference which they ſhewed before for China into an earneſt Deſire to be acquainted with it. But this Curioſity gave riſe to a great many trifling and falſe Relations.

Curioſity gives riſe to trifling and

As ſoon as an European Veſſel arrived in a Port of China, it was uſual for ſome of the Ship's Crew, during the few Months ſtay they made there, to gather all the Information they cou'd, both from the Report of the Natives and their own Obſervation; this they committed to Writing, and at their Return gave out they had made great Diſcoveries: and it is from ſuch inaccurate Materials as theſe, pick'd up in the Outskirts of ſo vaſt a Country, that their Relations are compoſed.

Others again, with leſs ſincerity, have, in order to entertain their Readers, ſupply'd by Invention the Want of proper Remarks. This appears to be the Method taken by a certain Italian Traveller (B) who in a Book printed at Naples in 1720, entitled Giro del Mondo, [a Voyage round the World,] has given a particular Deſcription of the Emperor of China's Palace; of which he cou'd have no Idea, but what his Fancy ſuggeſted: and the more eaſily to gain Credit in what he advances, he makes no Scruple to affirm that Pere Grimaldi, Preſident of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, introduced him into the Palace.

fictitious Relations.

All that's true in this Matter is; That he was at Pe-king, and walk'd up and down that great City, follow'd by a Chineſe, who ſerved both as his Footman and Valet; that he frequently viſited the Jeſuits, who did him all the good Offices they were able; that he deſired them to get him a Sight of the Emperor, or at leaſt his Palace, but it was not in their Power; That coming to a Bridge, which it was neceſſary to paſs in going to the Palace, he was conſtrain'd to turn back, becauſe his Valet wou'd not venture any farther; and that he was oblig'd to leave Pe-king without ſeeing more of the Palace than the South-Gate, which is always ſhut.

(A) Marco Polo, commonly call'd Marcus Paulus Venetus, and Mark Paul the Venetian, who was in China toward the End of the 13th Century

(B) The Author here aimed at is Dr. I. Francis Gemelli Careri, well known by his Travels round the World, which were firſt publiſh'd about the Beginning of this Century, and have been printed in ſeveral Languages, and are to be found in the Fourth Volume of Churchill's Engliſh Collection. This Cenſure of Pere du Halde is doubtleſs taken from the Extract of a Letter from a Miſſionary at Pe-king, in the Preface to the 15th Volume of the Lettres Edifiantes & Curieuſes, p. 14.

The whole of this is Fact; whence it follows that the Description, which he has given of the Palace, the Halls, and Imperial Throne, the Audience he was at, and all the reſt, is purely his own Invention. How cou'd P. Grimaldi, notwithſtanding his high Station, without the Emperor's expreſs Order introduce an unknown Perſon into the Palace among the Members of a Tribunal going to Audience? a Thing which neither a Miniſter of State, nor even a Prince of the Blood has Power to do.

Ancient Accounts of China by 2 Arabian Merchants cenſur'd

But how unfaithfully ſoever others may have written of China, I am much ſurprized that an Author, (C) famous for his Parts and Learning, ſhou'd loſe his Time in tranſlating into French, and illuſtrating with long Diſſertations, two ancient Arabian Accounts concerning China, which are nothing but a Parcel of Abſurdities and Lyes. It needs no great skill in Criticiſm to perceive that the Writers of thoſe Accounts deſerve no manner of Credit, and never were in China; but when the Mind is once prejudiced, it is diſpoſed to adopt the moſt ridiculous Fables, and to receive every thing as Truth, which tends to run down the Perſons whom we do not love, and even make a Merit of not loving. (D)

All Men of Learning are not indued with that Sagacity and Penetration, to take a Thing in its proper Light at once, and to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe; as is found in thoſe rational and judicious Reflections made by a learned * Academician concerning China, and propoſed by way of Doubts to P. Parennin, who returned Satisfactory Anſwers.

The bad Tendency of injudicious and falſe Relations.

Relations that are either made without Judgment, fictitious, or written with Partiality, have a bad Effect on the Mind, by rendering thoſe ſuſpected which are faithful; and inſtilling, even into Perſons of Underſtanding, certain Prejudices, which they have much ado to ſhake off again. How many, for inſtance, are there who will not be perſuaded but the Chineſe carry the Origin of their Empire much higher than the Deluge, and even than the Creation itſelf?

But if ſo abſurd a Notion has entered into the Heads of a ſmall number of Chineſe, who have been deceived by the fictitious Epoch's of certain Aſtronomers, all the reſt of the Nation laugh at their Ignorance. What ſhould we ſay of thoſe Chineſe, who, on hearing that one European Author had aſſerted that the World has exiſted from all Eternity, ſhou'd conclude that to be the general Opinion over all Europe?

The Chineſe are guided by their Great Hiſtory, which, far from giving into ſuch Whimſies, fixes the Commencement of their Empire at Fo-hi: neither do they pretend to determin when that Monarch or his Succeſſors, down to Tau, began their Reigns, or how long they continued. But from the Time of their laſt named-Emperor they deem their Chronology ſure: and indeed there is very little to be corrected therein, either with regard to the Duration and Order of the reſpective Reigns, or the remarkable Events.

The beſt Accounts of China written by the Miſſionaries.

Whatever Prejudices certain Perſons may have entertained, thus far muſt be allowed, that the moſt exact Accounts we have of China came by way of the Miſſionaries; who have ſpent moſt part of their Lives either in the Capital City or Provinces of that great Empire, and were thereby qualify'd better than any others to give a faithful Account of it.

Yet hitherto defective.

Nevertheleſs the Relations, which they have hitherto publiſhed, are pretty much confined, and ſometimes even defective. Moſt of their Authors, being employed about the Affairs of their Miſſions, mind little more than to inform Europeans of the Diſpoſition they found thoſe People in to embrace the Faith, and of the Progreſs of the Goſpel amongſt them. So that if they mention any thing remarkable relating to the Country, it is only occaſionally and in brief, without dwelling on the Subject. Some indeed, at the requeſt of the Learned in Europe, have at their leiſure Hours enter'd deeper in their Enquiries; but their Obſervations, tho' pretty curious in themſelves, have ſometimes wanted Exactneſs, as being taken from the Chineſe Books, whoſe Authors are naturally inclined to exaggerate the Rarities and Wonders of their Country.

Principally as to the Geography.

The Points wherein they have happened to be miſtaken principally regard the Geography, occaſion'd by their depending a little too much on the Accuracy of the Chi Shû; which are certain Books, containing the Hiſtory of every City and its Diſtrict. Among other remarkable Things to be found in theſe Books, are the Plan of the City, and the Number of Market Towns and Villages belonging to it, with their Diſtances from one another. Theſe Diſtances are reckon'd by Li's or Furlongs, which are of different Lengths in different Provinces; juſt like the Leagues of the different Provinces of Kingdoms in Europe. The City of Tong-chew, for inſtance, which lies Eaſt of Pe-king, is reckon'd to be 40 Li's diſtant: nevertheleſs according to the Meaſure employed by the Miſſionary Geographers, who made the Maps, the Diſtance is not above 30; in the Province of Shang-tong, 10 Li's make but 8 of their Li's, which are almoſt equal to thoſe uſed in the North Part of the Province of Hu-quang. But the Provinces of Kyang-nan, Fo-kyen and ſome others, reckon the Li's very differently, as the Miſſionaries found by comparing them with the ſame Meaſure. This is ſufficient to ſhew that the Longitudes given by the Peres Martini and Noel (E) cannot be exact, becauſe they were determined by the Diſtances as computed by the Chineſe in Li's or Furlongs, whereof the exact Length ought to be known before they are made uſe of.

Inaccuracy of P. P. Martini's and Noel's Tables;

(C) This is the late Abbe Renaudot, Member of the Academy of Inſcriptions at Paris, eminent for his Skill in the Oriental Languages. There is a ſmart Critique of P. Premare, on the Book in Queſtion, publiſhed by P. du Halde, in the Lettres Edifiantes, Tom. 19. but the Work is not altogether ſo faulty as that Jeſuit would repreſent it: it has been tranſlated lately into Engliſh.

(D) This Maxim will be found to be almoſt univerſal, but none will apply it to themſelves.

* M. Dortous de Mairan of the Academy of Sciences. See the 21ſt Tome of the Lettres Edifiantes & Curieuſes, p. 76.

(E) The firſt in his Atlas Chinenſis, and the latter in his Obſervationes Math. & Phyſ. in India and China.

In like manner the Peres Regis and Jartoux, by the Obſervations made with excellent Inſtruments, both at Si-ning where they dwelt a Month, and at other Cities, always found a Difference of 29 or 30 Minutes between the Altitude taken by themſelves and that taken by P. Grueber; whether it was that the Inſtruments uſed by that Jeſuit were too ſhort and not well (F) divided, which is very likely, or that he had no regard to the Diameter of the Sun. and of Grueber's Obſervations.

For the reſt, I don't think we ought in the leaſt to ſuſpect the Veracity of certain Miſſionaries who reſiding in thoſe fine Provinces, where Nature ſeems to have ſcatter'd all her Riches, have, by their charming Deſcriptions, given occaſion to imagin that all the reſt of the Provinces were like them: For ſince they ſpeak only of what they ſaw themſelves, they are not to be blamed for the falſe Concluſions of others, nor is what they have written the leſs true on that Score. They had not then travelled over all the Provinces, as they have ſince done, by means whereof they have acquired a moſt particular and exact Knowledge of the Country. The Miſſionaries vindicated.

In ſhort Pere le Comte, who has written ſo agreeably about China, confined himſelf to certain Matters; and is ſo far from pretending to give a methodical Relation of the whole, that he confeſſes his Letters ought to be conſider'd only as Memoirs, which might be of uſe to thoſe who had Thoughts afterwards of publiſhing a more complete Deſcription. P. le Comte's Memoirs not extenſive enough.

'Tis in compoſing ſuch a Deſcription that I have been at Work for ſeveral Years; and the Quantity as well as Variety of Matters, compriſed in the Propoſals which I publiſhed, has cauſed ſome to doubt whether the Execution wou'd come up to the Deſign: yet however vaſt it appears, I hope it will be found that I have even done more than I promiſed. At leaſt I have ſpared no Pains to make known every thing, with regard to that large Portion of the Earth, that deſerved Notice; and to aſſure myſelf of the Truth of whatever I relate concerning it. The Author's Deſign.

I have had in my Hands a prodigious quantity of Memoirs ſent from China; which (tho' moſt of the Things contained in them were foreign to my Deſign) I was not tired with reading, becauſe I met from time to time with ſuch Particulars, as either were not known, or elſe confirmed the Truth of what has been publiſhed already in the printed Relations. Whence he had his Materials.

Beſides, the frequent Converſations I have had with certain Miſſionaries returned from China, during their Stay in Europe, but eſpecially the neceſſary and continual Correſpondence carry'd on for theſe 24 Years paſt with the other Miſſionaries in all Parts of the Empire, have ſupply'd me with all the Helps and Informations which I had occaſion for. Some of them have even had the Complaiſance to tranſlate with great Care certain Books of the learned Chineſe, which are inſerted in this Work, and furniſh Proofs to many of the Facts related by me.

In ſhort, the whole being finiſhed, I had reſolved to ſend it to China, in order to have it examined by ſome or other of the oldeſt Miſſionaries; but while I was thinking of the moſt proper Means of doing it, I was informed that Pere Contancin, whom I had chiefly in View, was arrived in France, having been ſent into Europe about the Affairs of the Miſſion. His Care to procure Accuracy to his Work.

That able and experienced Father, who had lived 30 Years in China (10 at Pe-king, where he had been Superior of the Jeſuits Houſe, and the reſt of the Time in different Provinces) ſtay'd more than a Year at Paris, during which Time he had leiſure to read over this Work, more than once, and examine it with the moſt critical Attention. By means of his Aſſiſtance, in clearing up certain doubtful Points, as well as adding ſeveral curious Particulars, I am convinced that I advance nothing which is not ſtrictly Fact, and hence it is that I hope to avoid the Cenſure I have paſſed on others.

As to the Order of diſpoſing the Materials, it is the ſame with that obſerved in the Propoſals, excepting that I have inſerted the compendious Hiſtory of the Chineſe Monarchy in the firſt Tome (G); becauſe the previous Knowledge of what relates to the Emperors and the Tranſactions during their Reigns, is neceſſary for the more eaſily underſtanding the Matters that are handled afterwards. Method and Plan of the Work.

For the ſame Reaſon I begin with a general View of the Empire, containing a ſummary Account of the Things which are treated more at large in the Body of the Work. This is followed by a ſhort Hiſtory of certain People, particularly the Si-fan: which Nation heretofore formed a powerful Dominion, till Civil Wars rent it in Pieces, and compelled them at length to ſubmit to the Chineſe Emperors to whom they were formidable before. General View of China

I ought not to omit the curious Travels of certain Miſſionaries in China, wherein is mark'd down very particularly what daily occurred to their Obſervation; inſomuch that in reading, one ſeems to accompany them on the Road. Theſe Relations prepare us for the Deſcription that follows of the 15 Provinces which compoſe the Empire. Travels of Miſſionaries

This preſents to our View a great Number of ſplendid Cities, celebrated on account of their Situation and Extent; the Multitude of their Inhabitants; the extraordinary Concourſe of the Chineſe drawn thither for ſake of Trade; the Beauty of the publick Buildings, and Plenty which reigns therein: there alſo one beholds the Produce of fertile Lands, (which often yield two Crops in one Year) in Corn, Trees, and remarkable Fruits; Metals of all ſorts, Minerals and precious Marble dug from the Bowels of the Mountains; extraordinary Plants, whoſe Roots are ſo wholeſome, and thrive in no other Climate; numerous Lakes, and Canals, as well as large and deep Rivers, which abound with all Kinds of Fiſh; a ſurprizing Multitude of Stupendous Bridges, which are very ſtrong, and not only embelliſhed with divers Ornaments of Sculpture, but every Way fitted for the publick Conveniency; in a word, all the Advantages which Art and Nature can contribute, for the Neceſſaries and Pleaſures of Life. Deſcription of the ſeveral Provinces

Beſides

(F) See the Travels of the Peres Grueber and Dorville from China to India, thro' Tibet and Laſſa, in Thevenot's French Collection of Voyages and Travels.

(G) The Reference is here made to the Original, which conſiſts of four Tomes.

Maps and Plans. Beſides the general Map of all, including China, Chineſe Tartary, and Tibet as far as the Caſpian Sea, there is in this Tome a general Map of China itſelf, and a particular Map of each Province, with ſeveral Plans of the Cities, which differ in Figure from thoſe of other Countries.

Annals of the Emperors. In ſhort, this firſt Tome concludes with a ſuccinct Hiſtory of that great and ancient Monarchy: wherein I conform, as I ought, to the Opinion univerſally received among the Chineſe, who deduce their Chronology from the Reign of the Emperor Yau, and look upon it as indubitable down to the preſent; as I have remarked in the (1) Advertiſement prefixt to that Hiſtory.

After giving theſe general Notices of China, I enter into a more particular Detail of what concerns that Nation as to their Character, Manners, Cuſtoms, Government, Progreſs in the Sciences, Religion, Morality, &c. which I handle in ſo many ſeparate Articles, and, I flatter myſelf, as fully as the Subject required.

Government of China. I ſpeak firſt of the Antiquity and Extent of that Monarchy; the Authority of the Emperor, his Expences, Revenues, Houſehold, the Magnificence of his Palace, and his Retinue when he goes abroad; the Form of Government both Civil and Military; the proper Functions of the Mandarins, their Power, and the Honour paid them; the Forces of the Empire, the Fortreſſes, the Soldiery, their Arms and Artillery; the Policy which is obſerved, as well in the Cities for maintaining good Order, as in the great Roads for the Safety and Conveniency of Travellers.

Character of the Chineſe. Next I treat of the Genius and Character of the Chineſe, their Air, Phyſiognomy, Faſhions; their Houſes, and elegant Furniture thereof; the Puniſhments inflicted on Criminals, and the Regulations obſerved in the Priſons where they are confined.

I proceed to ſhew how Merit, which alone confers Nobility in China, may be acquired, and how much it differs from the European. As the Grandees are Enemies to Luxury, ſo far as concerns their Perſons, they make the better Figure when they appear abroad: we ſhall here ſee what Magnificence the Chineſe affect in their Journeys, and Feaſts; as well as in their publick Works, ſuch as Bridges, Triumphal Arches, Gates, Towers, Walls of their Cities, &c.

Ceremonies. Every Thing is regulated in China, even to the moſt common Duties of Society: which gives me an Occaſion to ſpeak of the Ceremonies obſerved by them in point of Civility; in their Viſits, and the Preſents they make one another; in their Letters, Feaſts, Marriages and Funerals.

Agriculture. With regard to the Commonalty, they are wholly employ'd either about Husbandry, Manufactures, or Trade. This leads me to ſpeak of the Eſteem ſet upon Agriculture, and thoſe who apply themſelves to it; of the Skill and Induſtry of the Mechanics; the incredible Trade carry'd on in the Heart of the Empire; the numerous Lakes and Rivers, which render the Provinces fertile and produce Plenty; the Barks and Veſſels of Burden for tranſporting ſo many rich Commodities from one Province to another; of the antient Coins, and thoſe current at preſent in the Empire.

Manufactures. Their principal Trade with Foreigners, eſpecially the Europeans, conſiſting in Varniſhed Works, Porcelain and Silks; I ſhew how the Varniſh and China Ware are made: and give the Tranſlation of an antient Chineſe Author, who teaches us the Method of managing and rearing the Silk-Worms, ſo as to encreaſe and improve the Breed. Theſe Matters are render'd ſtill more intelligible by the Plates, where ſomething of each is repreſented after the Life.

As the Sciences cultivated in China are the only Way to Honours and Employments, and conſiſt chiefly in a thorough Knowledge of their Laws, Hiſtory and Morality, they deſerve a more than ordinary Attention. I introduce this Part, by informing the Reader what ſort of Language. Idea he ought to have of the Chineſe Language, ſo widely different from all others both dead and living. In order to this, I remark what is the Genius of it, and how the Words, which are all Monoſyllables, muſt be pronounced, annexing a ſhort Sketch of the Grammar of that Tongue: after which I ſhew how the Chineſe make their Ink, and different Sorts of Paper; with their Method of printing and binding Books.

Education. I proceed next to give an Account of the Studies peculiar to the Chineſe Youth, the different Degrees thro' which they paſs before they commence Doctor, and the Examinations they muſt undergo to obtain them. For the Reader's better Information I have inſerted an Extract of a Chineſe Book on that Subject: wherein is ſhewn, the Method to be obſerved in teaching Students; the Choice to be made of Maſters; the Paſſages of Hiſtory neceſſary to be learned in order to form the Manners; the Examination of thoſe who aſpire to different ſorts of Degrees; a Specimen of the Diſcourſes made in the Aſſembly of the Literati; laſtly, the Plan of an Academy, or Society of Learned Men.

Literature. Theſe are only, as it were, the Preliminaries naturally leading to the Chineſe Literature, that is, to the Knowledge of thoſe Books, ſo antient and highly eſteemed among them, call'd King: by which Word they underſtand a ſublime and ſolid Doctrine, grounded on ſure Principles. Of theſe they reckon five, which they conſider as Canonical Books of the firſt Order, and call U-king, or The five Books, by way of Excellence.

Canonical Books of the firſt Order. I have given the Subſtance of theſe 5 Books, viz. (1.) the I-king, a Work purely Symbolical. (2.) the Shu-king, which contains the remarkable Events under the firſt Emperors and Legiſlators of the Nation; their Inſtructions about Government; with their Laws and Regulations touching Manners, whereof thoſe antient Heroes were ſo many Patterns. From this I have given ſome Extracts. (3.) the Shi-king, conſiſting of Odes or Poems, wherein the Elogies of illuſtrious Men are recited, and the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Empire recorded. Some of theſe Odes have been ſelected, and faithfully tranſlated. (4.) the Chun-tſyu, which is inferior to the three former, yet is very much eſteemed by the Learned: It contains the Annals of the Kingdom of Lu, the ſame at preſent with the Province of Shan-tong. (5.) the Li-ki, being a ſort of Memorial of the Laws, Ceremonies and Duties of a Civil Life.

From theſe Books, which are of greateſt Antiquity, I paſs to the four Claſſical or Canonical Books of the ſecond Rank, call'd Tſe-ſhu: Theſe properly are no more than Expoſitions and Aphoriſms, grounded on thoſe antient Monuments; and were either written by Confuçius, or compiled by his Diſciples, out of the Maxims and Diſcourſes of that celebrated Philoſopher, whom the whole Nation look upon as their Maſter. Firſt, I give an Abridgment of his Life, and after that an Extract of the moſt eſſential Matters, according to the Order of the Chapters or Heads contained in each of his Works; which are, (1.) the Ta-hyo, that is, the Great Science, or Science of Adults; (2.) the Chong-yong, or immutable Medium, which is that juſt Mean to be found between the two Extremes wherein Virtue conſiſts; (3.) the Lun-yu, that is, moral and pithy Diſcourſes; (4.) Meng-tſe, or, the Book of the Philoſopher Mençius, which gives the Idea of a perfect Government.

To theſe four Books I ſubjoin two others, which are very much eſteem'd, and placed by the Chineſe among their Claſſical Books: The firſt has the Title of Hyau-king, that is, concerning Filial Reſpect, and contains the Anſwers made by Confuçius to his Diſciple Tſeng; the ſecond is named Syau-hyo, which ſignifies the Science or School of Children.

This is properly what is call'd the Chineſe Science, which compriſes the fundamental Principles of their Government, and maintains ſuch good Order in the Empire: This, in effect, is the Science moſt proper for Man, ſeeing it has regard directly to his Conduct, and the Means of rendring him perfect according to his State and Condition.

Conſtitution of the Chineſe Government.

Some, perhaps, may think, that the Government of China, which was grounded originally on ſuch Principles, has been gradually weaken'd during a long Series of Years, and under ſo many different Monarchs: But the Chineſe themſelves inform us, that they have never deviated from thoſe wiſe Maxims. This will appear from a curſory View of moſt of the Dynaſties, as they ſtand in a Collection made by the Orders and Direction of the late Emperor Kang-hi, whoſe Reign was ſo long and glorious.

Collection of Edicts, Diſcourſes &c.

In this curious Collection we meet with the Diſcourſes and Reflections made by thoſe who were moſt eminent in the State on account of their Dignity, Experience and Knowledge. Part of theſe are the Edicts, Declarations and Ordinances of different Emperors, and their Inſtructions which they ſent to the Kings, Tributary Princes and Magiſtrates; the reſt are the Diſcourſes and Remonſtrances of the Prime Miniſters, and other Perſons moſt famed for Wiſdom throughout the Realm, to the Emperor. The Whole of what they ſay turns principally upon good or bad Government, the Improvement of Agriculture, the Means of comforting the People, and ſupplying their Neceſſities, the Art and Difficulty of Reigning; on War, the Advancement of Learning, &c. At the End of moſt of theſe Pieces are brief Remarks of the Emperor Kang-hi, a Prince skilful in the Art of Reigning, written with a red Pencil, that is, with his own Hand.

The ſame Matters are handled in two other Books, of which I have given very ſhort Abſtracts: The Firſt was compiled under the Dynaſty of the Ming; the Second is intitled The illuſtrious Women; whereby in like manner it appears that, under different Reigns, the Chineſe Ladies governed themſelves and their Families according to thoſe Maxims.

It appearing from theſe Evidences, that the fundamental Principles of the Government have been always maintained in China by a conſtant Obſervance of them, it is no wonder at all that a State of ſuch vaſt Extent has ſubſiſted for ſo many Ages, and ſtill ſubſiſts in all its Splendor.

Religions in China.

From this Detail of the Chineſe Form of Government, I proceed to conſider the Religion of theſe People; their Morality; the Knowledge they had of other Sciences; their Taſte in Hiſtory, Poetry, and the Drama; and laſtly, their Skill in point of Medicine. Theſe are the Matters contained in the third Volume.

With regard to the Religions approved of, or tolerated in China, I exhibit, according to the Order of Time, the Doctrines of the different Sects: Here I treat of (1.) the Worſhip of the antient Chineſe, drawn from their claſſical Books; but without ſtaying to explain what they underſtand by * Tyen and † Shang-ti which is the Object of their Worſhip, I leave the Reader to his own Judgment; (2.) the Sect of Tau-tſe, whoſe Syſtem I deſcribe; (3.) the Sect of the Idol Fo, where I explain what thoſe Idolaters call internal and external Doctrine; (4.) the Sect of certain modern Literati, who have made a ſort of Philoſophy of their own, by means whereof, adhering not ſo much to the Text of the antient Books as the Gloſſes and Comments of ſome late Writers, they pretend to ſolve every Thing according to natural Cauſes: A Treatiſe I have inſerted in form of Dialogue, wherein one of theſe modern Philoſophers unfolds his Syſtem concerning the Origin and State of the World, will ſhew how much theſe Smatterers in Learning are miſtaken.

The Eſtabliſhment and Progreſs of the Chriſtian Religion in this Empire being an Article too intereſting to be omitted, I thought myſelf obliged to give the Hiſtory of it; wherein, tho' I cou'd not avoid ſpeaking occaſionally of the Conteſts which aroſe latterly among the Missionaries, yet I handle them very slightly, acting herein the Part of an Historian, and relating simply, and in few Words, what has been said on both Sides.

Moral Philosophy. Moral Philosophy has been all along the principal Study of the Chinese, and it is chiefly by their Abilities therein that they attain to the Honours and Dignities of the Empire; but as, in order to be thoroughly informed what their Notions and Maxims are with regard to the Regulation of Manners, it will be necessary to hear what some of their Sages have written thereon, I have given the Abridgement of two Books of Morality: the one pretty Modern, and much esteem'd in the Country; the other more antient, containing Reflections, Maxims and Examples in point of Behaviour.

The Authors of these two Treatises have done no more than explained the Principles dispersed thro' those antient and venerated Books above mention'd. Altho' that on the one Hand, I grant there are among them found Maxims, useful Reflections, and laudable Instances; yet on the other, I disapprove whatever is vicious or criminal in the Actions which they relate, as well as what is false or out of the way in their Remarks and Maxims. (M)

Mathematics. The other Sciences have not been wholly neglected by the Chinese; but whether they have made any considerable Progress in them, may be judged from the Account I have given. The Reader will at least understand what the Missionary Jesuits have done to assist them in improving some of those Sciences, particularly Astronomy, wherein they were most versed; and in teaching them other Parts of Mathematics which they were ignorant of.

Poetry and History. For the rest, it can't be deny'd but they have a Taste for Poetry, and especially History; whether we regard the History of their own Nation, which they write faithfully, and without Partiality: or the little Histories they compose not unlike our Romances; which are filled with variety of Incidents contrived to amuse the Fancy, but whose sole End is almost constantly to discourage Vice and recommend Virtue, like those I have inserted, which I believe will afford Pleasure in reading

I cannot say so much in behalf of their Tragedies, which are formed on Notions very different from ours. However that which I have given, being carefully translated, will shew their Genius, and what they have been able to do this way on their own Bottom, since they never corresponded with any other polite and learned People.

Medicine. It remains only to speak of the Medicine of the Chinese, and their Method of Practice. This I have done by explaining first the general System in use with their Physicians, and afterwards shewing what is singular among them, namely, their Skill in judging of Distempers by feeling the Pulse, and knowing the Use of their Simples for composing their Remedies. To illustrate this the more, I have inserted three of their Works: The first is a Treatise intitled the Secret of the Pulse, the Author whereof lived some Ages before Christ; The second is a brief Extract of a Chinese Herbal; and the third a Collection of Recipes, made use of by their Physicians in the Cure of divers Distempers.

To these I have added another Extract of a Work, whose Author is not at all favourable to the Physicians of his own Nation. He teaches his Countrymen how they may do without the Assistance of Doctors or their Drugs, by means of a Regimen which he prescribes, and had try'd with Success; he pretends to have found out an easy way of prolonging one's Days in perfect Health, and becoming our own Physician. This concludes the three Volumes which treat of China: wherein I think I have taken notice of every Thing that is necessary in furnishing a complete Account of that Empire.

Description of Chinese Tartary. The Fourth and last Volume is wholly taken up with the Description of Chinese Tartary, Korea, and Tibet: Of which vast Countries hitherto we have known little more than the Names, as any one may be convinced, by only casting an Eye on the Maps of our ablest Geographers. But here he shall meet with a particular Account of them, partly from the Geographical and Historical Remarks which I have inserted relating to the different Countries; and partly from Travels of P. Gerbillon. the Eight Journals of P. Gerbillon's Travels into Tartary, by Order of the Emperor, or in his Retinue. That Father sets down in a very particular Manner whatever occurr'd to him from day to day concerning those vast Regions, which extend from China as far as the Russian Dominions. And I question whether the Readers cou'd have acquir'd a more thorough Knowledge of them, in case they had performed those long and painful Travels themselves.

Altho'

(M) The following Lines, which come in here, being foreign to the Subject, we have thought the Notes the most proper Place for them; if rather such Digressions ought not to have been consider'd as Excrescences, and thrown out.

We are far from intending to introduce the Chinese Doctors into Europe to give Lectures on Virtue. The Light of the Gospel shines out among us in full Lustre, and exposes clearly to our View what the whole Strength of human Wisdom has been able to give us but a Glimpse of.

Whatever the Sages of China, as well as the antient Philosophers, have taught worthy Commendation, it has been owing to the Light of Reason, in following which they have acquired some small Knowledge of Truth and its Principles. Whereas Christians have a perfect Knowledge thereof, inasmuch as they know J. C. who is the Truth itself, the sovereign Reason and subsisting Wisdom of God. All human Wisdom is but Folly, if it does not lead to J. C. his Doctrine is to be found no where but in the Scriptures, which have the Character of the Divinity stamp'd on them; and it is to this heavenly Doctrine, that every Man, who has not a Mind to be led away with vain Reasonings, ought inviolably to adhere, as to the pure Fountains of Truth.

The Chinese Sages have indeed known some Truths, but neither they, nor the antient Philosophers, so much cry'd up, have known them all: in the Christian Law alone consummate Righteousness is to be found; nor can any one arrive at true Wisdom but by embracing its Rules, and putting them in Practice.

If the Chinese Philosophers have sometimes spoken concerning Humility, the very Name of which was unknown to the Pagan Sages, yet it appears that they understood nothing more thereby than that outward Respect which we ought to have for one another, consisting in a certain Composure of the Countenance, peculiar Postures of the Body, such as falling on the Knees, or prostrate on the Ground; certain Marks of Submission and Obedience paid to Parents, Magistrates, and all Persons in Authority; but that internal Humility, which teaches us to humble our Hearts before God, to acknowledge our Faults, not to be presumptuous, nor attribute any Thing to our own Strength; all this is only to be learned, as St. Augustin observes, from the Doctrine and Actions of J. C. when he tells us learn from me, for I am meek and humble of Heart; when being infinitely great, he made himself little to come to us; when having no Sin of his own to blot out or expiate, he submitted even to Death, and the Cross. He only was capable of teaching and making us love a Virtue so sublime and little known, which is however the Basis of all other Virtues.

Altho' by my Propoſals I am not obliged to meddle with that Part of Tartary which belongs to the Ruſſians, yet I have inſerted both the Map and Relation of the new Diſcoveries made by Captain Beerings in his Travels from Tobolsk as far as (N) Kamchatka, where he was ſent by the late Czar, to examine if there was a Paſſage thence into North America. Of Captain Beerings thro' Siberia.

I conclude the whole with a Table of part of the Latitudes which were obſerved, and the Longitudes reſulting from the Geometrical Operations, which the Miſſionaries made uſe of in order to draw the Maps inſerted in this Work. Theſe Longitudes are reckon'd from the Meridian of Pe-king, being unwilling to reduce them to that of Paris for fear of committing ſome Miſtake. (O) The Latitudes were obſerved with excellent Inſtruments and great Care. They have not inſerted in this Catalogue, all that were determin'd, becauſe ſeveral of the Obſervations were made in Places, which either wanted a Name, or were too inconſiderable to be inſerted in the Maps. (P) Table of Latitude and Longitude.

As theſe Maps make a conſiderable and very intereſting Part of our Deſign, it may doubtleſs be expected, that I ſhould give an Account of the Motives which induced the Emperor Kang-hi to have them drawn, and of the Method taken by the Miſſionaries in executing the Work. An Account of the Maps.

That great Monarch having perceived the Accuracy of the European Methods from a Map of the Country about Pe-king, which the Miſſionaries had made by his Order, reſolved to have Maps of all the Provinces of his Empire, as well as of Tartary ſo far as is under his Subjection, drawn after the ſame Manner. In recommending this Work to the Miſſionaries, he ſpoke to them in the moſt obliging Terms, proteſting publickly that he looked on this great Undertaking as a Matter of vaſt Importance to the Empire, and that he wou'd ſpare no coſt to have it completed. The firſt Occaſion of them.

In effect, a few Days after he commanded the great Tribunals to nominate Mandarins to ſuperintend the Meaſurements, to the end that they might give the exact Names of the moſt remarkable Places they were to paſs thro'; and cauſe the Magiſtrates of Towns to attend on the Bounds of their reſpective Diſtricts with their People, and afford ſuch other Aſſiſtance as ſhou'd be deem'd requiſite. All this was performed with ſurprizing Punctuality; which is a manifeſt Proof of the admirable Order and Policy obſerv'd through that vaſt Empire.

The Work was begun the 4th of July 1708, according to our Way of reckoning, or according to the Chineſe Kalendar, on the 16th of the 4th Month of the 47th Year of Kang-hi. The Peres Bouvet, Regis and Jartoux, undertook to determine the exact Situation of the famous Wall that ſeparates China from Tartary; which affording a great Number of remarkable Points, by means of the Gates that give Entrance into the Empire, and ſo many fortify'd Towns with which it is as it were flank'd, might ſerve to regulate the Longitudes of the Northern Provinces whereof it is the boundary, and conſequently of all thoſe that are contiguous to them. P. P. Bouvet, Regis and Jartoux begin with ſurveying the Great Wall.

P. Bouvet falling ſick after 2 Months application, P. P. Regis and Jartoux continued the Work, and did not return to Pe-king till the January 10, 1709.

The Map which they brought home with them, and was above 15 Foot long, exhibited not only all the windings of this Wall, which ſometimes mounts to the tops of Mountains, and ſometimes deſcends into the loweſt Vallies, according to the Diſpoſition of the Land, but alſo all the Streights of the Mountains, and Gates great and ſmall, to the Number of about 300; all the Forts and Military Places, even thoſe which, being built at a certain Diſtance from the Wall, ſeem to have been erected purely to ſupport the others that are near them. In ſhort, it exhibits the Poſitions of all the neighbouring Places, on both ſides the Wall, as well as the Paſſage in and out of the moſt inconſiderable Rivers. Map of it 15 Foot long.

The Emperor who was much pleaſed with this Map, no longer doubting the Succeſs of the Undertaking, became more earneſt than ever to have it executed in the beſt Manner.

The 8th of May 1709, the Peres Regis, Jartoux, and Fridelli a German, whom the Emperor had joined with them, ſet out from Pe-king to begin the Geography of Eaſtern Tartary, which is properly the Country of the Manchews who at preſent have the Dominion in China. Map of Eaſtern Tartary and Lyautong made by P. P. Regis Jartoux and Fridelli.

This was a difficult Task, becauſe that Country having been as it were abandoned for many Years, it ſeem'd ſcarce poſſible to find the neceſſary Supplies of Men, Horſes and Proviſions, for a Work that was to continue for ſeveral Months. But as nothing eſcaped the Emperor's foreſight, he gave ſo good Orders to the Manchew Mandarins who govern the Cities, whereon thoſe uninhabited Countries depend, and thoſe Orders were ſo punctually executed, that the Work was never retarded. In advancing towards thoſe Parts they determined the Situations of the principal Places of the Province of Lyau-tong or Quan-tong, bounded on the South by the Great Wall, which having been ſurvey'd the Year before ſerved as a Baſis to the Work. In ſhort the Map made this Year comprized the Province of Lyau-tong, the antient Country of the Manchews, the northern Bounds of Korea ſeparated from it by the (Q) Tumen River, the Territories of the Tartars call'd Iu-pi Ta-ſe, the Habitations of the Ke-cheng Ta-ſe, which extend to the Mouth of the greateſt River in Tartary, named by the Tartars, Saghalian Ula, and by the Chineſe

(O) For our Parts we ſee no Inconveniency in reckoning Longitude from Paris more than Pe-king, but think it beſt to compute from both Places.

(P) The Author ſeems to be miſtaken here. An Obſervation of the Latitude at any Place wou'd help to give Authority to that Part of the Map where it was ſituated, tho' the Name were unknown. An Obſervation wou'd even intitle a Village to a Place in a Map before a City which wanted that Advantage, and render it conſiderable in Geography, however abject it might be in itſelf.

(Q) In the Orig. Toumen Oula, but as Oula or Ula ſignifies a River, I thought fit to omit it, to prevent the Tautology.

Chineſe, He-long-kyang; in a word, all the Diſtricts of the Mongol Princes, whom the Chineſe call Tſan Ta-ſe, from the 45th Degree of Latitude to the 40th by which they returned.

This Work was very agreeable to the Emperor, as well as to the Manchews born at Pe-king, who there beheld their antient Country, and were able to learn more from it in a quarter of an Hour than by diſcourſing with ever ſo many Travellers.

Map of Pe-che-li, made by the ſame Fathers.

Theſe three Fathers were ſcarce arrived at Pe-king when they had Orders to begin upon the Map of the Province of Pe-che-li, which is that of the Court. They ſet out the 10th of Dec. the ſame Year, and did not finiſh it till the 20th of June 1710. The Province is large, and contains a great number of Cities, whoſe Poſitions were not to be neglected, otherwiſe the mutual Diſtances wou'd have been greater or leſſer than they ought, or the Bearings of the Towns already mark'd down wou'd have diſagreed with the Obſervations.

This Map was the more acceptable, as the Province it deſcribed was well known. The Emperor took the Pains to examine it himſelf, and ſeeing the Places juſtly exhibited which he had often paſſed thro', and cauſed to be meaſured by the Manchews, (whoſe Buſineſs it is to ſurvey the Roads when he goes into the Country) he ſignify'd to the Miſſionaries that he wou'd anſwer for the Accuracy of it; and that if the reſt proved as good, their Performance wou'd ſatisfy him, and be out of the reach of Criticiſm.

Map of the Remainder Eaſtern Tartary by the ſame Jeſuits.

The 22d of July 1710, the Emperor ordered the ſame Miſſionaries to go towards the Saghalian Ula; he had cauſed a Town to be built on the South ſide of that great River, call'd Saghalian Ula Hotun (R), where there are Manchews under a Lieutenant General (named in their Language Maireychain, to guard the Frontiers againſt the Ruſſians; who deſcending the River from Nipchû, a City a little to the Weſt, might in a few Days enter the Territories of the Empire.

To ſupport this Lieutenant General, the Emperor has built two other Cities farther up in his Dominions towards the South. They are but a few Days Journey aſunder, with Villages all along the Road, where are Relays of Poſt-Horſes. The neareſt to the Saghalian Ula Hotun, is Merghen, where is alſo a Lieutenant General with Troops; the other, named Tſitſikar, (S) is the Seat of the General Commander of all the Country.

Returning from Tſitſikar, which is in the Latitude of 47 Degrees 24 Minutes and 30 Seconds, they had an Opportunity of meaſuring ſeveral Degrees ſucceſſively from North to South; for the Country conſiſts wholly of Plains which extend beyond the reach of Sight, without either Houſes, Trees, or any conſiderable Rivers. The uſual Drink of the Mongols in thoſe Parts, is Water drawn out of Wells, dug here and there, to which they remove their Tents and Flocks, according to the Seaſon and the Plenty or Scarcity of Paſture.

This Map was finiſh'd the 14th of December, and tho' it was empty enough, yet the Emperor was pleaſed with it, as giving him a View of his new Settlements which he judged ſo neceſſary to the publick Tranquillity.

Map of Shan-tong by Regis and Cordoſo.

In the Year 1711 the Geographers, in order to expedite the Work, were divided into two Companies. The Peres Regis and Cordoſo, a Portugueze newly landed in China, undertook the Map of the Province of Shan-tong, contiguous to that of Pe-che-li. The Peres Jartoux and Fridelli, accompanied by Pere Bonjour, an Auſtin Friar, (already known in Europe on account of his Learning) who arrived about 3 Months before in China, went beyond the Great Wall as far as Hami (T), the Capital City of a Country of the ſame Name, and meaſured almoſt all the Territories of the Tartars call'd Kalka Ta-ſe. They returned by the publick Road thro' the Provinces of Shen-ſi and Shan-ſi, entering China by the Gate of the Great Wall, which is named Hya-yu-quan, from the Fort that defends it, and is diſtant from Hami not above Ninety Leagues whereof Twenty go to a Degree: theſe Miſſionaries did not arrive at Pe-king before January 1712.

The Emperor was extremely pleaſed with this Map, and that of Shan-tong made a little before, and having ſent to know if more of their Society were not to be found in the Provinces, who were capable of engaging in the ſame Work, four others were propoſed and approved of. Pere Cordoſo went to join Pere de Tartre, who remain'd in Shan-ſi, with Orders to make the Map of that Province and Shen-ſi adjoining to it: As ſoon as they had finiſhed theſe 2 Maps, which were each 10 Feet ſquare, they returned to Pe-king.

The Mandarin who preſented theſe Maps to the Emperor, having informed his Majeſty, that if he required any Thing to be explain'd, Pere de Tartre was in waiting to obey his Commands, (R) The Chineſe H in Hotun, Hami, Hya-yu-quan, &c. is a ſtrong Aſperate ſounding like a double Hh, or rather is a Sound partaking both of the K and H; hence we find the ſame Words written ſometimes with K, ſometimes with H. The beſt Way wou'd be to make uſe of both Letters together, or Kh, as Mr D'Anville has done in many Names; but 'tis often difficult to know when that Character is to be uſed, the H being ſometimes confounded with the K in Words which we know ought to be written with a K, as we have obſerved in our Preface. Pere Souciet by Compariſon of Words ſhews that Pere Gaubil expreſſes the Chineſe H in foreign Names by Ga. But he miſtakes in ſuppoſing that he expreſſes the ſame Letter by an O in Olaſſe, [O-la-ſſe] Ruſſe or Ruſſian, ſuppoſing the O to be prefixed like the Particle He in Hebrew Words. But doubtleſs the Reaſon is because the Chineſe take the Name from the Tartars, who call the Ruſſians Urûs or Orûs, as well as the Turks, Arabs, and all the other oriental Nations.

See Pere Souciet, Obſervations Mathematiques &c. 4°. 1729 Vol. I. Page 168.

(S) In the French in this Place 'tis written Tſitcikar. In the Table of Longitudes at the End of the 4th Volume Tchiſkar, and in the Jeſuits Maps Teitcicar, which laſt Pronunciation I have followed. On this Occaſion I muſt obſerve that Pere du Halde has obſerved no Uniformity, in expreſſing the Sound common among the Chineſe and Tartars, and which is deſignated by the Portugueze and Spaniards, who alſo have it, by a ç or c with a Plica, call'd by them Cedilla. For we find it expreſs'd no leſs than 4 different Ways, ſometimes by ſſ as in Sſe-ſhu, by a ſingle S in Ta-ſe, by ts as in tſong, and by Tc in the Name in Queſtion; to which Pere du Halde, for what Reaſon I know not, has added a 5th Character, viz. Tſ, as in the ſame Word. So little Uniformity is obſerved on this Head, that we meet with the Cedilla written 3 different Ways in the ſame Word, viz. Tſevang, Sſevang, and Sevang; it partakes ſome what of our z, and is ſounded like an ſ with a t before it, whiſtling or ſtraining it between the Teeth: I have diſtinguiſh'd this Sort of Sound by ts, tho' perhaps a ſingle ſ might do as well. It is difficult for thoſe Nations who do not uſe this Sound to expreſs it in their Characters. Hence Brand in his Account of Isbrand Ides's Travels from Moſcow to China, writes Suttegar; Isbrand Ides himſelf, Xixigar; and Mr Kyrillow in his late Map of the Ruſſian Empire, Tchitſchigar: which two laſt Words according to the Engliſh Orthography are Chichigar.

(T) Hami is the City, which in ſome of our Books and Maps is written Camul, in others Chamil or Khamil; ſo Hya-yu-quan is written Kia-yu-koan not only by Pere Gaubil, but often by Pere Du Halde himſelf, for the Reaſon before aſſigned in Note R.

hands, the Emperor sent for him in, to point out some Places he had himself obsery'd in these Provinces: Which done, that Prince said several times I-tyeu-pû-tso, He is right in every Thing.

There happened one Thing pretty remarkable in this Audience: The Emperor alledged that the Course of a River was wrong in another Map, which had relation to the Maps of Shan-si and Shen-si: Pere De Tartre, sensible of his Majesty's Mistake, maintained the Truth (with all due Respect,) in so clear a Manner, that the Monarch came into his Opinion; Tso lyau, says he, I am mistaken. A great Concession in an Emperor of China!

The Peres De Mailla and Henderer were ordered to assist Pere Regis in the Province of Honan, after which they all joined in making the Maps of Kyang-nan, Che-kyang, and Fo-kyen; those of the Province of Kyang-si, Quang-tong and Quang-si, fell to the Share of the Peres De Tartre and Cordoso; and those of Se-chwen and Yun-nan to P. Fridelli with P. Bonjour, who dyed in this last Province on the Frontiers of Ava and Pegû the 25th of December 1714.

The 24th of March following Pere Regis was sent into Yun-nan to finish the Map of it, Pere Fridelli having fallen sick there. By the time he had finished his Work that Missionary recovered, and both together set about the Maps of Quey-chew and Hû-quang.

After their return to Pe-king January 1. 1717, nothing remained to be done, but out of the particular Maps of the Provinces to make a general one; and that was far advanc'd by P. Jartoux, who was detain'd at Pe-king by his Indisposition, so that it was finished and presented to the Emperor in the year 1718. That the Reader may be more fully apprized in how particular and accurate a Manner this Work was conducted, I shall insert the Account sent by Pere Regis in the Name of the Missionaries concerned with him in the Execution of it.

Method observed in making the Maps.

'I can assure you, says he, that we have omitted nothing requisite for rendering our Work 'perfect. We have ourselves visited all the Places, even those of least Consideration, throughout 'the Provinces; examined the Maps and Histories of each City preserved in their Tribunals; 'made Enquiries of the Mandarins and their Officers, as well as the Principal Inhabitants, whose 'Territories we pass'd thro'; in short, by measuring as we advanc'd, we still had Measures 'ready to serve the Triangles, form'd by such Points as were to be fix'd. For after mature 'Deliberation we thought it best to use the Method of Triangles, all others appearing to us 'not only too tedious, considering the vast Extent of the Countries of which the Emperor 'wanted the Map, but scarcely practicable on account of the Towns being so near one another; 'since it is certain that the least Error, occasioned by the Pendulum going wrong, or the Immersion of one of Jupiter's Satellites not being accurately observed, wou'd cause a considerable 'Error in the Longitude: For Instance, the Mistake of a Minute in Time wou'd produce an 'Error of 15 Minutes in Longitude, which are equivalent to four or five Leagues, according to 'the Difference of the Parallels: So that it might happen, that according to the Observation, 'two Towns wou'd be made contiguous, at the same time that there wou'd be really some 'Distance, tho' not much, between them.

Method of Triangles excellent.

'This Inconveniency is not to be fear'd in the Method of Triangles: For how is it possible 'to err four Leagues in the Distance between two Places no farther asunder, when by a Measure 'that always follows us, and Semi-Circles accurately divided, we fix divers Points between 'the two Terms, which joined together make as it were a Chain of Triangles? On the other 'hand nothing is so difficult as to avoid a small Error in Time; the best Pendulums are put out 'of order by Travelling, and to prevent erring, even in a single Minute, the Observations must 'be repeated several Days; a Task which wou'd be extremely fatiguing.

'The Observations of the Satellites require, not only more Time and Accuracy, but also Telescopes of the same Size, and, if I may so speak, the same Eyes in the Observer and his 'Correspondent; for, if the one sees them ever so little sooner than the other, some Error 'will inevitably happen, which must not be suffered in determining small Distances: And if Observations of a Satellite, made in the same Place, by the same Person, differ so in Time as to 'cause a small Variation in the Longitudes, and oblige us to take a middle Difference among 'them, (supposing the Difference to become insensible by the Greatness of the Distance) the 'Results will be still more uncertain when there are several Observers, who have neither the 'same Instruments nor Address; so that the Difference, arising between the Observations, renders 'the Position of Places lying near one another doubtful, nor can it be fixt but by the Rules of 'Geometry; which shews the necessity of having recourse to the Method of Triangles at last.

'This Method, when continued without Interruption, has one farther Advantage, as it gives not 'only the Longitude but also the Latitude of the Towns to be inserted; which, being afterwards examined by the Meridian Altitudes of the Sun or Polar Stars, serves to correct the 'preceding Operations. This Course we took as often as we were able, and commonly 'found no sensible Difference between the Observation of the Latitude and the Determination 'by Triangles. If sometimes we discovered Variations, we did not think ourselves thereby 'obliged to lay aside this Method, since we find as many in the Observations of the Polar Altitudes, made by the best Astronomers in the same Place. Altho' the Theory, whereon such 'Observations are grounded, is certain, nevertheless the Practice depends on so many little Circumstances, which must all be attended to in order to obtain perfect Accuracy, that the Operations 'cannot be always exact, but must vary something more or less. However these little 'Defects always appear, and may be often corrected in large Works, by connecting the Points 'fixt by Trigonometry with those whose Position is under Examination.

'Another Method, which we judged ought to be employed for greater Precision, was to return 'to the same Point, already determined, by different Ways, from a considerable Distance, 'working according to Rules. For if by the last Essay you find the same Situation, the Exactness of the preceding Operations will be proved in some measure to a Demonstration. When

'in measuring we cou'd not return to the same Point, our Method was, as we pass'd near the 'great Towns already marked down, or other fit Places, to look out for the remarkable Towers, 'or Mountains that commanded them; and from time to time we measured, to see if the 'Distance resulting from the Operations (when corrected) agreed with the actual Measure.

Care for preventing Mistakes.

'All these Precautions, and many more, too tedious to enumerate, appeared to us necessary 'when executing a Work, in a Manner worthy the Trust repos'd in us by a wise Prince, 'who judg'd it of the greatest Importance to his State. Moreover the Hopes of meriting his Pro- 'tection, which was necessary to favour the Progress of Christianity in his Empire, supported 'us amidst those Dangers and Crosses that are unavoidable by those who have to do with such 'a Variety of Tempers, and are engag'd in so laborious an Undertaking: Nay, we were Observations of the Longitude for verifying the Work.

'willing, for our own Satisfaction, to have repair'd again both to the Eastern and Western Fron- 'tiers, as well as to some Places within the Kingdom, situated at convenient Distances, there 'to examine the Longitudes by repeated Observations of Eclipses; but as the Work was 'finished, and the Emperor appeared satisfy'd with it, we did not think it proper to engage him 'in a new and not altogether necessary Affair.

Not wholly neglected.

'We therefore contented ourselves with Observations of the Moon and Satellites of Jupiter 'made before our Time in several Cities by Members of our Society, tho' we rejected a few 'because they did not agree with our Measures, on account of some small Error as to Time in 'the Observation, which but too often happens to the most experienced. Not but that we 'ourselves observed some Eclipses of the Moon (X) and found no other Difference in our 'Observations than is usual in such Cases; where we had any doubt we chose the mean Difference.

Work compared with those of other Geographers.

'Thus having first made use of the Method of Triangles for determining the Distances between 'the several Cities, and afterwards compared it with that of Eclipses observed in Places remote 'from Pe-king, we flatter ourselves that we have followed the surest Course, and even the only 'one practicable, in prosecuting the greatest Geographical Work that ever was performed 'according to the Rules of Art.

More accurate than the Maps of Europe.

'Those who have publish'd Maps of Europe, or any particular Kingdom thereof, have sel- 'dom taken the pains themselves to examine the Situation of Places on the Spot. They are 'content either with such Observations as they can pick up, made by Persons of very unequal 'Abilities; or with collecting the itinerary Distances, which are scarce ever alike in different 'Provinces; with procuring the Relations of Travellers, who commonly give the Distances from 'Report; and with ranging their Materials, partly according to some of those Observations, and 'partly by Conjecture.

Defects of Ptolomy's Geography.

'Thus we need not wonder, if Ptolomy himself, the Restorer (Y) of Astronomy and Geogra- 'phy, has committed considerable Faults; not only in speaking of China, whose Capital he 'places in three Degrees of South Latitude, but with respect to Africa and Europe, both 'which the Alexandrians were so well acquainted with. Not that he neglected to consult the 'Astronomical Observations of those who preceded him; for he cites and follows them, so far 'as to maintain, (on the Authority of the celebrated Pytheas of Marseilles) what passed then 'for a Falsehood, viz. that in the Isle of Thulé, to which he sailed from the Pillars of Hercules, 'the Sun at the Summer Solstice rose a little after it set. Ptolomy had also the most esteem'd 'Itineraries, such as that attributed to the Emperor Antoninus, (in whose Reign he lived) 'supposed to be a Compend of the Distances measured by the Senate throughout the Roman 'Empire: Whereof the general Description, under the Name of The whole World, form'd 'from Agrippa's Memoirs, was by Augustus expos'd in a magnificent Portico at Rome: 'Nor is it to be doubted but Ptolomy was acquainted with the Descriptions Alexander 'caused to be made of his Conquests. However it is certain that those Materials were insuf- 'ficient for making a Geography of the whole Earth, or even a considerable Part of either Observations not distinguish'd in his Tables.

'Europe or Asia, with any tolerable Accuracy. Besides, how among the antient Observations shall 'we distinguish the good from the bad? which yet is necessary in order to have exact Maps; for 'an Error in Astronomical Observations, which disappears on account of the great Distance 'of the Heavens, shews itself at first sight in a Map, by means of the Relation it has 'to the neighbouring Places known to every Traveller. How could Ptolomy know Uncertainty of antient Measures.

'the just Proportion of Distances, measured several Ages before, under quite different Govern- 'ments, among barbarous as well as civilized Nations, and in some sort determined by the simple 'Estimation of a Ship's Course, which, tho' made by able Men, (such as Polybius, Nearchus 'and Onesicritus; the first sent by Scipio to the Coasts of Africa and Spain, the others by 'Alexander to discover the Persian Gulf) must have their Defects too; and supposing they 'had not, there still remains a Difficulty, almost insuperable, which is, to determine precisely how Difficulty of allowing for winding of Roads.

'much of the Roads is to be retrenched, in order to fix the exact Distance in a strait Line from 'one City to another. Altho' Ptolomy, for instance, had a much more particular Account of 'the Distances from the Caspian Sea to the Indian Ocean, as measured by Diogenetes and Beto, 'at the Command of Alexander, than we find in the sixth Book of Pliny; yet if he never was 'on the Spot, to mark all the Windings and different Bearings of the Road, occasioned by the 'various Disposition of the Lands, it was not possible for him to determine, exactly, either 'the Position of Towns, or Passages of Rivers, much less the intire Course, merely by a few 'Points only; nor to ascertain the Dimensions of a Country, by means of one or two Geogra- 'phical Lines, without having the intermediate Points, which are absolutely necessary, to 'connect the one with the other.

But

* Agathem. Geogr. l. 1. c. 6.

(Y) *Ptolomy was the Improver, not the Restorer (as is commonly thought) of those Sciences, which were cultivated down to his Time; one of the Antients themselves tells us, that in Matters of Geography, he followed those who went before him, inventing nothing of his own.

'But as the Knowledge of these Things does not depend on the Force of Genius, and 'that which must be done to acquire it far surpasses the Strength of a single Person, 'Ptolomy had no other Way but to have recourse to the Memoirs of Travellers, to combine their Remarks with the Observations, and in a multitude of Instances make use of Conjectures. 'If notwithstanding these Disadvantages he has composed a useful Work, (the Description 'which he has given of the World being very ample, and the first that exhibited Places according 'to Latitude and Longitude), yet it is certain that the greater Part of it is grounded not 'on Observations made with a View to rectify Geography, but on the Relations of Travellers 'of very different Talents, and the Reports of some Historians, who have mentioned the Dist-'ances only occasionally, and always according to the vulgar Computation.

'The Case is otherwise in the Work we offer the Publick; for vast as it is, we judged we 'ought not to confine ourselves either to the Maps of the Chinese Governors, or to the 'Distances measured almost throughout the whole Empire, and particularly in Tartary, with 'great Labour and Exactness, by the Manchews; nor yet to the printed Memoirs, whereof 'we had divers: But we resolved to begin the whole anew, employing those Materials no far-'ther than as Guides, in the Roads we were to take, and in the Choice of Places for Observation; 'it being our Intention to reduce all that we did, to the same Measure, as well as Design.

Present Work grounded on a more sure Basis and wholly new.

'The Measure, which we constantly made use of, had been established some Years before by 'the Emperor; I mean the Chinese Foot employ'd in the Buildings and Works of the Palace, 'which differs from the other Chinese Feet, and even from that formerly used in the Tribunal of 'the Mathematicks: By this Foot Pere Thomas found a Degree to be 200 Li's, or Chinese 'Furlongs, each consisting of 180 Chinese Fathoms of 10 Feet. As then the 20th Part of a 'Degree, according to the Experiment of the Academy [at Paris] contains 2853 Toises, each 'containing 6 Feet of the Châtelet, it is just equal to 1800 Chinese Toises, or 10 Li's; and 'consequently one Degree comprizing 20 of our great Leagues, call'd also Marine Leagues, 'contains 200 Li's, or Chinese Furlongs, computing by the Foot above mentioned.

Measure made use of throughout the Work.

'This Proportion furnishes a very easy Method of accommodating a Scale of French Measures 'to that of our Chinese Maps, since allowing 10 Li's or Chinese Furlongs to one of our Great 'Leagues, the same Part of a Degree gives the same Number of Leagues in both, as well in 'the Meridians as Parallels; for tho' these latter diminish according to the ordinary Method, 'they nevertheless do not, according to the Measure of Great Circles, which are supposed 'equal by Geographers and Geometricians.

'However I cannot forbear taking notice here, that this Doctrine is not altogether certain: 'Since in our Return from Tsitsikar in 1710, when we measured six Degrees from North to South 'in those Plains, mentioned before, between the 47th and 41st Parallels of Latitude, the Peres 'Regis and Jartoux always found a Difference between the Degrees, whatever Care they 'took in measuring; altho' they often examined the Cords divided into Feet, and corrected 'the Quadrant with which they took the Altitudes, they found an Error somewhat less than 'thirty Seconds. 'Tis true, that Instrument was no more than two Feet Radius, and tho' 'divided exactly, gave the Altitude somewhat less, than perhaps one of Nine or Ten Feet 'wou'd have done, such as Mr Picard made use of in finding the Content of a Degree: 'Tis 'true also, that the Cords, 10 of which made a Chinese Li, shrunk and extended according 'to the different Changes of the Air. But on the other hand considering that the Instruments 'being always the same, the Quantity of the Error ought to be the same; that the Weather 'was then dry, and without any considerable Variation; that they took care often to measure 'the Cord with a Toise or Fathom, made for the Purpose; and that in short such imperceptible 'Defects cou'd not cause a Difference of 258 Chinese Feet, which they found in comparing 'the 47th Degree with the rest; hence those Missionaries were almost persuaded that there must 'be some Inequality in the Degrees themselves, altho' it had not been perceived by our 'Geometricians, but only conjectured by some who supposed the Earth to be like a Spheroid.

Inequality in Degrees of Latitude discovered.

'But as it would be unadvised to change the Figure of the Earth without unexceptionable 'Observations, continued under divers Parallels, we determined to make the Degrees equal in all 'the Great Circles, and all the Parts of the Meridians; conforming ourselves to the generally 'received Opinion of the Rotundity of the Earth, and referring the Solution of this new Pro-'blem to others, who have the Conveniency and Leisure which we have not.

'In the Course of our Operations, we did not forget to observe the Variations of the Mag-'netic Needle, both in Tartary and China: But seeing the Declination changes in the same 'Place in a certain Number of Years, we did not think fit to insert them in this Piece of Geo-'graphy. It suffices that they served to determine exactly the Bearings of the Roads we took, 'and to convince us (by Observations made under the same Meridian, in two different Places, 'both neighbouring and remote) that Geography can draw no Advantage from thence, with 'regard to the Longitude, as hath been hoped by several eminent Authors; who, while they 'were taking pains to collect the Declinations mentioned by Mariners and Travellers, never 'consider'd that they might have vary'd in the Time they were forming their System of Magnetic 'Meridians, one of which ought to pass thro' Kanton; for we have found, on both sides of 'that Meridian, such a Difference in the Declinations, that there is no Possibility of reducing 'them to any of the Hypotheses hitherto published, much less to a constant Rule; seeing the 'Declinations, observed by us in those Parts, will in all likelyhood be no more the same after 'a certain Period of Years, unless we suppose that the Law, by which the Variations of 'the Needle in the same Place are regulated, is neither made for Tartary nor China.'

Longitude not to be found by the Variation of the Compass.

By the foregoing Account of this Performance, the Reader may judge of its Merit, as well as of the Application and Fatigue of the Missionaries in drawing such accurate Maps of all the Provinces

Provinces of China and Chineſe Tartary; a Work, which the Emperor longed to ſee executed.

Maps of Tibet how made.

With regard to Tibet, if it has not been ſurveyed in the ſame Manner by the Jeſuits, at leaſt the Map has been delineated from divers very exact Journals, as well as itinerary Diſtances meaſured by Tartars, who underſtood the Mathematics and were ſent expreſsly into Tibet by the Emperor, after having received the neceſſary Inſtructions from the Miſſionaries.

Map of Korea.

The Map of Korea was taken from one which is in the Palace of the King of that Country, and examined on the Frontiers by the Miſſionaries, employ'd to make the Map of Tartary, as we have explained in the Obſervations on the Map itſelf.

As all the Maps are drawn according to the ſame Scale and general Projection, they ſeem to be Parts of the ſame Map divided into ſo many Portions, and in effect, by joining them, one Map might be made out of the whole. They were preſented to the King juſt as the Miſſionaries ſent them me from China: His Majeſty, who knew their Value, was pleaſed to accept of, and give them a Place in his private Library at Verſailles.

General Maps by Mr D'Anville.

To adjuſt theſe Maps, and prepare them for Engraving, I pitch'd on Mr D'Anville, Geographer in Ordinary to the King; who, having performed the Work with uncommon Elegance and Accuracy, afterwards drew general Maps from the Particulars, of Dimenſions ſufficient to ſhew with what Minuteneſs and Preciſion the latter were executed, (A) ſuppoſing they had not been inſerted in the Work. In drawing his general Map of [Chineſe] Tartary, he had recourſe to the particular Memoirs of Pere Gerbillon; and to fill it up has added the whole Iſland of Japan, and ſome other Lands to the North of it, which are exhibited after a peculiar Manner (B). As to the Map of Tibet, he has regulated that Part bordering on Indoſtan by ſuch Informations, with reſpect to this laſt Country, as may be rely'd on.

General Map of the whole.

In ſhort, the Map placed in the Front of this Work, beſides the Countries comprized in the other general Maps, includes all the reſt of Tartary as far as the Caſpian Sea. With reſpect to theſe Parts, the Miſſionaries had gather'd ſeveral Materials, but were not in a Condition to complete them; however they communicated them in order to be made uſe of, by comparing and connecting them with thoſe which might be collected from other Quarters: This Mr D'Anville has done with a great deal of Care, whereof a particular Account is given in the Geographical and Hiſtorical Obſervations on Tibet.

I ſhall ſay nothing concerning the Impreſſion of this Work, nor the Care I have taken to embelliſh it. It is obvious enough that no Coſt has been ſpared to give it all the Beauty and Ornament it was capable of, in reſpect to Paper, Print and Engraving. The Frontiſpieces, Cuts, and Compartments of the Maps, were done from the Draughts, and under the Direction of Mr Humblot, who has to perfection imitated the Taſte of the Chineſe Pictures; part of which were communicated to me by Mr du Velaer, who lived ſeveral Years at Kanton, as Director of the India Company; to whom I am farther obliged for ſome very curious Remarks concerning the Iſle of Hay-nan, where he made ſome Stay.

Orthography of Chineſe Names.

Whatever Care I took to write the Chineſe Words as they ought to be pronounced, it was difficult to avoid ſome Faults in the Courſe of the Impreſſion: But they may be eaſily corrected by means of the Alphabetical Tables, at the End of the third and fourth Volumes, where they are written truly, and explained for the Reader's farther Help, who may not always remember the Meaning of the Words, which occur often, and are only explained the firſt time.

As ſtrange as the Chineſe Names may appear at firſt, it muſt not be imagined that they are as difficult to pronounce in our Tongue, as ſome have fancy'd: On the contrary, Experience ſhews, that they may be learned much ſooner than the Names uſed by ſeveral Nations of Europe, and, for any thing that appears, may be pronounced with more Eaſe. What has contributed to make them difficult to us, is the Portugueze Orthography, which has been followed for a while by ſeveral of our French Miſſionaries, tho', to give the Chineſe Pronunciation, they ought to be written after a quite different Manner. The Portugueze X is expreſs'd by our Ch (C): For inſtance, the City which we call Chan-tong, as the Chineſe pronounce it, they write Xantum; in like Sort the Letter m is the ſame with them as the Letters ng with us; for Pe-king, which is the Chineſe Pronunciation [in our Characters] they write Pe-kim. The Reader therefore muſt remember that the Names ending with m, which ſometimes occur in the Maps, ought to be pronounced as if they ended in ng; like ſang, rang, and without laying any Streſs on the g, which is added only to diſtinguiſh ſuch Words from thoſe that end with a Single n, and are to be pronounced, as if the n, was followed by a mute e; As in non in Latin, and profane in French.

A NEW MAP of CHINA, Drawn from those of the particular Provinces made on the Spot by the Jesuit Missionaries: wherein the principal Places are distinguish'd whose positions have been determin'd, & the positions themselves inserted, as Vouchers to the Work; the Names also are written according to the English Orthography.

Advertisement

In Drawing the Maps of the Provinces of CHINA, the MISSIONARIES determined the Latitude of above 500 Cities, and other remark'able Places, by Observation, and those Longitude by the Method of Triangles.

They were also assisted by the Maps and Histories preserved in the Tribunals of the respective Cities, and Informations of the MANDARINS, and their Officers as well as the Chiefs of the People, thro' whose Territories they passed.

This Great work was begun the 4th of July 1708 and finished the 1st of January 1717 in the following manner.

Pe-che-li was drawn by PP Regis Jartoux and Fridelli from the 18th of December 1709 to the 28th of June 1710.

A DESCRIPTION OF CHINA, CHINESE-TARTARY, &c.

A General View of the Empire of China.

HE Kingdom of China is call'd by the Weſtern Mongols, Katay (A); by the Man-chew Tartars (B) Nikan Kuran (C), and by the Chineſe (D) Chong-qua: As to the Name in Uſe with Europeans, we cannot ſay, with any certainty, whence it is derived, unleſs it be from that of the firſt Royal Family, which carrying their victorious Arms weſtward, occaſion'd the Country to be call'd Tſin, or Tay-tſin. Name of China.

The Emperor Tſin Shi-whang's Fleet, which according to the Chineſe Hiſtory ſailed to Bengal, muſt needs have made known to the Indians the Name of Tſin, whoſe Power was felt at ſuch a diſtance; and that Name paſſing from the Indies into Perſia and Egypt, it is highly probable (E), came thence to us about the Year 230 before Chriſt.

However that be, China is, beyond all diſpute, the largeſt and fineſt Kingdom known to us: For I would not take upon me to ſay there is no other polite Nation to be found in the Terra Auſtralis, or ſome other unknown Countries. When, after paſſing from Europe, we enter on the neareſt part of Africa, do not we ſeem to be got into another World? Even the Indians themſelves, tho' not altogether ſo rude, can be accounted little better than Barbarians, when compared with our civiliz'd Nations. Who would have believ'd, that beyond theſe, ſhould be found a People powerful, well-govern'd, ſkilful in Arts, and addicted to the Sciences?

(A) This is to be underſtood only of that Part of China which lies to the North of the Whang-ho, or yellow River, as will hereafter be explained.

(B) The true Name is Tatars, or Tattan, and not Tartars, which laſt is known only to the Nations on this ſide Poland.

(C) In the French Copy Couron inſtead of Couron, or rather Couran, which ſignifies a Kingdom.

(D) That is, the Kingdom of the middle; the Chineſe, ſuppoſing their Country to be ſituate in the middle of the Earth.

(E) This Origin of the Name ſeems to us improbable; for tho' the Sinæ and Sina of the Greeks and Latins came from the Perſians, yet as theſe latter, as well as the Turks, and other Orientals, except the Arabs, ſay Chin, and not Sin, we cannot well ſuppoſe the Name to have been derived from that of the Emperor Tſin. The Arabs ſay Sin, or Tſin, and the Greeks, Sinæ, becauſe they have not the Sound of our ch, in their Languages. The Portugueze brought the Name of China into Europe, from either Perſia or India; where, according to Navarette, it was firſt introduced on account of the Silk, which is called Chin; the Italians write Cina, the Germans, Tſchina, but pronounce like the Engliſh; the French write Chine, but pronounce Sheen.

When Marco Polo, the Venetian, publiſh'd his firſt Relation, in the 13th Century, it was look'd on by moſt People to be entirely fabulous, and was attacked as a Forgery by ſome Critics of thoſe Times, on much the ſame Conjectures that ſeveral later Writers have advanced; though it is certain, that this Traveller, who followed the Weſtern Tartars, when they conquer'd China, has aſſerted nothing but the Truth; this plainly appears from the Account he gives of certain Cities, which are ſtill the ſame as he deſcribes them, both as to Name and Condition. For who does not perceive, that his Cingiang, ſituate on the (*) Kyang is the City of Chin-kyang, near that great River? It is eaſy to account for the ſmall Difference found between the Names, partly from the different Idioms of the Tartar Language, and partly from the Corruption of the Chineſe Words by Strangers, who have not had ſufficient Time to learn the true Pronunciation of a Language ſo different from all others.

Extent of China. China extends more from North to South, and is narrower from Eaſt to Weſt, than that part of Tartary, which falls within our Plan; but which way ſoever we meaſure it, its Extent, taken in a ſtrait Line, is not leſs than 360 great Leagues of France, 20 whereof go to a Degree. 'Tis divided into 15 Provinces: Thoſe of Shen-ſi, Shan-ſi, Pe-che-li, ſtretch themſelves along the famous Wall, which on the North divides it from Tartary; Shan-tong, Kyang-nan, Che-kyang, and Fo-kyen, lie along the Eaſtern Ocean; thoſe of Quang-tong, Quang-ſi, Yun-nan, and Se-chuen, lie to the South and Weſt; laſtly, the Provinces Ho-nan, Hu-quang, Quey-chew and Kiang-ſi, take up the middle Part.

Government. Every Province is divided into a certain Number of Juriſdictions, call'd by the Chineſe, Fû, on which other Diſtricts of much leſs Extent, named Chew and Hyen depend, in the ſame manner as our Bailiwicks and inferior Courts of Juſtice do on the Preſidencies: The Preſidents of the Supreme-Courts are call'd (†) Chi-fû, and of the others, Chi-chew and Chi-hyen. Hence it is, that in every City having the appellation of Fû, there is always found a (ıı) Mandarin named Chi-fû, and at leaſt another who is a Chi-hyen: But in the great Cities of all, there are, beſides the Chi-fû, two other inferior (ғ) Mandarins, with the Title of Chi-hyen; becauſe when the Territory is large, it is divided into two Diſtricts, each of which has immediate recourſe to its Chi-hyen.

Each of theſe two Tribunals has its particular Name, and depends immediately on that of the Chi-fû, which is much more numerous, more powerful, and very often differently named. For inſtance, beſides the ſix great ſupreme Courts at Pe-king, there is alſo the Tribunal peculiar to that City, which is the Capital of the Empire, and named Shun-tyen; under this Tribunal there are two inferior Courts of the two Hyen, or Cities of the third Rank, whereof one is call'd Tay-hing, and the other Ven-ping.

When we ſpeak of the Hyen, or City of the third Rank, the Reader muſt not imagine it to be a Diſtrict of ſmall Extent. There are Hyens of 60, 70, and even 80 Leagues in compaſs, which pay ſeveral Millions into the Emperor's Treaſury.

What we have ſaid with regard to the Cities of Tay-hing and Ven-ping, is to be underſtood alſo of ſeveral others, in proportion to the Extent of the Lands belonging to them; ſo that the Number of Cities of this Kingdom will appear to be greater than it is, if we reckon them according to the printed Catalogues to be had every where of the Fû and Hyen, without diſtinguiſhing between thoſe comprized in the ſame Diſtrict, and thoſe which are not.

There are ſome Cities with Courts, named Wey, whoſe Mandarins, or Governors, have the Title of Wey-ſhew-pey, and are military Officers; their Juriſdiction ſeldom extends without the Walls of the Town. There are others appointed in the Villages, and all that commonly falls under their Cognizance relates to certain Perſons, who are obliged by their Station and Birth to attend the Service of the Public. Theſe Tribunals, diſtinguiſhed alſo by their Names, are ſometimes, like thoſe of the Chi-fû and Chi-hyen, included within the ſame Diſtricts; ſo that if one relies on the Liſts of the Mandarins, or Hiſtories of the Provinces, without enquiring farther, he may reckon three Cities where there is but one. For inſtance, the Town, which in the Hiſtory of the Province of Quey-chew is called Li-ping-fû, is in reality the ſame which in the Province of Hû-quang is call'd U-kay-ſew; for being ſituated on the Borders of two Provinces, it is the Seat of a Chi-fû, ſubject to the Province of Quey-chew, and of a Wey-ſhew-pey, who depends on the Province of Hû-quang, as a military Officer. This Inſtance may ſuffice to ſhew, that the Number of Cities in China, tho' very great, is yet much fewer than almoſt all the printed Relations make it; and that to write with certainty of the Geography of a large Country, it is not enough to travel over it barely for Information, but one muſt be furniſh'd with the proper Helps.

All theſe Courts depend on the Viceroy of the Province, and the four other general Officers, who are his Aſſiſtants, according to the nature of the Buſineſs. If it relates to the Revenue and civil Matters, the Affair is brought before the Pû-ching-ſe, or Treaſurer-General: If a criminal Cauſe, it is referr'd to the Lieutenant-Criminal Ngan-cha-ſe: If it concerns the Poſts, or Salt-branch, &c. recourſe is had to the Yen-tau: Laſtly, If the Buſineſs relates to the Proviſions which are collected by way of Tribute, they apply to the Lyang-tau. But beſides the Affairs peculiar to their reſpective Tribunals, theſe may be apply'd to in Caſes of a different Nature; becauſe all the inferior Courts of the Provinces depend on them, and they are by their Stations

Coun-

(*) Kyang ſignifies River.

(ғ) Mandarin, or rather Mandarim, ſignifies Commander: Under which general Appellation the Portugueze (who firſt entred China) comprehend all the Degrees of Chineſe Magiſtrates and Officers, military and civil. In the Language of the Country, they have the Title of Quân, or Quân-ſû, that is Prepoſitus, ſet before, to denote their Authority; and that of Lau-ya, Lord or Maſter, on account of their Quality; either of theſe Terms would be more proper than that of Mandarin, which Cuſtom has adopted, and which from the frequent Uſe of it in Relations of China, has been commonly miſtaken for a Chineſe Word.

Counſellors to the Viceroy; in which Quality they are oblig'd ſeveral times, every Month, to attend his Tribunal on Matters of Importance relating to the Province.

As the Officers of the Army depend likewiſe in ſome Reſpects upon the Viceroy, and are oblig'd under ſevere Penalties to give him Notice of the leaſt Commotion among the People within their Diſtricts, it happens that almoſt all Affairs of the Government, whether civil, criminal, or military, are brought at length before his Tribunal; and what adds to his Authority is, that all the Deciſions of the ſupreme Courts of Pe-king are grounded commonly on the Informations that come from him, and that they almoſt always ratify the Sentence which he paſſes againſt the Mandarins, whom he hath a Right to diſplace, and, even previous thereto, of taking away their Seal. 'Tis true, the Treaſurer-General, and Lieutenant-Criminal, may accuſe the Viceroy of the Province; but as they fear to come by the worſt, and the Law conſtruing ſuch Diſſenſions as prejudicial to the Publick, they generally ſpeaking agree but too well together, and wink at each other's Conduct. When they proceed ſo far as to an Impeachment, either the Affair muſt be very notorious, and cannot fail of being otherwiſe known at Court, or elſe muſt nearly affect their own Honour and Quiet.

Even the Perſons ſent by the Emperor to inſpect into Affairs of the Provinces, for the Good of the People, are often corrupted by the Civilities and Preſents of the great Mandarins; ſo that on their Return, they make a favourable Report of their Benefactors, tho' at the ſame time they apprehend a Complaint againſt them unavoidable. Hence it requires a good deal of Penetration in a Prince to ſee through the Diſguiſe, and diſcover the Truth. The late Emperor Kang-hi had this Quality in great Perfection, and many Inſtances of it might be produced, were this a Place to ſpeak of his extraordinary Wiſdom, which has been long admired in the moſt diſtant Countries. It may however be affirmed, that in ſpight of all his Vigilance and Penetration, there were many Diſorders of this kind during his Reign: But his fourth Son, who ſucceeded him, has effectually remedy'd theſe, by allowing the Perſons he deputes, for that purpoſe, large Sums to defray their Expences, and vigorouſly puniſhing both the Corrupter and Corrupted.

The publick Cenſors of the Empire, called Ko-tau-yu-ſe, who reſide at Pe-king, and beſide the general Inſpection over the whole, have each a particular Province under their Care, are moſt dreaded of all the great Mandarins. As theſe Cenſors are very vigilant, and have their Spies, they can be ignorant of nothing that paſſes, and it is their Intereſt to have good Order preſerv'd every where. If any Mandarin fails of his Duty, in a matter of Importance, wherein the Publick Peace is concern'd, and the Viceroy does not give immediate Notice thereof, the Cenſors are oblig'd to inform the ſupreme Courts, and the Emperor, by a publick Accuſation, even tho' the Proof they have be not half ſufficient to make out their Charge: And if they be the firſt by whom his Majeſty is appriz'd of the Diſorder, it redounds much to their Honour; on the other hand, if they fail of ſo doing, they are liable not only to be reprimanded by him, but even to be remov'd from their Employments. Poſitive Proof is not required, if their Report has the Air of Truth, it is ſufficient to ground an Information upon.

Nothing perhaps contributes more to preſerve good Order and the ancient Cuſtoms, as alſo to prevent Commotions, which are ordinarily cauſed by the Love of Novelty, ſo predominant in the People, as the Fear of theſe public Cenſors. It is an addition to their Authority, that if they be ill treated either by the Intrigues of the Grandees whom they have accuſed, or by the Emperors, who ſometimes are offended at the Advice their Office obliges them to give; the whole Nation looks on them as Fathers of their Country, and (if we may ſo ſpeak) Martyrs for the public Welfare: And indeed there is often found in theſe Cenſors an Intrepidity, which ſhews that this People are very far from wanting Greatneſs of Soul. For the reſt, tho' the Viceroy of the Province has the four great Officers already mentioned under him, and the Mandarins of the inferior Juriſdictions have always one, and ſometimes two Aſſiſtants; yet Matters are not ordinarily determined by plurality of Voices: Each Magiſtrate, great or ſmall, has his Tribunal, or Yu-men; and ſo ſoon as he is fully apprized of the Cauſe by the Parties, after ſome few Proceedings, drawn up by proper Perſons, he pronounces Sentence juſt as he thinks fit. Sometimes he orders him who has loſt his Cauſe to be baſtonaded, for having commenc'd it with no good Deſign, or defended it againſt all appearance of Equity.

Ordinary Puniſhment.

The Baſtonade, which is the ordinary Puniſhment of the common People, cannot be inflicted on a Mandarin however inconſiderable, unleſs he be firſt depriv'd of his Office; yet this no way obſtructs the Viceroy's Courts of Juſtice, ſince he has Power to caſhier him on certain Occaſions, without waiting for the Anſwer of the ſupreme Courts, being only obliged to give them his Reaſons, which uſually they approve, and often even order the Offender to be proſecuted; but he has liberty to repair to Pe-king, to juſtify his Conduct, by preſenting his Petition to one of the ſovereign Courts, or even carrying his Complaint before the Emperor: And this reſtrains the Viceroy from acting precipitately, and abuſing his Authority.

The greateſt Puniſhment next to the Baſtonade, is a ſort of Collar made of two Pieces of Wood, of different Sizes, according to the Nature of the Crime, and hollowed in the middle, to fit the Neck of the Offender, which is put between the two, and then the Boards being join'd cloſe together, they are ſeal'd with the Seal of the Court, fix'd to a ſlip of Paper, wherein is written the Time that the Puniſhment is to continue, and the Crime puniſhed.

Theſe two Puniſhments, and Impriſoning, are all that the Chineſe Laws permit the Mandarins of the Provinces to inflict on Criminals; they may indeed condemn to Baniſhment, yet their Sentence muſt be examined by the Supreme Courts; but they muſt never go ſo far as to take away Life, Life, except the Nature of the Crime require ſpeedy Juſtice, as in Caſes of Sedition, or Revolt; then the Emperor gives Authority to the Tſong-tû, and even to the Viceroy, to puniſh the Offenders with immediate Death.

'Tis true, the Law which requires all Cauſes relating to capital Offences to be tranſmitted to Court, would in Europe appear very inconvenient: But in China great Inconveniences would be the conſequence of giving the Mandarins Power over the Lives of the People; wherefore the Legiſlators, who know the diſpoſition of the Nation, have thought it neceſſary to take that Power out of their Hands.

Puniſhments of Criminals. The three capital Puniſhments are Strangling, Beheading, and cutting in Pieces: This laſt is inflicted on none but Rebels, thoſe who murder their Maſters, and mercileſs Robbers.

The firſt is the moſt common Puniſhment which the Court adjudges thoſe to, who are worthy of Death. Beheading is the next: The condemn'd Perſon is not expoſed on a Scaffold on the Day of Execution; but being made to kneel in ſome public Place, with his Hands tied behind, a Perſon holds him ſo faſt that he cannot move, while the Executioner coming behind takes off his Head at one Stroke, and at the ſame time lays him on his Back with ſuch Dexterity, that not one Drop of Blood falls on his Cloaths, which on that Occaſion are often better than ordinary: His Relations and Friends, who are aſhamed to own him in thoſe unhappy Circumſtances, commonly ſend him new Cloaths, and cauſe Proviſions and Drink to be furniſh'd him by the way.

The Executioner is commonly a Soldier, nor is the Office ſcandalous, but the contrary, if they perform it well. At Pe-king, he accompanies the Criminal, girt with a Saſh of yellow Silk, which is the Imperial Colour; and his Cutlas is wrap'd in Silk of the ſame kind, to ſhew that he is veſted with the Emperor's Authority, and to command the greater Reſpect from the People.

Indeed in Chineſe Authors, mention is made of ſeveral other kinds of Puniſhments, ſome of them alſo pretty extraordinary; but it muſt be obſerved, at the ſame time, that they have never been inflicted by any but barbarous Princes, who were look'd on as Tyrants by the whole Nation; Juſtice, ſay they, is neceſſary, but not Cruelty.

But though the Power of the Magiſtrate be reſtrain'd by the Laws in criminal Matters, it is in a manner abſolute in civil Caſes: Since all Affairs, which merely regard private Property, are determin'd by the great Officers of the Provinces, without Appeal to the ſovereign Courts of Pe-king, except in Matters of greateſt Conſequence.

Raiſing of Taxes. That which chiefly employs the inferior Mandarins, whether they be the Chi-chew, Chi-hyen, or Wey-ſhew-pey, is gathering of the Taxes, and it requires their perſonal Attendance. Altho' the Lands in every Province are meaſured, and what every (G) Arpent is to pay be adjuſted, according to the Goodneſs of the Soil; yet whether through Poverty, or Avarice, the People are uſually unwilling to part with it, till the inferior Officers come and haraſs them for it, being ſometimes conſtrain'd to make uſe of Blows. When theſe Tax-gatherers are reproached for their Severity in preſſing the Payment, they excuſe themſelves by ſaying, That when they are ſent into the Villages to levy the Tax, ſhould they not bring it home with them, their Maſters would ſuſpect either that they had neglected their Duty, or had taken Bribes; which bare Suſpicion, without farther Examination, would be ſufficient to procure them the Baſtonade. The Mandarins on the other hand pretend to juſtify their Conduct, by the Neceſſity they are under of acting in that manner; alledging, that having failed of collecting the Dues in the appointed Time, they have been obliged more than once to pay the Emperor out of their own Pockets, for fear of loſing their Employments; which is a Fact known to all thoſe who are acquainted with Affairs; beſides, ſeveral Provinces are greatly in Arrear to the Royal Treaſury, which probably will never be paid. But to remedy this Inconvenience, the preſent (H) Emperor has ordered that, for the future, the Proprietors of the Lands, and not the Occupiers, ſhall pay the Taxes.

Beſides the great Mandarins of every Province, as before mentioned, there is one ſtill more conſiderable, call'd Tſong-tû. His Juriſdiction extends over two Provinces; or, ſhould we compare the Viceroys to our Intendants, [in France] (tho' there is a great Difference in reſpect to their Authority, and the Extent of their Juriſdiction) it comprehends at leaſt two Generalities: For in the larger Provinces, ſuch as Hû-quang, Shen-ſi, &c. the Tſong-tû has the Care only of one Province; but then it is divided into two Governments, and each Government has its proper Viceroy: How far the Power of this ſuperior Governor extends over the other Viceroys, is determined both by the Laws and Cuſtom: For he is their Superior only in certain Matters; but he has always a Right of deciding Cauſes, in caſe of Appeals from the Tribunals of either of the Provincial Governors.

Having given this general Account of the Magiſtrates and their Juriſdictions, it will be proper to exhibit the Names of the Provinces, and the Cities belonging to each: This is the more neceſſary, as we find many Errors in the printed Relations; probably either becauſe the Authors have followed the old Catalogues, without conſidering the Difference between the Times they were made in, and the preſent; or elſe have relied on the Report of their Chineſe Friends, who, altho' they are Batchelors and Doctors, are often as little acquainted with their Country, as old Lawyers in Europe, who never take any pains to know more of the Land than lies within their own Diſtrict.

(G) Arpent is a Meaſure of Land, containing 100 Perches Square, of 18 Foot each. (H) Yong-Ching, who died in the Year 1736.

There

There are in China 173 Tribunals or Jurisdictions, immediately subject to the general Officers and Governors of each Province, named in Chinese, Fû; 1408 inferior Tribunals, or subordinate Jurisdictions, depending immediately on the Chi-fû, whereof 1173 have the Title of Hyen, and 235 that of Chew; these latter however differ somewhat from each other. The greater part have no Authority over the Hyen; but some have a Jurisdiction over one, two, and sometimes four Hyen, almost equal to that of the Chi-fû. There are likewise several of them which have no dependance on the Chi-fû, but depend immediately on the Viceroy; we shall here give a List of them, which exhibits, at one View, the several Sub-divisions of each Province. If the Reader thinks it tedious, he may pass it over, and consult it only when he has occasion for the better understanding what follows.

Names of the Provinces and Cities belonging to them.

The First Province, PE-CHE-LI, CHE-LI, or LI-PA-FU, Sub-divided into IX Fû, or Cities of the first Rank.

1	Shun-tyen-fû, the Capital City of the Kingdom. In this City the Court resides, whence 'tis called Pe-king, that is, the Northern Court. It commands over 6 Chew or Cities of the 2d Rank, and 20 Hyen, or Cities of the 3d Rank.
2	Pau-ting-fû, Capital of the Province of Pe-che-li. Here the Governor of Che-li resides. This Fû has Jurisdiction over		3 Chew.	17 Hyen.
3	Ho-kyen-fû	governs	2	15
4	Chin-ting-fû		5	27
5	Shun-te-fû		0	9
6	Quang-ping-fû		0	9
7	Tay-ming-fû		1	10
8	Yung-ping-fû		1	5
9	Swen-wha-fû		2	8

The Second Province, KYANG-NAN, divided into two Parts, the Eastern; and Western; each of which is Sub-divided into VII Fû.

The Eastern Part.

1	Nan-king, otherwise called Kyang-ning-fû, the Metropolis of all the Province. There the Tsong-tû of Kyang-nan and Kyang-si resides. This Fû governs			8 Hyen.
2	Sû-chew-fû, Capital of the Eastern Part. Here is the Governor of the Eastern Part, which is named I-tong, it has under it		1 Chew.	7 Hyen.
3	Song-kyang-fû	governs	0	4
4	Chang-chew-fû		0	5
5	Chin-kyang-fû		0	3
6	Whay-ngan-fû		2	9
7	Yang-chew-fû		0	6

The Western Part.

1	Ngan-king-fû, the chief City of the Western Part. Here resides the Governor of the Western Part, called I-si. This Fû has		0 Chew.	6 Hyen.
2	Whe-chew-fû	governs	0	6
3	Ning-que-fû		0	6
4	Chi-chew-fû		0	6
5	Tay-ping-fû		0	3
6	Tong-yang-fû		3	13

The Third Province, KYANG-SI, Sub-divided into XIII Fû.

1	Nan-chang-fû, Capital of the Province. Here the Governor resides. The Fû commands		1 Chew.	7 Hyen.
2	Zhau-chew-fû	governs	0	7
3	Quang-sin-fû		0	7
4	Nan-kang-fû		0	4
5	Kyew-kyang-fû		0	5
6	Kyen-chang-fû		0	5
7	Fû or Vû-chew-fû		0	6
8	Ling-kyang-fû		0	4
9	Kin-gan-fû		0	9
10	Shwi-chew-fû		0	3
11	Ywen-chew-fû		0	4
12	Kan-chew-fû		0	12
13	Nan-ngan-fû		0	4

The Fourth Province, FO-KYEN, Sub-divided into IX Fû.

1	Fû-chew-fû, Metropolis. Here resides the Tsong-tû of the 2 Provinces of Fo-kyen and Che-kyang; as also the Governor of Fo-kyen. This Fû presides over		0 Chew.	9 Hyen.
2	Tswen-chew-fû	governs	0	7
3	Kyen-ning-fû		0	8
4	Yen-ping-fû		0	7
5	Ting-chew-fû		0	8
6	Hing-wha-fû		0	2
7	Shau-û-fû		0	4
8	Chang-chew-fû		0	10
9	Tay-van-fû, in the Isle of Tay-van, or Tay-wan.		0	3

The Fifth Province, CHE-KYANG, Sub-divided into XI Fû.

1	Hang-chew-fû, Capital of the Province, the Residence of the Governor. This Fû	governs	0 Chew.	9 Hyen.
2	Kya-hing-fû		0	7
3	Hû-chew-fû		1	6
4	Ning-po-fû.		0	6
5	Shau-hing-fû		0	8
6	Tay-chew-fû		0	6
7	Kin-wha-fû		0	8
8	Kyu-chew-fû		0	5
9	Nyen, or Yen-chew-fû		0	6
10	Wen-chew-fû		0	5
11	Chu-chew-fû		0	10

The Sixth PROVINCE, HU-QUANG, divided into two Parts, Northern and Southern; the Northern Part Sub-divided into VIII Fû.

1 Vû-chang-fû, the Metropolis of the whole Province, and chief City of the Northern Part, or Hû-pe. 'Tis the Seat of the Tsong-tû of both Parts, and Governor of the Hû-pe.
The Fû presides over 1 Chew. 9 Hyen.

2	Han-yang-fû governs	0	2
3	Ngan-lû-fû	2	5
4	Syang-yang-fû	1	6
5	Ywen-yang-fû	0	6
6	Te-ngan-fû	1	5
7	Hing-chew-fû	2	11
8	Whang-chew-fû	1	8

The Southern Part, Sub-divided into 7 Fû.

1 Chang-cha-fû, Capital of the Southern Part, called Hû-nan; the Seat of the Governor of Hû-nan.
This Fû governs 1 Chew. 11 Hyen.

2	Yo-chew-fû	1	7
3	Pau-hing-fû	1	4
4	Hing-chew-fû	1	9
5	Chang-te-fû	0	4
6	Ching-chew-fû	1	6
7	Yung-chew-fû	1	7

The Seventh PROVINCE, HO-NAN, Sub-divided into VIII Fû.

1 Kay-fong-fû, Capital of the Province, the Seat of the Governor.
This Fû governs 4 Chew. 30 Hyen.

2	Que-te-fû	1	8
3	Chang-te-fû	1	6
4	We-kyun-fû	0	6
5	Whay-king-fû	0	6
6	Ho-nan-fû	1	13
7	Nan-yang-fû	2	10
8	Zhu-ning-fû	2	12

The Eighth PROVINCE, SHANG-TONG, Sub-divided into VI Fû.

1 Tsi-nan-fû, Capital of the Province; the Residence of the Governor. This Fû commands over 4 Chew. 26 Hyen.

2	Yen-chew-fû	4	23
3	Tong-chang-fû	3	15
4	Tsing-chew-fû	1	13
5	Teng-chew-fû	1	7
6	Lay-chew-fû	2	5

The Ninth PROVINCE, SHAN-SI, Sub-divided into V Fû.

1 Tay-ywen-fû, Metropolis of the Province. Here the Governor resides.
This Fû governs over 5 Chew. 20 Hyen.

2	Ping-yang-fû	6	28
3	Lû-yang-fû	0	8
4	Fen-chew-fû	1	7
5	Tay-tong-fû	4	7

The Tenth PROVINCE, SHEN-SI, divided into two Parts, Eastern and Western; each Sub-divided into IV Fû.

The Eastern Part, call'd I-tong.

1 Si-ngan-fû, Metropolis of the whole Province, and Capital of the Eastern Part, or I-tong. This is the Seat of the Tsong-tû, of both Parts of Shen-si, and the Province of Se-chwen. There also resides the Governor of the Eastern Part.
This Fû governs 6 Chew. 31 Hyen.

2	Yen-ngan-fû	3	16
3	Fong-tsyang-fû	1	7
4	Han-chang-fû	2	14

The Western Part, or I-si.

1	Ping-leang-fû, or Ping-lyang,] governs	3 Chew.	7 Hyen.
2	Kong-chang-fû	3	10
3	Ling-tau-fû	2	13

Lan-chew is one of the Chews where the Governor of the Western Part resides.

4	Hing-yang-fû	0	0

The Eleventh PROVINCE, SE-CHUEN, [or SE-CHWEN.] Sub-divided into X Fû.

1 Ching-tû-fû, Capital of the Province. Here the Governor resides. This Fû commands over 6 Chew. 19 Hyen.

2	Pau-ning-fû	2	8
3	Shun-king-fû	1	7
4	Su-chew-fû	0	10
5	Chong-king-fû	3	11
6	Wey-chew-fû	1	9
7	Ma-hû-fû	0	1
8	Long-ngan-fû	0	3
9	Tsun-i-fû	2	4
10	Tong-chwen-fû	0	0

The Twelfth PROVINCE, QUANG-TONG, Sub-divided into X Fû.

1 Quang-chew-fû, Capital of the Province. The Governor's Seat is here; and the Fû presides over 1 Chew. 16 Hyen.

2	Shau-chew-fû	0	6
3	Nan-hyung-fû	0	2
4	Whey-chew-fû	0	1
5	Chau-chew-fû	0	11
6	Chau-king-fû Here resides the Tsong-tû of Quang-tong, and Quang-si; it governs	1 Chew.	11 Hyen.
7	Kau-chew-fû	1	5
8	Lyen-chew-fû	1	2
9	Lwi-chew-fû	0	3
10	Kyun-chew-fû, in the Isle of Hay-nan,	3	10

The Thirteenth PROVINCE, QUANG-SI, Sub-divided into XII Fû.

1 Quey-ling-fû, Metropolis of the Province. Here the Governor resides. The Fû commands over 2 Chew. 7 Hyen.

2	Lew-chew-fû	2	10
3	King-ywen-fû	2	5
4	Se-nghen-fû	1	2
5	Ping-lo-fû	1	7

6 U-chew-fû	1 Chew.	9 Hyen.
7 Tſin-chew-fû	0	3
8 Nan-ning-fû	4	3
9 Tay-ping-fû	12	2
10 Se-ming-fû	4	0
11 Chin-ngan-fû	1	0
12 Se-ching-fû	2	0

The Fourteenth PROVINCE, YUN-NAN, Sub-divided into XVII Fû.

1 Yun-nan-fû, Metropolis of the Province. This is the Seat of the Tſong-tû of Yun-nan, and Quey-chew, as well as of the Governor of the Province. The Fû governs 4 Chew. 7 Hyen.

2 Ta-li-fû	4	3
3 Ling-ngan-fû	4	5
4 Tſu, Tſû, or Chû-kyang-fû	2	0
5 Chin-kyang-fû	2	2
6 King-tong-fû	0	0
7 Quang-nan-fû	0	0
8 Quang-ſi-fû	0	2
9 Shun-ning-fû	1	0
10 Ku-chew-fû	5	2
11 Yau-ngan-fû	1	1
12 Ko-king-fû	1 Chew.	0 Hyen.
13 U-ting-fû	2	1
14 Li-kyang-fû	0	0
15 Ywen-kyang-fû	0	0
16 Mong-wha-fû	0	0
17 Yung-chang-fû	1	2

The Fifteenth PROVINCE, QUEY-CHEW, Sub-divided into XI Fû.

1 Quey-yang-fû, chief City of the Province. This is the Seat of the Governor. The Fû preſides over 3 Chew. 4 Hyen.

2 Se-chew-fû	0	0
3 Se-nan-fû	0	3
4 Chin-ywen-fû	0	2
5 She-tſin-fû	0	1
6 Tong-jin-fû	0	1
7 Li-ping-fû	0	1
8 Ngan-ſhan-fû	3	5
9 Tû-yun-fû	2	2
10 Ping-yue-fû	1	4
11 Wey-ning-fû	3	3

By this Liſt, one would be apt to think thoſe the beſt and largeſt Provinces, which had moſt of theſe Cities [or Mandarinats] in them. But it is not ſo; for, in ſome Countries, the Neceſſity of keeping certain ſtubborn, and but half civiliz'd People in ſubjection, obliges the Emperors to encreaſe the Number of the conſiderable Mandarins; and thence it is, that the moſt barren Provinces, ſuch as Quey-chew, have more of them, in proportion, than the moſt fruitful.

'Tis true, that, generally ſpeaking, the Land in all the Provinces, and even in Quey-chew, is fertile enough, and ſometimes brings a double Crop; but 'tis entirely owing to the indefatigable Labour of the Huſbandman that thoſe Countries, where the Grounds are low and boggy, are capable of bearing Corn. Add to this, that ſeveral Provinces being full of Mountains, which afford but a ſmall quantity of Land fit for Tillage, it happens ſometimes, that the whole Produce of the Empire is ſcarce ſufficient for the Suſtenance of the prodigious Number of Inhabitants.

Beſides the Provinces of Yun-nan, Quey-chew, Se-chwen, and Fo-kyen, which are too mountainous to be cultivated ſufficiently; that of Che-kyang, whoſe Eaſtern Part is very fruitful, has hideous Mountains in the Weſtern. The Land of Quang-tong and Quang-ſi, ſo fine and fertile along the Sea-Coaſt, becomes frightful and almoſt barren in divers Places, the farther it lies from thence. In the Province of Kyang-nan, the large Diſtrict of Whey-chew-fû is entirely over-run with very high, and almoſt uninhabitable Mountains; they abound ſtill more in the Provinces of Shen-ſi, and Shan-ſi; all whoſe Plains, put together, don't amount to a quarter Part of the whole.

When coming from the Province of Quang-tong, you have ſail'd between the ſteep Mountains, which run along its River, and, having made one Stage of the Mey-lin, afterwards come to the River of the Province of Kyang-ſi, then you begin to diſcover the moſt beautiful Country of all China; one Part of it lies upon the great River, adorned with the fine Cities of Ngan-king-fû, Kyang-ning-fû, or Nan-king, and Chin-kyang-fû; another Part runs along the great Canal, Yu-lyang-ho, beſet with the moſt rich and populous Cities of the Province of Kyang-nan; as Whay-ngan-fû, Yang-chew-fû, Chang-chew-fû, Sû-chew-fû; and a third Part borders on the Sea-Coaſts of the Province of Che-kyang, where are the Lands of Hang-chew-fû, the Metropolis, Hû-chew-fû, and Kya-hing-fû, which alone furniſh more Silk than all the other Provinces of China.

It muſt be confeſſed, nothing appears more charming than theſe Plains, which are ſo level, that they ſeem to have been laid out by Rule; they are overſpread with Cities and large Villages, and cut into an infinite Number of Canals, which have communication with each other, and are navigated without the leaſt Danger: They are covered with an incredible Quantity of magnificent Barks, and the Water of every Canal is clear, and excellent to drink. Theſe Plains are cultivated with an Induſtry which no People but the Chineſe are capable of: They are withal ſo fertile, that in ſeveral Places they yield Rice twice a Year, and frequently Wheat and ſmaller Grain between the two Crops.

But, whoever judges of China in general by this Country, cannot form an exact Idea of it. The Knowledge of a certain Number of very large Cities is not ſufficient to give a diſtinct Notion of the whole; and had it not been for the Opportunity which the Miſſionaries had of travelling over the Empire, when they made the Map of it, we ſhould ſtill have been ignorant, that in moſt of the great Governments, there are Countries which for more than 20 Leagues together are very thinly peopled, almoſt uncultivated, and often ſo wild, that they are uninhabitable.

As

As theſe Countries are remote from the great Roads ordinarily taken by Travellers, they may eaſily have eſcaped the Knowledge of former Miſſionaries, and Authors of printed Relations. The Reaſon why the Provinces of Shen-ſi and Se-chwen are much commended by ſome of them, is, becauſe they had ſeen the Diſtrict of Si-ngan-fú, which is divided into 37 Cities, moſt of them rich and populous. To a like Cauſe are to be attributed the Praiſes they beſtow on the Lands of Ching-tú-fú, which are cut by artificial Canals, in imitation of thoſe of the Provinces of Kyang-nan, and Che-kyang; they never imagin'd, without doubt, that the Parts which they had no Opportunity of ſeeing, differed ſo much, as in effect they do, from thoſe they had travell'd thro'. The Provinces of Ho-nan and Hú-quang are generally commended by thoſe Writers, and not undeſervedly; for next to that of Kyang-nan, they are the moſt populous and fertile. Not but great Part of the Weſtern Side of Ho-nan is deſart and uncultivated, and there are larger Deſarts ſtill in Hú-quang: But it muſt be attributed to the quantity of fertile Lands contained in theſe Provinces, that they commonly produce plenty enough of Rice and other Grain to furniſh the neighbouring Provinces, and eſpecially that of the Court: For tho' the Province of Pe-che-li is one vaſt continued Plain, bounded on the Northweſt by Mountains, and on the Eaſt by the Ocean, the Soil is always ſo dry and deſtitute of Rivulets, that notwithſtanding it abounds in Wheat and ſmall Grain, it produces very little Rice, without which the Chineſe could hardly make a ſhift to live. Hence it is, that this Province, and eſpecially Pe-king, which is the Reſort of the whole Empire, could ſcarcely ſubſiſt without Supplies of Proviſions brought from the other Provinces.

Generally ſpeaking, the whole Country to the North of Whang-ho, [or Yellow River] produces greater Plenty of Rice than Pe-che-li; their Crop conſiſting in Wheat, ſmall Grain and Pulſe.

Fruit Trees. Nevertheleſs, if the Chineſe were as careful as we to cultivate Fruit-Trees, they would have almoſt as many ſorts as there are in Europe. Walnuts, Cheſnuts, Plums, Pears, Apples, Peaches, Apricots, and Cherry-Trees thrive almoſt every where: Vines, Figs, and Pomegranates multiply exceedingly in ſome Parts of thoſe Northern Provinces; the only difference is, that they have not ſo great variety of each Kind; thus they have but 3 or 4 ſorts of Apples, 7 or 8 of Pears, as many of Peaches, and no good Cherries at all.

This Defect is ſufficiently compenſated by other excellent Fruits not known in Europe;

The Tſe-tſe. particularly one called, by the Chineſe, Tſe-tſe, but by the Portugueze of Macau, Figs; becauſe when it is dry'd it becomes mealy and ſweet, like a Fig; the Trees which bear them, when grafted, look very pretty; there is great plenty of them, eſpecially in the Province of Ho-nan; they are as tall, and ſpreading, as our middling Walnut-Trees; the Leaves are large, and of a beautiful Green, which changes in the Autumn to an agreeable Red: The Fruit alſo is about the bigneſs of our Apple, and, as it ripens, grows of a bright Yellow.

Tho' they are of different Kinds, the Fruit of ſome having a more thin, tranſparent, and ruddy Rind, while that of others, to give them a finer Flavour, muſt be put upon Straw to ripen, yet they are all very agreeable to the Sight, and good to eat: They are found alſo in the Provinces on this ſide of the Whang-ho; and it is no ſmall Advantage that this kind of Tree will grow in ſuch different Soils.

In theſe Southern Provinces there grow other Fruits, which are ſtill in greater Eſteem with the Chineſe: For beſides Oranges of ſeveral ſorts, Limons, and Citrons, which were many Years ago brought into Europe; there are two ſorts of Fruit found in the Provinces of Fo-kyen, Quang-

The Li Chi. tong, and Quang-ſi, to which we are ſtrangers. What they call Li-chi, (if it be of a good ſort, for there are ſeveral) is about the ſize of a Date: The Stone is equally long and hard, it is cover'd with a ſoft Pulp, full of Moiſture and of an excellent Flavour, which it partly loſes when it becomes black and wrinkled, like our ordinary Prunes; the Rind or Skin outwardly reſembles Shagreen, but it is ſmooth within, and of a Figure nearly Oval.

The Long yen. The other ſort, which turns to great account in China, is call'd Long-yen, that is, the Dragon's Eye: Its Shape is round, the Rind yellowiſh, the Pulp white, watery, and often ſouriſh. They pretend, that tho' this is not ſo pleaſant as the Li-chi, it is more wholeſome, and never does one hurt: However that be, both theſe ſorts of Fruit are excellent. But the Fruits called in the Indies, Pamplimus, and in China Yeow-tſe, as well as thoſe named Tſin-lan, or Quang-lan, have nothing in the Taſte to recommend them.

Yeu-tſe. The firſt are ordinarily bigger than our Citrons; the Fruit is ſometimes reddiſh, ſometimes white, and of a Taſte betwixt ſweet and ſour. The Tree is more prickly than the Citron Tree.

The Quang-lan. The ſecond ſort, in Figure and Colour, very nearly reſembles our large Olives: It is indeed one of the ten Kinds ſpoken of in the Books, which treat of Olives; and what they ſay of its Nature, Colour, and the Soil where it grows, ſuits them very well. In all probability, if they were prepared in the ſame manner as in Europe, they would have the ſame Taſte. The Tree is large, and the Leaves reſemble thoſe of the Olive. When they have a mind to gather the Olives before they are thoroughly ripe, which is their Time of eating them, inſtead of beating them down with long Poles, which ſhatters the Branches, and hurts the Tree, they make a Hole in the Body of the Tree, and putting in ſome Salt, they ſtop it up, and in a few Days after the Fruit drops of itſelf.

Other kinds of Trees. We muſt not forget to ſpeak of two other Trees, which beſides their Singularity, are uſeful at Meals. One of them produces a kind of Pepper call'd Wha-Tſyau. 'Tis the Huſk of a Grain as big as a Pea; the Kernel of which is too hot and biting to be made uſe of. The Colour is grey, mix'd with a few Streaks of red. The Plant which produces it, in ſome Places, grows like a thick Buſh, in others it reſembles a pretty tall Tree; it is neither ſo pungent, nor agreeable to the Taſte as Pepper, and is ſeldom uſed for ſeaſoning Victuals, except by the meaner People. The other Tree yields Peas; for their Figure, Colour, Pod, and Taſte, tho' ſomewhat rank, ſhew that they are of the kind of ordinary Peas. The Tree is common enough in ſeveral Provinces, it is very tall, extends its Branches very wide, and for Thickneſs ſcarce yields to any other.

Colour

But among the Trees that deſerve the Attention of the Public, and are moſt likely to excite the Envy of Europeans, there are none to be prefer'd to the four I am going to ſpeak of.

The firſt is the Varniſh-Tree, called Tſi-ſhu, 'tis neither tall, buſhy, nor ſpreading: Its Bark is whitiſh, its Leaf nearly reſembles that of the wild Cherry-Tree; and the Gum, which it diſtils drop by drop, the Tears of the Turpentine-Tree. It yields a much greater quantity of Liquor if an Inciſion be made in it; but then it periſhes ſo much the ſooner. The Varniſh-Tree.

'Tis commonly reported, that this Liquor, drawn off cold, has certain venomous Qualities, and that there is no way of preventing its miſchievous Effects, in pouring it from one Veſſel to another, or ſtirring it, but by avoiding to ſuck in the Effluvia with the Breath. The ſame Caution is to be obſerved in boiling it. However that be, 'tis certain this Varniſh [or Japan] is not leſs eſteem'd on that account, and is continually uſed by an infinite number of Workmen. It takes all Colours alike; and, if well made, loſes nothing of its Luſtre and Clearneſs, either by change of Air, or the age of the Wood to which it is apply'd. But to do it well requires Time and Care; for one or two layings on is not ſufficient; nor muſt a new lay of Varniſh be applied till the former, which ought to be very ſmooth and thin, be dry'd, but not ſo as to be hard. Care muſt be taken to ſee whether ſuch Lay be ſtiffer, or of a deeper Colour; one muſt try to bring it by degrees to a certain Temper, which only can render the Work firm, ſmooth, and clear. This Art is to be attained only by Experience. As the varniſhed Works muſt ſometimes be ſet in moiſt Places, ſometimes ſteep'd in Water, and, in ſhort, turn'd and placed in various Poſitions, they are ſeldom very large, like the Pillars fix'd on Stone-Baſes, wherewith the Great Hall of the Empire, deſcribed hereafter, the Emperor's Apartment, and other Chineſe Buildings are ſupported: Which Pillars are not done over with true Varniſh, but another Liquor call'd Tong-yew. Manner of laying on the Varniſh, or Japaning.

The ſecond Tree is the Tong-ſhu, whence a Liquor is drawn not much differing from Varniſh. At a ſmall diſtance it appears like the Walnut-Tree: And ſuch the Tartar Mandarins, who came from Pe-king with the Miſſionaries, took it for, ſo great is the Reſemblance as to the Figure, colour of Bark, the ſize and faſhion of the Leaves, the ſhape and make of the Nuts. Theſe Nuts are full of a thickiſh Oil, mixt with an oily Pulp, which they preſs, otherwiſe they would loſe the greater part of the Liquor. Tree whence the Oil is drawn.

There goes a Report, that ſome Servants, after dreſſing their Supper in a Kettle, wherein this ſort of Oil had been boil'd a few Days before, found themſelves much diſorder'd: Which ſhews, that it partakes of the bad Quality of the Varniſh. To make it fit for uſe, they boil it with Litharge, and may mix it with any Colour at pleaſure. It is often laid without any mixture in Wood, which it preſerves againſt the bad Effects of Rain; as alſo on the Squares which form the Floors of Chambers: This makes them ſhine; and provided Care be taken to waſh them from time to time, they retain their Luſtre. The Pavements of the Apartments, belonging to the Emperor and the Grandees, are made in this manner.

But if they would make a finiſhed piece of Work, for inſtance, wou'd adorn a Hall, Chamber, or Cloſet, they firſt cover the Pillars and Wainſcot with a Paſte made of Flax, Lime, or ſuch like Materials; when this is dry'd to a certain degree, they with Bruſhes lay on the Oil, (mix'd with the Colour they pitch on, and boil'd as uſual) according to their Deſign. Sometimes they gild the Moldings, the Carvings, and every thing that is in Relievo: But, ſetting aſide the Gilding, theſe Works ſcarce yield in Beauty and Luſtre to thoſe wherein they employ the Varniſh, call'd T-ſi.

As this Oil is cheap, and the Varniſh pretty dear, the Merchants uſually mix a great quantity of the Tong-yew with the latter, under pretence, that a little of it is neceſſary to bring it to a Temper, and make it ſpread more eaſily. 'Tis with this Tong-yew that they make Cloth to keep out Rain, like the Oil-Cloth in Europe; but the Cloaths made of it can be worn only in the Northern Parts. In ſhort, the Tong-yew is one of the moſt uſeful Trees to be found in China, and we have all the reaſon in the World to wiſh we had it in Europe.

The third Tree is that which produces the Tallow. It is as tall as a large Cherry-Tree; the Fruit is contain'd in a Rind called Yen-kyû, which, when ripe, opens in the middle like a Cheſnut; it conſiſts of white Kernels of the bigneſs of an ordinary Hazle-nut, whoſe Pulp has the Properties of Tallow; accordingly they make Candles of it when it is melted, often mixing with it a little common Oil, and dipping the Candles in the Wax produc'd by the Tree I am going to ſpeak of: This forms a ſort of Cruſt about the Tallow, which hinders it from running. I ſhall ſpeak more of it hereafter. The Tallow-Tree.

The fourth called Pe-la-ſhu, that is, the white Wax-Tree, is the moſt extraordinary of all. 'Tis not ſo tall as the Tallow-Tree, and differs from it alſo in the colour of the Bark, which is white; and in the figure of the Leaves, which are longer than broad. A kind of little Worms faſten on theſe Leaves, wherewith being cover'd, in a ſhort time they form Combs of Wax, much ſmaller than the Honey-Combs. This Wax is very hard and ſhining, and is conſiderably The Wax-Tree.

ſiderably dearer than Bees-Wax. When theſe Worms are accuſtom'd to the Trees of any Diſtrict, they never quit them but on particular Occaſions; and once they remove from a Place, they never return, ſo that others muſt be procured in their ſtead, there being Merchants who deal in them.

The Bambû. To the uſeful Trees may be added the Cane, which the Chineſe call Chû-tſe, and we Europeans Bambû. It grows as high as moſt Trees; and tho' it is hollow throughout, except in the knotty Parts, yet 'tis exceeding hard, is capable of ſuſtaining great Weights, and, in ſome Places, large Houſes of Wood. It may be divided into ſmall Splinters or Strings, of which they make Mats, Boxes, and other curious Works. When it is beaten to Pieces, then left to rot, and boiled in Water till it is reduc'd to a kind of Paſte, it ſerves to make Paper of different ſorts, both fine and coarſe, in which they trade. The Bambû is alſo made uſe of for Pipes to convey Water, and ſeveral other Occaſions too tedious to mention. In ſhort, there are ſo many ſorts of them, in the ſeveral Provinces, differing as to ſize, colour, and other qualities, that it would be tireſome to deſcribe them all. Moſt kinds of Wood, uſed by the Carpenters and Joiners in Europe, are to be found in China. In the Northern Provinces the Fir-Tree is employ'd in Building; and in the Southern Part, beyond the River, they ordinarily make uſe of the Sha-mû.

The Nan-mû much eſteemed in China. But that of greateſt Eſteem among them is called Nan-mû. The Pillars of the Apartments, and ancient Halls, of the Imperial Palace, are all made of it, as well as the Windows, Doors and Beams. The Relations of Travellers ſpeak of it as a Chineſe Cedar; poſſibly, becauſe the Natives look upon it as a Wood that never decays, and for that Reaſon to be prefer'd to all others. When a Perſon has a Mind, ſay they, to build a Houſe, that may laſt forever, he muſt uſe the Nan-mû. However the Leaves of the Nan-mû, at leaſt ſuch as the Miſſionaries have ſeen, are not at all like thoſe of the Cedar, as deſcribed by Authors who have ſeen the Cedars of Mount Libanus. This Tree is one of the talleſt ſort, and very ſtrait; its Branches ſhoot directly upwards; they begin only at a certain height, and terminate a-top in form of a Noſegay.

The Tſe-tan, or Roſe-Wood. The Nan-mû, notwithſtanding 'tis ſo much eſteemed by the Chineſe, comes far ſhort in Beauty of the Wood named Tſe-tan, which at Court is called Roſe-Wood. It is of a reddiſh Black, ſtreaked, and full of very fine Veins, which one would think were painted: It is beſides fit for the fineſt ſort of Joinery-Work. The Furniture made of this Wood is much eſteemed all over the Empire, and in the Northern Provinces ſelling at a greater Price than that which is varniſhed.

The Tye-li-mû, or Iron-Wood. With regard to Strength and Firmneſs, there is, perhaps, no Wood comparable to that called by the Portugueze (the better to accommodate the Expreſſion to the Chineſe Tye-li-mû) Pao de ferro, that is, Iron-Wood. This Tree is as tall as our large Oak, but differs from it in the thickneſs of the Trunk, the ſhape of the Leaves, the colour of the Wood, which is darker, and ſtill more in the Weight. The Anchors of their Ships of War are made of this Wood, and the Emperor's Officers, who accompany'd the Miſſionaries in their Paſſage to the Iſland of Formoſa, or Tay-wan, pretended they were preferable to the Iron-Anchors belonging to the Chineſe Merchantmen; but in this they muſt be miſtaken: For the Flooks can neither be ſufficiently pointed, nor ſtrong enough for taking ſure hold; and, by making the Shanks twice as long as thoſe of Iron-Anchors, they muſt be proportionably weak, be they ever ſo large.

Tea-Shrub, its different Sorts. If from Trees we paſs to Shrubs, thoſe which bear the Tea ought to be placed in the firſt Rank, becauſe they are of the greateſt uſe and benefit in China. The Name of Tha, [or Tea] comes to us from the corrupt Pronunciation at Tſwon-chew, and Chang-chew-fû, in the Province of Fo-kyen; in all other Parts of the Empire they uſe the Word Cha, as do the Portugueze in their Relations. But this Word comprizes many kinds of Tea, conſider'd according to the different Names given to it in different Provinces. However, it may be diſtinguiſhed, by its Qualities, into four Sorts, viz. Song-lo-cha, Vû-i-cha, Pû-eul-cha, and Lo-ngan-cha.

Song-lo, or Green-Tea. The firſt Sort is ſo call'd from a Mountain in the Province of Kyang-nan and Diſtrict of Whey-chew-fû, in the Latitude of 29 d. 58 m. 30 ſ. This Mountain bears the Name of Song-lo-ſhan; it is neither high nor of great Extent, but cover'd over with theſe Shrubs, which are cultivated on its Sides, in the ſame manner as at the Foot of the neighbouring Mountains.

Song-lo, which we call Green-Tea, is planted much in the ſame manner as Vines, and its Growth is prevented, otherwiſe it wou'd run up to 6 or 7 Foot in height: It muſt alſo be planted anew every 4 or 5 Years, or elſe the Leaves will become thick, hard and rough. The Flower is white, and ſhap'd like a Roſe of 5 Leaves. In Autumn, when the Flower decays, there appears a Berry in the form of a well-fill'd Nut, ſomewhat moiſt, and not ill-taſted.

What I have ſpoken of the Height of theſe Shrubs, muſt be underſtood of thoſe that grow in the Province of Kyang-nan; in other Parts they let them grow to their natural Height, which is 10 or 12 Feet; for this reaſon, when the Branches are young, they bend them down, that they may gather the Leaves with greater eaſe. The Song-lo-cha, preſerved ſeveral Years, is an excellent Remedy againſt many Diſtempers.

Vû-i, or Bohea-Tea. The Vû-i-cha grows in the Province of Fo-kyen, and takes it Name alſo from the famous Mountain Vû-i-ſhan, ſituated in the Diſtrict of Kyen-ning-fû, and two Leagues diſtant from the little City of Tſong-gan-kyen, in 27 d. 47 m. 38 ſ. Latitude, according to the Obſervations made on the Spot. This is the moſt famous Mountain in that Province: It is cover'd with a great Number of Temples, Houſes and Hermitages of the Bonzas belonging to the Sect of Tau-kya, which draw thither a great Concourſe of People.

The better to compaſs their Deſign of making this Mountain paſs for the Abode of the Immortal Beings, they have convey'd Barks, Chariots, and other Things of the ſame Kind, into the Clefts

Clefts of the ſteepeſt Rocks all along the Sides of a Rivulet that runs between; inſomuch that theſe fantaſtical Ornaments are looked upon by the ſtupid Vulgar as a real Prodigy, believing it impoſſible that they could have been raiſed to ſuch inacceſſible Places, but by a Power more than human; the Soil of the Mountain which produces this Plant is light, whitiſh and ſandy.

The Shrubs Vû-i-cha and Song-lo-cha are of the ſame Height and Size, and cultivated in the ſame manner; the only Difference between them is, that the Leaves of the latter are more long and pointed, give the Water a greeniſh Tincture, and Experience ſhews it to be ſomewhat raking. On the contrary, the Leaves of the Vû-i-cha are ſhort, more round, ſomewhat blackiſh and colour the Water yellow, without the leaſt Harſhneſs, or any Quality offenſive to the weakeſt Stomach: Hence the Vû-i-cha is moſt generally uſed throughout the Empire. 'Tis difficult to meet with any that is good in the Northern Provinces, where uſually that only which conſiſts of the large Leaf is ſold; for the more yellow, tender and fine the Leaves of the Vû-i-cha, as well as thoſe of the Song-lo, are, the more they are eſteemed: Of theſe they make three ſorts in Places where Tea is gathered.

The firſt is the Leaf gathered from the Shrubs newly planted, or, as the Chineſe expreſs it, are the firſt Points of the Leaves: This they call Mau cha; and is ſcarce ever uſed but in Preſents, or to ſend to the Emperor. The ſecond is of the Leaves more full grown; this is what they ſell by the Name of good Vû-i-cha. The remaining Leaves, which are allowed to grow to their full Bigneſs, make the third ſort, which is very cheap. Mau-cha, or Imperial-Tea.

There is yet another ſort made of the Flower itſelf, but thoſe who would have it muſt beſpeak it, and pay an exceſſive Price. The Miſſionary-Geographers, having got a little of it by means of the Mandarins, had it prepared twice or thrice after the uſual manner, but found no ſenſible Change in the Water, either as to Colour or Taſte, which is probably the Reaſon why this Tea is not uſed by the Emperor or even in the Palace. The Mau-cha above-mentioned is the Imperial Tea, and ſold in the Places near the Mountains Song-lo and Vû-i, for Forty or Fifty Sols a Pound [about two Shillings Engliſh.]

Under theſe two ſorts of Tea or Cha, we may comprehend all the reſt, diſtinguiſhed by different Names, as Lû-ngan-cha, Hay-cha, &c. The firſt has its Name from the City of Lû-ngan-chew, although the beſt Tea of this kind is cultivated no where but on the Sides of the little Hills belonging to the ſmall City of Ho-ſhan-hyen, from whence they are diſtant about ſeven Leagues. The Miſſionaries, having examined it on the Spot, found no Difference between it and the Song-lo-cha, either in the Figure of the Leaves or the manner of Cultivation. If it tinges the Water of a different Colour, and when freſh appears not quite ſo rough or corroſive to the Taſte, it may be attributed to the difference of Soil, which has a ſenſible Effect on ſeveral Plants; ſince we ſee in Europe, that Wines of the ſame kind of Grape are more or leſs rough in different Parts of the ſame Province, and in Provinces more diſtant the Alteration is ſtill more perceptible.

The Chineſe however find the Effects of them very different: The Song-lo is hot and raking, which the Lû-ngan Tea is not, and beſides is ſo tempered that it is neither hot nor cold, and is reckoned very wholſome. The Hay-cha comes from Kan-chew-fû in the Province of Kyang-ſi, and differs in no Reſpect from the Lû-ngan-cha, not even in its Roughneſs or Smoothneſs upon the Palate, ſo that it may be called a Species of the Song-lo-cha.

'Tis the ſame with the other ſorts of Tea; for inſtance, that which the Mongols in Tartary uſe, called by them Kayel cha or Karcha, conſiſts only of Leaves, either of the Song-lo or Vû-i-cha, which grow to their full Size, and are mixed without any ſorting; becauſe the Chineſe think any thing good enough for the Tartars, who cannot diſtinguiſh the coarſe Tea from the fine, and commonly dilute it with Milk; of this they make both an agreeable and a nouriſhing Liquor, which they take at any Hour of the Day.

But we muſt not confound every thing which the Chineſe call Cha with the true Tea; for they give that Name to Plants that do not deſerve it, and which are indeed otherwiſe denominated by thoſe who have not Intereſt enough to make them paſs for ſuch. Thus in the Province of Shan-tong, that which is ſold by the Name of Meng-ing-cha as admirable Tea, is properly no more than a kind of Moſs, which grows on the rocky Parts of a Mountain belonging to the City of Meng-ing-hyen. It is of a very bitter Taſte; and has this Quality of the true Tea, that, when drank hot after Meals, it promotes Digeſtion. Counterfeit Teas.

The ſame ſort of Tea is found in ſome parts of the Provinces which are more Northerly than Shan-tong; though it be not made of Leaves, yet the Merchants call it Cha-ye, or Leaves of Tea. In thoſe Countries where the Tea does not uſually grow, the common People, who have not the niceſt Palates, make uſe of any thing that reſembles the Tea, either in Taſte or Effects, and regale themſelves upon this coarſe Stuff, which they frequently gather from Trees, that, having been long tranſplanted, degenerate on account of the improper Soil, which does not agree with them; and to make it come cheaper, they lay in their Store when the Leaves are grown old, and become tough and large, which renders the Taſte rough and inſipid, although it produces the ſame Effects in thoſe who take it, as the Song lo or Vû-i Tea.

The third ſort of Tea is that which we have named Pû-eul-cha, or Tea of the Village Pû-eul, which is ſituated in the Province of Yun-nan, and on the Borders of Pegu, Ava, the Lavs and Tun-king. Its Neighbourhood to the Mountains, which produce this kind of Tea, has invited the Merchants thither, and by this means it is become conſiderable; though the Inhabitants debar any Merchant from approaching nearer than the Foot of the Mountains, where they receive the Quantity of Tea for which they have bargained. From theſe Merchants we learned that the Trees which produce this Tea are tall and bushy, planted without Order, and propagated without Culture; the Leaves are longer and thicker than those of the Song-lo-cha and Vû-i-cha, and are roll'd up into a kind of Balls, which they sell at a good Price. This sort of Tea is common in the Provinces of Yun-nan and Quey-chew; but the Taste is disagreeable, tho' smooth. The Balls, when cut in pieces, they throw like other Tea into boiling Water, to which it gives a reddish Tincture.

The Chinese Physicians affirm this Drink to be wholsome, as by its Effects it seems to be: The Missionaries, and those who accompanied them, found it very good in slight Disorders, inevitable in long Travels, especially in the excessive Heats of Summer; but its peculiar Qualities are, that it cures the Cholick, stops the Flux, and creates an Appetite; but then it ought to be drank as strong again as Tea is commonly made.

The Tree which yields the Oil.

There is another Tree which bears a Fruit, from whence is drawn an Oil called Cha-yew; this Oil when fresh is perhaps the best in all China. It very nearly resembles the Shrub of the Vû-i-cha, with respect to the Figure of its Leaves, Colour of the Wood, and some other Qualities, but differs from it, not only as to its Size, Thickness and Make, but also as to its Figure, Flowers and Fruit, which is naturally oleaginous, and becomes still more so when kept after it is gathered.

These Trees are of a moderate Height, and grow without Culture on the Slope of a Hill, and even in stony Valleys; they bear green Berries of an irregular Shape, filled with a sort of Kernels, which are pretty hard, but not so hard as the Stones of other Fruits.

Shrubs which bear Flowers.

The flowering Trees and Shrubs are very numerous throughout the Empire. In these the Chinese have the Advantage of the Europeans, as the Europeans have of them with regard to Flowers which spring from Seeds and Roots. Large Trees are to be seen there, covered with Flowers, which have a perfect Resemblance of Tulips; the Flowers of others are like Roses, which intermixt with the green Leaves make a very beautiful Appearance.

Odoriferous Shrubs.

Among the Shrubs I don't know above three or four Sorts whose Flowers are odoriferous; those, called by the Chinese Mo-li-wha, are the most agreeable. The Shrub which bears them is easily propagated in the Southern Parts of China, where it grows to a pretty good Height; but in the Northern Provinces it never exceeds five or six Feet, although they take care in Winter to keep them in Green-Houses made on purpose. The Flower has a great Resemblance of the double Jessamin, both in Figure and Colour, but the Scent is stronger, though no less agreeable: Its Leaf is intirely different, more nearly approaching that of the young Citron Tree.

Flower Quey-wha.

The Tree that produces the Flowers call'd Quey-wha, very common in the Southern Provinces, and sometimes as tall as an Oak, is rarely seen in any of the Northern. These Flowers are small, differing in Colour, and have a very agreeable Odour. The Leaves resemble those of our Bay-Tree; which Resemblance is more easily discerned in the very high Trees, that are principally to be met with in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-si, Yun-nan, and Quang-si, than in the Shrubs of the same Kind. These Flowers are ordinarily yellow, very small, and hang on the Trees in such Clusters, that when they fall they quite cover the Ground: Their Scent is so agreeable, that the Air is perfum'd at a great Distance. There are some Trees which bear four times in the Year; for when the old Flowers fall, others presently succeed, so that very frequently they are to be had even in Winter.

Lan-wha.

There is yet a sort of Plant which is difficult to rear in all but the Maritime Provinces. 'Tis that which bears the Flower call'd Lan-wha, or Lan-wey-wha, whose Smell is still more fragrant than that of the Mo-li-wha, and Quey-wha; but it is not so beautiful to the Eye; the Colour of it is commonly inclining to that of Wax. The most leafy, and the most beautiful Flowers, but entirely insipid, grow like Roses on Trees and Shrubs, which are thought to be of the Peach and Pomegranate kind; they are of a very bright Colour, but produce no Fruit. There is another Shrub which has still less Conformity with any of that Species among us, named by the Chinese, at Pe-king, Wen-quang-shu; for it has different Names, in at least three different Provinces. Its Flower is white, the Leaves of it growing in form of a double and sometimes a triple Rose. The Calix or Cup becomes afterwards a Fruit resembling a Peach, but quite tasteless: The Cells are fill'd with Kernels, or rather Seeds, cover'd with a cartilaginous and blackish Film.

Peonies.

Peonies are found in several Parts of China, much finer than those of Europe: And besides the variety of their Colour, in some Places they have this peculiar to them, that they diffuse a sweet and a most charming Fragrance. Indeed they are the greatest Ornament of their Parterres of Flowers, where one meets with no other sort to compare with our Pink, Tulip, Ranunculus, Anemony, and the like.

Lyen wha, Nymphea, Water-Rose, or Water-Lilly.

In artificial Fishponds, and often in the Marshes, there grows a Flower call'd Lyen-wha, much esteem'd, and cultivated with great Care by the Chinese; by the Leaves, the Fruit and the Stalk, it appears to be the Nymphea, or Water-Lilly, which is but little valued in Europe: But by the great Care they bestow on it, the Flower becomes double; the Leaves, 'tis said, amount to an Hundred; and the Colours are more lively, and in greater Variety than in Europe. Where the Flower is single, the Cup, as in ours, has ordinarily no more than 5 Leaves, whereof the Pistil grows in form of a Cone, and is divided lengthways into several Cells, which contain a very white sort of Fruit larger than our Beans.

To this Plant, which is much us'd all over the Empire, they attribute a great many Qualities; some it certainly has, such as that of being refreshing; others are questionable, as when the Chinese tell us, that it softens Copper when put into one's Mouth, with a bit of the Root. I shall have occasion to mention this elsewhere. The Flower, call'd in Chinese Pe-tsi, is probably a Species of the little Water-Lilly: The Juice to the Taste is agreeable, and seems to have no corrosive Qualities. The meaner sort of People in China living, for the most part, on Herbs, Roots and Pulse, together with Rice, which is their ordinary Food, are very careful to cultivate their Kitchen-Gardens: Whenever the Season for one thing is over, another immediately is planted or sown, and by this means they never suffer the least Spot of Earth to lie idle. They have great Variety of these Vegetables, many of which we have in Europe, others we have not. The Seeds of Cabbage, Sorrel, Rue, and some other Plants, which are brought from the Indies, either dye or degenerate in 2 or 3 Years. They have true Cabbages indeed, but they don't come to a Head: They have had Parsly for many Ages, since it is found in their Books under the Name of Shin-tray; but it has neither the Beauty nor Sweetness of ours. Pot-Herbs.

Among the Pot-Herbs which we have not, there is scarce any, except one call'd Pe-tsay, that deserves a Place in our best Kitchen-Gardens. This indeed is exceeding good, and much us'd; some mistake it for a kind of Lettuce: But tho' its first Leaves resemble those of the Roman Lettuce, it differs from it in the Flower, Seed, Taste, and Height. They are best in the Northern Provinces, where they are left in the Ground during the first Hoar-Frosts, by which they become more tender; the Quantity of them that is sown, is almost incredible: In October and November, the nine Gates of Pe-king are stop'd up by Carts loaded with them, which are passing continually from Morning to Sun-set. The ordinary Kinds which grow in any Ground, are propagated in an infinite Degree by the Chinese, who preserve them with Salt or Pickle them; in order to mix with, and give a Relish to their Rice, which, when boild by itself, is insipid. Pe-tsay, a kind of Lettuce.

In some of the Southern Provinces they cultivate Mallows, boiling their Leaves, and dressing them with Fat or Oil, as we do our Lettuce or Spinage with Butter. This Plant is very wholesome and laxative, without causing any Inconvenience.

The Medicinal Herbs, which we don't there find collected, as at Paris, into a Royal Garden of Plants, might certainly be very numerous in a Country of such vast Extent, and under so many different Climates: But it is not my Design to examine the difference there is between these of China and ours. I shall only speak succinctly of those Plants, which are most esteemed or extraordinary, at least that appeared so to the Missionaries, when they travell'd over the Provinces of that Empire. Medicinal Herbs.

Rhubarb grows in great Plenty, not only in the Province of Se-chwen, but also in the Mountains of Shen-si, named Swe-shan, or the Mountains of Snow, which extend from Lyang-chew, as far as Su-chew and Si-ning-chew: An incredible Quantity of it is gather'd in those Parts only, where the Missionaries, while they were making the Map thereof, in the Months of October and November, frequently met whole Troops of Camels, loaded with Net-Bags full of Rhubarb. The Flowers resemble Bells scolloped at the Edges; the Leaves are long, and somewhat rough to the Touch. The inside of the Root, when fresh, is whitish; but, as it dries, assumes the Colour it has when it comes to us. Rhubarb.

The Plant which their Physicians most use, is called by them Fû-ling, and by European Authors Radix Xina, and grows chiefly in Se-chwen; its Leaves, which creep along the Ground, are long, and narrow; on the contrary, the Root grows to a great thickness; and if we may believe the Chinese, sometimes to the Size of a Child's Head. But whatever Truth is in this, it is certain, that it contains in a kind of Shell a white pithy Substance, somewhat clammy: In all appearance, it is on account of its Whiteness, that the right sort is called Pe-fû-ling, or white Fû-ling. It differs from another sort, which is also much used, because it is cheaper, and grows spontaneously in several Parts of China, where it is consider'd as a Species of wild Fû-ling. Some of our Missionaries, who are Natives of that Part of France, where Truffles grow, affirm that the Pe-fû-ling of Shen-si is a perfect Truffle; its Colour is nearly green, but when dry, it grows somewhat yellowish; the Virtues of this Plant are too universally experienc'd to admit of any Doubt; but it is not so easy to determine in what Distemper it is most proper to apply it, because the Chinese Physicians are observed to use it indifferently in all their Prescriptions.

The Root of the Plant named Ten-se, is not so commonly used, but bears a greater Price. It is scarce, even in the Province of Se-chwen, where it grows between the 30th and 29th Degrees of Latitude; is of a hot Quality, and accounted an excellent Remedy for Disorders caused by cold Humours, and for all sorts of Obstructions. Ten-se.

Its Figure is singular, being very round on one Side, and almost flat on the other; its flat Side is fasten'd to the Ground by Strings, especially by one, pretty thick, which is in the midst of the rest, and enters deeper into the Substance of the Root; from the Convex Surface, shoot divers Stems, which separating at the Bottom, each makes a little Nosegay; by these Marks 'tis easily distinguish'd. They commonly throw away the Branches, and only keep the Root, which they boil, or at least make them pass the Balneum Mariæ before they are sold.

Ti-whang is another Root of a very beautiful Plant, which grows chiefly in the North of the Province of Ho-nan, in 35 d. 6 m. and 10 s. Latitude, in the District of Whay-king-fû. At first sight one would take it for a kind of Liquorish, having a leguminous Flower, and crooked Pod; but after examining the Leaves, the Seed and the Taste, it is hard to determine under what Species to range it. However that be, it is commonly used by the Chinese, who find it good for strengthening the Stomach, and restoring, by degrees, the loss of Vigour. Ti-whang.

But of all Plants, next to the Jin-seng, none is so much valued by the Chinese Physicians as the San-tsi, and they attribute almost the same Virtues to both, even preferring the San-tsi in Female Disorders, and in all Cases where there is loss of Blood. It has no Resemblance of the Jin-seng in Figure; it grows in the Province of Quang-si, and is to be found no where but on San-tsi.

the Tops of almoſt inacceſſible Mountains. A kind of Goat, of a greyiſh Colour, is very fond of this Plant: Whence the Chineſe ſay, the Blood of that Animal receives a Medicinal Quality. 'Tis certain, that its Blood has ſurprizing Effects in caſe of Hurts, and Contuſions received by falls from Horſes, and the like Accidents; this the Miſſionaries have frequently experienc'd. Some of their Servants, who had been thrown by vicious Horſes, and depriv'd almoſt of Speech and Motion, having been ſo ſpeedily cured by this Remedy, that next Day they were in a Condition to continue their Journey.

We muſt not forget to obſerve, that they look on this Potion as a Specific againſt the Small-Pox; Inſtances of its Succeſs are frequent: The black and infectious Puſtules become of a clear red, as ſoon as the Patient has taken the Remedy: Hence 'tis preſcribed in ſeveral Diſeaſes, ſuppoſed to proceed from bad Qualities in the Blood. But this Plant is both ſcarce, and dear, and after all, one is not ſure of having it pure and unmix'd.

In the Experiments above mentioned, they make uſe of the Blood of a Goat that has been hunted down; the San-tſi they uſe, is always that which grows in the Province of Quang-ſi, and which the Mandarins, in thoſe Parts, are accuſtomed to make Preſents of to the ſuperior Mandarins, and to their Protectors at Court.

Caſſia Trees. In the Province of Yun-nan, towards the Kingdom of Ava, there are Caſſia Trees (Caſſia Fiſtula); they are pretty tall, and bear long Pods; whence 'tis called by the Chineſe, Chang-ko-tſe-ſhu, The Tree with long Fruit; its Pods are longer than thoſe we ſee in Europe, and not compoſed of two convex Shells, like thoſe of ordinary Pulſe, but are ſo many hollow Pipes, divided by Partitions into Cells, which contain a pithy Subſtance, in every Reſpect like the Caſſia in uſe with us.

I forbear to ſpeak of the Trees which produce the Betel, tho' 'tis good againſt ſeveral Ailments, and much uſed in the Southern Provinces; as alſo of the Palm, the Banana-Tree, Cotton-Tree, the Mango-Tree, Anana's, and ſeveral other Plants which grow in the Indies, becauſe they are deſcribed in all the Relations of thoſe Countries.

I ſhall only obſerve, that the Chineſe Cinamon grows in the Province of Quang-ſi, and Diſtrict of Tſin-chew-fû, chiefly on the Mountain Pe-ſhe. 'Tis not ſo much eſteemed, even in China, as that which comes from other Places; its Colour inclines rather to grey than red, which is the Colour of the beſt Cinamon of Ceylan; it is alſo more thick, and rough, nor is it ſo odoriferous. However, it has the ſame Virtue of ſtrengthening the Stomach, and exhilarating the Spirits; and Experience ſhews it has all the Qualities of Cinamon, tho' not in ſo great Perfection. One meets, now and then, with ſome more biting than that which comes from the Indies; and this they affirm becomes Grey alſo, when it is long a drying.

It is not proper here to ſpeak of the Simples and Drugs made uſe of by the Artificers of China; ſuch a Work wou'd be more ſuited to the Natural Hiſtory of that Empire. However, I ſhall mention the Plant named Tyen and Tyen-wha; 'tis very commonly us'd in all the Provinces: When it is ſteep'd in Water, and prepar'd in large Tubs, or little Ponds, it yields a Blue, ſerviceable in Dying. Thoſe of Fo-kyen give a more beautiful Teint, and are moſt eſteemed in that ſort of Painting which they call Tan-mey.

They ſcarce employ any thing elſe but the Juices of Flowers and Herbs for painting Flowers and Figures on Satin, and Satin-Taffaties, whereof the Chineſe make their Cloaths, Trimmings and Furniture. Theſe Colours, which penetrate the Subſtance of the Silk, never fade; and as they have not a Body, they never peel off. They ſeem to be woven in very finely with the Ground of the Silk, tho' they are only painted in a very delicate manner.

Animals. We have not been able to procure an exact Knowledge of the rare Animals, which they tell us, are found in the Mountains of the Chineſe Empire. That which they relate of ſome has ſuch an Air of Fable, that I think it unworthy the Attention of the Publick. By what is reported all over Se-chwen, the Sin-ſin ſeems to be a kind of Ape; they ſay it is as large as a middle ſiz'd Man, and has a greater Reſemblance of Mankind than other Apes, both in its Actions, and in the Facility with which it walks on its Hind-Feet.

Man-Bear. What they likewiſe report of the Jin-hyung, or Man-Bear, found in the Deſarts of the Province of Shen-ſi, ought only to be underſtood of the extraordinary bigneſs of thoſe Bears compar'd with Man; juſt as the Animal call'd Ma-lû, or the Horſe-Stag, is only a Species of Stags, which are near as high as the little Horſes of the Provinces of Se-chwen, and Yun-nan, named Chwen-ma.

Yun-nan alſo breeds a kind of Stags, to be found no where elſe; for their ſize never exceeds that of ordinary Dogs; the Princes and great Men keep them in their Gardens as Curioſities.

But what ſome Chineſe Books mention of the Horſe-Tiger, ought to be look'd on as mere Fiction. They pretend it differs from a Horſe only in being cover'd with Scales, in having Claws which reſemble a Tiger's, and in its bloody Diſpoſition; which in the Spring makes him leave the Water to ſeize Men and Beaſts.

The Miſſionaries have travell'd along the River Han, that waters the Territory of Syang-yang-fû, in the Province of Hû-quang, where they ſay theſe Animals breed: They likewiſe have croſs'd the frightful Mountains of Yun-yang-fû; and, notwithſtanding that the Inhabitants made them take Notice of every thing worth obſerving, and of ſeveral things even very trifling, and that the Tartars were very inquiſitive after whatever was rare, in order to entertain the Emperor, who had a taſte for Natural Hiſtory, and judged it very conducive to the Public Welfare, yet they cou'd neither hear of, nor ſee any ſuch Creature. That however which is reported con-concerning the Hyang-chàng-tſe, or odoriferous Deer, is very true; this Animal is not ſcarce, being found, not only in the Southern Provinces, but even within 4 or 5 Leagues to the Weſt of Pe-king. 'Tis a ſort of Deer without Horns, with Hair of a blackiſh Colour; its Muſk-bag is compoſed of a very thin Skin, covered with Hair exceeding fine; the Fleſh is good to eat, and ſerved up at the beſt Tables. I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of it hereafter.

Birds Kin-ki, or golden Hens.

In the Southern Provinces, as Quang-tong, and eſpecially Quang-ſi, there are Parrots of all ſorts, in every reſpect like thoſe brought from America, they have the ſame Plumage and Docility for Talking, but they are not comparable to the Birds called Kin-ki, or Golden-Hens; theſe laſt are found in the Provinces of Se-chwen, Yun-nan and Shen-ſi. We have no Bird in Europe that reſembles them; their lively red and yellow, the Plume on the Head, the ſhadowing of the Tail, and the Variety of Colours in the Wings, together with a well ſhap'd Body, have no doubt given occaſion to the Name of Golden-Hen, as it ſhews the Preference this Bird ought to have over all others: Its Fleſh is more delicate than that of a Pheaſant; ſo that, of all the Birds in the Eaſt, this perhaps beſt deſerves to be brought into Europe.

The Tung-wha-fong.

Nothing is more to be admired than a little Bird called Tung-wha-fong, mentioned by the Chineſe Geographers, according to whom, the Variety of its Colours is ſurprizing, and its Bill of a ſhining Red, inclining to Vermillion; but in the Province of Se-chwen, and even at Ching-tû-fû it ſelf, where, they ſay, it breeds, the Inhabitants know nothing of this Bird, according to the ſame Geographers, its Life is of no longer Duration than the Flower Ting-wha, and its Beauty ſurpaſſes that of the Bird Fang-whang; which ſhould be our Phœnix, if there ever was ſuch a Bird, as it is deſcribed by our Authors.

Fong-whang, or Phœnix.

It is certain that the Fong-whang, whoſe Figure is often painted and ſet off with a vaſt Number of Ornaments, never appears in any of the Cities or Mountains, to which they have given its Name, at Fong-tſyang-fû in Shen-ſi, where they ſay it is, 'tis not more known any where elſe, as we have already remarked in ſpeaking of Fong-whang-ching in Tartary (M.)

Among the beautiful Birds, they with good Reaſon reckon the Hay-tſing. 'Tis very rare, being found only in the Diſtrict of Hong-chan-fû in Shen-ſi, and ſome Parts of Tartary; it is not inferior to our fineſt Falcons, but exceeds them in Bigneſs and Strength; it may be called the King of the Birds of Prey in Tartary and China; for it is the moſt beautiful, ſprightly and courageous of all, and in ſuch Eſteem, that as ſoon as any of them is catched, it muſt be carried to Court, where it is preſented to the Emperor, and afterwards committed to the Care of the Royal Falconers.

Butterflies.

The Butterflies of the Mountain Lo-few-ſhan, ſituated in the Diſtrict of Whey-chew-fû and Province of Quang-tong, are likewiſe ſo much eſteemed, that the largeſt and moſt uncommon are ſent to Court, where they become a Part of certain Ornaments in the Palace: Their Colours are ſurprizingly diverſified and lively; they are much bigger than the Butterflies of Europe, and their Wings a great deal larger. In the Day time they appear without Motion on the Trees, and are eaſily taken; in the Evening they begin to flutter about, much like our Bats, and ſome of them ſeem to be as large, when their Wings are extended: There are alſo beautiful Butterflies found in the Mountains of Si-ſhan in the Province of Pe-che-li, which are likewiſe in Requeſt; but they are ſmall, and not to be compared to theſe of Mount Lo-few-ſhan.

Mountains, and Mines therein.

The Mountains of China are ſtill more valuable, on account of the Mines of different Metals. The Chineſe ſay they are full of Gold and Silver; but that the working of them hitherto has been hindered from ſome political Views, perhaps, that the publick Tranquillity might not be diſturbed by the too great abundance of theſe Metals, which would make the People haughty and negligent of Agriculture.

Thus this immenſe Fund of hidden Treaſure, which they talk ſo much of, becomes uſeleſs. The late Emperor Kang-hi, ſo famous for his Wiſdom, had once given Permiſſion to ſome of his own Houſhold, who had the Care of his Domain to a large Extent, to open the Silver Mines, but cauſed them to give over the Work in 2 or 3 Years. Not, ſay they, becauſe the Profit ariſing from them was trifling, but rather to prevent the Rabble from aſſembling together. They add that thoſe who work in the Silver Mines in the Province of Yun-nan, which have always been open, were formerly conſiderable Gainers by them.

Gold Mines.

Without doubt, China affords Mines of Gold alſo. What Gold they have there, is partly dug out of Mines; but moſt of it is found among the Sands, which the Rivers and Torrents roll from the Mountains in the weſtern Parts of the Provinces of Se-chwen and Yun-nan; this laſt is the richer of the two. The People called Lo-lo, of whom I ſhall ſpeak hereafter, and who poſſeſs the neighbouring Parts of the Kingdoms of Ava, Pegu and Laos, probably dig a great deal of Gold from their Mountains; ſince they uſe to put a good Quantity of Gold Leaves in the Coffins of illuſtrious Perſons, or thoſe who deſerved their Eſteem. Their Gold is not very beautiful, poſſibly becauſe not purified: In all likelihood the Lo-lo are not better ſkilled in Smelting of Gold than Silver, which is ſtill blacker, and fuller of Alloy; but when refined by the Chineſe Workmen, it becomes as pure and beautiful as any other Silver. The Gold, which is moſt beautiful and dear, is found in the Diſtricts of Li-kyang-fû and Yang-chang-fû.

As the Gold which comes from thoſe Places is not coined, it is employed in Trade as a Merchandize; but the Demand for it in the Empire is not very conſiderable, becauſe Gold is ſcarce ever ever uſed but by the Gilders, and in ſome trifling Ornaments; for none but the Europeans have any golden Plate.

Coal Mines. Coal Mines are ſo numerous in the Provinces, that perhaps no Kingdom in the World beſides, has ſo many and ſo rich. Thoſe in the Provinces of Shen-ſi, Shan-ſi and Pe-che-li are innumerable: So that Coal Supplies all their Furnaces, Kitchens and Stoves, which are uſed during all the Winter: Without ſome ſuch Convenience there would be no living in ſo cold a Country, where Wood for Firing is ſcarce, and conſequently very dear.

Mines of Iron, Tin, and other Metals for ordinary Uſe, muſt needs alſo be very numerous there, ſeeing they bear a low Price throughout the Empire. The Miſſionary Geographers were Witneſſes of the Richneſs of a Tuttenague Mine in the Province of Hû-quang, from whence in a few Days were drawn ſome hundreds of Quintals.

Copper-Mine. White Copper. The Mines of common Copper which are in the Provinces of Yun-nan and Quey-chew, have ſupplied the Empire with all the ſmall Money that has been coined there for ſeveral Years paſt: But the moſt extraordinary Copper is that called Pe-tong, or White Copper; it is white when dug out of the Mine, and ſtill more white within than without. It appears by a vaſt Number of Experiments made at Pe-king, that its Colour is owing to no Mixture, on the contrary, all Mixtures diminiſh its Beauty; for when it is rightly managed it looks exactly like Silver; and were there not a Neceſſity of mixing a little Tuttenague, or ſome ſuch Metal with it, to ſoften it, and prevent its Brittleneſs, it would be ſo much the more extraordinary, as this ſort of Copper is, perhaps, to be met with no where but in China, and that only in the Province of Yun-nan. Thoſe who would have it keep its fine Colour, mix a fifth Part of Silver with it inſtead of other Metal.

Red Copper. As for the Copper named Tſe-lay-tong, or the Copper which comes of itſelf; it proves to be nothing elſe but red Copper waſhed down by the great Rains from the high Mountains of Yun-nan, and found among the Sands and Flints, in the Channel of the Torrents, when they ſubſide and their Beds become dry.

The Chineſe pretend, that the Bracelets of Tſe-lay-tong defend the Arms againſt the Palſy, or rather prevent their Loſs of Feeling, by the Diſcharge of certain Humours. One of the Tartars who accompanied the Miſſionaries, found as much Benefit from Bracelets made of Yun-nan Gold, as he had received from thoſe of Tſe-lay-tong; whence the Virtues aſcribed to the exterior Application of that Metal may be juſtly queſtioned: However, it is in great Reputation in Yun-nan, and even in Pe-king.

Quarries of extraordinary Stones. If what they affirm of the Stone called Hyung-Whang, being an Antidote againſt Poiſons is true, it ought to be looked on as a Source of Riches to the Empire, and preferred to the Rubies of Yun-nan, where Mines or rather Quarries of it are found, as alſo in ſeveral other Provinces, even Northern ones, as Shen-ſi. Tis not a Mineral but a ſoft Stone, eaſily formed into Veſſels of all kinds, which they tinge with Vermillion, the Stone itſelf being naturally of a yellowiſh Colour, and ſometimes ſpotted with black.

What the Chineſe Geographers report, of its being an excellent Specifick againſt malignant Fevers, is uncertain; at leaſt it is not uſed in the Cure of them in Places where it abounds: Whence it may be preſumed, that in caſe it has that Property, the Phyſicians there have not diſcovered it.

Lapis Armenus. The Lapis Armenus is not very dear in Yun-nan, where it is found in ſeveral Places, differing in nothing from what is imported into Europe. 'Tis produced alſo in the Province of Se-chwen, and in the Diſtrict of Tay-tong-fû, belonging to Shan-ſi, which furniſhes perhaps the moſt beautiful Yu-ſhe in all China; 'tis a kind of white Jaſper, the white reſembling that of Agat; 'tis tranſparent, and ſometimes ſpotted when it is poliſhed.

Jaſper.

Rubies. The Rubies ſold at Yun-nan-fû, are of the right ſort, but very ſmall. We know not in what Part of the Province they are found. One meets with ſome other kinds of Precious Stones at the ſame City; but they are ſaid to be brought from other Countries, and eſpecially from Ava: at leaſt they are brought by the Merchants of that Kingdom, who come to trade at Yung-chang-fû, whoſe Juriſdiction borders upon it.

Rock Cryſtal. The faireſt Rock Cryſtal does not come from Yun-nan, but is found in the Mountains of Chang-chew-fû, and Chang-pû-hyen, in the Province of Fo-kyen, ſituated in the Latitude of 24 deg. 10 min. The Artificers of thoſe two Cities are very ſkilful in working it; and they make of it Seals, Buttons, and Figures of Animals.

Marble-Quarries. There are in the ſame Province (of Fo-kyeh) as alſo in ſeveral others, Quarries of Marble, not inferior to European Marble, were it as well wrought. However, one may meet at the Merchants with Variety of little pieces, well enough poliſhed, and of a pretty good Colour; for inſtance, the little Tables named Tyen-tſan, wherewith ſometimes the Tables at Entertainments are adorned, are very pretty, and ſpotted with divers Colours, which, though not extraordinary lively, repreſent very naturally Mountains, Rivers, and Trees: They are made of a Marble commonly dug in the Quarries of Tay-li-fû, whereof they ſelect only certain Pieces.

But tho' there is no want of Marble in China, yet one meets with neither Palace, Temple or other Structure at Peking or elſewhere, which is intirely built with it. Tho' the Chineſe Houſes are ſupported by Pillars, it does not appear, that they have yet made any of Marble, or once thought of employing the coloured kind inſtead of Wood, whereof they are accuſtomed to make Pillars. Buildings even of the fine Free-ſtone are rare in this Country: Stone is never uſed but in Bridges and Triumphal Arches, named Pay-lew, which adorn the Streets of a great Number of Towns in each Province.

The

The triumphal Arches are moſtly adorned with lively Figures of Men, Birds and Flowers, in pierced Work; ſo neatly detached from the Body of the Arch, that they are joyned together only by Cordons, and thus run into one another without Confuſion. This ſhows the ſuperior Skill of the ancient Workmen; for it is obſerved that the Triumphal Arches erected of late in certain Cities, fall vaſtly ſhort of the old ones; the Sculpture is very ſparing and appears coarſe; the Work is all ſolid, without being pierced, or having any thing to enliven it. Triumphal Arches.

However, the Order in the modern Pay-lew, is the ſame as in the old: But this Order is very different from ours, both as to the Diſpoſition and Proportion of the Parts. They have neither Chapiters, nor Corniſhes; and that which bears ſome Likeneſs to our Frizes, is of a Height ſhocking to an Eye accuſtomed to the European Architecture; although it is ſo much the more agreeable to the Chineſe Taſte, as it affords more Room for the Ornaments, which garniſh the Sides of the Inſcriptions engraven thereon.

The Stone-Bridges are commonly built like ours, on huge Stone Piers, capable of breaking the Force of the Stream, and ſuſtaining the Weight of Arches, wide and high enough for the largeſt Barks to paſs. They are very numerous in China, and the Emperor ſpares no Expence, when the Benefit of the Public requires them to be built. There is ſcarce a more beautiful Bridge to be ſeen than that of Fû-chew-fû, Capital of the Province of Fo-kyen; the River, which is a Mile and a half broad, is ſometimes divided into ſmall Arms, and ſometimes interſperſed with little Iſlands. This is all united in joining the Iſlands by Bridges, which altogether make 8 Li or Furlongs, and 76 Chineſe Fathoms. The principal Bridge alone has above 100 Arches, built of white Stone, with carved Banniſters on each Side, upon which at the diſtance of every tenth Foot are placed little ſquare Pilaſters, whoſe Baſes are very large, reſembling hollow Barks. Every Pillar bears one or two croſs Stones, which ſupport ſtone Steps, more or leſs in Number, according to the Breadth of the Bridge. Magnificence of the Chineſe in their Stone Bridges. —That of Fû-chew-fû.

But that which ſurpaſſes all the reſt, is the Bridge of Swen-chew-fû, built over the point of an Arm of the Sea, which otherwiſe muſt be croſſed in a Bark, often not without Danger. It is 2520 Chineſe Feet long and 20 broad, ſupported by 252 huge Piers, 126 on each ſide: All the Stones are of a greyiſh Colour, and of the ſame Length and Thickneſs, as well thoſe which croſs from Pier to Pier, as thoſe which are laid a-croſs to join them together.

'Tis not eaſy to comprehend where they could find ſo many large Pieces of Rock, or how they could contrive to cut or place Stones of ſuch enormous Weight, high enough for large Veſſels to paſs underneath: the Bridge is likewiſe ſet off with Ornaments, made of the ſame ſort of Stone. In ſhort, the moſt remarkable things to be ſeen elſewhere, however eſteemed in the Country, are nothing comparable to this. What I have ſaid is ſufficient to give the Reader an Idea of the Magnificence of the Chineſe in publick Edifices, and whatever concerns the Good of the People; with regard to which they are no leſs profuſe, than they are ſparing in what relates to their Perſons and private Buildings. This Magnificence appears ſtill farther in the Quays, which border the Rivers and Canals. 'Tis ſurprizing to behold of what Length and Breadth they are, and what large Stones they are fac'd with.

But theſe Works, however ſplendid they appear, fall far ſhort of thoſe which regard the Rivers and Lakes. Nothing can be of greater public Conveniency, than to be able to go by Water from Kanton, the moſt Southern Part of the Empire, to Pe-king the moſt Northern; and that without travelling above one Day by Land, over Mount Mey-lin, where the River of Kyang-ſi riſes: But one need never quit the Bark, provided he ſails about thro' the Provinces of Quang-ſi and Hû-quang. For the Rivers of Hû-quang and Kyang-ſi run Northwards into the Yang-tſe-Kyang, which is the greateſt River in all China, and traverſes it from Weſt to Eaſt. Rivers and Canals.

This great River joins the River Pe-ho, which is convey'd Southward from Pe-king, by means of a famous Artificial Canal; ſo that there is an eaſy Communication between the Southern Maritime Provinces, and the Northern bordering on Tartary, which becomes an inexhauſtible Source of reciprocal Advantages to both. This Canal, which is call'd Yu-lyang-ho, that is, the Canal for conveying Merchandize, and often Yu-ho, or the Royal Canal, is very remarkable for its Length, which is above 160 great French Leagues, and ſtill more ſo for the Evenneſs of the Country thro' which it is cut; for in all that Space there were neither Hills, Quarries nor Rocks, which gave the Workmen any Trouble either to level, or to penetrate. Great Canal.

In the Province of Shan-tong is a River of an ordinary largeneſs, named Wen-ho, whoſe Stream they have found means to divide. The Point of Diviſion is near a ſmall Eminence, 3 Leagues from the little City of Wen-ſhan-hyen. This Place is call'd Fû-ſhwi-myau, or the Temple of the diviſion of the Waters, becauſe it is conſecrated by the Idolaters to Long-vang, who, according to the Bonzas, is Maſter of the Waters; the larger quantity of Water, after being divided, ſupplies that Part of the Canal which runs to the North; where, after it has received the River Wey-ho, from the Province of Ho-nan, and run a long Courſe, it falls, near the City of Tyen-tſing-wey in the Province of Pe-che-li, into the River which comes from Pe-king, and diſcharges itſelf into the Eaſtern Ocean. The other Branch, which is ſcarce one third Part of the Stream, running Southward [in the Canal] towards the Whang-ho, or Yellow River, meets at firſt with Pools and Marſhes, ſome whereof ſerve for its Channel, and others ſupply it with Water, by means of Sluices, which are open'd and ſhut at pleaſure, with Wooden-Planks that are faſtened a-croſs the Mouth of the Sluice, in Grooves cut into the Stone-Piers that line it, where it is diſcharg'd into the Canal. Its Origin and Courſe.

These Works are in Chinese call'd Cha, and in our Relations Dikes, tho' very improperly; because those which are built in the Canal itself, and contract its Breadth, leaving only Space enough for a large Bark to pass, serve like our Sluices to restrain the Water, when they want at once to stop its Course either entirely, or in part, by laying the Boards a-cross to a certain Height. This Precaution is often necessary, especially in times of Drought: For the Stream of the Canal being only part, as has been observed, of a moderate River, and not able to furnish Water to more than the Depth of 5 or 6 Feet, they have endeavour'd to retard, and even stop the Course of it, by the Elbows made by frequent Turnings and Windings of the Canal: It happens some Years, when there is scarcity of Rain, that it is reduced to three Feet of Water, which is not sufficient to bear the great Imperial Barks, that carry the Provisions and Tributes furnished by the Provinces to Court. In Parts therefore subject to that Inconvenience, they have recourse to this sort of Sluices, [or Reservoires,] if they deserve that Name, since they have no other Basin besides the Canal itself. The Number of others is not so great as is reported, not exceeding 45, and their Breadth not above 30 Feet, nor are the Sides of the Canal lined with Stone, except here and there: They often need repairing, either in those Places where the Earth, being sandy and loose, easily tumbles down; or else near Ponds, which swell'd by extraordinary Rains, sometimes break down the Banks that are made commonly of Earth, probably the same that was thrown up in digging the Canal.

They have greater Difficulties to struggle with, beyond the Whang-ho: For, to draw the Canal from its Southern side to the great Yang-tse-Kyang, it was necessary to raise great Banks of Stone, and other Works of that kind, to resist the Waters, both of a great Lake which is to the West, and of the River Quay-ho, which swell'd to such a degree, in the time of great Rains, that, after ravaging the Plain, it fell with fury on the Canal; these Works are near Whay-ngan-fû, and the best that have been made for the Service of the Canal. There are also some pretty good ones towards Yang-chew-fû, which serve as Quays to that fine City.

Beyond the Yang-tse-Kyang, the Canal (which is continued from Chin-kyang-fû, thro' Chang-chew-fû, and Sû-chew-fû, and receives the several Canals of the Province of Che-kyang,) is more commodious, as it is not embarrass'd with Sluices, or such like Works. The Evenness of the Land, the plenty of Water which has no Descent, and the Nature of the Ground, are Advantages which it wou'd have been difficult for those who made the Canal to have met with else-where.

Imperial Barks. That which most charms the Eye, is the vast Number of large and beautiful Imperial Barks, divided into Squadrons, commanded each by its Mandarin, advancing in great Order, loaded with the best Things that the Provinces afford. 'Tis commonly reported, and agreeable to the printed Accounts, that the Number of these Barks, maintain'd at the Expence of the Empire, amounts to 10,000. However the Mandarins, who are Surveyors of the Transports of Merchandizes, and count them in their Passage, have often affirm'd, that they never saw above 4 or 5000 of them arrive: But even that Number is surprizing, when we reflect upon the Largeness of those Barks, many whereof carry 80 Tun, and that they are design'd meerly for supplying the Imperial City with Necessaries.

In the Countries, where there is no danger of damaging the Great Royal Canal, several little Canals have been cut into it, by the Inhabitants of neighbouring Towns or great Villages. The Advantages that accrue by having a Communication with the whole Kingdom, and thereby facilitating Trade, have made the Chinese surmount Difficulties which frighten Europeans. We meet with an Instance of this in the Canals that pass from Shau-hing-fû to Ning-po-fû; the Waters of one Canal not being on a Level with that of another, the Boat, by means of two Capestanes, is hoisted upon a Stone-Glacis, or Sloping, which being made slippery with Water, the Boat slides down into the second Canal, as swift as an Arrow out of a Bow: For this reason they are made in form of Gondolas, with Keels of a Wood hard enough to sustain the Weight of the Bark. These Boats are proper only for carrying Goods from Ning-po, and the Towns depending on it, as far as the Canal of Shau-hing. They differ much, both as to size and make, from the Imperial Barks, which to be sure wou'd be broken to Pieces, or at least receive some considerable Damage in the Descent.

In the Province of Quang-si they have joined the River that falls into the Sea at Kanton with that which, after crossing the Province of Hu-quang, enters into the great Yang-tse-Kyang, at the Place where the Royal Canal ends, as has been already observed. The Waters which descend from the Mountains, in the North Part of the Province, form near the City Hing-ngan-hyen a small River, which is stopped by a Bank equal to the highest Ground whereon it runs, and its Rapidity makes it swell above the natural Declivity of its Channel, which discharges the Surplus of the Water. But this Canal, which goes not far, before it enters the two Rivers just now mentioned, is neither so commodious, nor so well kept in Repair as the Grand Canal. The Water is often so low, that in many Places the Barks are rather halled along the Gravel, than carry'd by the Stream.

These sorts of Sluices, which are very proper for increasing the Water, by stopping its Course, are commonly made only of Earth, supported by Stakes, and their Mouths secured by Matts, or such like things. But whatever Defects happen, they are supply'd by the Industry and Labour of the Boatmen and Peasants. This Road is chosen by the Merchants, who are deterred from taking that to Kanton, thro' the Province of Kyang-si, because of the Expence and Trouble they are obliged to be at, by carrying their Goods one Day's Journey over Land.

There

There is ſome Inconveniency in travelling from Kanton by the Province of Hû-quang; for they muſt quit the River (which paſſing to Shau-chew-fû, falls into that of Kanton) at I-chang-hyen, whence it is 7 Leagues and a half to the fine City of Ching-chew; (both in Hû-quang) where they embark on another River which falls into the great Yang-tſe-Kyang: But, when the Waters are high, they are not retarded at all in the Road thro' Kyang-ſi and Hû-quang. 'Tis doubtleſs of vaſt Advantage to the whole Kingdom, to have a conſtant Courſe of Trade ſo eaſily kept up among the Provinces, by means of the Communication carry'd on, as well by the Royal Canal, which leads to Pe-king, as the leſſer Canals, which terminate in it, like ſo many croſs Roads.

Theſe Canals are ſupply'd with Fiſh from the Rivers and Lakes, wherewith they communicate; one meets with almoſt all the Kinds that are found in our Rivers in France: Several others come from the Sea, advancing a great way up the Rivers; ſometimes thoſe of the largeſt Size are caught in Places above 150 Leagues from the Coaſt. There is near Nan-king, a famous Fiſhery for Shads, call'd She-yu, in the Months of April and May; and at another Place, a good way from thence, there is ſuch plenty of this ſort of Fiſh, that they often carry them to a neighbouring Iſland call'd Tſong-ming, where they were ſold exceeding cheap, at the time the Miſſionaries made the Map of it. Different kinds of Fiſh.

Theſe Miſſionaries were ſo employ'd in ſettling the Geography of Places, that they had not time to enquire into the various Species of Fiſh, which are ſo numerous in the Rivers and Lakes of China: Beſides, a Work of that kind wou'd belong to a Natural Hiſtory of the Country, if it were ſet on foot. They have, however, obſerved two or three Things ſingular enough. The firſt is, That in the great River Yang-tſe-Kyang, not far from the City Kyew-king-fû, in the Province of Kyang-ſi, a prodigious Number of Barks meet every Year to buy the Spawn of Fiſhes. About May the People of the Country damm up the River for 9 or 10 Leagues together, in ſeveral Places, with Mats and Hurdles, (leaving only Room enough for Barks to paſs) in order to ſtop the Spawn, which they know how to diſtinguiſh at firſt Sight, tho' the Water is ſcarce alter'd; with this Water, mixt with the Spawn, they fill ſeveral Veſſels to ſell to the Merchants, who at this Seaſon arrive in great Numbers to buy, and tranſport it into divers Provinces, taking Care to have it ſtirr'd up from time to time. This Water is ſold by Meaſure to ſuch as have Fiſh-Ponds, and Pools belonging to their Houſes; in a few Days the young Fry begin to appear in little Shoals, but the different Kinds cannot be ſo ſoon diſtinguiſhed. The Profit often amounts to a hundred times the Expence; for the common People live much on Fiſh.

The next Thing remarkable, is the Kin-yu, or Golden-Fiſh; theſe are kept, either in little Ponds, made for that purpoſe, wherewith the Houſes of Pleaſure, belonging to the Princes and great Lords, are embelliſh'd; or elſe in Baſins, that commonly adorn the Courts of their Houſes: In theſe Baſins, which are more deep than wide, they put the leaſt that can be found: For the ſmaller they are, they think them the more beautiful; beſides, the greater Number may be kept of them, and they afford more Diverſion. Golden Fiſh.

The prettieſt of them are of a curious Red, ſpeckled as it were with Gold-Duſt, eſpecially towards the Tail, which is forked with two or three Points; ſome are of a ſilver Colour, others White, and ſome ſpotted with Red; both ſorts are extraordinary lively and active, delighting to play on the Surface of the Water; but then their Smallneſs renders 'em ſo tender, that the leaſt impreſſion of Air, and even any violent ſhaking of the Veſſel, will kill great Numbers of them. Thoſe that are bred in Ponds are of various Sizes; ſome are bigger than our largeſt Pilchards (N): They teach them to riſe up to the Top of the Water at the Noiſe of a Clapper, which the Perſon uſes who feeds them. What is moſt ſurprizing is, that, according to all Accounts, the beſt way to preſerve them is to give them nothing in Winter; 'tis certain they do not feed them for 3 or 4 Months at Pe-king, while the very cold Weather laſts; what they live on in the mean time, under the Ice, it is not eaſy to underſtand, except we ſuppoſe, either that they find little Worms in the Roots of Herbs, which grow at the Bottom of the Ponds, or elſe that Pieces of Roots themſelves, being ſoftened by the Water, become proper Food for them; but thoſe which, to prevent their being frozen, are taken into the Houſes, and kept all Winter in a Chamber, often ſhut up in a China Veſſel, without being fed at all, are towards Spring put into the Baſins again, where they ſport with the ſame Strength and Agility as they did the Year before. One wou'd imagine they knew their Maſters, and thoſe who carry them Food, by their being ſo ready to riſe at their approach: The greateſt Lords themſelves delight in feeding them with their own Hands, and ſpend ſome Time to obſerve their nimble Motions, and ſporting in the Water.

Theſe Fiſh, at leaſt the prettieſt of them, are caught in a ſmall Lake (O), in the Province of Che-kyang, near the little City of Chang-wha-hyen, in the Diſtrict of Han-chew-fû, and at the Foot of a Mountain call'd Tſyen-king, ſituated in 30 d. 23 m. of Latitude; but as this Lake is ſmall, it is not likely that all the Golden-Fiſh come from thence, which are ſeen in the Provinces of China, particularly thoſe of Quan-tong and Fo-kyen, where this Species may be eaſily preſerved and propagated. For 'tis certain, that even the ſmalleſt of thoſe that are fed in Veſſels are prolific enough; their Spawn is ſeen ſwimming on the top of the Water, and provided it is taken up, and kept with Care, the Heat of the Seaſon never fails to animate it.

(N) They ſcarce ever exceed a Finger's Length, and one of the better ſort ſells for three or four Crowns.

The Hay-ſeng.

But this Kind of Fiſh is not more beautiful, than thoſe, called by the Chineſe Hay-ſeng, are hideous and ugly; they are however the common Diet of the Chineſe, and make a Diſh in almoſt every Meal; they are ſeen floating on the Coaſts of Shan-tong and Fo-kyen: The Miſſionaries took them at firſt for ſo many inanimate Lumps: But the Chineſe Mariners having taken one of them, by their Orders, they found it to be alive. It ſwam in the Baſin wherein it was caſt, and even liv'd there a pretty while. The Natives having always told them, that this Animal had four Eyes and ſix Feet, and that in Figure it reſembled a Man's Liver, they examin'd it very carefully, but cou'd diſcover only two Places, which ſeem'd to be Eyes, by the ſigns of Fear it ſhewed when they moved their Hands before thoſe Parts; indeed, was every thing, that ſerves it to move with, to be look'd on as Feet, one might reckon as many as there are little Pimples, reſembling Buttons, all over its Body; it has neither Prickles nor Bones, and dies the Moment it is ſqueezed. A little Salt will preſerve it, in which it is convey'd to all Parts of the Empire; it is accounted a great Dainty, and ſo it may really be to a Chineſe Palate, tho' it did not appear ſo to ours. But if one's own Taſte is not the ſame at all times, no wonder it ſhou'd differ from that of People accuſtom'd to different Food.

Petrefy'd Sea-Crabs.

I might ſpeak of a kind of Sea-Crabs, (found between the Coaſt of Kau-chew, in the Province of Quang-tong, and the Iſle of Hay-nan) which are ſubject to Petrefaction without loſing their natural Shape, but this is no Novelty in Europe: The Chineſe Phyſicians preſcribe them as very proper in burning and acute Fevers; but to prove the certainty of this, Experiments ought to be made to demonſtrate the Efficacy of this Remedy.

Remarkable Lakes.

The Chineſe tell Wonders alſo, concerning the Water of certain Lakes and Rivers; but what they report appears to be as falſe as it ſeems improbable. Nature being the ſame in all Countries, extraordinary Effects ought to be rare, which they wou'd not be, if all that is ſaid on this Head, by the Chineſe, was true: However it can't be deny'd, but that China is full of conſiderable Lakes as well as Rivers; ſuch are the Hong-ſe-Hû in the Kyang-pe; Ta-Hû, partly in the Province of Kyang-nan, and partly in that of Che-kyang; the Po-yang-Hû in Kyang-ſi, and the greateſt of all, in Hû-quang, named Tong-ting-Hû. This laſt Lake is remarkable for the greatneſs of its Circumference, which is above 80 French Leagues, and the abundance of its Waters, eſpecially in certain Seaſons, when two of the largeſt Rivers in the Province, ſwollen with the Rains, diſcharge themſelves into it, and when it diſembogues them, one can ſcarcely perceive it to be diminiſhed.

In the Province of Yun-nan there are, at leaſt, three Rivers which terminate in pretty large Lakes, but leſs than the four already mentioned; the People of the Country name them Hay, that is, Seas. There are alſo in the ſame Province, as well as ſome others, large Brooks, which run under Ground for a conſiderable Space, and appear again: But there is nothing in all this inconſiſtent with the Nature of Things, the Countries known to us affording Inſtances of the like kind.

As the Cities of China, which are very numerous, are almoſt all built on Lakes, Rivers or Canals, they make without doubt their greateſt Ornament, and render travelling by Water extremely commodious, as well as agreeable; this will appear hereafter from the Deſcription of the ſeveral Provinces, each of which is preceded by its Map. But firſt I think it neceſſary to give an Account of the Great Wall, and certain Nations, which are either independant of the Chineſe, or but half-ſubdued. To theſe I have added the Travels of certain Miſſionaries thro' divers Provinces, whoſe Obſervations are ſo particular, that the Reader will imagine he is performing the Journey himſelf.

Of the GREAT WALL, ſeparating China from Tartary.

THIS celebrated Wall was built by the famous Emperor Tſin Shi-whang, with a politic View, 221 Years before Chriſt. It bounds China on the North, and defends it againſt the neighbouring Tartars, who being at that time divided into various Nations, under different Princes, cou'd only incommode it by ſudden Inroads and Plunderings. There was then no Inſtance of ſuch a re-union among the Weſtern Tartars, as happen'd about the beginning of the 13th Century, when they conquer'd China. No Work in the World is equal to this; it is continued along three large Provinces, viz. Pe-che-li, Shan-ſi, and Shen-ſi, built often in Places which ſeem inacceſſible, and ſtrengthened with a Series of Forts erected at no leſs Expence. The beginning of this Wall is a large Bulwark of Stone, rais'd in the Sea, to the Eaſt of Pe-king, and almoſt in the ſame Latitude, being 40 d. 2 m. and 6 ſ. in the Province of Pe-che-li; it is well terraſſed, and caſed with Brick, and is as high, and much broader, than the Walls of the Cities of the Empire uſually are, that is, from 20 to 25 Feet in height.

P. Regis, and the other Miſſionaries, who aſſiſted him in making the Map of the Provinces, have often, on the Top of it, apply'd the Cord to meaſure the Baſes of Triangles, and taken the Bearing of Points at a diſtance; they always found it well pav'd, and wide enough for 5 or 6 Horſemen to march a-breaſt with eaſe. The Gates of the Great Wall are defended on the ſide of China, by pretty large Forts: The firſt of them to the Eaſt is call'd Shang-hay-Quan, it ſtands near the Wall, which extends, from the Bulwark before-mentioned, the Space of a League, along a Country perfectly level, and does not begin to aſcend the Mountains, till after it has paſs'd that Place. It was the Chineſe General commanding in this Part, who firſt called in the Tartars of the Province of Lyau-tong, which lies beyond it: And by this gave them an Opportunity of conquering China, notwithſtanding the Confidence the Chineſe had in their mural Rampart, which they thought impregnable. Such is the viciſſitude of human Affairs, that outward Defences, and all the Strength of a State, ſerve only to produce more ſudden Revolutions, and even haſten its Ruin, when unſupported by Virtue in the Subject, and Vigilance in the Prince.

The other Forts, no leſs remarkable, are Hi-fong-kew, in 40 deg. 26 min. Tu-ſke-kew in 41 deg. 19 min. 20 ſec. Chang-kya-kew, in 40 deg. 5 min. 15 ſec. two noted Paſſes, by which the Tartars, who are ſubject to China, come to Pe-king; and Kû-Pe-kew, in 40 deg. 43 min. 15 ſec. this laſt was the Way the Emperor Kang-hi uſually took to go to Je-ho-el in Tartary: The Place is above 40 Leagues North-eaſtward from Pe-king. About it are nothing but Mountains, where he uſed to take the Diverſion of Hunting: The Road hither from Pe-king is a grand Work, and level as a Bowling-Green.

Here that great Prince reſided above one half of the Year, governing his vaſt Empire all the while with the ſame Eaſe as a Father governs his Family. If he returned late from Hunting, he never went to Reſt till he had diſpatched all the Petitions, and next Morning roſe again before Day-break. It was ſurprizing to ſee him at the Age of Sixty, often when it ſnow'd very hard, on Horſeback, in the midſt of his Guards, cloathed as thinly as themſelves, laden with his Bow on one Side and his Quiver on the other, without offering to make uſe of an empty Chaiſe which followed him.

All theſe Forts, which are in the Province of Pe-che-li, are made of Earth, caſed on both Sides with Brick; but when one leaves that Province and enters Shan-ſi, towards Tyen-ching-wey, the Wall begins to be only of Earth, is without Battlements, nor ſo much as plaiſtered, grows narrow, and is not above 15 Feet in Height. However, after one has paſſed Sha-hû-kew in 40 deg. 19 min. which is the Place the Ruſſians come to directly from Selinghinſkoi, it is caſed on the outſide with Brick; ſome of its Towers alſo are very large, and built of Brick, on a Foundation of Stone; but it does not always continue the ſame. The River Whang-ho, which has Centry-Boxes along its Banks, where Soldiers keep Guard day and night, ſupplies the Place of the Great Wall towards the Borders of Shan-ſi and Shen-ſi.

Beyond the Whang-ho, Weſtward, in the Province of Shen-ſi, the Wall is only of Earth, low, narrow, and ſometimes of Gravel (for it ſtands in a gravelly Country) and in ſome Places quite ruined. But then the Entrance is defended by ſeveral conſiderable Cities, as Yu-ling-hyen, in 38 deg. 18 min. Ning-hya, (P) 18 deg. 32 min. 8 ſec. Lyang-chew (Q) in 37 d. 59 m. Kan-chew, in 39 deg. Sû-chew and Si-ning, at which Places General Officers are poſted with Bodies of Troops. He who reſides at Kan-chew is the Generaliſſimo, whom they name Ti-tû; the reſt are only Lieutenant-Generals called Tſong-ping. Ning-hya.

Ning-hya is the beſt of theſe Cities; it is handſomer, richer and better built than moſt Cities of the Empire: It is alſo pretty large; for taking in both the Incloſures, that are inhabited, it is at leaſt 15 Chineſe Li in Compaſs. The Induſtry of the Inhabitants has rendered the Country about it fertile; for by means of Canals and Sluices which they have made, they can convey the Waters of the Whang-ho into the Lands when they ſtand in need of Moiſture. There are Salt-ſprings in the Ditches of the Town, from which they make Salt. Here are alſo Manufacturies of Woollen Goods and Carpets, after the Turkiſh Faſhion. The Mountains are ſo high and almoſt perpendicularly ſteep in the Diſtrict of Ning-hya, that 7 or 8 Leag. from the City they ſerve inſtead of the Great Wall, for the Space of about 10 Leagues. Sû-chew, which lies in 39 d. 45 m. 40 ſ. is a pretty large City; but not equal to Ning-hya, either for Beauty or Trade, tho' it commands the Garriſon at Hya-yu-quan, (thro' which the Road lies to Hami) and ſeveral Diſtricts of the Kalka Tartars.

The Wall in theſe Parts is only of Earth, but kept in better Repair than elſewhere, becauſe of the Neighbourhood of the People of Hami, who have ſubmitted to the Emperor within theſe few Years. The Walls of Hya-yu-quan are not of Brick, but they are well guarded with Soldiers who defend this important Paſs.

The Wall ends when you have paſſed the little City Chwang-lan, ſo named becauſe it ſtands where two Roads meet, one whereof is in the Valley which goes by Lang-chew to Hya-yu-quan, and the other upon the Mountains which reach to Si-ning-chew; but inſtead of a Wall there is a pretty broad Trench dug on purpoſe, excepting in the narrow Paſſes near to Si-ning, which are walled like thoſe in the Province of Shen-ſi. The City of Si-ning lying in 36 deg. 59 min. is not large, but exceeds Ning-hya in Trade. All the Furrs that come from the Weſtern Tartary, are ſold in this Town, or in a neighbouring Borough called To-pa. This laſt Place is of more Worth than a large City, although it is neither well built nor well ſituated; for it abounds with almoſt all ſorts of foreign as well as Chineſe Commodities, and with various kinds of Drugs, as Saffron, Dates, Coffee, &c.

When P. Regis was at To-pa making the Map of that Country, he met with three or four Armenian Catholics, who kept Shop there, and ſold beautiful Skins, which they fetched from Tartary. The Houſes and Shops are much dearer in this Borough than in the City of Si-ning, which is but four

(P) In the Table of Longitudes and Latitudes, it is put at 38 deg. 18 min. 8 ſec. which agrees with the Map, ſo that 33 deg. 15 min. as in the French, muſt be a Miſtake.

(Q) Lan-chew, as in the Original, muſt be a Miſtake alſo, as appears by the Latitude, which belongs to Lyang-chew.

Leagues distant. It is remarkable, that it does not depend on the Mandarins of Si-ning, but on a Lama-Bonza (R), who is always one of the Race to which that Territory belongs. This Family is the most considerable of the Nation called Si-fan or Tû-fan, whereof I shall give a more ample Account hereafter.

The Emperors of the former Race, thinking to procure a more lasting Repose to the Nation, by making the Place, where they kept their Court, impregnable, had built a second Wall as strong and surprizing as the first, which still remains entire in Pe-che-li, 76 Li from Pe-king, at one of the principal Gates named Nan-kew 10 Leagues from thence, on the Side of a high Mountain, by which the Road leads to Swen-wha-fû, and from thence to Tay-tong in the Province of Shen-si. This is a small City fortified with several Walls, that rise and fall according to the Surface of the Mountains whereon they are built, and surprize the Eye with the Boldness of their Structure.

This Wall, which is called the inner Great Wall, joins the other to the North of Pe-king, near Swen-wha-fû, where there is a Garrison; and is continued along the Western Part of the Province of Pe-che-li, extending into that of Shan-si, where it is fallen to ruin in several Places. Among the Plans of Cities inserted towards the middle of this Volume, there is one Part of the Great Wall on the Side of Yong-ping-fû.

When we consider the Number of strong Places and Forts built between these two Walls, with the other Works on the Eastern Side, we cannot but admire the Care and Efforts of the Chinese, who seem to have made use of all the Means, which human Forecast could suggest, for the Defence of their Kingdom, and for preserving the publick Tranquility.

Of the People named SI-FAN, or TU-FAN.

FOR the better understanding what I am going to relate, it is necessary to call to mind what I only just mentioned before, viz. that the little Town of Chwang-lan stands as it were at the meeting of two Valleys; whereof one goes towards the North as far as the Gate of the Great Wall, called Hya-yu-quan, the Space of above a hundred Leagues; and contains three great Cities, Lan-chew, Kan-chew, and Sû-chew, with several Forts belonging to them. The other Valley extends Westward above twenty Leagues to Si-ning, and is full also of little Forts, which are subject to that City, and render the Chinese absolute Masters of the plain Country; but they are not so of the Mountains, which are inhabited by a Nation different from the Chinese, who lie to the South of them, as well as from the Tartars, who are to the North.

The Chinese distinguish this Nation into two sorts of People; they call one sort He Si-fan, or black Si-fan; and the other Whang Si-fan, or yellow Si-fang: Not that the one is whiter than the other, for they are in general a little swarthy, but because their respective Tents are of those Colours.

The black Si-fan. The black Si-fan have also some pitiful Houses, but are very uncivilized. They are governed by petty Chiefs who depend on a greater. Those whom P. Regis saw were dressed like the Inhabitants of Hami: The Women wore their Hair parted into Tresses hanging down on their Shoulders full of little brass Mirrors.

The yellow Si-fan. The yellow Si-fan are subject to certain Families, whereof the eldest is made a Lama, or Tartarian Bonzas, and wears a yellow Habit, which may probably be another reason, for the Chinese Distinction of Black and Yellow Si-fan. These Lamas, who are of the same Family and govern in their respective Districts, have the Power of deciding Causes, and punishing Criminals. They inhabit the same Canton, but in separate Bodies, and without forming large Villages. Their usual Way is to make little Hamlets, consisting of six or seven Families of the same Kindred; which appear like little Camps, or Syau-in, as they are called in the modern Chinese Books of Geography.

The greater Number of them dwell in Tents; but some have their Houses built with Earth, and a few of Brick. They want none of the Necessaries of Life. They have numerous Flocks of Sheep; their Horses indeed are but small, but well shaped, mettlesome and strong.

The Lamas, who govern these People, don't make them uneasy, provided they render them certain Honours, and punctually pay the Dues of Fo, which are very trifling (s). The Armenians who were at To-pa, seemed very well pleased with the Lama, who is Lord of the Place, and was not then above 25 or 26 Years of Age. Far from vexing his Subjects, he only took from each Family a very small Tribute, in Proportion to the Quantity of Land it possessed.

Their Language. There is said to be some Difference in the Language of these two sorts of Si-fan; but as they understand each other well enough to trade together, it is probable that they differ only as Dialects of the same Language.

The Books and Characters used by their Chiefs, are those of Tibet, which is the Country of the great Lama. Neither of these two Nations are more than half subject to the neighbouring Chinese Mandarins, before whom they rarely appear when cited: and indeed for the most part they don't

(R) Or a Tartarian Bonza, as he is termed towards the Beginning of the next Article, to distinguish these from the Chinese Bonzas or Priests, who yet profess the same Religion.

(s) These Dues I take to be a kind of Tythes, as being exacted on a Religious Account.

don't regard their Citations. It ſeems, the Mandarins dare not treat them with Rigour, or offer to force them to Obedience, the Mountains they inhabit, whoſe Tops are covered with Snow even in July, ſheltering them againſt all Purſuits. Nay, as they have the Diſpoſal of the Rhubarb, which grows in abundance on their Lands, they are courted by the Chineſe, who readily leave them in Poſſeſſion of ſo frightful a Country, provided they can procure from them the Commodity in the Condition which they require it. They have Cuſtoms and Ceremonies very different from the Chineſe: For inſtance, 'tis uſual with them to preſent a large white Handkerchief of Cotton or Taffety, when they go to wait upon the Perſons whom they mean to honour. They have alſo ſome Cuſtoms like thoſe found among the Kalka Tartars, and others which reſemble the Cuſtoms of the Tartars of Kokonor. Cuſtoms and Manners.

The preſent Government of the Si-fan, or Tü-fan, is very different from what it was formerly. They have not now one Town in their Poſſeſſion, and are pent up between the Rivers Ya-long and Yang-tſe-kyang, whereas anciently, their Kingdom was well peopled, fortified, and very powerful. Dominions.

It appears from the Chineſe Geographers of the middle Age, from the Hiſtory of the Provinces of Shen-ſi and Se-chwen, and by the great Annals Nyen-i-ſhe, that they had a very large Dominion, and Princes of great Reputation, who both made themſelves formidable to their Neighbours, and cut out ſome Work even to the Emperors of China. On the Eaſt-ſide they not only poſſeſſed divers Territories, which at preſent belong to the Provinces of Se-chwen and Shen-ſi, but alſo puſhed their Conqueſts ſo far into China as to ſubdue ſeveral Cities of the Rank of Chew, whereof they formed four great Governments: Weſtward they were Maſters of all the Countries from the River Ya-long, to the Borders of Caſhmir.

In the ſeventh Century, Ki-tſon, King of the Tü-fan, poſſeſſed this vaſt Dominion, and had ſeveral Kings his Tributaries, to whom he ſent Patents and Seals of Gold. Having form'd the Plan of an Alliance with China, in the Time of the Emperor Tay-tſong of the Dynaſty of Tang, one of the greateſt Princes that Monarchy ever had, he ſent a moſt famous Embaſſy to that Prince, who, pleaſed with his Politeneſs, received and diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors with the greateſt Marks of Honour and Diſtinction. Hiſtory of the Si fan. AN. CHRIS. 630.

Ki-tſon, upon this Encouragement, by a ſecond Embaſſy demanded a Princeſs of the Imperial Blood, for his Son Long-tſang. The Emperor's Council, looking on this as a very bold Propoſal, rejected it with Scorn, without ſo much as deigning to deliberate on it. Long-tſang ſucceeding to the Throne on the Death of his Father, came at the Head of 200,000 Men to demand the Princeſs; and having defeated certain Princes Tributary to China, who oppoſed his Paſſage, he penetrated to the Borders of Shen-ſi, where the Emperor then kept his Court. The Imperial Council depended on the Reſiſtance of thoſe Princes, becauſe all the other Roads were impracticable to a numerous Army.

After theſe firſt Succeſſes, Long-tſang ſent one of his Officers with a proud and haughty Letter, which he wrote to the Emperor; wherein he demanded that the Princeſs ſhould be immediately delivered up to him, with a certain Quantity of Gold, Silver, and Silks, which he ſaid were due to the Huſband of a Princeſs of the Imperial Blood, who came to receive her in Perſon with ſo much State and Magnificence.

The Emperor, offended at ſuch a Demand, immediately ſent Orders to his Troops on the Frontiers to aſſemble, and to gain Time, he amuſed the Envoy with Hopes, giving him every Day a ſumptuous Entertainment: But as ſoon as he underſtood that the Imperial Army was ready to march, he diſmiſſed the Envoy with Diſgrace, and without returning any Anſwer to the Letter of the King his Maſter.

The General Hew-hyen-tſi ſet out at the ſame time, and as ſoon as he had joined the Army, he attacked that of Long-tſang, and routed it. However the Loſs was not ſo conſiderable on the Prince's Side, but that, after having rallied his Troops, he found himſelf in a Condition to give the Emperor Uneaſineſs; for which Reaſon, as he promiſed to retire, in caſe the Princeſs was ſent him with an Equipage ſuitable to her Dignity, the Emperor's Council were of Opinion, that he ſhould give his Conſent: Accordingly the Princeſs ſet out with a great deal of Pomp, and after the Ceremonies of Marriage were over, Long-tſang retired, and became a faithful Ally. He was very ſerviceable to the Empire on divers Occaſions; particularly when the General Alena uſurped a Tributary Kingdom of China, Long-tſang aided the Emperor's General with all his Forces, fought himſelf in Perſon, and had a good Share in the Victory by killing the Rebel. 640.

Ki-li-ſo, who ſucceeded Long-tſang, did nothing to diſturb the Peace which he had with the Empire and all his Neighbours: On the contrary, he ſtudied only to continue it, by the Treaties which he made with different Nations of Tartars, and eſpecially with the Whey-he. This Prince died without any Iſſue, leaving his Kingdom equally powerful in domeſtick Forces and foreign Alliances. 696. The Whey-he Tartars.

Su-ſi, his next Heir and Succeſſor, was of a more warlike Genius; he was call'd in with his Tartarian Confederates, and ſome other Allies of the Empire, to aſſiſt the Emperor When-tſong, obliged at that Time to quit his Court at Chang-gan (the City at preſent called Si-ngan) and abandon it to the Rebels headed by the General Gan-lo-ſhan.

The next Heir to the Crown, who called them in, had promiſed them great Rewards, if they gained the Victory. He kept his Word with them, and beſides giving them the Plunder of certain rebellious Cities, and among the reſt that of Lo-yang, which was very rich, he made them Preſents of great Quantities of Silks and the choiceſt things that China produced.

But

But whether diſſatisfied with thoſe Preſents, or grown more haughty and enterprizing from the Proof they had given of their Strength, or prompted by Policy to take an Advantage of the Weakneſs of an Empire exhauſted by ſo many civil Wars; as ſoon as they heard of the Emperor's Death, they ſet forward with a formidable Army, and made ſuch incredible Haſte, that they were arrived on the Frontiers of the Empire, before there was the leaſt Surmiſe of their Irruption.

The Governors of Ta-chin-quan, Lan-chew, and all the Country of Ho-ſi-ú, were ſurprized, and forced to ſurrender. The News being brought to Court by ſome that had fled, he who was then at the Head of Affairs, at firſt could ſcarce believe it. However, as he had the Wiſdom to provide againſt the worſt, he ordered the moſt experienced general Officer, then at Court, to depart at the Head of 3000 Horſe to learn the Truth.

Ko-tſey, (for that was the General's Name) was ſcarcely arrived at Hyen-yang, a City not far from the Court, when he received Information that the Enemy's Army, conſiſting of 300,000 Men, would be there that very Day. He diſpatched immediately a Courier to the Miniſter, to preſs him for Succours, without which it was impoſſible for him with ſuch a Handful of Men, to oppoſe the Tú-fan, who were ready to fall upon the City where the Emperor reſided.

The Miniſter did not ſtir a Step faſter. Mean time the Generals of the Enemy, who knew the Country, were no ſooner arrived at Hyen-yang, than they detached a conſiderable Body of Troops to poſſeſs themſelves of a Bridge on the River, where the reſt of the Army arrived next Day in good Order.

The Emperor, from whom they had till then concealed the Danger he was in; was ſo confounded with the News, that he abandoned his Palace and fled: The great Men of his Court, the Officers and People all followed his Example. Thus the victorious Army entered the Palaces of the Emperor and the Princes, without Reſiſtance, where they found immenſe Riches, which they carried away, and then ſet both the Palaces and the City on fire in different Places.

Ko-tſey had retired with his 3000 Horſe, that he might join the Troops, which, on the firſt Alarm, left Chang-gan; By means of that Reinforcement he ſaw himſelf preſently at the Head of 40,000 Men; and in order to ſupply by Policy what he wanted in Strength, he had recourſe to the following Stratagem. He ordered a Detachment of Horſe, commanded by one of his beſt Officers, to encamp on the neighbouring Hills, and there, ranging themſelves in one Line, to make a dreadful Noiſe with their Drums, and to light up great Fires every Night in different Parts of the Camp, in View of the Enemy. This Artifice ſucceeded; for the Tú-fan fearing to be ſurrounded and overpowered by the united Forces of the Empire, conducted by a General of known Bravery and Experience, returned towards the Weſt, and blocked up the City of Fong-tſyang.

Ma-lin, who commanded in that Diſtrict, came to the Relief of the Place, and forcing his way thro' a Body of the Enemies Troops, whereof he killed above 1000, threw himſelf into the Town. As ſoon as he was entered, he cauſed all the Gates to be opened, to let the Enemy ſee he did not fear them. This extraordinary Conduct aſtoniſhed the Tú-fan, and confirm'd them in their firſt Suſpicions, that there was ſome Ambuſcade prepared to ſurprize them. Beſides, ſaid they, as this General ſeems not to value his Life, it will coſt us dear before we can take the Town, and conſidering how much weakened we are already, by the Fatigues we have undergone, how ſhall we be able to withſtand an Army perhaps more numerous than our own, and compoſed of freſh Troops? Hereupon they reſolved to retire, contenting themſelves with the Spoil they had already gain'd; and by their Retreat gave the Chineſe time to repair the Royal City of Chang-gan, whither the Emperor returned ſome Months after he had quitted it in ſo ſhameful a Manner.

Theſe Troubles were no ſooner over, than the Chineſe were obliged to take the Field againſt a new Rebel called Pú-kú, who entered into Confederacy with the Whey-he Tartars; but he being taken very opportunely off by a ſudden Death, the Chineſe had the Addreſs to diſ-unite the two Nations, by fomenting a Jealouſy betwixt them, about the chief Command.

Yo-ko-lo, who commanded the Whey-he, would needs be nominated General of the whole Army. This the Tú-fan oppoſed, as a thing contrary to the Orders they had received from the King their Maſter, and diſhonourable to their Kingdom, which was much ſuperior to the little State poſſeſſed by thoſe Tartars. The Chineſe Generals, who were encamped in their View, ſecretly ſupported the Pretenſions of Yo-ko-lo, and at length joined him. Hereupon the Tú-fan were attacked as they were marching off, and loſt 10,000 Men in their Retreat. The King of the Tú-fan meditated how to retrieve his Loſſes, and being informed that the Whey-he were retired much diſſatisfied with the Chineſe, he ſent his Army to beſiege Ling-chew; the Governor of which City and its Diſtrict, having but few Troops, carefully ſhunned an Engagement on ſuch unequal Terms.

The Courſe he took was to put himſelf at the Head of 5,000 Horſe, and turning ſuddenly towards the Magazines of the Beſiegers, not only burnt them, but carried off all the Spoil which they had taken, with part of their Baggage. This Loſs obliged the Tú-fan to retire in Haſte to their own Territories. They remained 5 Years without Action, and only thought of Preparations for a new War; but then brought a formidable Army into the Field, which dividing into two Bodies, fell almoſt at the ſame time on the Diſtricts of King-chew and Ping-chew.

Theſe numerous Troops eaſily defeated ſeveral Bodies of the Imperial Forces; the brave Ma-lin, who before had driven them from Fong-tſyang, had the ſame Fate as the other Generals; but at laſt the General Ko-tſey routed them intirely, by an Ambuſcade which he laid for them in their Paſſage.

This Defeat diſpoſing the King of Tú-fan to Peace, he ſent an Embaſſy to China, more numerous than magnificent; the Ambaſſador having no leſs than 500 Men in his Retinue. The Emperor peror to mortify him detained him a long time at Court, without either giving him Audience, or dismissing him. The King of the Tû-fan was greatly incensed at so disagreeable a Reception of his Embassy, and was preparing to take Revenge, when the Emperor happened to dye. YEAR of CHRIST.

One of the first Cares of his Son Te-tsong, who succeeded him, was to deliberate about the manner of dismissing the Ambassador and his Train. The Course he took was quite different from that of his Predecessor: he feasted the principal Persons of the Embassy, gave them and their Followers rich Habits according to their several Ranks, loaded them with Presents, and sent them back, under the Conduct of one of his Officers, named Wey-ling, who had Orders to justify the small Regard which had been paid to his Ambassadors, by laying the Fault on their bad Conduct, and their having too numerous a Retinue.

Wey-ling, contrary to his Expectation, was received not only with Honour, but also with a Magnificence that surprized the Emperor, and gave him an Esteem for this Court. He had his Expences defrayed, and was sent back with an Ambassador loaded with rich Presents to the Emperor, with an Assurance, that he would never do any thing for the future that might break the good Understanding which he desired to maintain with the Empire: So that the Court not doubting the Sincerity of this Reconciliation, was too easily persuaded that there was nothing more to fear from the Tû-fan.

In the mean time this King dying, Tsang-po his Successor was no sooner in the Throne, than 786.
he ordered his Army to take the Field and enter Shen-si, which they did without being discovered; and defeated all the Imperial Troops they met with till they arrived at the City Kyen-ching, called at present Kyen-yang.

The Chinese Court was alarmed upon this; but the General Li-ching, seeing the Consequences of this Invasion, thought he ought not to wait for the Emperor's Orders; he therefore began his March with all his Troops joined to those of the Province, and coming up with the Enemy as they were on the point of besieging the City, he obtained so compleat a Victory, that he forced them to sue for Peace, which was granted on Condition they should swear to the Terms, as soon as one of the Lords of the Emperor's Court arrived, with full Powers to adjust Matters amicably, and ratify them in his Name by Oath, which was done accordingly: But their treacherous Designs were soon discovered. Some of their Officers who desired the Continuation of the War, endeavoured to seize the Emperor's Envoy and carry him to their Camp. Indeed the General disowned having any Hand in the Matter, and the Envoy imagined he had gained a great Point in his Negociation with the Chiefs of the Enemy's Army, by prevailing with them to return home, without doing any Damage to the Subjects of the Empire.

This first Expedition not having the Success which the King of the Tû-fan had promised himself, he prepared for a second, and raised an Army strong enough to oppose both the Whey-he Tartars, (who had newly made an Alliance with the Emperor) and the Chinese. At first they took 791 some considerable Forts which lay in their Road, and having possessed themselves of Gan-si, advanced to Pe-ting, which lies to the South of Ning-hya; where they were surprized and defeated by the Whey-he. Nevertheless, far from retiring, they continued their March towards the Court, with incredible Boldness and Intrepidity; but soon after, when they least expected it, the General Wey-kau fell on them, cut in pieces those Bodies which were drawn up in Order of Battle, carried off 50 of their * Camps, and pursued them as far as the Frontiers. At the same time he dispatched an Officer to the King of Yun-nan, to persuade him to come and join him with all his Force; but that Prince refused for fear of drawing so formidable an Enemy upon himself.

* In the French Campemens.

After this Victory, Wey-kau proposed to the Emperor a Method to hinder the Incursions of the Tû-fan; which was to build certain Cities or Fortresses on the Western Frontiers. The Court followed his Advice, and Orders were given to build four in the District of Ning-yang-fû, in the Province of Shen-si, viz. Tang-ka, Ho-tau, Mû-pû and Ma-ling.

This Precaution was useless; for scarce were these Towns finished, when the Tû-fan returned 801 as usual, and at length took the City Lin-chew, which they had before attempted several times in vain. The General Wey-kau did not give them time to repair their Breaches, before he appeared with his Army, at the Sight of which the Tû-fan abandoned the City, and marched towards Wey-chew in the Province of Se-chwen, which was one of the best Places they had. Wey-kau pursued them, and finding they fled continually before him, he resolved to besiege Wey-chew.

This News startled the King of the Tû-fan, who immediately sent Lun-nang his Prime Minister with considerable Succours. Wey-kau being informed of this, marched out of his Lines to meet the Enemy, defeated the Army of the Prime Minister, and obliged him to surrender himself Prisoner: Immediately after this Victory, he had Admission into the City, which he resolved to make a Place of Arms, and went to besiege the Fortress of Quen-min-ching, but he was baffled there, through the Bravery of the Governor, who made a glorious Resistance.

Wey-chew was one of the Royal Cities, and the Kings of Tû-fan, since the Time of Ki-lo-so, re- 802 sided there one part of the Year. So that the first thing King I-tay, who succeeded his Brother, did, was by all possible Means to recover it. With this View he levied an Army of 150,000 Men, and sent to besiege it.

On the Report of the March of this Army, the Chinese General threw himself into the City, where he sustained a Siege for 25 Days, and defended it bravely, against the continual Assaults of the Enemy; but the Succours which he expected not arriving, and seeing himself reduced to Extremity, he was at length constrained to surrender.

The Tû-fan, puffed up with their Conquest, advanced towards Ching-tu-fû, the Capital of the Province of Se-chwen. The Chinese General, who with the few Troops he commanded, was unable able to oppoſe their March, ſpread a Report that he was gone to poſſeſs himſelf of the Defiles of the Mountains through which they had paſſed, and cauſed his little Army to make all the neceſſary Motions to induce them to believe, that this was really his Deſign. In effect they were ſo convinced of it, that for fear of having their Retreat cut off, they contented themſelves with executing the principal Order of their Prince, and retired to Wey-chew.

I-tay was a Prince naturally mild, peaceable and full of Tenderneſs for his People: As he began the War for no other End, than to recover a Place which had been taken from his Predeceſſor, as ſoon as his Troops were returned, he ſent to acquaint the Generals poſted on the Frontiers of the Empire, that he was willing they ſhould live in Peace, and to convince them his Intentions were ſincere, he publiſhed an Order, which enjoin'd all his Officers to act only on the Defenſive.

The Chineſe on their Side behaved with great Generoſity on ſeveral Occaſions. Si-ta-mew, a Tû-fan by Nation, and Governor of Wey-chew, offered to deliver up that Place to Li-ti-yeu, who commanded the Chineſe Troops on the Frontiers of the Empire. The other Officers were almoſt unanimouſly of Opinion, that the Offer ought to be accepted, but Ni-û-ſan, one of the principal among them, oppoſed it ſtrongly.

" A great Empire like ours, ſaid he, ought to prize ſincere Dealing more than the Poſſeſſion " of a Town. If we break the Peace firſt, we ſhall authorize all the former Perfidies of the Tû-fan, " and the Complaints we have made of them would thenceforth be unjuſt; for whatever they do " for the future, either by plundering or ravaging our Frontiers, will be juſtified by our own " Example". The reſt yielded to his Reaſons, and it was concluded to reject the Offers of the Governor. I-tay took the Opportunity which the Peace afforded him, to govern his Subjects by new Laws, and advanced none to Employments but Men of the greateſt Merit. If he was informed of any Perſon who was remarkable for his Knowledge, and Application to Study, he preferred him to thoſe who were equally experienced in the Management of Affairs. Having heard of one among the Literati of great Reputation named (c) Shang-pi-pi, and who had no other Recommendation but that of his great Abilities, he ſent for him to Court from the fartheſt Part of the Kingdom; being deſirous to examine him himſelf, and hear him diſcourſe on different Subjects, he was ſo well ſatisfied of his Qualifications, that he made him Governour of the City and Diſtrict of Chen-chew, at preſent Si-ning.

Notwithſtanding all that Shang-pi-pi could do, in repreſenting that he was fit for nothing but Books, that ſuch a Poſt required a martial Genius, and that at the Age of 40, it was too late to ſerve an Apprenticeſhip to State Affairs, the King ordered him to accept of the Government, and take Poſſeſſion of it without Delay. That Prince who by the Wiſdom and mildneſs of his Sway, had gained the Hearts of all his Subjects, dying without Iſſue, Ta-mo, who was neareſt of Blood to the Throne, was readily acknowledged by the States, as lawful Succeſſor.

This Prince gave himſelf up wholly to his Pleaſures; he lived in Peace with all his Neighbours, but his Paſſions together with the Violences and Cruelties he committed, rendered him ſo odious to his Subjects, that they left their Country in Crowds, to free themſelves from his continual Oppreſſions. In ſhort, he was the firſt Cauſe of this Kingdom's falling to decay.

842. The Diſtractions encreaſed much more after his Death; for as he neither left any Children, nor had nominated a Succeſſor, one of the Miniſters, gained by the Widow Queen, cauſed the Son of Pay-va, her Favourite, and one of the greateſt Lords of the Kingdom, to be proclaimed King.

On the firſt Report of this Election, Kye-tû-na, firſt Miniſter of State, haſtened to the Palace and oppoſed it. " If the Royal Family is not extinct, cry'd he, is it not a Crime to chuſe a " King elſewhere"? But his Zeal coſt him his Life, for they killed him as he was returning home.

This Conduct of the Court loſt them the Hearts of all the People; who were ſtill more incenſed, when they underſtood that the new King was no more than a Child of 3 Years old, whoſe Name would be only of Uſe to authorize all the Proceedings of the Favourite; but at laſt the Queen's Party was ſo powerful at Court, that they were conſtrained to comply and acknowledge this young Prince with the uſual Ceremonies.

When this News arrived at the Army, which was then near the Frontiers, the great General, Lû-kong-je, refuſed the Orders that were ſent him by the Court, and even conceived Thoughts of making himſelf King.

He was a Man of boundleſs Ambition, proud, full of his own Merit, extreamly paſſionate, and often cruel; but on the other hand, he was brave, ſkilful, and capable of the greateſt Undertakings. So without heſitating, he laid hold of this Opportunity to aſcend the Throne. He firſt cauſed a Report to be ſpread, that he was preparing to revenge the Royal Family, by extirpating the Uſurpers of the Crown: And having augmented his own Army with freſh Troops, marched directly againſt that of the new King, which he defeated. He alſo took and plundered Wey-chew, and being joined by a great Number of Officers and Malecontents, he found himſelf at the Head of 100,000 effective Men. The firſt Step he made, was to bring the Governors of the Provinces into his Meaſures.

Shang-pi-pi was one of the Principal, and in great Reputation among the Soldiery. Ever ſince King I-tay had made him Governor of Chen-chew, he had apply'd himſelf with ſuch Aſſiduity to diſcipline his Troops, (by making them exerciſe frequently, and teaching them the various Stratagems of War) that they were reckoned the beſt in all the Kingdom.

(c) Orig. Cham-p-pi, where, as in many other Places, the Portugueſe Orthography ſeems to be retain'd thro' Inadvertency.

Lu-

Lu-kong-je was willing to ſound him firſt, and after writing him a deceitful Letter, advanced towards the City. Shang-pi-pi who ſaw thro' the General's Deſign, reſolved to croſs it, and to deceive him in his Turn, wrote him ſo modeſt an Anſwer, that Lu-kong-je did not doubt but he had gained him over to his Side. YEAR of CHRIST.

Immediately after the Departure of the Courier, Shang-pi-pi began his March with all his Troops, and made ſuch Haſte, that he arrived almoſt as ſoon as his Letter. That Inſtant he attacked the Army of Lu-kong-je, which was much ſtronger than his own, and as this General was ſurprized and unprovided, he was defeated without any Difficulty.

Lu-kong-je after rallying the reſt of his Troops retired, much inraged in his Heart. He ſaw plainly, that Shang-pi-pi would be a great Obſtacle to his ambitious Views, and the more ſo, as he had given out in his Government, that if they could not have a King of the Royal Blood, it would be better to ſubmit to the Emperor of China, than to favour the Ambition of a rebellious Subject.

Lu-kong-je having recruited his Army, imagin'd the way both to regain his Authority and win the Affections of his Nation, was to enter the Chineſe Territories, and give them up to be be plundered. He had ſome Succeſs at the Beginning, but was quickly beaten by the Chineſe Generals, who afterwards took from the Tû-fan, the City of Yen-chew and ſeveral Fortreſſes. 846 and 849

Lu-kong-je was no way diſmayed at theſe Loſſes; he imagin'd that if he was once ſole Maſter of the Kingdom, it would not be difficult to repair them; for which Reaſon, he bent all his Thoughts on reducing Shang-pi-pi. He had augmented his Army with new Recruits, and with the Tartars, who were old Allies of the Tû-fan, to whom he had promiſed the plundering of the Frontiers of China. Thus he began his March, and arrived near Chen-chew with a formidable Army.

Shang-pi-pi, without taking too many Men out of his City, had fortified his Camp near the River, on the firſt News of the Enemy's Approach. But Lu-kong-je, attacked and forced him to abandon it; he paſſed the River, broke down the Bridge, and followed the Enemy Step by Step on the other Side. And tho' he beheld the Spoil and Ravages that Lu-kong-je made on his Territories, with a Deſign to draw him to a general Battle, yet he never ſuffered his Soldiers to croſs the River, not ſo much as to ſkirmiſh with the Enemy. The natural Brutiſhneſs of Lu-kong-je and his bad Temper, which encreaſed by the ſmall Succeſs of his Enterprizes, rendered him ſo inſupportable to his Soldiers, that they deſerted in Troops to Shang-pi-pi, who received them kindly, and form'd them into new Companies.

The Tartars on their Side, who could no longer bear ſuch an intolerable Yoke, and ſaw into the ambitious Deſign of the General, retired. In ſhort, the Deſertion, which encreaſed daily more and more, frightend Lu-kong-je to ſuch a Degree, that he gave himſelf for loſt, and deſpairing of Succeſs, thought he could not do better, than ſurrender to the Emperor of China on certain Conditions. Accordingly he departed for the Court, and treated with his Imperial Majeſty. Though he could not obtain all his Demands, he pretended to be ſatisfied, and retired to Ko-chew, a Chineſe City, where he lived at eaſe the Remainder of his Life.

While the ambitious Lu-kong-je was Maſter of almoſt the whole Forces of the State, the Princes of the Blood retired into different Parts of the Kingdom, where they had ſmall Patrimonies, tho ſome of them took Shelter in certain Forts that belong'd to them towards Se-chwen, reſolving rather to ſubmit to the Emperor of China, than to an Uſurper. Others fortify'd themſelves in their Mountains, while ſome of the moſt conſiderable remain'd in the Territories they poſſeſs'd, bordering on the Government of Shang-pi-pi. Hence aroſe an infinite Number of Diſtractions in the State, which neither the Wiſdom and Valour of that General, nor his Succeſſor, were able to appeaſe; and which was the Ruin of this Monarchy at laſt.

When the Tû-fan, divided into different Parties, were weary of fighting, many Officers and Soldiers joined themſelves to Pan-lo-chi, Prince of Lû-kû, a Place in the Borders of the Diſtrict of Chen-chew, which the Children of Shang-pi-pi had preſerved for their Nation. As ſoon as they beheld a Chief of the Royal Blood, they quickly formed an Army, and to retrieve the Honour of their Country by ſome glorious Exploit, reſolved to attack the King of Hya. 951

This new King, who was a Tartar, originally of Tû-pa, which is ſtill in the Poſſeſſion of the Tû-fan, had founded a Dominion in Spight of the Chineſe, near the Whang-ho, the Capital whereof was Hya-chew, call'd at preſent Ning-hya; from which City the new Kingdom took the Name of Hya. Kingdom of Hya or Khya.

The Tû-fan had much aſſiſted this Prince in his Enterprize; but they alledged that their Services were ill requited, and that their Complaints had been rejected with ill Treatment from the Miniſters of the new State; for which Reaſon, ſeeing themſelves re-united under one of their own Princes, they deſign'd to be revenged of them for their Ingratitude.

The King of Hya, who was the Founder of this little Monarchy, was named Li-ki-tſyen; he had renewed the War with the Empire, at that Time govern'd by the Imperial Family of the Song; entring ſuddenly with a numerous Army into the Weſtern Part of Shen-ſi, which bordered on the ſmall Dominion that the Tû-fan were ſtill poſſeſs'd of. 1003

Pan-lo-chi offer'd to join the Chineſe Commander with his Forces, to deſtroy this growing Power, provided the Emperor would honour him with a Title that might give him more Authority among thoſe of his own Nation. The Emperor liked the Propoſal, and ſent him Patents as Governor General of the Tû-fan.

The King of Hya, who knew nothing of theſe private Contracts, after making ſome Ravages, beſieged the Town of Si-lyang, and taking it, put the Governor to Death; he thought to puſh his Conqueſt farther, believing that Pan-lo-chi was coming to join him with his Army, to favour his Deſigns.

Year of CHRIST.

Deſigns. But that Prince having, at the Head of 60,000 Horſe, come up with the King of Hya in a few Days, attack'd him with ſo much Valour, that he entirely defeated his great Army; however, being wounded in the Battle he dyed ſoon after the Victory.

So-tſo-lo his Succeſſor bent his Thoughts on recovering the ancient Monarchy of his Anceſtors. His little Dominion conſiſted only of 7 or 8 Towns, with ſome neighbouring Countrys. But he rely'd much on the experience and valour of his Troops, which were very well diſciplined; he was 1015 in hopes alſo that the reſt of the Tû-fan wou'd join him and ſeek his Protection, when they ſhou'd ſee him powerful enough to defend them. He fix'd his Court at Tſong-ko-ching, where he eſtabliſhed Officers the ſame both as to Number and Titles, that the Kings his Predeceſſors had. Afterwards levying new Forces in the Territories of Li-tſing-chin, Ho-chew, Y-chwen, Tſing-tang and throughout all the Parts in general that remain'd to him of the ancient Dominions of the Tû-fan, he entred the Territories of the Empire ſeveral Times, but was always beaten, and at length concluded a Peace.

The Enterprizes of the King of Hya gave him ſome uneaſineſs. That Prince's power encreaſed Daily, which ſwelled his Pride to ſuch exceſs, that he had aſſumed the Title of Emperor. The Chineſe Monarch was glad of having So-tſo-lo to oppoſe him, and to engage that Prince more firmly in his Intereſt, he made him Governor General of Pau-ſhun, which ſtood very conveniently for him. So-tſo-lo dying in the mean Time, the Diviſion, which ſoon after enſued among his Children, haſten'd the intire ruin of the State of the Tû-fan. That Prince had by his firſt Wife two Children, the one named Hya-chen, and the other Mo-chen-tſû: He had afterwards by a ſecond Venter the Prince Ton-ſhen. This laſt Wife had ſo much influence and favour, that to render her Son more powerful, ſhe perſwaded her Huſband to impriſon his Children by the firſt, and oblige their Mother to turn Bonzeſs. But they finding means to eſcape, and deliver their Mother out of the Monaſtery where ſhe had been ſhut up, the People who aſſiſted them in getting out of Priſon, declared for them.

So-tſo-lo who had recovered from his infatuation approved of this Change, and permitted that Mo-chen-tſû ſhou'd live at Tſong-ko-ching which he gave him for his Maintenance, for he had removed his Court to Chen-chew. To Kan-ku his other Son he aſſign'd Hya-chen (D) for the Place of his abode. As to his third Son Ton-ſhen, who appear'd to him moſt capable of upholding his Family, he gave up to him all his Authority and the reſt of his Dominions. Ton-ſhen reſided at Li-tſing-chin, where he was equally beloved of his People and fear'd by his Neighbours: Inſomuch that all the Tû-fan which dwelt to the North of the Whang-ho [or Yellow River] were intirely under his Subjection. Moreover the Emperor of China granted him the Government of the whole Country of Pau-ſhun, at the Requeſt of So-tſo-lo, who ſurrendred it in his Favour.

This great Power wherewith the Younger was inveſted, gave Umbrage to the two Elder, and their Families, who were afraid of being one time or other oppreſs'd: Nevertheleſs they reſumed Courage, aſſerting the Privileges of their Seniority, and by the precautions they took, died undiſturbed in the Cities that fell to their Share.

Mû-ching, Son of Hya-chen, more uneaſy than his Father at the Power of Prince Ton-ſhen, reſolved to ſubmit to the Emperor and deliver up to him Kan-ku, Ho-chew, and all the Land, which were in his Poſſeſſion. As the City of Ho-chew was a Place of great importance for ſecuring the Frontiers of the Empire, the Chineſe Monarch received the Propoſals of Mû-ching with joy, granting to him and his Poſterity in general, whatever he demanded in order to live with Honour in the Empire.

Mo-chen-tſû had for his Heir his Son Kyau-ki-ting, who was much beloved in his little State, but did not ſurvive his Father many Years. His Son Hya-cheng ſucceeded him: He was a paſſionate, violent and cruel Prince, whereby he ſo incenſed his Subjects, that they form'd a Deſign to depoſe him, and ſet up his Uncle Sû-nan in his Stead. But the Plot being diſcovered, Sû-nan and almoſt all his Accomplices were put to Death.

One of the Principal Officers, named Tſyen-lo-ki, finding means to eſcape, carry'd with him Cho-ſa who was of the Prince's Family; and ſeizing the City of Ki-kû-ching, cauſed him to be proclaimed Prince of that petty State. But Hya-ching haſtening thither with his Forces, took the Place, and put Cho-ſa to Death: while Tſyen-lo-ki in the midſt of all theſe troubles, found means again to eſcape to Ho-chew.

The General Van-chau, having been made Governor of this Place by the Emperor of China, Tſyen-lo-ki perſuaded him that the Conqueſt of the Country of Tſing-tang was very eaſy, and that if he had a mind he might make himſelf Maſter of it. Van-chau gave credit to him, and immediately attack'd the little City of Mo-chwen, which he took without any Difficulty. It was then that the Prince Hya-ching, ſeeing himſelf hated by his People, and vigorouſly attack'd by the Chineſe, reſolved to ſubmit to the Emperor on advantageous Conditions. To this end he re-1090 paired himſelf to Van-chau, offer'd him all the Territories that belonged to him, and obtained his Demands. The Emperor ratify'd the Treaty and gave the Government of this Diſtrict to Hû-tſong-cha.

The like happen'd to Long-ſu (E) a Son of Mû-ching, whom one of the Chiefs of the Tû-fan had put in Poſſeſſion of the City of Hi-pa-wen. After ſeveral Battles fought with Van-chau, wherein wherein he diſtinguiſh'd himſelf by his ſurprizing Valour, being ſometimes Conqueror and ſometimes conquered, that Prince ſubmitted upon advantageous Terms, which the Emperor ratified, and thereby all his Territories were re-united to the Empire.

The Family of the third Son of So-tſö-lo continued longer in Splendor, but at length it was diſpoſſeſſed of its Principality by the Mongols, who took the Name of Ywen and Ywen-chau, after the Conqueſt of China.

In the midſt of the Troubles, which aroſe in the 12th Century between the Chineſe Emperors of the Dynaſty of the Song, and the Eaſtern Tartars, called Nu-che, who took the Name of Kin, the Family of Ton-ſken made an Alliance with the Kings of Hya, and under their Protection enjoy'd their Territories pretty peaceably: But at length it was involved in the common Ruin by the victorious Founder of the Dynaſty of the Ywen, whom our European Authors name Jinghiz-Khân, and the Chineſe Chin-ki-ſe-Han. (E)

End of the Kingdom of the Tû-fan.

The Year 1227, according to the Chineſe Hiſtory, is the Æra of the intire Ruin of the Tû-fan; from that Time they have remained in their ancient Country without either Name or Power, happy to live there in quiet. So true it is, that the Diviſion of a Government almoſt always overturns the moſt flouriſhing Monarchies. The Tû-fan were always reſpected by their Neighbours, ſo long as they were united under Monarchs who were capable of governing them well.

Religion of the Tû-fan.

Tho' the Form of the Government has been changed among the Tû-fan, their Belief has always continued the ſame. The Idolatry of Fo was the Religion of their Kings and Princes, as it is ſtill that of the Chiefs of the Nation. The Lama Bonzas, and ſometimes the Ho-ſhan Bonzas, had great Authority in their Courts: They even choſe them to be Miniſters of State, and on certain Occaſions to command the Armies. Superſtition has rather encreaſed among the Tû-fan ſince their Decline. Under the Emperors of the Ywen, the Lamas became ſo powerful, that the Tartar Families thought it was an Honour to have one of their Kindred among theſe Bonzas. 'Tis likely this introduced among the Tû-fan, who were then Subjects to the Ywen, the Cuſtom of conferring on a Lama of the Family, the Power of Governing and Puniſhing.

This alſo has much contributed to their being ſo extremely devoted to Fo. Their Liberality is never ſhewn, unleſs it be in honouring this Idol, which they inrich by their Offerings. For they have Gold in ſome of their Rivers: And know pretty well how to work it, eſpecially in making Veſſels and little Statues.

The uſe of Gold is alſo very ancient among 'em: Since the Chineſe Books mention that in the Reign of a certain Emperor of the Dynaſty of the Han, an Officer having been ſent to the Tû-fan, to complain of the Devaſtations made by ſome of their Chiefs with their united Forces, they endeavoured to pacify him, by offering him a Quantity of Gold Plate: But the Officer refuſed it, cauſing the Tû-fan to be told, that Rice in diſhes of Gold did not reliſh with him.

Nature of the Country.

Their Country is very Mountainous: Lying between the Rivers Whang-ho to the North, Ya-long to the Weſt, and the Yang-tſe-kyang to the Eaſt. Nevertheleſs, between theſe Mountains there are ſome fine Plains, which are like thoſe of Se-chwen and Yun-nan, principally along the Banks of the great and beautiful River Ya-long: But there is neither Town nor Fortreſs to be met with any where, though there muſt needs be the remains of Cities, ſince it is certain there were ſome formerly in this Country. The Source of the Ya-long, which is both broad and deep, is between 34 and 35 deg. of latitude and 19 of longitude (F).

The Springs of the Yang-tſe-kyang, which runs quite thro' China, are in the Country of the Tû-fan. The moſt famous which the oldeſt Chineſe Books ſpeak of, is named He-ſhwi, and lies below 33 deg. of lat. and in 15 of long. but it is called by the Tû-fan, Chûnak, and comes from a Chain of Mountains, which they name Chûrkûla.

I thought fit to take particular notice of this, becauſe the Chineſe Books of Geography relate many falſehoods concerning the great River Yang-tſe-kyang. Theſe Authors wrote only from common Report, and at a Time when there was ſcarce any Correſpondence with either Tibet or the Tû-fan.

Of the TARTARS of KOKO-NOR.

BEYOND Si-ning, without the Gates of the Great Wall, are the Territories of the Tartars of Koko-Nor. They are properly Eluths (G) by Nation: But ſince the Extinction of the Royal Family, denominated Ywen-chau, they inhabit to the Weſt of China, along the Province of Se-chwen, between it and Tibet; they take their Name from a great Lake which the Chineſe call Si-hay, that is, the Weſtern Sea; and themſelves in their own Language, Koko-Not or Koko-Nor.

(E) P. du Halde paſſes ſlightly over this Part relating to the Deſtruction of the Power of the Si-fan and Si-hya, which yet is the moſt curious and intereſting to us of all their Hiſtory, as being connected with that of Jenghiz Khân; had that Jeſuit or his Correſpondents been fuller on this Head, we might have been able perhaps to have determined the Situation of Kara Katay, which we take to have been the Country poſſeſſed by the Emperors of Hya.

(F) It muſt be obſerved that the Longitude is always reckon'd from Pe-king, excepting where it is mention'd to be otherwiſe.

(G) Eluths or Aluths; Of whom an Account is given in the 2d Volume.

Their Country is pretty large, extending from North to South above ſeven Degrees. 'Tis ſeparated from China by Mountains, ſo high and ſteep, that they ſerve almoſt every where inſtead of the Great Wall. However, there are ſome Pieces of it to be ſeen towards the Openings of the Mountains, eſpecially in thoſe Places which are frequented by the Koko-Nor and other Strangers; for Inſtance, Tſing-fang-wey, where there are ſome Battalions under the conduct of a Tſong-ping, who has alſo other Troops in different Poſts, which he diſpoſes of as there is Occaſion.

Commodities. The principal Merchandize of Tſong-fang-wey, is a ſort of Woolen-ſtuff named Pû-lû, much like our Frize, but not above one fourth or fifth part of the Breadth. It is made by the Tartars of Koko-Nor and the Si-fan, who know very well how to dye it of all ſorts of Colours. In the Country they often make long Habits of it, and at Pe-king they cover Saddles with it.

The Country of theſe Tartars, which borders on Se-chwen, is not contiguous to the Kingdoms of Pegû and Ava, called by the Chineſe Myen (G) and Ya-wa, altho' theſe lie to the South of it (H); becauſe there are frightful and inacceſſible Mountains between, inhabited by Nationsalmoſt wholly unknown, and which by report of the Chineſe of Yun-nan, their Neighbours, are very ſavage, being without either Laws or Government.

The moſt Northern of the Mountains bordering on the Koko-nor Tartars is called Nû-i; and the moſt Southern bounding Ava, in 25 Degr. 33 Min. Latitude, is named Li-ſe in that Part towards Yun-chang-fû.

The Entrances of theſe Mountains, which alſo make a good part of its weſtern Limits, are fortified no more than thoſe of Se-chwen; but conſidering the Country, they are ſufficient for the Security of the State, and the Trade carry'd on with Ava, by Ten-ye-chew, a middling City, on which depends the guarding the Paſs which is neareſt, and moſt frequented by the Merchants.

There was ſtill leſs Occaſion for fortifying the Avenues of the Mountains to the South of Yun-nan and China, along the Confines of the Kingdoms of Laos (called by the Chineſe Lau-Shwa or Lau-ſe) and Tong-king; for beſides that the Air of this Country is fatal to Strangers, it happens that moſt part of the Year it is uncultivated and wild, full of Rivers and dangerous Torrents; whence it is, that the Chineſe traffic ſo little with either of thoſe Kingdoms. Nevertheleſs P. Regis found ſome Traders at Yun-nan-fû, who had travelled as far as the Borders of both Countries; and whoſe Memoirs and Journals were ſerviceable to him in determining ſome Poſitions in the Southern Part of Yun-nan, proportioning their Stages to the Diſtances meaſur'd between the Places, thro' which they paſſed in making the Map of the neighbouring Cities.

The Chineſe have extended their Dominions as far as theſe Tracts of inacceſſible Mountains, which in a Courſe of ſuch prodigious Length are interrupted only by great Rivers, and ſeem to have been deſign'd by Nature for the Bounds of ſome large Kingdom. They little regard the Complaints and Efforts of certain inconſiderable Nations, who remain ſhut up in this Encloſure, as we have obſerved of the Si-fan, who have been hemmed in by the Great Wall about Si-ning and Kya-yu-quan. Nevertheleſs the Conduct of the Chineſe has not been the ſame towards theſe different Nations, as we are going to inform the Reader.

Of the Nation of the LO-LO.

Government. THE Nation of the Lo-lo (I) ruled in Yun-nan, and was governed by different Sovereigns. The Chineſe, after building ſome Forts and Cities in the little uncultivated Plains there, and fighting ſeveral Battles, reſolved to gain theſe People, by conferring on their Lords for ever the Seals and all Honours of Chineſe Mandarins, with the Title of Chi-fû and Chi-chew, &c. on condition, that they ſhould acknowledge the Emperor, and be ſubject to the Governor of the Province in common Affairs, after the ſame Manner as the Chineſe Mandarins of the ſame Rank: Moreover, that they ſhould receive the Inveſtiture of their Lands from the Emperor, and ſhould not execute any Authority therein without his Conſent; the Emperor on his Part obliging himſelf to inveſt the next Heir.

Language, Religion. The Lo-lo are as well ſhaped as the Chineſe, and more inured to Fatigue; they have a different Language, and a ſort of Writing which ſeems to be the ſame as that of the Bonzas of Pegu and Ava. Theſe have inſinuated themſelves with the moſt rich and powerful among the Lo-lo, who inhabit the northern Part of Yun-nan, and have there built huge Temples of different Structure from the Chineſe; the Ceremonies, Prayers, and in ſhort the whole religious Worſhip is the ſame as practiſed in Pegu.

The Lo-lo Lords are abſolute Maſters of their Subjects, and have a Right to puniſh even with Death, without waiting for the Anſwer of the Vice-Roy, much leſs that of the Court; ſo that they are obey'd with an incredible Readineſs and Zeal. Any one thinks his Fortune made, if he is admitted to ſerve in the Palace; which Name thoſe Edifices deſerve better than a great many

(G) In the French it is fauſtly printed Miau.

(H) The Situation given the Koko-nor Tartars here does not agree with that aſſign'd them in the Map, where they are placed to the Weſt of Shen-ſi, and North of the Tibet or Si-fan, whoſe Country borders on Se-chwen.

(I) In the French it is written Lo-los, but it muſt be conſider'd that the s is added to diſtinguiſh the plural Number, the Chineſe having no Words ending in s, for which Reaſon we have left it out to preſerve the Propriety of the Name.

many Chineſe Tribunals, as they are called in ſome Relations, which for the moſt part are kept in bad Repair and ſcarce habitable. The Lo-lo, who conſider the Hall where they give Audience, and all the other Apartments, as their Eſtate, take care to beautify and keep them in good Condition.

Beſides the Officers of the Houſehold, and others who ſerve quarterly, they have Captains, who command the Militia of the Country; one Part of which conſiſts of Horſe, the other of Foot, who are armed with Arrows, Spears, and often with Muſquets. Forces.

Altho' the Horſes of Yun-nan as well as Se-chwen are the leaſt in all China, yet they are not the leſs eſteemed on that Account; for they are not only of a beautiful Colour and well ſhaped, but are alſo ſtrong, lively, and tractable. Horſes.

The Mountains within their Diſtrict muſt needs afford Mines of Iron and Copper, for they make their own Weapons. The Chineſe ſometimes carry them Arms, and often inſinuating into the Houſes of thoſe Lords, enrich themſelves at the Expence of their Subjects. Mines of Iron and Copper.

In ſhort the Country abounds in all Sorts of Commodities, and affords Mines of Gold and Silver. The Habit of the Lo-lo conſiſts in a pair of Drawers, a linnen Veſt, that reaches no lower than the Knees, and a Straw Hat, or one of Ratann; they go with their Legs bare, and wear nothing but Sandals; the Lords wear the Tartar Habit, made of Satin or Damaſk; the Ladies over a long Gown, which reaches down to their Feet, wear a little Cloak which comes no lower than the Waiſt; it is in this Dreſs they ride on Horſeback, even in performing the Marriage Ceremonies, or in the Viſits they make, accompany'd by their Waiting Women on Horſeback likewiſe, and their other Domeſticks on Foot. Gold and Silver.

Concerning the Nation of the MYAU TSE.

THE Myau tſe (K) are diſperſed thro' the Provinces of Se-chwen, Quey-chew, Hu-quang, Quang-ſi, and along the Borders of Quang-tong; under this general Name ſeveral People are comprehended. Moſt of them differ only in certain Cuſtoms, and a ſlight Variation of Language; ſuch are the Myau-tſe of Se-chwen, thoſe to the Weſt of Hu-quang, and thoſe to the North of Quey-chew; they are more fierce and uncivilized than the Lo-lo, as well as greater Enemies to the Chineſe. Their Country.

To ſubdue them, or at leaſt to bridle them; the Chineſe have built large Forts and Towns, upon very diſadvantageous Situations, with incredible Expence; but then by this means they have effectually ſecured the Quiet of the State, by cutting off all Communication among them, ſo that the moſt powerful of theſe Myau-tſe are, as it were, block'd up by thoſe Barriers.

Thoſe of whom we ſpeak are as abſolute over their People as the Lo-lo; but as they have not received the Dignity of Chi-ſſi, Chi-chew, &c. they are conſidered as ſubdued, provided they keep quiet: And in caſe they commit Acts of Hoſtility, either to be revenged of the Chineſe, who are often troubleſome Neighbours, or to ſhew their Bravery, wherein they picque themſelves, believing they are better Horſemen than any other Nation, the Chineſe are content to drive them back to their Mountains, without attempting to force them from thence. In vain the Vice-Roy of the Provinces cites them to appear even by Proxy, for they do juſt as they think proper. Government.

One of theſe Myau-tſe Lords, having been invited to a Meeting, where the Vice-Roy of Yun-nan, Quey-chew, and Se-chwen, expected him accompany'd with two great Men of Pe-king, ſent from Court to examine into the Complaints which one of the Governors had made of his Conduct, obſtinately refuſed to come; whereupon the Grandees thought fit to diſſemble, and treat with him by way of Negotiation.

Theſe Lords have not only their Officers, like the Lo-lo, but they have alſo petty Lords under them; who, tho' Maſters of their Vaſſals, are feudatory, and obliged to attend with their Troops when ordered. The Houſes of theſe Lords are not inferior to the beſt belonging to the Chineſe. Their uſual Arms are the Bow and half Pike; their Saddles are well made, and differ from the Chineſe, being narrower and higher, with Stirrups of painted Wood.

Their Horſes are much eſteem'd on account of their Swiftneſs in climbing up and galloping down Mountains, as alſo for their Agility in leaping very wide Ditches. Thoſe of them that are ſold in theſe Parts coſt an exceſſive Price. Horſes.

The Great Mandarins receive them often as Preſents from the Inferior, who buy them, dear as they are, to procure the Favour of their Protectors, or even of the Myau-tſe Lords, when they live in good Underſtanding with them. The Chineſe report ſurprizing and even incredible Things of theſe Horſes.

One Thing which they tell is not altogether ſo, viz. That when Officers of the Army are to be choſen, they oblige the Candidates to leap their Horſes over a Ditch, of a certain Breadth, with a clear Fire burning in it, and to order the Soldiers to ride full ſpeed down the higheſt Mountains. In ſhort, they relate many other things of the ſame Nature, wherein ſuppoſing posing them to be practicable by a few Heroes among them, the Actors run very dangerous Risks.

The Myau-tse who dwell in the Middle and Southern Part of Quey-chew differ from the former as to their Condition: For without stopping to give an Account of the various Names (1) given them by the Chinese of the Country, (which are the Names of the Colonies come from other Parts, or sent by the Emperors and Conquerors of this Province,) they may be divided into Myau-tse who are not subdued, and Myau-tse who are subdued.

Myau-tse who are subdued.

These last are again divided into two Sorts, one obeying the Magistrates of the Empire, and making Part of the Chinese People, from whom they are distinguish'd only by a kind of Head-Dress, which they wear instead of the Bonnet, or Cap, commonly used by the Chinese.

The others have their Hereditary Mandarins, originally inferior Officers, who served in the Chinese Army of Hong-vû, on the Rise of the last Royal Family, and were in recompense made Masters, some of six, others of ten or more Villages conquered from the Myau-tse.

These new Masters were supported by the Garrisons placed in those advantageous Stations, where the Towns of that Province are seen at present. The Myau-tse accustom'd themselves by Degrees to the Yoke, so that now they look on their Mandarins, as if they were of their own Nation, and have conform'd to almost all their Customs. However, they have not yet forgot their Country; they talk of the Provinces and Towns they came from, and how many Generations have settled in the Province of Quey-chew. Most of them reckon 14, some 16; which agrees with the Æra of Hong-vû.

Altho' their Jurisdiction is but small, yet they do not want Riches. Their Houses are large, commodious, and kept in good Repair. They hear the Causes of their Subjects on the first Demand, and have Power to punish them, but not capitally. From their Tribunals, which have the Privilege only of the Chi-hyen, an Appeal lies to that of the Chi-fû.

The People wrap their Heads in a Piece of Linnen, and wear nothing but a sort of Doublet and Breeches; but their Mandarins and their Domesticks are cloathed like the Mandarins and Chinese of the Country, especially when they go to the City, to visit the Chi-fû, or any other Mandarin.

Myau-tse who are not subdued.

It was from these Mandarins of the conquered Myau-tse, that the Missionaries, who were at work on the Map of those Provinces, got some Intelligence of the Myau-tse, who are not subdued, and possess above 40 French Leagues in the Province of Quey-chew near Li-ping-fû: For tho' they pass'd along their Country on the North and West Sides, in settling the Positions of the Chinese Towns and Places, where the Soldiers were posted all around, almost in sight of their Borders, yet they never saw one of them appear.

their Houses,

They told them that these unconquered Myau-tse, who are called by the Chinese Sing-Myau-tse or Ye-Myau-tse, that is, Wild Myau-tse, have Houses built of Brick, one Story high, and like those of the conquered Myau-tse. In the Ground-Floor they put their Cattle, as the Oxen, Cows, Sheep, and Hogs, for in those Parts one sees scarce any other Kinds of Animals, not even Horses. Hence it is, that their Houses are dirty and stinking, and that those who are not used to it, can hardly bear to lie in the upper Room. In effect, the Tartars choose rather to lodge in the miserable Caserns of the Soldiers, than in those Houses, which otherwise make a pretty good Appearance.

Manufactures.

These Myau-tse are divided into Villages, and live in great Unity, altho' they are only govern'd by the Seniors of each Village. They cultivate their Lands, make Linnen, and a sort of Carpets, which serve them for Coverlets in the Night. This Linnen is not good, being like bad Muslin; but the Carpets are very well woven; some of them are made of Silk of different Colours, red, yellow, and green; others of raw Thread, made of a kind of Hemp, which they likewise dye. Their Habit is only a pair of Drawers, and a sort of Great Coat, which they fold over their Stomach.

The Chinese Merchants find Means, in all likelihood, by the procurement of the conquered Myau-tse Mandarins, to trade with the Wild Myau-tse, and buy the Woods of their Forests, which having cut down, and thrown them into a River that runs through the midst of their Country, the Chinese, who are a little lower on the other Side, receive and make great Floats of it; the Price of the Merchandize remains in the Hands of a Person agreed upon, and usually consists of a certain Number of Cows, Oxen, and Buffaloes; of the Skin of these Animals the Myau-tse make their Cuirasses, which they cover with little Plates of Iron or beaten Copper, which render them heavy, but very strong, and of great Use to these Nations.

Among the conquered Myau-tse there are some who have their Chiefs, but these Chiefs have not Power of judging Causes. They differ however from the Chinese, in that they dwell only in Villages, and never go into the City, unless on some very urgent Occasion.

Mû-lau, or Wood-Rats.

Those whom the Chinese call Mû-lau, that is, Rats of the Wood, and who dwell within 3 or 4 Leagues of the Posts of Yun-nan, throughout the Province of Quey-chew, are best apparell'd of all the Myau-tse in this Country. Their Habit is shaped like a Bag, with Sleeves wide at the Cuffs, and slit in two above the Elbow; underneath there is a Vest of a different Colour; the Seams are cover'd with the smallest Shells that are to be found in the Seas of Yun-nan, or the Lakes of the Country; the Cap and the rest of their Dress are much of a piece. The Cloth is made of coarse Thread twisted from a kind of Hemp and Herbs, unknown to us; they probably make Use of this Thread in working the Carpets already mention'd, which are woven sometimes all plain and of one Colour, sometimes in little Squares of divers Colours.

(1) P. du Halde would have done well to have given us the different Names by which these People are distinguish'd; such Notices are of great Use to Geography; and serve to prevent Mistakes, as to the Identity of a Nation, call'd by different Names in different Authors.

Among

Among their Inſtruments of Muſick, there is one compoſed of ſeveral Pipes inſerted in a larger, which has a hole or kind of Reed into which they blow, the Sound whereof is more ſoft and agreeable than the Chineſe Shin, which may be conſidered as a ſort of little Hand-Organ, that muſt be blown with the Breath. Muſical Inſtruments.

They know how to keep Time in Dancing, and expreſs the gay, melancholy, &c. Airs very naturally; ſometimes they play on a ſort of Guittar; ſometimes they beat an Inſtrument compoſed of two little Drums, one ſet againſt the other; afterwards they turn it upſide down, as if they were going to throw it againſt the Ground and break it to pieces. Dancing.

Theſe People have no Bonzas of the Religion of Fo among them, ſo that being free from this unhappy Obſtacle, which is conſiderable with reſpect to the Chineſe and Lo-lo, they may more eaſily embrace the true Religion; in Caſe they have not among them ſtill worſe Seducers, ſuch as are certain Tartarian Jugglers, tho' we do not know that they entertain any. Religion.

In that Part of Hu-quang, next to the Province of Quang-tong and that of Quang-ſi, depending on Yung-chew-fû, are Myau-tſe, ſtill more uncivilized, altho' they are thought to acknowledge the Juriſdiction of the neighbouring Mandarins, and pay the Tribute, which they carry in what kind and when they pleaſe; for in certain Places they permit no Officer of the Chineſe Tribunal to enter their Lands, and if he ſhould, he would run the Riſk of his Life. Myau-tſe of Hu-quang.

They go barefooted, and by the Habit of running on their Mountains, their Feet become ſo callous that they climb the ſteepeſt Rocks, and paſs over the moſt ſtony Grounds with incredible Swiftneſs, without receiving the leaſt Inconvenience.

The Head Dreſs of the Women has ſomething in it very odd and whimſical. They put on their Heads a piece of light Board above a Foot long, and five or ſix Inches broad, which they cover with their Hair, faſtening it with Wax; ſo that they ſeem to have Hats of Hair; they can neither lean nor lye down but by reſting on their Necks, and they are obliged to turn their Heads continually to the Right and Left, on the Roads, which in this Country are full of Woods and Thickets. Whimſical Head Attire.

The Difficulty is ſtill greater when they would comb their Hair, for they muſt be whole Hours at the Fire to melt the Wax; after having clean'd their Hair, which Trouble they are at 3 or 4 times a Year, they fall to dreſſing it up again as it was before.

The Myau-tſe think this Dreſs very charming, eſpecially for young Women. The more elderly Sort don't take ſo much Pains, but content themſelves with doing up their Hair on the Crown of the Head into knotted Treſſes.

Theſe Myau-tſe are alſo called by the Chineſe, Li-jin and Yau-tſe. They have ſeveral other Names or rather Nick-names, for all the Names already mention'd, and many others, denote Contempt and Raillery, which the Chineſe are not ſparing of. Li-jin and Yau-tſe.

Thoſe whom they call Pa-chay and Lû-chay, the firſt on the Borders of Quang-tong, the latter on thoſe of Quang-ſi, are however more fear'd than deſpiſed by their Chineſe Neighbours of Hû-quang and Quang-tong; the firſt are ſo call'd, becauſe the Number of their principal Villages is eight; and the latter, becauſe they have ſix, which ſerve them for Intrenchments. Pa-chay and Lû-chay.

The Chineſe have erected fortified Towns to the North, Eaſt, and Weſt of thoſe Countries, which ſeem to have been built for no other Purpoſe, than to hinder the Incurſions of theſe petty Nations, for their Situation is very incommodious. If to theſe Towns we add all the Forts that have been raiſed about their Territories, they will amount to more than twenty.

Some of theſe Forts have been abandon'd ſince the Acceſſion of the preſent Family; however above one half of them are ſtill kept on Foot, and pretty well garriſon'd. Theſe Myau-tſe were wont to fall upon the Chineſe; but the latter have at length got them to put one of their principal Men into the Hands of the neighbouring Mandarins, as a Security for their good Behaviour. Moreover they have bound themſelves to give the Chineſe no Diſturbance, either becauſe they intend to come and trade in their Cities, or do not care to leave their Mountains.

The Myau-tſe of the Province of Quang-ſi are on another Footing. They exerciſe the Juriſdiction of the Chi-fû and Chi-hyen, &c. over their Subjects, by a Right which has been hereditary to them for many Centuries. They are originally Chineſe; their Anceſtors having followed the two Conquerors of theſe Countries and Tong-king, named Fû-pau and Ma-ywen. The firſt was Generaliſſimo of the Army ſent by the Emperor Quang-vû-ti againſt the Rebels of the South and the Tong-kineſe, who, taking advantage of the Troubles of the Empire, had ſeized on ſuch Territories as they found convenient for them. Myau-tſe of Quang-ſi.

The General Ma-ywen march'd againſt theſe laſt, drove them back within their ancient Bounds, and fill'd them with ſuch Terror, that his Name, after 16 Centuries, is ſtill fear'd among them. He cauſed a Pillar of Braſs to be erected on the Mountain, which ſerves for a Boundary, with theſe Chineſe Words, Tong chû chi che kyo chi chi mye, which ſignifies that they ſhould extirpate the Tong-kineſe, if they paſs'd the Brazen Pillar.

The Tong-kineſe at preſent look upon this Inſcription, which is one of the moſt ancient in China, as a Propheſy that indicates the Duration of their Monarchy, which is not to be deſtroy'd till the Brazen Pillar ſhall be quite conſumed by Time; for which Cauſe they take great care to ſhelter it from the Injuries of the Weather, and incloſe it with large Stones to render it more ſteady, believing, that by preſerving it, they fix the Deſtiny of their Kingdom.

Ma-ywen left his Officers and brave Soldiers towards the Frontiers to ſecure the Conqueſts, and made them Maſters of whatever he diſtributed among them. It is thus theſe Mandarins of the Myau-tſe hold from the Beginning their Authority from the Emperor, to whom they are tributary; they have their Soldiers and Officers, nor do they want for Arms, which they either make in their own Mountains, or buy privately of the Chineſe.

What is very grievous to theſe People is, that they are almoſt continually at War, and deſtroying one another; Revenge is perpetuated and hereditary among them. The great Grandchild often endeavours to revenge the Death of his great Grandfather, if he thinks it has not been ſufficiently revenged before. As the Chineſe Mandarins do not care to run any Riſk to eſtabliſh Peace among them, they willingly wink at what they cannot hinder, without hazarding the Lives of the Chineſe Soldiers.

Language of the Myau-tſe. The Language of the Myau-tſe of Se-chwen, the Weſtern Parts of Hû-quang, and Northern Parts of Quey-chew is the ſame, or differs only in the Pronunciation and ſome particular Words; but that of the Myau-tſe towards Li-ping-fû is reckon'd a Mixture of the Chineſe and the true Myau-tſe, for the People of both Nations underſtand one another very well. They ſay there are alſo ſome Countries between Quang-ſi, Hû-quang, and Quey-chew, of which, thoſe that are to the North are not underſtood by the Myau-tſe; this the conquer'd Myau-tſe affirm.

Manners. The Chineſe give all the Myau-tſe the Character of being an unconſtant, perfidious, barbarous People, and above all egregious Thieves; which however did not appear to be fact to P. Regis and the Miſſionaries who aſſiſted in making the Map of thoſe Countries; on the contrary they found them very faithful in reſtoring the Cloaths committed to their Truſt, attentive, laborious, and obliging. But perhaps the Myau-tſe have reaſon to be diſſatisfied with the Chineſe, who have taken from them almoſt all the Lands that were good for any thing in the Country, and continue to ſeize on whatever they find for their Conveniency, unleſs prevented by the Fear of irritating thoſe, whom they endeavour to diſpoſſeſs, too far. However it is certain, that the Chineſe neither love nor eſteem the Myau-tſe or the Lo-lo; and that theſe People have ſtill leſs Affection for the Chineſe: looking on them as ſevere and troubleſome Maſters, who keep them ſhut up by their Garriſons, and as it were coop'd up within a long Wall; which deprives them of all Communication with other Nations, from whom they might procure Aſſiſtance.

Iron Bridge. Whatever Towers, Towns, and Bridges there are in Quey-chew and other Territories, which formerly did or do at preſent belong to them, they were all built by the Chineſe; the Iron Bridge as it is called, which is in Quey-chew upon the great Road to Yun-nan, is the Work of a Chineſe General, whoſe Name is cut in a great Piece of Marble on the other Side of the Pan-ho. This is a Torrent, which is not wide but very deep; on each Bank they have built a great Gate between two huge Piers of Stone, 6 or 7 Foot broad, and 17 or 18 high; from each of the Piers on the Eaſt Side hang 4 Chains by huge Rings, which are faſten'd to the Piers on the Weſtern Side, and link'd together by ſmall Chains, which make it look like Network with great Meſhes, on this they have laid thick Planks faſten'd one to the other; but as they do not reach within ſome Paces of the Gate, becauſe of the bending of the Chains, eſpecially when loaded, they have fixt Conſoles or Brackets on the ſame, level with the Gate, which ſupports a Floor that reaches to the Planks laid on the Chains; on the Sides of theſe Planks they have ſet up little Wooden Pilaſters, which ſuſtain a ſmall Roof of the ſame Materials, continued from one Side to the other, the Ends whereof reſt on the Piers.

The Chineſe have made ſome other Bridges in imitation of this, which is famous over all the Empire; there is one eſpecially pretty well known, on the River Kin-ſha-kyang, in the ancient Country of the Lo-lo of the Province of Yun-nan; and in that of Se-chwen there are 2 or 3 others, which are ſupported only by thick Ropes, but theſe tho' ſmall, are tottering and ſo unſecure, that nothing but Neceſſity could make one venture to croſs them.

They have ſucceeded better in ſome other Parts, both in the Province of Se-chwen, at the Foot of the Mountains poſſeſs'd by the Myau-tſe, and in that of Shen-ſi, in the Diſtrict of Han-chong-fû. They have by help of Conſoles faſten'd Wooden Poles into the Rocks of the Mountains; on theſe they have laid thick Planks, and thus made Bridges hanging over the Valleys, which ſerve for Roads, ſometimes for a conſiderable Way together.

All theſe are the Works of the ancient Chineſe ſettled in thoſe Provinces, which ſhews the Superiority of their Genius, not only over the Myau-tſe and Lo-lo, but even all the neighbouring Nations, both to the Weſtward and Southward.

The TRAVELS of ſeveral JESUIT MISSIONARIES in CHINA.

The Road taken by P. P. Bouvet, Fontaney, Gerbillon, le Comte, and Viſdelou, from the Port of Ning-po to Pe-king: with a very exact and particular Deſcription of all the Places which they paſs'd through in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, Shan-tong, and Pe-che-li.

WE departed from Ning-po the 26*th* of November 1687, in order to go to Pe-king, where we were call'd by the Emperor, embarking in the Evening with a Mandarin, who was appointed us by the Governor.

The 27th in the Morning we paſs'd by Yu-yau-hyen, a City of the third Order, depending on Shau-hing; its Wall incloſes a pretty high Mountain, on which there is not a Houſe to be ſeen, except except towards the Foot. A little River ſeparates the City from a Palace, which Li-Ko-lau, after having obtain'd a Permiſſion to retire from Court, cauſed to be built in the Reign of the Father of the Emperor Van-lye, to perpetuate his Memory in the Place of his Birth. He incloſed with Walls a great Piece of Ground, which was inhabited afterwards and is now Part of the City; there is a Communication between them, by means of a Bridge of 3 Arches, pretty well built, and over-againſt it are erected 7 or 8 Triumphal Arches, which almoſt touch one another. Road from Ning-po to Pe king.

That Day in the Evening we paſs'd two Dikes, and arrived firſt at a Paſſage where they hoiſt up the Barks in order to convey them into a Canal, which is 9 or 10 Feet higher than the Level of the River; they hoiſt the Bark on a Slope or Declivity, paved with great Stones, and when it is at the Top they let it ſlide down another into the Canal. There are ſeveral People at this Paſſage, who wait to be hired for this Work, which they finiſh in about a quarter of an Hour, by means of two Capſtans.

All the Country we ſaw conſiſts of large, well cultivated Plains, bounded with frightful barren Mountains, tho' ſome are cover'd with Pines and Cypreſſes, which are the moſt common Trees to be ſeen between Ning-po and Hang-chew. The Tree which produces the Tallow is almoſt as common, eſpecially towards Ning-po, where ſcarce any other Trees are to be ſeen; they were at that Time ſtrip'd of their Leaves, and cover'd with a white Fruit growing in Bunches at the End of the Branches; their Huſks being fallen off, they appear'd white, ſo that at a Diſtance they ſeem'd as if cover'd with Flowers. Pines. Cypreſſes. Talow Tree.

The 28th in the Morning, we croſs'd a Sort of Lake, or rather an Arm of the Sea, call'd Tſau-hú, at our own Expence; for the Mandarin declared, that having no Order from the Emperor, he could not oblige the Officers to furniſh us with Neceſſaries beyond the Diſtrict of Ning-po: for which Reaſon we were compell'd to hire new Barks, and defray the Mandarin's Expences as far as Hang-chew.

This Day we ſailed on the fine Canal which P. Martini mentions, but he does not give ſo particular an Account of it as it deſerves. This Canal is near 20 Leagues in Length; it is lined on one Side with large flat Stones, 5 or 6 Feet long, 2 in Breadth, and 2 or 3 Inches thick; its Water is pure and very clear, and its Breadth is generally 20 or 30 Geometrical Paces, ſometimes 40 or more. In divers Places it runs above a League, ſometimes two in a ſtrait Plain. But what is more common, tho' not mention'd by P. Martini, is, that from Beginning to End, at certain Diſtances, one finds ſeveral fine Canals on both Sides, extending along the Plain, where they divide into ſeveral others; forming a great Number of Iſlands, that make it look like a great Labyrinth, as far as the Mountains bounding theſe beautiful Plains, which are level, and ſmooth as Glaſs. Fine Canal.

In this agreeable Place is the City of Shau-hing, which is croſs'd by a great Number of Canals; the Bridges, which are very numerous, and generally of a ſingle Arch, are very high, but the Arches not being of any Thickneſs towards the Top, are much weaker than ours; ſo that Carts never paſs over them, all Burthens being carry'd by Porters. Theſe Bridges are paſs'd by means of Stairs which are flat, and of eaſy Aſcent, the Steps commonly not being above 3 Inches thick. City Shau-hing.

Some of theſe Bridges inſtead of Arches have 3 or 4 great Stones laid on Piles in form of a Floor: We ſaw ſome, the Stones whereof were 10, 12, 15, and 18 Feet in Length. There are ſeveral of theſe over the great Canal, very neatly built. The Country which is water'd by it is very pleaſant and fertile, offering to the View large Plains cover'd with Rice and Pulſe, which afford Suſtenance to an immenſe Number of People; it is alſo diverſify'd with infinite Thickets of Cypreſs Trees, here and there ſhading the Tombs.

About Shau-hing, and from thence almoſt as far as Hang-chew, one ſees a continual Series of Houſes and Hamlets, which makes the Country look as if it was one City. The Houſes in the Country, as well as thoſe of the Villages, are better built and kept in Repair, than thoſe of the common Sort in ſome Towns: ſo that the Villages of this Country are prettier and more pleaſant than thoſe of Europe generally are.

The 29th we paſs'd by Syau-ſhan, a City of the third Rank. It is ſuppoſed to have had its Name on account of a little Mountain, which is in one of its Suburbs. This City alſo is water'd with many Canals; its Gates, as well as thoſe of Shau-hing, are cover'd with Plates of Iron. City Syau-ſhan.

The 30th we went in Chairs within half a League of the Tſyen-tang (M), which we paſs'd in leſs than an Hour and an half. The River was in this Place about 4,000 Geometrical Paces in Breadth, but Ships cannot enter becauſe of its Shallows; it has an extraordinary high Tide every Year about the full Moon in October. When we had paſs'd the River, we found very neat Calaſhes ready for us, which the Chriſtians of Hang-chew (N) had brought down to the Water Side; they accompany'd us, as it were, in Triumph to Church, where we found P. Intorcetta, who was grown hoary in the Labour of the Apoſtolic Life, and no leſs venerable on account of his Merit and Vertue, than his great Age. P. Intorcetta.

As we were going to Court we were indiſpenſably obliged both to make and receive ſeveral Viſits; in the way from our own Houſe to the Palace of the Vice Roy, we paſs'd thro' a very ſtrait Street, about 25 or 30 Feet broad, and in Length from our Houſe to the Gate of the Tartars City about a League. The Middle of it is paved with large flat Stones, and the reſt like the Streets of of the European Cities, but without any Deſcent. All the Houſes are one Story high over the Shops, which are open towards the Street; on the back ſide is the Canal. This Street is as much crouded as the moſt populous Streets of Paris, yet not a Woman to be ſeen. It is adorn'd with ſeveral Triumphal Arches, placed at certain Diſtances, which make a very beautiful Appearance. the other Streets, and eſpecially thoſe where the Soldiers and the Tartars live, are very different; the Houſes on each Side look like thoſe of the pooreſt Cottagers, neither are they by far ſo well peopled as thoſe before mention'd.

We viſited the Burying Place of the Chriſtians; all that Quarter, which is full of Mountains, is ſcatter'd over with Tombs for the Space of near two Leagues. We went afterwards on the Lake call'd Si-hû, which P. Martini deſcribes as a delightful Place: The Chriſtians had provided us a Dinner in a large Bark, which had a Hall and very commodious Apartments. This Lake, whoſe Waters are very clear, is above a League and an half in Compaſs; on the Side of it in ſome Places there are Houſes, which are agreeable enough, but not extraordinary handſome. Without Doubt the Tartars, who have ſack'd this great City 2 or 3 Times, have demoliſh'd moſt of the Palaces P. Martini ſpeaks of.

Lake Si-hu.

The 19th Dec. we took Leave of the Mandarins, and after having ſent our Cheſt on Board the Bark, went to Prayers in the Church where the Chriſtians were aſſembled; they furniſh'd each of us with a Chair, and conducted us as they had done at our Arrival to our Bark.

We paſs'd Eaſtwards thro' a Street, belonging to one of the Suburbs, for about 11 or 1,200 Geometrical Paces; as we did not go to the End of it, I cannot ſay juſtly how far it extends. This Street is narrower than that before ſpoken of, but as ſtraight. The Houſes are 2 Story high and very cloſe together; we ſaw as many People as there are in the moſt frequented Streets of Paris, but ſtill not a Woman.

Our Bark, tho' it was only of the third Rate, was very large, neat and commodious; being more than 16 Foot in Breadth, and between 60 and 80 in Length; its Sides were 10 or 12 Feet high; it was accommodated with a Hall and 4 very convenient Chambers, without reckoning the Kitchen and the Places where our Domeſticks retired, all on the ſame Deck. The Hall and Chambers were adorn'd on the Inſide with carved Work, painted and gilded; the reſt was beautifully varniſh'd, and the Cieling conſiſting of ſeveral Pannels, painted after the Chineſe Manner. Not only the Emperor, but the Merchants themſelves have great Numbers of this Sort of Barks for trading to the ſeveral Provinces, by Means of the Rivers and Canals, wherewith the Country is interſected.

Canal.

We have ſeen ſome of theſe Barks which might hold 200 Tun; whole Families lodge in them more conveniently than in their Houſes, which are not ſo neat. There were above 400 in the Canal that we ſail'd on. This Canal, which is to the North Weſt of the City, runs more than a great League in a ſtrait Line, and is in Breadth every where above 15 Fathom; it is lined on both Sides with Free Stone, and on the Banks are Rows of Houſes as thick ſet as in the Streets, and as full of People; nor are the Barks leſs crouded, which lie on each Side of the Canal. We ſtop'd in our Bark till the 20th, being obliged to wait for the Vice Roy, who deſign'd to viſit us, and give us the Kang-ho, or Order of the Ping-pû, that is, the ſovereign Tribunal for the Militia. This Order imported, that whether we travel'd by Land or Water, we ſhould be furniſh'd with all ſorts of Neceſſaries till we arrived at Court.

The 21ſt in the Morning we left Hang-chew, the Canal was every where about 20 or 25 Fathom broad; the Sides which were lined with Free Stone and ſet thick with great Barks, whereof we reckon'd above 500, and the Banks were ranged with Houſes for a Mile and a Quarter. Beyond the Suburbs the Canal is lined with Stone only on one Side; along which there is a paved Way for the Conveniency of thoſe who haul the Barks. We found Canals every now and then, and in thoſe Places, where the Banks are low and overflow'd, they have made flat Bridges, with great Stones, each 7 or 8 Foot long, and placed three and three together, which form a ſort of Cauſey.

About 4 Leagues from Hang-chew, we paſs'd through a Village call'd Tan-tſi, built on both Sides of the Canal, which to this Place is ordinarily 15, 25, and 50 Paces broad. The two Sides are very well lined with Free Stone and form 2 Quays, each between 4 and 500 Geometrical Paces long, adorned with double Stairs, fronting the Door of every Houſe, for the Conveniency of Water.

The Houſes which extend along the Quays are better built than thoſe in the City, and more uniform; ſo that each Row ſeems to be one continued Pile of the ſame Building. In the midſt of the Village is a handſome Bridge with 7 large Arches, whereof the middlemoſt is 45 Feet wide; the reſt are alſo very large, diminiſhing in Proportion to the 2 Deſcents of the Bridge. We found alſo 2 or 3 great Bridges of one Arch only, and ſeveral Canals with Houſes on each Side. Two Leagues from this Village we ſaw an Iſland in the middle of the Canal, with a very neat Pagod on it.

The 22d, after we had paſs'd ſeveral Bridges, we found that the Canal grew narrower; we arrived at a City called She-men-hyen, 10 Leagues from Hang-chew. Thus far we had advanced almoſt continually North Eaſt, through a very level Country without Hills, full of Canals cover'd with Bridges, and planted with dwarf Mulberry Trees, much like our Vineyards; Houſes and Hamlets were alſo very numerous.

The 23d we arrived at Kya-hing-fû. We saw in our passage on the Side of the Canal a beautiful Pagod, which is call'd Sun-ko-ta, because of 3 Ta or Towers, several Stories high, which form the Entrance of it; we saw another that was larger, in one of the Suburbs, on the East Side. This City is large, well peopled, and has a very good Trade; its Suburbs are of great Extent. They compare it to Ning-po for Bigness, but it is much handsomer and richer. Road from Ning po to Pe-king. Kya-hing-fû.

The 24th we departed early in the Morning, and entered a fine Canal, 25 or 30 Paces broad, the Water of which was very sweet. We cross'd a large Village named Wan-kyang-king, which extends a good way into the Plain. They pass from one Side to the other over a three-arch'd Bridge of very beautiful Architecture; the middlemost Arch is 75 Feet wide and above 20 high. This Work appears very bold, the Stones whereof it is built are more than 5 Feet long.

From within three or 4 Leagues on this Side Hang-chew to this Place, the Country is flat, without Mountains, and sufficiently cover'd with Wood, so that it makes a beautiful Landskip. Not an Inch of Ground lies useless; but Mulberry Trees here begin to be scarce. Between Kya-hing and this Village, at a Point where the Canal divides into 3 Branches, we saw 3 Fortresses or Square Towers built in the Water, and situated in Form of a Triangle. We were told that they served heretofore as Boundaries between Kyang-nan and Che-kyang, when those Provinces belong'd to two different Sovereigns. Province of Kyang-nan.

Twenty Li (*) from the same Village we pass'd by another on the Left, call'd Whan-kya-kyun-chin, in the Province of Kyang-nan; it is so large that we took it at first Sight to be a City; and is intersected and surrounded with very broad Canals, quite cover'd with Barks. The Plains are well cultivated, and full of Hamlets; the Multitude and Breadth of the Canals, and the Evenness of the Ground, where there is not the least Eminence to be seen, gives room to believe that this Country had been formerly intirely under Water, and that the Chinese, who are extremely laborious, have drain'd it by cutting these Canals, whereby they have render'd it extremely fertile, and very commodious for Trade. Here we counted no less than a dozen Villages, the farthest of which was not above a Mile off, besides those which appear'd at a Distance.

After all, we were told that this Country, as populous as it is, was a Desart, in Comparison of Song-kyang, Nang-king, and the Southern Part of this Province. If China was every where as well peopled as it is between Shau-hing and Sû-chew, I should make no Difficulty to believe that it contain'd more Inhabitants than all Europe; but we were assur'd that the Northern Provinces are not near so populous as the Southern.

Having run 10 Li, we arrived at Pin-Yang, which signifies an even Prospect. It is a great Village, which we took at first for a City, on account of the Multitude of its Houses and Inhabitants; it is cut in several Parts by Canals cover'd with well built Bridges and a great Number of Barks. They derive their Waters from a great Lake on the West Side, through which the little Barks pass to shorten their Way in going to Sû-chew, and then they don't touch at Kya-hing.

From this Village the Canal extends Northwards out of Sight, and continues in a strait Line, with a Causey lined towards the Water with very fair Free Stone. On the East appears another great Lake, and these 2 Lakes extend as far as U-kyang. We pass'd by this City in the Night, which is like the rest cut with fair Canals. Before we arrived we pass'd under the Arch of a Bridge 48 Feet broad and 25 high. City U-kyang.

A League beyond U-kyang we found that the Causey on the Left Hand or West was 7 Feet high, and very well lined on both Sides with Free Stone, which made a kind of solid Bridge; under which, at certain Distances, there were Arches made for the Water to pass into the Plain, which was sown with Rice, and all overflow'd. This being Christmas Eve we said our Masses in the Hall, which was as steady as if the Bark had been on firm Ground.

The 25th, being Christmas Day, we found ourselves in the Morning at the Foot of the Walls of Sû-chew, in a great Canal 35 or 40 Feet broad; it runs North and South along the Side of a Wall, which we discover'd at one View for about a League, almost in a strait Line. Our Bark stop'd over-against a great Arch of a magnificent Bridge, under which is a Passage into a great Canal, that runs Westward, and loses itself in a very long Suburb. City of Sû-chew.

On the Edge of the Plain we saw a kind of great Pavilion, or square Building, with a double Roof curling up, cover'd with yellow Tiles, and encompass'd with a Wall, pierced towards the Top, and adorn'd with variety of Figures. This is a Monument erected by the Mandarins, in memory of the Honour which the Emperor Kang-hi did their City when he came thither, without that Pride and Pomp which ordinarily accompanies the Chinese Emperors. There are engraven on a Stone, belonging to this Edifice, the Instructions which the Emperor gave the Vice-Roy for governing the People.

We entered the City betimes in the Morning through the West Gate, and after we had gone the Space of 5 or 6 Li on different Canals, we arrived at our Church, where we found P. Simon Rodriguez, who presides over a numerous and zealous Congregation of Christians. Near the Door thro' which we enter'd, we saw a Polygonal Tower 6 or 7 Stories high, and above a League without the Walls, another Tower of the same Height in one of the Suburbs, which extended beyond the Reach of Eye.

That Day we received a Visit from Hyu Lau-ya, Grandson of Paul Syu, that famous Ko-lau, who was one of the greatest Defenders of the Christian Religion. That Mandarin is retired to Shang-hay with his Family; he had been Vice-Roy, had he not been related to U-san-ghey, who revolted againſt the Emperor. He is Han-lin (*), that is, one of the Doctors of the firſt Rank, who are choſen by his Majeſty for their ſuperior Abilities, to compoſe, print, and to be for the moſt part in waiting near his Perſon. This Dignity gives him a conſiderable Rank; the Billets of Viſit which he ſends, are written in the ſame Manner as thoſe of the Vice-Roys.

This illuſtrious Chriſtian, malgre all our Oppoſition, fell on his Knees to ſalute us, and knock'd his Forehead againſt the Ground, to ſhew the Reſpect which he bore to the Preachers of the Goſpel. On the 26th we viſited the Vice-Roy of the Province, who reſides in this City; he received us with much Politeneſs and Civility, and after a long Converſation reconducted us as far as his Court.

The 28th we left Sû-chew. Firſt we ſail'd about 2 Miles Northwards on a great Canal, that runs partly along the Walls of the City, and partly along a large Suburb, which is cut with Canals in divers Places, and very thick ſet with Houſes. We ſaw for near three Quarters of a Mile together a double and treble Row of Barks, ſo cloſe that they touch'd one another's Sides. We ſteer'd afterwards to the Weſt, quitting the Great Canal, which continues its Courſe Northward, farther than we could ſee; and advanced along a new Canal, narrower than the former, croſſing a Suburb, which is adorn'd with Houſes for the Space of a great League, furniſh'd with Streets and Canals.

From what I had ſeen of the Walls of Sû-chew, tho' only on one Side, from the Largeneſs of its Suburbs, and the Multitude of Barks, where whole Families dwell, I made no difficulty to conclude, that it is more than 4 Leagues in Compaſs, as they affirm'd it was, and that it contains ſeveral Millions of Inhabitants.

At the End of this Suburb, the Canal grows conſiderably wider, and extends in a direct Line beyond the Reach of Eye, to a great Village, divided by Streets and Canals, where is the Cuſtom-Houſe of Sû-chew; from which City as far as Vû-tſye-hyen the Canal runs in a ſtrait Line to the North-Weſt, the Space of 100 Li, which make 10 Leagues; nothing is to be ſeen but Barks paſſing, ſometimes 50 at once. A League from the Cuſtom-Houſe we found a Bridge of one Arch, 50 Feet wide.

City Vû-tſye-hyen deſcribed.

Vû-tſye-hyen is a City of the third Rank, depending on Chang-chew. We paſs'd thro' the South Suburb, which is half a League long, extending on both Sides of the Canal; we went cloſe by the Walls of the City, and tho' we could ſee but part of it, we judged it was two Miles and an half in Compaſs. The Walls were more than 25 Feet in height, not ſtrong but very neat, and kept in good Repair. They are ſurrounded with a great Ditch, which is a ſort of Canal. The Space between the Ditch and the Walls is very level, and makes a moſt agreeable Walk. The Waters that abound in this Place form ſeveral Iſlands in the different Canals, that make a charming Proſpect, and produce excellent Tea, which is ſent even to Pe-king and all over China.

We paſs'd the Night in the City, and next Day continued our Voyage on the Canal, which extends in a ſtrait Line ſtill towards the North-Weſt, with a Cauſey on the Eaſt, very well lined on each Side with Free Stone. The Country is even as Glaſs, and very well cultivated; one ſees a continued Series of Hamlets and Villages, which may be eaſily diſtinguiſh'd in Plains as level as our Gardens. When the View is bounded by ſome large City, it yields a moſt delightful Proſpect.

The 31ſt of December in the Evening we arrived at Chang-chew-fû, a famous City and of great Trade. We ſail'd half a League only in croſſing one of its Suburbs; the Canal was ſo cover'd with Barks, which touch'd one another, that we could ſcarce ſee the Water. Here they ſeized two Thieves, who in the Night had crept into our Bark; one of them found means to eſcape, and we hinder'd the other from being carry'd before the Mandarin: When he was ſet free, he made what Haſte he could to a little Bark, where there were ſeveral of his Accomplices, with whom he diſappear'd in an Inſtant. They affirm that theſe Robbers burn a kind of Paſtil, whoſe Fumes throw one into a Sleep.

The 30th in the Morning, departing from Chang-chew, we found the Canal very narrow, being ſcarce 12 Feet in Breadth; the Banks were 17 or 18 Feet high, but perpendicular. Forty nine Li from thence, after we had paſs'd the Towns Ping-nyû and Lu-ſhan, the Canal runs in a ſtrait Line quite out of Sight. Theſe Towns are half ruin'd, altho' there ſtill remain a few Houſes, which are very neat. The Canal is lined on both Sides to the Height of 10 or 12 Feet with fine ſquare Pieces of Marble, greyiſh, and much of the Colour of Slate.

About 2 Leagues on this ſide Tan-yang we were obliged to quit the Canal, and continue our Journey by Land, becauſe they were making the Canal deeper, that it might carry the Barks which bring the Tribute to the Court. Tho' this Paſſage had been ſhut up but for one Day, yet we ſaw an infinite Number of Barks ſtop'd, and thoſe who conducted them purſued their Journey by Land Carriages like us.

The Mandarin of Tan-yang, who had Notice of our coming the Day before, ſent us Chairs, Horſes, and Porters, to conduct us to Ching-kyang-fû; thoſe who carry'd us and our Baggage went at the Rate of a good German League an Hour, ſo that in leſs than two Hours we made the two Leagues and an half, which was the Diſtance we were at from Tan-yang.

Town of Tan-yang.

Before we arrived there, at the End of the Canal we paſs'd near a Tower, 7 Stories high, and over three large Marble Bridges with only one Arch. The Suburbs of this Town are alſo paved paved with Marble; in three Quarters of an Hour we went round it, going along the Walls, which are of Brick, 25 Feet in height, and raiſed on a Marble Foundation. Road from Ning-po to Pe-king.

On the North of this Town is a Lake, 5 or 6 Leagues in Compaſs, along which we travell'd about a League before we arrived at Ma-lin, a Village 2 Leagues beyond Tan-yang, where we paſs'd the Night in a Houſe prepar'd for us by the Chriſtians. Tho' this Village has but one Street, yet they aſſur'd us it contain'd above 200,000 Inhabitants; it is paved with Marble like the reſt of the Villages we paſs'd, till we came to Ching-kyang-fû; in one part of the Road we met with Stones of white Marble 6 Feet in height, with ſeveral coarſe Figures in Relief cut on them. Village Ma-lin, with 200,000 Inhabitants.

The 2d of January we arrived at Ching-kyang-fû. We paſs'd firſt thro' a Suburb 13,000 Geometrical Paces in Length, all paved with Marble; the Pieces of Marble wherewith the middle of the Street is paved, are 3 Feet long and near 2 broad. After we had paſs'd above a League along the Walls, which are more than 30 Feet high, and in very good Repair, we croſs'd over a Marble Bridge into another Suburb, where we found ſo great a Concourſe of People, that we had much ado to make our Way thro' them. City Ching-kyang-fû.

The City of Ching-kyang is none of the largeſt, for it is but one League in Circumference, but one of the moſt conſiderable for Trade, and as it were a Key of the Empire towards the Sea, from whence it is not above 2 ſhort Days Journey; it is alſo a fortified Place, and has a large Garriſon. We ſaw 18 Iron Cannon, which form'd a Battery even with the Water.

We croſs'd only one Street of this ſecond Suburb, where there is a little Mountain, from the Top whereof we had one of the moſt agreeable Proſpects imaginable; on one Side we ſaw the City of Ching-kyang and its Suburbs, on the other the beautiful Yang-tſe-kyang, which the Chineſe call the Son of the Sea, or Ta-kyang, the Great River, or ſimply Kyang, that is, The River, by way of Excellence; in effect, it ſeems from this Place to be a vaſt Sea. On the other Side of the River over-againſt Ching-kyang there appears a great City, named Qua-chew, at leaſt it wants nothing but the great Privilege belonging to Cities; nor is it look'd on in China as more than a Ma-tew, or Place of Trade. At the Foot of this Hill lies the Port, where there is a continual Concourſe of People, who make no ſmall Clutter and Noiſe.

Here we went on Board the Bark again, which the Officers had prepar'd for us; they were ſmall but extremely handſome, and were to ſerve us only in paſſing the River to Yang-chew; where we paſs'd, the River is above a League in Breadth, and yet it was reckon'd narrow in compariſon of what it is both higher up and lower down. About 700 Paces within the River we paſs'd by an Iſland, which look'd like a Place inchanted; hence the Chineſe call it Kin-ſhan, or the Mountain of Gold; it is about 600 Feet in Compaſs, and cover'd with fair Stones; on the Top ſtands a Tower ſeveral Stories high, ſurrounded with Pagods and Houſes of Bonzas. A Cha, or Chineſe Sluice

On the other Side of the River we enter'd into a Canal, where we were obliged to paſs a Cha, which is a kind of Sluice, if I may give it that Name. The Chineſe, whom I had talk'd to about our European Sluices, had not the leaſt Notion of them. In this Place they have contracted the Canal between 2 Dikes lined with Free Stone, which approach one another towards the Middle, where the Water runs with great Rapidity: It is likely they reſtrain it thus, to make its Channel deeper, for otherwiſe it would ſpread, and not have Depth enough to carry Barks. At this Paſſage there are People ready to draw the Barks, who muſt be very careful not to let them go down with the Stream, for in that Caſe they would infallibly be broken to Pieces and wreck'd.

We could not ſee Qua-chew, becauſe it was Night, when we paſs'd thro' one of its Suburbs. Next Morning we arrived betimes at Yang-chew-fû, which is a fair City, of great Trade, and very populous; they aſſured me it was 2 Leagues in Compaſs, and that including the Suburbs it contain'd 2 Millions of Souls. City Yang-chew-fû.

We departed thence in Litters the 10th of January, at 6 in the Evening, and lay 4 Leagues and an half from it at a great Borough named Shau-pe; we travell'd a good part of this Way by the ſide of the Canal on a fair Cauſey, which is cut thro' in three Places, to let the Water into the Fields.

The 11th, after travelling 7 Leagues without ſtopping, we arrived at Kau-yew-chew. This Country is flat, and almoſt all under Water; we advanced along a great Cauſey about 30 Feet broad and 10 or 12 high, lined in ſome Places with ſquare pieces of Marble, eſpecially on the Side towards the Canal, which we left on the Right Hand. City Kau-yew-chew.

Beyond this we diſcover'd a great Lake, which is parallel to the Canal, and above a League in Breadth. The Plain on the Right Hand is likewiſe under Water, excepting ſeveral Eminences where Rice is ſown; and many Hamlets appear whoſe houſes are cover'd with Reeds, and have Walls made of Reeds done over with Clay. The vaſt Number of Barks under Sail, and rowing over theſe Fields, as on a large Sea, afforded a pretty diverting Spectacle.

Kau-yew-chew is a great City, as we were inform'd, for we only paſs'd about the Space of 12,000 Geometrical Paces by the Side of the Walls, which are about 30 Feet high. In our Way to it we ſaw, in one of its Suburbs, a Tower 7 Stories high; and in the City itſelf another ſquare Building of 6 or 7 Stories, which went up tapering like a Pyramid, terminated by a little ſquare Roof of a different Make from that of the Towers; the Suburbs are large, and pretty well built.

Road from Ning-po to Pe-king.

The 12th in the Morning we travell'd 6 Leagues on the Cauſey which runs along the Canal and Lake; this Lake extends out of ſight like a vaſt Sea, where we ſaw an infinite Number of Barks under Sail. Between the Canal and Lake is another Cauſey, cover'd very neatly with ſquare Stones in ſeveral Places; it is full of wild Fowl, and from time to time we ſaw Clouds of ſmall Birds which cover'd part of the Sky; the Crows were all black, whereas thoſe we had met with from Ning-po hither, had a kind of white Collar about the Neck.

In the Afternoon we went 6 Leagues farther to Pau-hing-hyen along the Canal, which advances continually between 2 great Cauſeys, with the Lake on the Left Hand; the Country on the Right is flat, and very well cultivated near that City, but one half of it lies under Water.

City of Whay-ngan-fû.

The 14th having advanced 8 Leagues we came to lie at Whay-ngan-fû; this is a conſiderable City, and ſeem'd to us more populous, and of greater Trade than Yang-chew. The Grand Maſter of the Waters, Canals, and Rivers reſides there; he then lived in a publick Inn, where thoſe are lodged who are ſent for by the Emperor, or diſpatch'd from the Court into the Provinces: ſo that we were obliged to take up with a wretched Inn made of Mats and Reeds, notwithſtanding the Cold and Snow, which fell even into the Place where we lay. Three Mandarins lodged with us, who were greatly pleaſed with the Sight of ſome of our Books, and the Paper Figures they found in them. We made them a Preſent of one of them, with a French Crown, for which they return'd us the weight in Silver, and invited us to drink Tea in their Apartment, where they regaled us with ſeveral Kinds of Fruit.

Marble.

Marble is common in theſe Parts, but the Chineſe don't ſeem to ſet any great Value on it; they employ it only for lining Canals, and in ſome other publick Works; we ſaw there as well as at Ching-kyang Marble Rowlers, reſembling pieces of Pillars, which they draw over the cultivated Lands to make them level.

On the 15th in the Afternoon we went 3 Leagues farther to lodge at Chin-kyang-pû (Q), which lies on the South Bank of the Whang-ho, and Side of the Canal; between Whay-ngan and this Town we found another not far from the Suburbs of that City, this gave Occaſion to the Error, which the Dutch Embaſſadors fell into, who, as appears from their Relation, have taken theſe two Boroughs for a continuation of the Suburbs of Whay-ngan, making this Suburb above 3 German Leagues long. Indeed we paſs'd one running parallel to the Walls of the City, which is a League and an half in Length. The Country is flat, well cultivated, and in ſome Places half under Water; which renders the Plain, where they ſow Rice, fit for tilling. Here we ſaw abundance of Geeſe, Wild Ducks, Pheaſants, &c.

River Whang-ho.

We did not leave this Town till the 17th, which was almoſt wholly ſpent in paſſing the Whang-ho, or Yellow River, becauſe the Ice was to be broken, and the Pieces obſtructed the Paſſage. The River is not more than 450 Fathom broad at this Place, which is 25 Leagues diſtant from its Mouth; its Channel is pretty ſtrait, the Banks conſiſt of a yellowiſh Clay, which mixing with the Waters in their Courſe, makes them yellow, whence it derives its Name. At the Time we paſs'd it, there was ſcarce any Appearance of this Colour in the Water when it was taken up; its Stream was then neither ſlow nor ſwift, but when it ſwells and is rapid, it waſhes off much Earth, which is naturally light, and ſo becomes a great deal muddier and yellower. If this River was not reſtrain'd by Dikes, which are continually repairing, it would make ſtrange Ravages.

We went and lodged in a Village [or Town]; the Road is the moſt even and handſome that can be ſeen, as well as the Country, which is flat and open like Beauce, but more beautiful, better cultivated, and full of Hamlets, which are not above 50, 100, or 200 Paces aſunder. One League from the Whang-ho we found a great Cauſey diſcontinued in one Place, over which there was a kind of Wooden Bridge, ſupported by Piles of Stones, 8 or 10 Feet high; it is 300 Paces in Length, and paved very neatly with ſquare Stones; afterwards we paſs'd a Canal, which runs Northward in a ſtrait Line, parallel to the Yellow River, whereinto it diſcharges itſelf; we took notice alſo of 3 other large Cauſeys in the Plain, which are the Roads to different Cities.

Cattle.

Hitherto we had not met with any Flocks of Sheep in our Journey; but we ſaw abundance of white Goats and black Hogs, ſome Cows and Buffaloes, a great many little Mules, Aſſes, and ſorry Horſes, which are commonly uſed for travelling, but not ſo much as one tolerably handſome among them.

The People are ſo numerous, that the Men commonly perform the Office of Beaſts of Burthen, both for carrying Luggage and one another; and tho' the Land is very fertile and well cultivated, it does not yield Suſtenance ſufficient for Men and Beaſts. The Houſes of the Suburbs and Country Towns, after one leaves Whay-ngan, are made of Reeds and Earth, and cover'd with Straw, the very Inns themſelves for lodging the Mandarins (R) being built after the ſame Manner. From the Whang-ho the Land riſes till we come to Pe-king, as is evident from the Courſe of the Rivers.

The 18th we travell'd 11 Leagues to Sû-tſyen-hyen over a flat Country, cultivated, and furniſh'd with ſeveral large Cauſeys, which are ſo many high Roads, as neat and commodious as one could wiſh. Theſe Cauſeys are level, and commonly raiſed 10 or 12 Feet, being 20 or 30 broad at Top, and the Slopes making 10 or 15 Feet more. All this Day we travell'd by the the Side of a ſmall, but very deep and rapid River; it is 7 or 8 Geometrical Paces broad, and bears pretty large Barks. It ſeems to run parallel to the Whang-ho, which is ſeldom above 3 or 400 Paces diſtant, and is probably the ſame which we took for an artificial Canal the Evening before. The Land hereabouts is all marſhy, yet bears abundance of little Trees reſembling the Birch. Road from Ning-po to Pe-king.

(Q) It ſhould be on the Left; for in the Map that City lies to the Right Hand or Eaſt of the Whang-ho.

We arrived at Sú-tſyen-hyen by a large handſome Cauſey, the Whang-ho appearing to the Right. This City ſtands on a riſing Ground, its Walls are half in Ruins; it has two Suburbs, either of which is preferable to the Town. Near the Walls we ſaw a kind of Palace, newly built; this is a Monument in Honour of the Emperor Kang-hi, who paſs'd thro' the City in his Way to Sú-chew: the principal Part of this Edifice is a ſort of oblong-ſquare Salon, open on all Sides, with a double Roof, cover'd with yellow-varniſh'd Tiles, Sú-tſyen-hyen.

The Cauſey reaches no farther than Sú-tſyen, which we left the 19th. Half a League beyond it we found 7 flat Bridges one after another, each about 100 Foot long, ſupported by Piers or little Walls of Brick, with great Rails on both Sides, and triumphal Arches made of Wood at each End. Theſe Bridges lie in a Line, and croſs divers Canals, which form a kind of Labyrinth in this Place. Beyond theſe there is a ninth ſtill larger, but not ſo neatly built as the reſt. The Country ſtill continues pretty flat, but is not ſo well cultivated or peopled as we found it the preceding Days. The Land is blackiſh, hard, and barren; and the Houſes built only with Earth and Straw.

The 20th we travell'd but 6 Leagues, to Hong-wa-pú, a large Village. They ſaid it was in Shan-tong, tho' others aſſured us we did not enter that Province till we had got 2 or 3 Leagues farther. The Country is flat, ſmoother than that we ſaw the Day before, and very well cultivated; it is alſo ſtored with Hamlets. We had 3 ſmall Bridges to paſs of 3 or 4 Arches each, built over the Torrents. We met with a ſort of Centry Boxes for Centinels built in the Plains at proper Diſtances. Here we firſt beheld a Flock of Sheep: for altho' hitherto we always travell'd in Plains, where we had an unbounded Proſpect, yet we neither ſaw Sheep nor Meadows. The Chineſe never let any of their Land lie uncultivated, and they conſume whatever it produces. Province of Shan-tong.

The 21ſt we began to ſee ſeveral Orchards planted with Fruit Trees in the open Fields, which in this Reſpect reſemble ſeveral of our Provinces of France: But the Lands here are better cultivated, and the Houſes and Hamlets much more frequent.

The Road from Yang-chew hither is extremely good and commodious; altho' it was the Depth of Winter, we did not find ſo much as one bad Step: It is free from Dirt and Stones, and all on a level, ſo that it looks like a Garden Walk. After Dinner we went 5 or 6 Li farther, the Country flat as uſual and well till'd; they ſow both Corn and Rice, but moſt of the former. We had this Day, on the Right Hand towards the Eaſt, a little Hill, which extends from North to South in a ſtrait Line: We lay at Li-kya-Shwang. As far as this Town we had ſeen in the Plain great Numbers of thoſe Stone Rowlers before mention'd; ſome channell'd, others plain, for levelling the Grounds and the Floors, whereon they threſh the Corn. This Borough lies beſide a little River which is very broad, conſidering its Depth.

The 22d we croſs'd the River, and at the End of 4 Leagues came to I-chew; the Plain always flat and even like la Beauce, but much more populous; the Roads dry and ſandy. The City did not appear to be above half a Ltague in Compaſs; the Walls are of Brick, and in very good Repair: we obſerved ſeveral Saliant Angles, and a ſort of Baſtions, which were either Polygonal or in the Form of a Horſe Shoe. City of I-chew.

The Governor came to viſit us at our Inn, and ſent a Meſſenger before to give Notice of our being on the Road, which was of great Service to us; for otherwiſe we might have found it difficult to have got a ſufficient Number of Porters to carry our Baggage in the Towns of Shan-tong, which are for the moſt part but ſmall.

We paſs'd into one of the Suburbs over a Bridge of five ſmall Arches; this Bridge is of Marble with Rails of the ſame, adorn'd with Lions very clumſily carved. Without the Suburbs, are a great many Tombs made of Earth in Form of Pyramids, with Inſcriptions engraven on Marble Tables. We lodged 4 Leagues beyond I-chew, at a pitiful Town, whoſe Houſes are of Earth cover'd with Stubble. The Country being ſandy, the Roads are troubleſome to Travellers on Account of the Duſt.

Beyond I-chew the Country is not ſo open, for one begins to ſee quick ſet Hedges of a very ſtrong and rugged kind of Thorns. At the Diſtance of every half League we commonly met with Centry Boxes, where the Centinels make Signals in the Night time, by kindling Fires on the Top, and in the Day time by hanging out a piece of Cloath. Theſe Centry Boxes, which are only made of Sods or Earth, are ſquare, raiſed with a Slope and 12 Feet high.

The 23d we travell'd 9 or 10 Leagues. In the Morning the Country was uneven, and we march'd now and then over Eminences, whoſe Deſcent was ſometimes pretty ſteep; the Soil too was barren in many Places; but in the Evening we came into a fertile Plain, between two Ridges of Mountains, one to the Eaſt, the other to the Weſt. Theſe latter were high, ſteep, and craggy in a thouſand Places, cover'd with Snow, and frightful to the Eye, by Reaſon of the Rocks; thoſe to the Eaſt were lower.

The Houſes of the Villages which we ſaw, are built with Stone in a very coarſe Manner: the Inhabitants of them are imploy'd in ſpinning or weaving the grey Silk of Shan-tong. It was there we ſaw the wild Silk Worms, which feed indifferently on all Sorts of Leaves and ſpin a greyiſh a greyiſh Silk; of this is made the Stuff call'd Kyen-chew, which waſhes well, and is ſold all over the Empire: Altho' it is not beautiful to the Eye, yet it is commonly worn by Perſons of Quality in their Houſes.

City Mong-in-hyen.

The 24th we travell'd all Day between barren Mountains, but the Valleys are generally well cultivated, and ſtored with Towns and Villages. We dined at Mong-in-hyen, a little City, whoſe Walls are but 12 Feet high, and in bad Repair. Altho' the Road was full of Aſcents and Deſcents, yet it was very good and dry, but much incommoded with Duſt.

City Sin-tay-hyen.

The 25th we went but 8 Leagues. We paſs'd thro' one of the Suburbs of the ſmall City Sin-tay-hyen. The Country was plain, well cultivated, very populous and cover'd with Fruit Trees. The Road all the Way was up Hill and down Hill; it was nevertheleſs good, and the Deſcents ſcarce perceptible. The Chains of Mountains continue on both Sides: at the Diſtance of about a League in ſome Places, they ſink into low Hills, beyond which we diſcover'd Plains which reach'd out of ſight.

The 26th, having travell'd about 3 Hours between frightful and deſart Mountains, we came into a well cultivated Plain, full of Fruit Trees. After Dinner, we found the Country equally charming, till we came to Tay-ngan-chew, which is at the Foot of a hideous Mountain that covers it from the North Winds.

City Tay-ngan-chew.

This City has a very agreeable Situation; its Walls are above 25 Foot high, but the Houſes are very deſpicable within. About a Mile from the Town of Yan-lew-tyen, where we dined, we croſs'd a River that was almoſt dry: there the Mountains open'd into a great Plain, which is very fertile and populous; they ſeem'd to be diſcontinued both on the Eaſt and Weſt Side, but began ſoon after, eſpecially on the Eaſt Side, and taking a Sweep, drew near again about Tay-ngan.

The 27th we reſted, to give our Baggage, which went the Road appointed by the Kang-ho, time to get 3 Days Journey from thence, where we were to overtake it, by nearer Roads.

The 28th we travell'd 9 or 10 Leagues among frightful Mountains, and ſaw very little cultivated Lands, altho' the Towns were pretty numerous and well peopled. One third of the Inhabitants of this Country have Wens or Swellings in their Throats; a Diſtemper ſuppoſed to proceed from the Well Water they are obliged to make Uſe of. The Inns are very inconvenient: the Beds are only little brick Forms the Length of a Man; the Entertainment is very bad, altho' one may buy Pheaſants cheaper than other Poultry; we have ſometimes had 4 for 10 Sols. The Mountains I ſpoke of, between which we paſs'd, are not very high, but generally without any Trees; ſome of them are cover'd with Earth, and had formerly been cultivated. The Remains of the Terraſſes are ſtill viſible from Bottom to Top; but all the Way hither from Ning-po, thro' the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, and Shan-tong, I could not perceive the leaſt Sign of the Ravages which the War had made in this vaſt Empire; nor an Inch of Ground untill'd, excepting on theſe Mountains.

Miſeries of the Civil Wars.

Any other Kingdom muſt have been exhauſted of Men, after ſo many Maſſacres: for it is incredible how many Millions have periſh'd by Famine and Sword, ſince the laſt Emperor of the Dynaſty of Ming; the Declenſion of that Family began with a Famine that was almoſt general. The Calamity was favourable to a great Number of Robbers, who reſolved to live by Rapine. They enter'd Sword in Hand into the Cities and Towns, and chuſing out the young Men, capable of bearing Arms, murder'd the reſt of their Family; to the End that having neither Father, nor Mother, nor Homes to go to, Neceſſity might compell them to be of their Party.

The Chiefs of theſe Robbers made away with each other by Degrees, till at length there remain'd but two; one of whom aſpiring even to the Throne, made himſelf Maſter of Pe-king, and obliged the Emperor in deſpair to hang himſelf. If we add to theſe Depopulations of whole Provinces, the War of the Tartars, (who were invited in to extirpate theſe Banditti) and the laſt Civil War, it will be eaſy to conclude, that no Country but China, could undergo ſuch plentiful Bleedings without loſing any of its Strength.

The 29th we travell'd about 9 Leagues between Mountains as hideous as the former: we paſs'd near one ſhaped like a Cone, on the Top whereof is a ſmall Pagod, to which they aſcend by very narrow and ſteep Stairs, conſiſting of about 200 Steps; ſoon after we enter'd a vaſt Plain well cultivated, where we travell'd the reſt of the Stage, much incommoded with the Duſt, altho' the Road was very good. This Day we went in all 9 Leagues. 2 Leagues before we came to our Lodging, we paſs'd near the Walls of a little City named Chang-tſin-hyen; we were obliged to croſs a Bridge built before the Gate of the City, over a Brook, which was then dry: this Bridge has 9 Arches ſuſtain'd by ſquare Piers of Stone very high and large, ſo that the Arches are but ſmall; it begins by a great Arch and ends with a long ſloping, ſupported by 7 ſmall Arches, ſeparated from the reſt by a very thick ſtone Pier. The Heads of the Poſts which ſupport the Stones that ſerve for Rails, are rudely carved Figures of Animals. The Materials of the whole are a ſort of blackiſh Marble, rough and unpoliſh'd; the Pavement is great ſquare Flags of the ſame. We found a large Quantity of this ſort of Marble in the two Provinces which we paſs'd thro', eſpecially in that of Shan-tong, where we now are; and it is likely, that the Mountains which we ſaw, almoſt intirely deſtitute of Trees, are full of it; becauſe in Places where the Rain had waſh'd away the Earth, there appear'd blackiſh Stones, which much reſembled this Marble.

The

The 30th we travell'd the Space of 10 Leagues in a very even Country, well improved, and full of great Hamlets or Villages, which might be taken for Country Towns. The Road being very dry is dusty, which mightily incommodes Travellers. In every Village we saw several Pagods, which are the only brick Buildings, all the rest being of Earth and Straw: the Roofs and Slopings are set off with Ornaments, as Birds, Dragons, and Foliage; and are cover'd with Tiles, varnish'd or japan'd with red and blue. Road from Ning po to Pe-king.

We found from Time to Time in the Plains, Pyramidical Tombs of Earth; there are usually in such Places small Groves of Cypresses, with flat Leaves which appear very pretty. Before Noon we pass'd by Yu-ching-hyen, a square City, the Walls whereof are made of temper'd Earth, mix'd with Straw, and in many Places with Bricks baked in the Sun, and rough cast, with Potters Clay. The Inns are the most pitiful we have seen yet.

Besides a great Numbers of Borroughs which the great Road passes through, we frequently found Inns by the Way Side: these are Sheds made of Reeds, or at best sorry Cottages of Earth, where the meaner Sort of People lodge; on most of the Towers here we saw Iron Bells, cast with very little Art.

The 31st our Stage was 12 Leagues, 2 Leagues from the Town where we lodged we had on our Left the City of Pin-yuen-hyen, which seem'd to be about 2 Leagues in Compass. In one of its Suburbs thro' which we pass'd we saw infinite Numbers of People, with many Timber-Yards full of Wood, for which there appear'd to be a great Trade. City Pin-yuen-hyen.

Eight Leagues from hence we found Te-chew, a large City, situated on the great Canal of the Court and inclosed with fair Brick Walls: one of its Suburbs, thro' which we pass'd, appear'd like a City, by its extent and the Number of People it contain'd. City Te-chew.

From Te-chew, the Road, which was before a little hollow, became even with the Plain; and, making Allowance for the Dust, is one of the finest imaginable. The Plain is level as a Garden, full of Villages surrounded with Fruit Trees, and diversify'd with Cypress Groves, planted about the Sepulchres, which afford a very agreeable Prospect. The Ground is a sort of Potter's Clay, but somewhat more soft and gray. The Carts are drawn by Oxen, as they are in Europe by Horses; one serves for a Thiller, and carries a small Saddle. The Houses are mostly of Earth and very low: the Roof makes so obtuse an Angle, or more properly rounds by Degrees in such a Manner, that it appears flat; it is composed of Reeds cover'd with Earth, and supported by Mats of small Reeds, which lie upon the Spars and Joysts. hence one may judge of their Inns, which are built in the same Manner, but not near so well. They have no Wood for firing, but make Use of Pit Coal, which must be very dear; in the Inns they often burn Reeds or Chaff, of which they have great Plenty.

The Royal Canal, which lies to the North of this City, was frozen up, and on it half a League together, we saw a Row of Barks that seem'd to touch one another. In the Way from Hang-wha-pû we often met with a sort of oblong square Towers or small Brick Platforms of 2 Stories, about 45 Foot high, 50 or 60 long, and 18 or 20 broad; with 7 Pinnacles on one Side, and 3 on the other. Their Villages are for the most Part inclosed with little Mud Walls, with 2 Gates at the End of the Street, and Pagods or little Idol Temples over those Gates.

The 1st of Feb. 4 Leagues from the Place where we lodged, we enter'd the Province of Pe-che-li, passing thro' one End of the Suburbs of King-chew. The Wall of this City seem'd to be of Earth: we saw three Sides of it, which are at right Angles; this makes me believe that it is square, as most of the Chinese Cities are. Within the City we observed an Hexagonal Tower of 12 or 13 Stories, one less than another as they rose, with Windows on each Side of every Story. In the North and South Suburbs there are several of those Towers or little Platforms before mention'd; they are found in most of the Villages, whose Inhabitants make Use of them for securing their Effects in troublesome Times, or when they fear an Irruption from the Robbers. The Houses of these Villages are of Earth mix'd with Straw, and the Roofs almost flat; several of them have a Platform. Province of Pe-che li. City King-chew.

Generally speaking, in all the Road from Ning-po we saw no Buildings worth taking Notice of, except the publick ones, such as Causeys, Dikes, Bridges, Walls of Cities, Triumphal Arches, &c. We lay 5 Leagues from King-chew, at the City Fû-ching-hyen, travelling a very dusty Road. There we heard of the Death of the Empress, Mother to the Emperor of Kang-hi, which happen'd the 27th of the last Month; to conform ourselves to the Customs of the Empire, we immediately took off the Tuft of red Silk, that cover'd our Caps, which is a Sign of Mourning; it is a Ceremony observed throughout the Empire for at least 27 Days, reckoning from the time they receive the News; the Mandarins publish the Order for it, and if any Person fails to obey, he is liable to be punish'd. City Fû ching-hyen.

The 2d of February was the Beginning of the Chinese Year, the first Days of which are Days of Rejoycing in China, much like Carnival Time in Europe; they visit, wish one another a happy New Year, and give publick Demonstrations of Joy by Illuminations and Fireworks. This Day we dined 7 Leagues from Fû-ching, at a large Village; we pass'd, in leaving it, over a fine Bridge of Marble about 20 Feet in Length. The Rails consist of beautiful Tables of Marble, laid along the Ground, about 20 Inches broad and 5 long (s); adorn'd with with Figures in Baſſo-relievo, and Pedeſtals between every two, which ſupport Lions, better cut than any we had ſeen before.

(s) Here seems to be some Mistake, for they ought not to be broader than long.

Road from Ning-po to Pe-king.

There is plenty of Marble in this Province. The Country is level, well cultivated and full of Towns and Villages, where we ſaw a great Number of thoſe Towers or Platforms; ſo that at a Diſtance one would take the Villages for ſo many Fortreſſes. All the Houſes are of Earth, the Roofs flat and cover'd with Straw or Stubble; many of them are flank'd with little ſquare Pavilions. We met on the Road a great Number of Couriers, with little Boxes at their Backs, wrap'd in pieces of yellow Stuff, which is the Imperial Colour: they were carrying without Doubt the News of the Death of the Empreſs into different Parts of the Empire.

City Hien-hyen.

We travell'd 4 or 5 Leagues in the Evening, and having paſs'd near Hyen-hyen, a City about a League in Circumference, (the Walls whereof as well as the Houſes are built with ſquare Tiles inſtead of Bricks) we went and lay at Kye-kya-lin.

City Ho-kyen-fu.

The 3d our Journey was 11 Leagues. After we had advanced about 2 Leagues, we paſs'd by the Walls of the City Ho-kyen-fu, which is ſquare and about 2 Leagues in Compaſs. The Walls and Parapets of Brick are in very good Repair. They are defended by little ſquare Towers at certain Diſtances, with ſmall ſquare Baſtions, which are not above 7 or 8 Fathom in Front.

City Jin-kyew-hyen.

We took up our Lodging at Jin-kyew-hyen another City. The Country appear'd the ſame as the preceding Days, equally level, and well improved. The Towns and Villages are very numerous. Some of them are of a great Length, having Gates at both Avenues, which do not differ from Gates of Cities, with Pagods over them.

We met with, in divers Places, Tables of Marble with Inſcriptions, placed perpendicularly on the Back of a huge Marble Tortoiſe; ſince we left Ning-po we ſaw neither Wood nor Foreſts; all the Land was well cultivated, excepting what was under Water, and a few barren Mountains.

The 4th we departed from Jin-kyew-hyen, which is in form of an oblong Square, and ſeem'd to be about 1400 Paces in Compaſs. Its Walls and Parapets are of Brick, (with Towers at certain Diſtances) more than 30 Foot high. The Houſes, as well as thoſe of the Villages are likewiſe of Brick, and the Roofs of them handſome enough.

Five Leagues from this City we paſs'd thro' a large Borough of great Trade, in the midſt of which is a triumphal Arch, reſembling the two we had ſeen the Evening before at Jin-kyew-hyen. Juſt without this Place a Cauſey begins, and a League beyond, Marſhes; through which is a Cauſey for the Space of 500 Paces: having paſs'd it we found a large Village where there are 3 Wooden Bridges over ſo many Canals.

City Hyong-hyen.

Two Leagues beyond, we paſs'd thro' the City Hyong-hyen, whoſe South Eaſt Suburb is croſs'd by a Canal. The Street was adorn'd with 4 triumphal Arches, whoſe Pillars ſtand on Baſes of white Marble 3 Foot high, compoſed of 4 Stones bound together with Iron Hoops, and faſten'd with Pins of the ſame Metal; moſt commonly the Pillar which is of Wood, is fix'd between theſe 4 Stones, as between the Cheeks of a Preſs. Theſe Pedeſtals inſtead of an Ogee, have a kind of Chapiter of long Leaves, which reſemble Flag or Sword Graſs.

From Hyong-hyen, where we dined, we travell'd 4 Leagues to Pe-kew-ho a great Borough [or Country Town] with Gates at both Ends, and Pagods over them. The Country as uſual was very populous and the Villages grew handſomer; the Houſes are almoſt all cover'd with very thick Tiles placed in form of a Demi-canal.

City Sin-ching-hyen

The 5th, 2 Leagues from this Town we paſs'd ſeveral Canals, and a League farther croſs'd the City Sin-ching-hyen, which is ſquare and not above 12 or 1300 Paces in Compaſs; its Walls are 25 Foot high.

City Tso-chew.

After Dinner we croſs'd Tso-chew thro' the principal Street, which is very broad and lies in a Line. This City is three Miles round, and better peopled than the reſt. The Suburbs on the South and North are very long, the Streets handſome and ſtrait, the Houſes low and of one or two Stories, after the Chineſe Manner. The Proſpect we had on paſſing out of the North Suburb was admirably fine: on the Right was a ſpacious Plain without the leaſt Eminence, or inequality within the reach of Eye; and on the Weſt, a Chain of Mountains, which in all Appearance encompaſs the Province of Pe-che-li to the very Sea; we travell'd by the Side of them, till we came to Pe-king.

We preſently found a Bridge of 9 Arches ſupported by ſquare pieces of Stone, which project ſo as to ſerve inſtead of Steps. The whole Work is ſolid and ſtrong. The Bridge is paved with great ſquare Stones; and the Breaſt Walls or Rails, which are 2 Feet and an half high, conſiſt of large Pannels of white Marble, not well poliſh'd, grooved in Poſts of the ſame, which are 62 on each Side and 4 Foot high. The Pannels in the Middle are above ſix Foot long, but they diminiſh gradually to the Ends of the Bridge. The two ſlopings or aſcents are very eaſy; one of them joins a Cauſey, made of Earth, about 500 Paces long: at the End whereof we found another Bridge like the former, with 34 Poſts on each Side. At the Entrance of it we left on the Right a She-pey, that is a large Marble Stone, placed in a great ſquare Room made of Brick; it ſtands on a Marble Baſis, 2 Foot and an half high, and 4 Paces ſquare. We had ſeen ſeveral of the Kind on the Roads; theſe Monuments at the End of Bridges are erected in Honour of the Perſon or Perſons who have been at Expences to ſerve the Publick, or done ſome illuſtrious Action.

For

For three Days paſt the Soil appear'd more hard and grey than uſual, and we continued to meet an infinite Number of People going backward and forward. We lay 2 Leagues from Tſò-chew, at a great Borrough call'd Lew-li-ho; it has Gates at both ends, and a ſort of Suburbs. We travell'd that Day 12 Leagues. Road from Ning-po to Pe-king.

The 6th, after we had paſs'd the Suburbs, we found a very handſome Bridge about 100 Geometrical Paces in Length, and 20 Feet in Breadth; with 2 great Triumphal Arches at the Ends. The Rails are of large flat Stones, ſome white, others grey, ſupported by ſmall Pillars of the ſame, which very much reſembles Marble; theſe Stones are neatly cut, and adorn'd with variety of Moldings. All along the Rails, there runs a little Bank of Stone in Height 9 or 10 Inches. The Bridge is paved with large handſome flat Stones; after which follows a long Cauſey above 40 Foot broad and 6 or 700 Paces long, paved in the ſame Manner; with two little Bridges on it of the ſame Architecture.

Four Leagues from Lew-li-ho we came to Lyang-hyang-hyen a pretty large City, but the Walls are in bad Condition. One League from thence we ſaw a fine Bridge, the Rails or Side Walls of which are of large handſome white Stones, and the Ends ſuſtain'd by four Figures of Elephants. We ſaw another of them, the great Stones of whoſe Rails were pierced thro' like Baluſters. This Day we travell'd but 3 Leagues, ſtopping at a Village, 8 Leagues from Pe-king, to wait for News from the Fathers of our Society who were at Court; we there received the melancholy Account of the Death of P Ferdinand Verbieſt, which happen'd the 28th of January. The Emperor ſpared nothing to preſerve the Life of this Miſſionary, whom he honour'd with his Favour. He ſent him one of his Prime Phyſicians, who waited cloſe on the Empreſs Dowager, when at the Point of Death; but the Phyſician, after having ſeen the Patient, told his Majeſty, according to the Chineſe Way of ſpeaking, that nine Parts in ten of him were already dead; and in Effect he dyed a few Days after. City Lyang-hyang-hyen. P. Verbieſt's Death.

The 7th, the Miſſionaries at Court ſent an Officer of the Tribunal of Mathematics to conduct us to Pe-king; But none of them came in Perſon as they intended, becauſe they were obliged to obſerve the Chineſe Cuſtom, of mourning for P. Verbieſt. We departed about one of the Clock; the Road was near 20 Fathom broad and often more: but there was ſuch a dreadful Clutter, cauſed by the Multitude of People, Horſes, Mules, Aſſes, Camels, Calaſhes, Litters, and Carts, that it is difficult to deſcribe it.

We paſs'd thro' Lû-kew-kyau, which is 3 Leagues ſhort of Pe-king. It is a little City almoſt ſquare, 1200 Paces in Circuit. Nothing makes a more delightful Appearance; the Walls are exceeding beautiful, it has 2 double Gates with a Place of Arms, and handſome Rooms over them. City Lû-kew-kyau.

We enter'd the City by a Bridge, the fineſt we had yet ſeen: it is above 170 Geometrical Paces in length; the Arches are ſmall, but the Rails or Side Walls are made of a hard whitiſh Stone, reſembling Marble. Theſe Stones are more than 5 Foot long, 3 high, and 7 or 8 Inches thick, ſupported at each End by Pilaſters, adorn'd with moldings, and bearing the Figures of Lions. I reckon'd on one Side only, 147 of theſe Pillaſters. Two little Banks, half a Foot high, and a Foot and an half broad, run along the Rails. The Bridge is paved with great flat Stones, ſo well joined, that it is as even as a Floor. The Walls of the City are very neatly built, and 40 Feet high. The Rampart, which is not very thick, is lined within after the ſame Manner. The Bank or raiſed Way is pretty broad and curiouſly built, as well as the Parapet, whoſe Battlements are very near each other. The Gates are double, with a kind of Advance Wall in this Place: they are high, thick, and well arch'd. Over them is a Building of 2 Stories, with a double Roof, to which they aſcend on each Side by a large Stair Caſe, that looks very graceful. The Road from this City to Pe-king appears like one continued Street, it is ſo throng'd with People.

Four or Five hundred Paces from the Gate of the outward City, we ſtopp'd at the Cuſtom Houſe, where they let our Baggage paſs without ſearching. Mean Time a Perſon opening the Window of my Litter, aſk'd if we were come to pay Tribute to the Emperor. On this Occaſion it may be proper to make ſome Remarks which are of Moment; but to explain them the better, it will be neceſſary to repeat, what I have obſerved elſewhere, that the Chineſe ſuppoſing the Earth to be ſquare, pretend that China takes up the greater Part of it: ſo that, to denote their Empire, they uſe the Word Tyen-hya, that is the under Heaven, this Term is continually in their Mouths; ſo they ſay, Tin pû tyen-hya, that is, this is current throughout China; Te lyan tyen-hya, he has made himſelf Maſter of the Empire.

Prepoſſeſs'd with this rare Syſtem of Geography, they have placed the reſt of Mankind in the Corners of this pretended Square; and conſidering them as Barbarians, think they do them much Honour in reckoning them among their Tributaries. Hence, whatever comes from foreign Kingdoms, whether Letters, Preſents, or Envoys, all paſs as Tribute, and a Mark of Submiſſion; and thenceforward ſuch Kingdoms are ſet down in their Hiſtory among thoſe that are tributary to China. It would be too tedious to enumerate all the Kingdoms which they reckon tributary to them, wherefore I ſhall mention only the principal; Korea is the firſt, next Japan, then come the Moors, in whoſe dominions they put the Kingdom of Sa-ma-eul-han, which probably is Samarkand (s); Pan-ko-la, which muſt be Bengal, for they place it to the

(s) Sa ma lh han, as it is written in the French, is certainly han inſtead of Khân, and want the Letter d. Samarkand; for the Chineſe always expreſs the r by an l, ſay

Eaſt of In-tû, or Indoſtân; laſtly Me-te-na; for Mohammed, who found the Way to be honour'd by ſo many Nations, was not able to keep himſelf out of the Number of the Tributaries of China.

In the Chineſe Geography intitled Quan-yu, you meet with the following Account; Me-te-na (u) is the firſt Kingdom of the Moors (w): Its firſt King named Mo-han-mû-te (x) was a Man of an extraordinary Genius; he reduced all the Kingdoms in the Weſt under his Empire; in the Reign of Min-hivn-te (y) he ſent an Ambaſſador, accompany'd with the People of the Kingdom of Tyen-ſan, to pay Tribute.

Whence it is evident, the Princes of Europe ought to be cautious how they ſend Letters or Preſents, either by the Miſſionaries, the Merchants, or any other Way in their own Name; for, the Moment they do, their Kingdoms will be regiſtred among the Tributaries. The Ruſſians had a great Struggle to get this Term changed in their Favour; and altho' it was changed, yet the Embaſſy was conſidered as a Tender of Homage. The ſame Cuſtom prevails in all other Parts of the Indies; where the Perſon, who carries his Princes Letter, is look'd on as his Ambaſſador. Not that the Indians really believe them to be ſuch, but they will have it ſo, to flatter their own Vanity: whence often they take Occaſion to deſpiſe the Majeſty of the Kings of Europe, with whom their Princes cannot compare. City of Pe-king deſcribed.

For a League before we arrived at Pe-king, the Country was cover'd with little Groves of pretty tall young Trees, incloſed with Walls made of Earth, which are ſo many Burying Places. About 4 of the Clock we enter'd Pe-king, by a Gate, which is double, (as all the reſt belonging to this City are,) and cover'd with thin Iron Plates, faſten'd on with ſeveral Rows of very large Nails. The Walls are 30 or 35 Feet high, with ſquare Towers at convenient Diſtances. The Street we enter'd was between 45 and 50 Feet broad, and as ſtrait as a Line. We paſs'd along for above half a League, thro' an incredible Number of People, yet we did not ſee one Woman, altho' they are more numerous here than the Men. Every now and then we met with Jugglers, ſurrounded by 50 or 60 Men, crouded upon one another; the Throngs were ſo great in every Part of this vaſt and long Street, that one would have concluded they were Fairs or ſome publick Aſſemblies.

This Street extended ſtill beyond the Reach of Eye, when we turn'd ſhort into another large ſtraight Street on the Left, almoſt as broad and crouded as the former. In both theſe Streets the Houſes are low, conſiſting only of a Ground Floor, and have nothing to attract the Sight, excepting the Shops of Merchants, which for Neatneſs, and perhaps Riches, excell moſt in Europe; the Entrance into theſe Shops is adorn'd with Gildings, Sculptures, Paintings, and Japannings, in a Manner which charms the Eye.

At the End of this Street we enter'd into the 2d Incloſure, or more properly the 2d City, which is call'd the Tartar City. The Gate at this Place alſo is double; the Wall is very neat and new built, with ſquare Towers, the Sides of which are above 7 or 8 Fathom in Breadth, and the Front yet broader. The 2d or inner Gate, has a large Edifice built over it with a double Roof, cover'd with japann'd Tiles. It conſiſts of 2 Stories, whereof the lowermoſt, which juts forward, is embelliſh'd with Paintings and carved Works. The Part of the advance-wall, which anſwers to the Gate, has likewiſe an Edifice erected over it, larger than the former; it is four Stories high, with 12 little ſquare Windows in each, which makes a very handſome Appearance at the Entrance of the Street of the firſt City.

As we had paſs'd theſe 2 Gates, we found on the Right Hand the Houſe of the Portugueſe Jeſuits, which is over-againſt and near the Rampart. It has a double Entrance; going in by one of them we paſs'd thro' three little Gates pretty neatly made, into a ſquare, regular Court, which leads to the Church; on each Side of the Entrance there is a very handſome ſquare Tower, the Tops of which are made in form of an Obſervatory; in that on the Right hand there is a very fine Organ, and in the other a Clock with ſeveral Bells.

At the Beginning of the Chineſe Year, all the Inhabitants of Pe-king croud ſo to ſee theſe Curioſities, that the Court is never empty from Morning till Night. During this Time the Organ plays, and the Clock is ſet a chiming; and many of thoſe who enter the Church inform themſelves about the Myſteries which are there repreſented by the Paintings, for there is a Cathechiſt attending all Day long to explain them: ſo that Curioſity is always the Means of making ſome Converts to the Faith.

(u) Me-te-na is evidently Medina in Arabia, or, as it is call'd by the Arabs, Medinat al Nabi, that is, the City of the Prophet, meaning Mohammed.

(w) By the Moors muſt be underſtood the Mohammedans in general, who are ſo called by a corrupt Uſe of the Word.

(y) Orig. Min-hiuen-te; others for Hiuen write Hiven and Huen. This ſeems to be the ſame with Hivn-tſong, 6th Emperor of the Dynaſty of Tang, who began his Reign in the Year 712 after Chriſt; but Mohammed had been dead above 80 Years before.

(z) Here, I fear, the European Vanity is ſtrain'd as much as the Indian; for certainly the grandeur of the Oriental Princes, eſpecially the Emperors of China, is not to be equalled by any thing on this Side of the World.

The

The JOURNEY of P. Fontaney, from Pe-king to Kyang-chew, in the Province of Shan-ſi; and from thence to Nan-king in the Province of Kyang-nan.

THE 30th of March 1688, we ſet out from Pe-king for Kyang-chew, which is 18 eaſy Days Journey. I hired Mules for 12 Francs each, out of which the Muleteer was obliged to maintain both himſelf and them; I lay at Tew tyen, a Country Town, 80 Li (*) from Pe-king. Road from Pe-king to Kyang-chew.

The 31ſt I paſs'd thro' Tſo-chew, where I took the Road of Shan-ſi; it is incredible what prodigious Multitudes of People there are on the Road; the Streets of our beſt Cities in Europe are not ſo throng'd. We rode 8 Leagues to get to Ting-hing-hyen. This City is ſquare, about 500 Paces long from North to South, and 400 broad from Eaſt to Weſt; its Walls are of Earth, and the Battlements of Brick.

A little before we came to the Village of Pe-kew, which is 20 Li farther, we croſs'd a River over a Wooden Bridge cover'd with Earth; it runs Eaſtward and rolls along a great Quantity of Sand with its Tide. Theſe Roads, which are always crouded, are very broad, and planted with Trees on both Sides from Pe-king, with Walls to cover and preſerve the Country. In leſs than the Space of a League we met with two or three Villages, not to mention thoſe which appear on all Sides in the Plain; in one of them I ſaw Puppets, which were made to ſpeak, and differ'd in nothing from thoſe of Europe, but in their Dreſs.

The 1ſt of April I went from Pe-kew to Kû-chin-tyen, a great Borough, 30 Li diſtant to the South-Weſt by Weſt; in the Way we found 3 Villages. Thence to Pay-ta-fû, where there is a great Tower on the Left Hand, 20 Li, with 2 Villages between. 10 Li farther we came to Gan-ſû-hyen; we paſs'd thro' this City, which meaſures 350 Paces from Eaſt to Weſt, and 400 from North to South; its Walls are of Earth, and the Battlements of Brick. At the Entrance of the Suburbs we ſaw a Stone Bridge, without Rails or Side Walls, over a ſmall Brook.

From Gan-ſû to Sû-ho are 40 Li. Going out of this Town, we paſs'd over a handſome Bridge of 3 Arches, and 20 Poſts on each Side, built with rough Marble. Thence to the City Pau-ting-fû, where reſides the Governor of the Province of Pe-che-li, 10 Li; it is nearly ſquare, and above 4,000 Paces in Circumference. We left it on the Left Hand, and over-againſt the Corner of the Wall found a fine Bridge with 3 Arches, of greyiſh Marble, built over a ſmall River, form'd by 2 little Brooks; one of which comes from the Weſt, and the other from the North. Our Courſe by Eſtimation was South-Weſt. The Road is very handſome, planted with Trees like a Garden Walk, and crouded with inconceiveable Numbers of People. City Pau-ting-fû.

The 2d we went directly Eaſt about 10 Li to Ta-ſye-pû, a Village, leaving on the Right, a little before we came to it, a ſmall Tower in the Plain: 10 Li thence to another Borough named Ta-ki-tyen, where there are 3 ſmall Stone Bridges; and 10 more South-Weſt to another Borough; 10 Li farther to Kin-yan-i; and from thence to Tan-ſhun-kyau, a great Country Town, in the middle of which there is a handſome Bridge of one Arch, 30 Li; 30 Li farther we paſs'd thro' the City King-tû-hyen, which is not ſquare, and no more than 1200 Paces in Circuit; the Walls reſemble thoſe of other Cities. On leaving it we ſaw a beautiful Triumphal Arch of white Marble, adorn'd with 4 Lions. Thence to Tſin-fong-tyen a great Borough, where I lay, are 20 Li. City King-tû-hyen.

In this Days Journey from Pau-ting I paſs'd by 15 or 16 Cities, Boroughs, and Villages, which are full of Inns, for lodging that ſurprizing Number of People which throngs the Roads. About 10 or 15 Li beyond Pau-ting, the Road is raiſed on both Sides with pretty broad Banks, ſo that the Space betwixt forms a ſort of Canal, which is plaſhy in ſome Places. As it is ſtrait, wide, and level, with Trees planted on both Sides, it affords beautiful Avenues to the Villages, that one meets with every Mile and an half. In ſome Places the Trees are at full Growth, in others but of one or two Years ſtanding; whence it is probable, theſe Avenues were ruin'd during the Wars, yet they have a fine Effect upon the Eye; beſides, very lovely, well cultivated Plains preſented themſelves on all Hands; however, there are ſo few Trees in this Country, that it appear'd often like a vaſt Sea. One is alſo agreeably deceived in the Parts where the Proſpect is bounded by Trees, which make the Country look as if it was overflow'd, or ſome great Lake; the thickneſs of the Vapours reflecting Light enough to create a Whiteneſs reſembling that of Water at a Diſtance. But to produce this Phenomenon, the Horizon muſt be terminated by opaque Bodies, ſuch as Trees, otherwiſe the faint reflected Light will be overpower'd by that which ſheds a greater Luſtre; it may alſo be ſaid, that the Shadows of theſe Trees appear in the Vapours, which therefore ſeem to be thick enough to produce the ſame Effect as a Looking-Glaſs.

The 3d we advanced 10 Li (1) South-Weſt to a Village, then 10 Li South-Weſt by South to another, after which we croſs'd a little River over a Wooden Bridge cover'd with Earth; thence 10 Li South-Weſt to Ting-chew, a City as big at leaſt as Pau-ting; after having paſs'd thro' 4 Villages, I came to Min-ywe-tyen a great Borough, where I dined, 60 Li from Tſin-fong- City Ting-chew.

(1) In the French it is 10 Leagues, which muſt be an Error of the Preſs or Copy.

tyen, the Courſe always South-Weſt by South; three Li beyond, our Courſe was Weſt-South-Weſt, and at the End of 3 or 4 more it changed to South-Weſt by Weſt.

Road from Pe-king to Kyang-chew.

City Sin-lo-hyen.

Thirty Li from Ting-chew we came to Sin-lo-hyen, a little City almoſt ſquare, not above 1200 Paces in Compaſs; we then paſs'd 3 wooden Bridges cover'd with Earth, over a ſmall River that runs North Eaſt, and which, when the Waters riſe, overflows the Country for 3 or 4 Li; after croſſing a few Villages and a Stone Bridge with 18 Poſts on each Side, we arrived at Fi-chin-i, a great Borough, where there is an Imperial Poſt-Houſe, (as the Word i denotes,) 45 Li diſtant from Sin-lo.

Imperial Poſt Houſe.

The great Road lies between two ſmall Canals, whoſe earthen Walls ſerve inſtead of Banks; it is of Gravel, about 100 Foot wide, the fineſt and moſt agreeable any where to be met with.

City Ching-ting-fû.

The 4th we travell'd 60 Li South-Weſt by South to Ching-ting-fû, a City near 4000 Paces in Circumference; its Figure is a long Square and the Walls handſome; we paſs'd along a Skirt of it at leaſt 3 Li, running South-Weſt; from the Corner to the Gate I reckon'd 17 ſquare Towers.

Six or ſeven Li thence, we croſs'd the Hû-to-Ho, a River 200 Paces broad; it comes from the Weſt, and runs South-Eaſt; its Waters are muddy like thoſe of Whang-ho. Beyond this River the great Road divides, one part leads towards the Provinces of Se-chwen, Yun-nan, Ho-nan, &c. the other to thoſe of Shan-ſi and Shen-ſi, which laſt was the Road we took; as it belongs to ſo many Provinces it is no wonder to find ſuch a prodigious Number of Paſſengers on it.

City Ho-lû-hyen.

I took up my Lodging at Ho-lû-hyen, a very populous City, 1400 Paces in Circuit, and about 40 Li from Ching-ting. It lies behind a Hill, which we paſs'd before we came to it; from the Top we diſcover'd the moſt charming Country imaginable, as ſmooth as Glaſs to the Foot of the Mountains, whereon there are neither Trees nor Buſhes. The Suburbs of Ho-lû-hyen are large in Compariſon of the City, where there are Manufactures of Iron and Earthen Ware.

The 5th I enter'd the Mountains, and having gone 40 Li to the Weſt-South-Weſt, dined at Zhu-chwi-pû (1) a large Borogh on the Eaſtern Bank of a River, which we croſs'd by a Bridge; on the other Side of the Town we found another handſome Bridge of one Arch, over a River that runs here Northwards, which having croſs'd, we found 3 more little Stone Bridges over ſo many Torrents. We travell'd along the River, having it on the Left, and at the End of 15 Li, paſs'd it over a Bridge like the former, and 15 Li farther arrived at Chin-king-hyen.

This City is 1200 Paces in Compaſs, ſeated on a little Hill; the Walls, which are of Brick, are fair, excepting the part on the Hill, which is of Earth; the lower part only is inhabited, and the Suburbs are better than the City itſelf. We left it on the Right, and travelling 25 Li farther, came to lodge at He-taw-tyen, a Town in the Mountains, which are indifferently high. The Road is rugged, ſo that one is always either aſcending, deſcending, or turning; we ſaw an aſtoniſhing Multitude of Aſſes and Mules, loaded with Earthen Ware, ground Bark for making Paſtils, Cotton, Silk, Skins, and eſpecially wrought Iron, which comes from Lû-ngan-fû, a City of Shan-ſi; on the River by which we travell'd, we ſaw ſeveral Mills, for grinding the Bark whereof they make the Paſtils.

Thirty Li from Ho-lû, after having paſs'd thro' the Borough of Chan-ngan, we croſs'd a Hill above 100 Paces in height; on the Top whereof is a Pagod; we advanced on 2 great inclining Plains, pav'd with Stone; nothing is to be ſeen on all Sides but Hills without Valleys, but they are low and cultivated to the very Top; to prevent the Rains from waſhing down the Earth, as well as to detain the Water, they are cut into Terraſſes, ſupported by dry Walls, built with the Stones wherewith the Ground was cover'd; we ſaw whole Families of Chineſe, which dwelt in Grots, for China has its Troglodytes, as well as Egypt; in ſhort, every Place is as populous as can be. We ſaw neither Trees nor Shrubs on the Mountains; the few Herbs and Briars which they produce are quickly pluck'd up to feed the Cattle, and ſupply the Lime-Kilns, which are very numerous along the River. Our Courſe was South-Weſt by Weſt.

The 6th, having gone 40 Li, we came to a Village, where there is a Cuſtom Houſe. I was diſcharged by ſending a Viſiting Letter, without having my Baggage ſearch'd. The Province of Pe-che-li ends here, and that of Shan-ſi begins. The Village is ſhut up by 2 great Stone Arches, which croſs the Road that lies between ſteep Hills. Here we ſaw a Wall, which running over the Mountains as well as Valleys, croſſes the Road alſo; I know not how far it extends, not being able to ſee either End; it is of Stone, rough-hewn but firmly laid, and is flank'd at proper Diſtances with ſquare Brick Towers, which ſeem'd as intire as if newly built. The Wall including the Battlements might be 10 or 12 Foot high, and 3 or 4 thick; ſome Parts of it are fallen down, ſome want only the Pinnacles, and others are ſtill entire. The Height is equal throughout, ſo that when they ſay it is 100 Feet and more, they include the Hills.

Twenty Li from the Cuſtom Houſe, I came to Pe-chin-i, a great Borough, where I dined. 5 Li beyond, we enter'd a Road 10 Paces broad, between pretty ſteep Hills, which are about

60 Paces in perpendicular. Having travell'd 50 Li, I came to Ping-ting-chew, a City about 2,000 Paces in Circumference. The North part ſtanding on a little Hill is waſte, the reſt is very populous: the Suburb to the Weſt is large. In croſſing the City, we paſs'd thro' a Street 300 Geometrical Paces long: I reckon'd 25 Triumphal Arches there, ſome are of Wood with Stone Baſes, others are all of Stone; ſeveral of them are very handſome. In the Weſt Suburb we ſaw 6 more. This City is ſituated in a Plain amidſt the Mountains. Two Leagues before we came to it, the Road began to be very good. The Tops of the Mountains are till'd with Oxen. We ſaw Villages conſiſting of Grots or Caverns, dug on Purpoſe; being very neat Chambers 20 Feet long, and 10 or 12 broad. I paſs'd thro' 14 Villages without reckoning thoſe at the Beginning and End of the Stage; the Courſe South-Weſt by Weſt.

Road from Pe-king to Kyang-chew.

City Ping-ting-chew.

The 7th leaving Ping-ting, we ſtruck Northwards, aſcending gradually for 7 or 8 Li till we came to a Village, after which we found a Deſcent, which was pretty ſteep, and at the Foot of it another Village; for 15 Li our Courſe was North-Weſt. At the End of 23 Li we paſs'd a Brook, that runs Eaſtward; at 25 Li we found a Village where we turn'd Weſt-North-Weſt; at 40 Li another Village, and advanced Weſt-South-Weſt, for 2 Li; afterwards North-Weſt 12 Li, then 6 Li Weſt to Sin-tyen, 60 Li from Ping-ting.

From Sin-tyen where I dined, I rode 4 Li Weſt, then 6 Li Weſt-North-Weſt to a Village: 14 Li farther I paſs'd a Brook which comes from the North, and falls into that by the Side whereof I travell'd. 20 Li thence to a Borough, and 4 Li beyond we aſcended a very ſteep Hill. There the Stony Road which was very troubleſome to us ends. The Top of this Hill, as well as all thoſe about it, is extremely well cultivated, and cut in Terraſſes which are continued to the Bottom, and make a very agreeable Proſpect.

From thence we had an eaſy Deſcent Weſtward to the City Shew-yang-hyen, 40 Li from Sin-tyen; one Li before we enter'd the Suburb we ſaw on the Left a Tower 300 Paces from the great Road beyond the Valley, where the River along which I rode, runs. This Diſtrict is full of Towns and Hamlets. We left the City to the Right; it is above 1500 Paces in Compaſs, and its Walls are in very good Repair.

City Shew-yang-hyen.

The 8th I advanced 45 Li Weſt-North-Weſt: and at a Village 40 Li farther left the Road leading to Tay-ywen-fu, the Capital of Shan-ſi, and took that for Pin-yang-fu, which runs South-Weſt by South. 33 Li from that Diviſion the Hills end, which were always well cultivated, and ſtored with Hamlets; but full of Precipices, form'd either by the Torrents, carrying away the Mold, or what is more likely, by Earthquakes, which happen pretty frequently in thoſe Parts, for many times I ſaw large Cavities encompaſſed in ſuch a Manner that the Water could neither get in nor out.

Earthquakes.

One Thing extraordinary I remark'd in ſeveral Parts of this Province, that there is Earth or Mold for 4 or 500 Feet deep without the leaſt Stone, which contributes not a little to the Fertility of the Soil. I came to lie at Wan-hu-ching, after having travell'd 120 Li over the Hills. In the Morning every thing was frozen and even the ſmalleſt River; ſo that the Cold was very piercing, yet the Evening was exceeding hot. After quitting thoſe Hills, we enter'd into a very fine, even, and populous Plain; here the Mountains form a ſpacious Hollow, leaving a large Opening between the Weſt and South-Weſt: they are 4 Leagues diſtant on the Weſt Side, and ſomewhat leſs on the South-Weſt.

The 9th, our Courſe was South-Weſt by Weſt. Advancing 6 or 7 Li, we left on the South to the City Yu-tſi-hyen; it has 4 Gates and ſeems to be ſquare. Having gone 12 Li we came to a Borough incloſed with Walls of Earth, where we croſs'd a Brook, which runs Weſtward. At the End of 15 Li we paſs'd another Brook running Weſtward likewiſe; thence 11 Li to a Village, Weſt-South-Weſt; 10 Li farther to a Brook that runs North-wards; 7 Li beyond, to a Village, after which our Courſe was Weſt-South-Weſt. Three Li thence, to a River which we croſs'd over a Wooden Bridge cover'd with Earth; it runs firſt to the Weſt, and preſently turns Northwards. 6 Li farther, to a Village, and then 8 Li more South Weſt, to Syu-kyu-hyen, where I dined after travelling 60 Li that Morning.

City Syu-kyu-hyen.

This City extends from North to South about 400 Paces, and leſs than 200 from Eaſt to Weſt. The Walls are of Brick and very handſome: thoſe which incloſe its Suburbs are of Earth, with Brick Battlements. Having travell'd 45 Li farther and paſs'd thro' ſeveral Villages, I came to lodge at Kya-lin. Theſe Villages are ſo many little Cities, and ſome of them are of more Value than ſeveral Hyen: this joined to the Beauty of the Country, which is as level as a Bowling Green, and the Groves of Trees wherewith the Villages are ſurrounded, makes a moſt agreeable Landſkip. In ſeveral Parts of this Plain, within the Compaſs of a Mile and half round, we ſaw 12 Villages at once; and taking in thoſe farther off, we could reckon 20, each of which had ſeveral pretty high Towers.

The 10th I made 15 Li South-Weſt to Ki-hyen, lying on the Left. I paſs'd thro' the Weſt Suburb, which is large and incloſed with Walls of Earth; thoſe of the City are of Brick and very fair, with Guard Houſes and Towers at convenient Diſtances. It may be 12 or 1500 Paces in Compaſs. Travelling afterwards South-Weſt by South we paſs'd thro' ſeveral Villages; at the End of 42 Li we ſaw to the Left a very beautiful Temple dedicated to Yu-whan-ſhan-ti; thence Weſt-South-Weſt to U-li-chwan a large Village or Town where I dined 60 Li from the place whence I ſet out.

Ten Li farther I paſs'd by Pin-yau-hyen on the Left Hand, a fair City 1,500 or 2,000 Paces in Circuit. It is ſquare; its Walls which are of Brick, are very fine, and flank'd with City Pin-yau-hyen.

Towers at proper Diſtances; I counted 30, and between every two, 22 Battlements; there are 4 Gates, one in the Middle of each of the 4 Fronts of the Wall.

Our Courſe afterwards was South-Weſt. Having travell'd 60 Li and paſs'd thro' ſeveral large Towns, I lay at Chan-ſiwen; the Road was crouded with People who raiſed a dreadful Duſt that was extremely troubleſome. For theſe two laſt Days the Land appear'd more fat, black and tough than uſual, and the Villages had fewer Towers; bet to make Amends moſt of them were incloſed by Walls of Earth, with Brick Battlements, and often thick double Gates cover'd with Iron Plates faſten'd by great Nails.

City Kyay-hyew-hyen. The 11th, at the End of 14 Li we ſaw a fair Pagod on the Left Hand, our Courſe Weſt South Weſt; 6 Li farther to Kyay-hyew-hyen, a fair populous City; we paſs'd thro' the North Suburb, which is a ſecond City encompaſs'd with Walls; 10 Li from thence Weſt-South-Weſt, we found a Bridge and Pagod; and 10 farther another Bridge on the Left, with two wall'd Villages, 100 Paces from the Road, which might be taken for Cities. There we River Fwen-ho. turn'd South-Weſt along a ſmall River on the Right Hand, call'd Fwen-ho, which riſes in the Territory of Tay-yuen-fu; its Waters are yellow and muddy, like thoſe of the Yellow River. Here the Mountains begin again, I travell'd however thro' a Valley 1,000 or 1,500 Paces broad; 10 Li farther we came to a large Village, and when we left it advanced South-South-Weſt; oppoſite to it on the Right was a fair Stone Bridge over the Fwen-ho of 12 ſmall Arches; preſently after on the Left a Pagod and two Villages built on little Hills. In ſhort, having rode in all 60 Li and paſs'd ſeveral big Villages, I dined in a large Burough; and 20 City Ling-ſhe-hyen. Li farther arrived at Ling-ſhe-hyen. This City takes up almoſt the whole Breadth of the Valley, altho' it does not exceed 300 Paces in Length from North to South, and 150 in Breadth from Eaſt to Weſt; we left it to the Right, being waſh'd by the Fwen-ho on the Weſt Side.

Ten Li from the City Southward there is a Village on the Right Hand ſtanding on a riſing Ground, at the Foot of which we paſs'd; there we quitted the Fwen-ho, which runs Weſtward into a Valley, and leaving on the South-Eaſt the Channel of a Torrent, which is broad and very ſtony, began to aſcend a Hill, that ſeem'd to be about 100 Paces higher than the Surface of the Fwen-ho; the Way up was rugged, and at Top we found a Hamlet, 20 Li from where we ſet out: from whence deſcending 5 Li, we came to a Pagod, where there is a large ſtone Arch over a Torrent; afterwards we aſcended for 5 Li, and then deſcended to Yin-i where I lay, 40 Li from Ling-ſhe-hyen. We met an infinite Number of People on the Road; the Wind was ſo high as ſometimes to hinder my Mule from advancing, and the Duſt ſo darken'd the Sky, that at Noon we ſaw no better than if there had been a thick Fog. All the Hills, whichare of Earth, are improved to the very Top and cut in Teraſſes; the Cavities and Precipices are equally well cultivated; for the laſt 30 Li, our Courſe was South-South-Weſt.

The 12th I rode 3 or 4 Li South-Weſt by Weſt. Afterwards I paſs'd a Mountain, advancing South South Eaſt; on the Top there is a Village, 15 Li from Yin-i, from whence we deſcended Southward 10 Li: then our Courſe was Weſtward; 23 Li farther at the Foot of the Mountain we found a Pagod; here we enter'd a Valley above 600 Paces wide, waſh'd on the Right Side by the Fwen-ho. After having travell'd this Mourning 60 Li I came to City Cho-chew. dine at Cho-chew on the ſame River. At the Entrance of the City, which is 200 Paces from Eaſt to Weſt, and 400 from North to South, we paſs'd a Brook over a little ſtone Bridge, on the Left of which we ſaw an Ox caſt in Iron. From thence our Courſe was full South, where we ſaw a Pagod, then we aſcended a Mountain; at the End of 36 Li we ſaw another Pagod on the Left, and found a charming Plain on the Top of the Mountain, which we deſcended, after we had gone 5 Li farther, our Courſe being South-South-Weſt. Then we enter'd into a Valley like the former, where we found the Fwen-ho, which we kept always on our Right.

City Chau-ching-hyen. At length having travell'd 60 Li, I came to lodge at Chau-ching-hyen. The Extent of this City from North to South is 300 Paces and 200 from Eaſt to Weſt; it is very populous. I ſaw there a fine Triumphal Arch of well cut Stone. The Road was always crouded with People, and the Land extremely well cultivated. In theſe Mountains, there are Coal Pits, where they are at work continually; the horrible Caverns which we ſaw were probably form'd by the Ground falling into the exhauſted Mines; however from the Top of any of theſe Mountains there is a charming Proſpect over the vaſt Numbers of others that lye round it, all terraſs'd and cover'd in Spring with a beautiful Green; on ſome of the Precipices there are ſcarce 3 or 4 Paces left for the Road.

The 13th we advanced Southward; 3 Li from the City we croſs'd a little River which falls into the Fwen-ho, after which we paſs'd by a Village on the Left. A Li farther, our Courſe was South Weſt, and 6 Li thence, we came to another Village, where we went up a little Hill; and 8 Li beyond it, to a large Village, where we deſcended into a fine Plain. At the Bottom of this Deſcent there is a handſome ſtone Bridge of 3 Arches over a Brook; 5 Li before we City Hong-tong-hyen. came to it, our Courſe began South-South-Weſt. After we had paſs'd ſome Villages and a fair Bridge 18 Paces long, always following the Fwen-ho, we arrived at Hong-tong-hyen, 12 Li farther. This City is 1800 Paces in Compaſs; we croſs'd it, and at the North-Weſt Angle, found a Pagod with an Obeliſk; for 4 Miles together it ſeems to be one continued Town, lying along the Hill; this Plain, which is 40 Feet lower than the former, is at leaſt a Mile broad to the River.

Fair Bridge. Departing from the City we croſs'd a fine Bridge of 17 Arches, 60 Paces in Length; the Piers are of Free Stone, faſten'd together with large iron Keys; the Buttreſſes are thick and ſtrong, ſupporting Figures of different Animals, couchant in projecture, and faſten'd by round Barrs of Iron, 3 Inches thick, among which are ſome Lions Whelps; it is paved with large ſquare Stones, placed on Beams. At a Village 3 Li from Hong-tong we turn'd to the South-Weſt by Weſt; 10 Li thence we found a great Borough on the Right; 17 farther another, leaving which we ſaw a fine ſtone Bridge of 3 Arches, over a large Brook. I paſs'd two other Villages, and two Bridges over the Fwen-ho. Road from Kyang-chew to Nan-king.

Twenty Li beyond I dined at a great Borough, where I ſaw a fine ſtone Bridge of 7 Arches, with Rails or Side Walls, conſiſting of ſtone Pannels, grooved into the Poſts, and adorn'd with Baſſo-relievo's, Chineſe Characters, and 4 great Lions at the Corners; it is about 60 Paces in Length.

Ten Li farther is the City Pin-yang-fû, above 4 Miles in Circumference, where there is a Wooden Bridge over the Fwen-ho. Thence our Courſe was South-Weſt; after I had rode 20 Li, and paſs'd ſome Villages, I came to Tſyang-leng-hyen; at the Entrance of this City, which is very populous, there is a Bridge with Rails or Side Walls cover'd with a Roof, ſupported by Wooden Pillars. City Pin-yang-fû. City Tſyang-leng-hyen.

I travell'd all the Day in very pleaſant and even Plains, tho' on different Levels; there is not an Inch of them uncultivated. Every thing here appear'd green, which I had not obſerved any where elſe; this no doubt was owing to the Multitude of Brooks, which deſcend on both Sides of the Hills, whoſe Waters are ſo well managed that every Body is ſupply'd with them.

Theſe Hills afford a very beautiful Landſkip, being ſtored with Corn, Pulſe, Trees, and Villages, the Number of which is ſurprizing. As the Corn is ſown in Beds, all this Part of the Country looks like a Garden; here I ſaw many of thoſe Trees, call'd Tſay-tſe (A), its Flower is yellow, and yields an Oyl uſed for Lamps. After paſſing the Fwen-ho, we found Rice ſow'd on its Sides, which are marſhy; the Road was every where crouded with People, and the Plains cover'd with Husbandmen ſowing Pulſe. The Tree Tſay-tſe.

The 14 our Courſe was South-Weſt by South; after we had rode 37 Li, in a Country like the former, I paſs'd a Bridge of five handſome ſtone Arches, over a Torrent that runs between 2 large Villages; there is a wooden Triumphal Arch at each End. Three Li farther we came to a three-arch'd Bridge, and 20 beyond that to the City of Tay-ping-hyen; it is ſmall, and not very populous, but has a pretty large Suburb. A little before we got to it, I ſaw a Bridge cover'd with a Roof, which bears the Name of the flying Rain-Bow; it is a great Lattice of Timber, ſupported by wooden Arches, placed on a Bank of Stone, built over two ſtone Arches that are next the Land; the Chineſe admire the Contrivance of it, and for that Reaſon, perhaps, have given it that whimſical Name; it is 7 or 8 Paces long, and was made by a ſkilful Carpenter. City Tay-ping-hyen. Remarkable Bridge.

Seven Li from Tay-ping we found another ſtone Bridge; after which our Courſe was South Weſt, as far as Kyang-chew, where I lodged. This City is 3254 Paces in Circumference, ſituate on the right Side of the Fwen-ho; it has but two Gates, becauſe one part of it ſtands on a riſing Ground. From Pe-king hither I made the beſt Uſe I could of a good Mariner's Compaſs, to mark the Bearings. City Kyang-chew.

At Pin-yang-fû I left the great Road which leads to the Province of Shen-ſi. I have ſaid nothing of the Inns that are upon it, becauſe they are like thoſe which I have deſcribed in the Journal from Ning-po to Pe-king (B). The Houſes deſign'd for the Reception of the Mandarins, call'd Kong-quan, have nothing remarkable; it is much if on their Journey they find Neceſſaries, but they have their own Servants, who buy and cook every thing according to their Liking.

The 5th of May I ſet out from Kyang-chew for Nan-king; that City ſtands, as I ſaid, on a riſing Ground, the River runs below in a fine well cultivated Plain, which bears Corn. I paſs'd it over a wooden Bridge, my Litter being carry'd on the Shoulders of Men, (who wait for that Purpoſe) inſtead of the Mules, which they took out; perhaps becauſe the Bridge is narrow and weak. The Chriſtians accompany'd me to the River Side, where they had ſet a Table, with a Collation, according to the Cuſtom of the Country, to take their Farewell of me; I juſt taſted of their Wine, that they might not think I ſlighted their Civility. The Author's Journey to Nan-king.

The 6th I dined at I-chin-hyen (C), 50 Li diſtant, our Courſe Eaſt. I paſs'd thro' 5 Villages, ſome of which were encompaſs'd with Walls of Earth, but thoſe of the laſt are of Brick. Going out of it, I paſs'd along a hollow Road, where ſeveral Carts meeting ſtopp'd. The Chineſe never fall into a Paſſion on ſuch Occaſions, but quietly aſſiſt one another. I had the Mountains always on the Right.

I-chin is in the Diſtrict of Pin-yang-fû; the Walls are of Earth, with brick Parapets; the whole Country is cultivated, and near the City we ſaw ſeveral Sepulchres. We could get no Meat to buy at I-chin, the Mandarin thereof having forbidden the Selling any, in Hopes to obtain Rain, by that Sort of Faſt; the Chineſe at this time eat nothing but Rice, Pulſe, and ſuch things as had not Life; the Mandarins have Poultry in their Houſes, which they cauſe to be dreſs'd: yet after all, Fleſh is ſold privately; for at Kyang-chew, where the ſame Prohibition was publiſh'd, we had Meat enough, and as cheap as at other times. I continued City I-chin.

Road from Kyang-chew to Nan-king.

here the rest of the Day, because there was no Possibility of getting that Night to the Place where we should have lodged, on account of the bad Weather.

The 7th travelling 40 Li East-South-East, I came to dine at a large Village. 3 Quarters of a Mile beyond I-chin, we enter'd the Hills, which are all of good Mold; the Ascent is rugged, every scrap of them is cultivated, and sown, not excepting the very Precipices; beyond them is a cultivated Plain full of Villages and Trees. Here sometimes we beheld Terrasses one above another, consisting of 4 or 5 Feet of till'd Earth; it appear'd that the Chinese had sown Corn even on the Tops of the Hills. We found crouds of People on this Road, and saw Mountains to the West, South and East, which form a Semicircle.

I went 40 Li farther South-East, to lodge at a Borough named Wan-chay; one League from Lew-hû (D) we had other Hills to pass, which are stony, and the Country uncultivated, excepting in certain Valleys; a League farther we climbed another, the Descent of which was so steep, that I was forced to walk. I met with several Asses and Mules, carrying Earthen Kettles of the Colour of Iron; all this Country is poor, and the Road difficult.

Earthen Ware.

The 8th I dined at a Hamlet 40 Li distant [from Wan-chay] to the South-East, always advancing in a Valley between Hills, the Way being stony but perfectly even. I pass'd thro' a Hyen, named Tsin-shwi (E), it is a small City with brick Walls. Leaving it we found two Towers, one on the right, the other on the left Hand, on the Tops of the two highest Mountains; likewise some Hamlets along the Road; Dinner was served up in Dishes of Earthen Ware, but not near so fine as the Dutch.

City Tsin-shwi-hyen.

At the End of this City we climbed up a Mountain, where we met with some Hamlets. It is an Hours very difficult Journey, Carts can neither ascend nor descend it. In some Places the Road is so narrow, that they run a Risk of falling down the Precipices; these Parts are uncultivated.

Afterwards the Road was even, the Lands were tilled, and we pass'd by 2 or 3 Villages; we were however in a sort of Valley, for on both Sides we beheld the Tops of other Mountains higher than that we were on. I lay at Lew-tswen, a pretty tolerable Borough; the Houses there were of Brick; our Course was South, the Distance 40 Li.

The 9th I dined at a little Village, the Distance 40 Li, Course South South East. I pass'd 3 Villages and some Hamlets; in one of which, call'd Yi-chin, they make those Iron colour'd Earthen Kettles mention'd before. The Road was even, and thro' a close Valley, whence the Tops of the Mountains appear'd only like Hillocks.

This Valley is stony, yet every where cultivated and planted with shady Trees: a Brook runs thro' the middle of it, among the Flints, sufficient to water both the Cattle and Land. At the End of it the Men and Horses ascend a very rugged Hill, Calashes and Litters continuing their Way in the Valley by the Side of it, above a Mile and an half farther; in which Space we pass'd 2 Villages, in the first whereof abundance of those Earthen Kettles are made. Having pass'd the 2d, I was obliged to clamber up a very steep Road; the Lands on every Side were sown, and the Ways so narrow that Carts cannot pass; on a Point of the Hill we saw the Walls of a ruin'd Castle.

I descended afterwards into a Valley, where is a Bridge, made of Stakes, over a Torrent or Rivulet, whose Water is yellow; then I went up another Hill: after which the Lands are very good and all tilled, the little Hills being cut in Terrasses to the Top, and each Terras sowen; I counted more than 40, one above another, several of them supported by Walls made of Stones, taken out of the Hills themselves. These Terrasses appear on all Sides for 2 or 3 Leagues together; the Country is diversify'd with Trees, Houses and Pagods built on Eminences.

Five or six Leagues on the right Hand I saw Hills much higher than those whereon I was. It is likely the Chinese have with vast Labour levell'd the Tops of most of these, in order to sow them. I lay at Chew-tswen (F), a pretty Borough, enclosed with brick Walls; the Distance 40 Li, the Course South-South-East.

The 10th travelling 45 Li, I came to dine at the Village of Li-chwen; I judged our Course was South-East, for the Sun not appearing I could make no Observation (G). In the Way I cross'd three Mountains, and as many large Villages, besides 3 or 4 which I saw on the right Hand. The Ascent of the first Mountain is not very steep; we found very fine plowed Lands on the Top of it, but the Descent was rugged. The second Mountain is steeper, standing in the midst of little Hills, which are tilled, and cut in Terrasses, whereof in one Hill only I reckon'd more than a hundred; they are commonly 20 or 30 Feet in Breadth; tho' some are but 12, and even less, according to the steepness of the Descent.

Having advanced above a League, seeing nothing but little Hills, sowen with Corn, and Thickets of Trees, we went up other stony Hills. The Roads were paved with large Flint Stones, but very uneven. The Terrasses on the Hills are here walled with Stone for a Mile and an half together. These Parts, which are plowed and cultivated with so much Toil, give us a better Idea of the Industry of the Chinese, than the Plains of Kyang-nan, Shan-tong, and Pe-che-li.

(F) In the French it is written Tcheou-tcouen; here the tc should seem to have a different Sound from the ts and tz, which he uses in the Word Tsay-tze, (See p. 51. Note A), but as he is not uniform, I make no Scruple to convert it into ts.

(G) The Author in this Part of the Journey seems to have observed the Bearing by the Course of the Sun, and not by the Compass.

This

Beyond these little Hills, the Mountains began to be barren, excepting towards the Bottom, where the Land is cultivated. I saw some Places where they had begun to make Terrasses; they first gather all the Stones and pile them up to build Walls with, after which they level the Ground and sow it. Road from Kyang-chew to Nan-king.

The third Mountain is still more rugged than the two former; in descending it I was forced to alight twice; after Rains, these Roads are impassible, the Flints being very slippery; I lay at Tsin-chau-i a large Village. Just beyond the Place where we dined, I ascended a Mountain; the rest of the Country is good and level; there appear on all Sides little plowed Hills, full of Trees, and a great Number of wall'd Terrasses. I pass'd thro' 6 or 7 Villages, some of which are pretty large, and built of Brick; I saw others in the Bottom, at the Foot of the Hills. On the Road we met a good many Mules and Asses loaded with Commodities from the Provinces of Ho-nan and Kyang-nan.

The 11th, I dined at the Town of Chan-pin, having travell'd 40 Li South East, and pass'd 5 or 6 little Towns or Villages; it is in the Province of Ho-nan. At setting out we went up a little Hill, after which we descended all the Way; we found a Road, made among the Rocks, along the Hills in form of a Terrass both lined and paved with Stone; it is 10 or 12 Feet wide, with a great Descent, and in rainy Weather so slippery, that it is impossible to go down it. Province of Ho-nan.

There are on this Road two or three little Forts to defend the Passage, one of which has thick Walls, whereon Soldiers might be drawn up. Beyond these little Hills we began to have a Sight of the Plains of Ho-nan. Every Part of the Mountains is improved, excepting where there are Rocks. We found multitudes of People on the Road, and so great a Number of loaded Mules and Asses that they often stopp'd up the Way.

After Dinner, I got rid of the Mountains. For two Leagues and an half the Road is rough and the Descents very steep, occasion'd by the Flints and Stones. Beyond a little Hill we discover'd the Whang-ho; its Course might be traced by the white Vapors, exhaled by the Sun. In the Space of a League and an half thro' the Plain, I pass'd thro' 6 Boroughs or Country Towns, some of which were very large. The Corn was high, and the Ears all form'd, in the Fields, whereas at 5 or 6 Leagues Distance, in the Mountains, it was still in Grass. The Country is charming; we saw Trees every where amidst the Corn and about the Villages: not an Inch of Ground is lost. I lay at Sin-wha-chin, having travell'd 40 Li East-South-East; it is a great Borough in the District of Whay-king-fû.

The 12th I travell'd 30 Li, to a little Village where there was not a Room to dine in; thence 40 Li, to a Borough named Mû-lang, where I lodged. The Country all the Way was even and cultivated; however I pass'd thro' 9 or 10 pitiful Villages.

The 13th I went 60 Li South-East to Wan-chwen, where I both dined and supp'd; it is a Borough depending on Kay-fong-fû. The Country all this Day was charming, with Villages on both Sides of the Road. We saw there little Carts with 4 solid Wheels, and not 3 Foot in Diameter, drawn by Oxen, Asses, Mules, and Horses, all mixt together, 4 or 5 in a breast. I rested in this Borough, because the Place where I was to have lodged was too far off. I saw Corn sown in Lines, like Rice, not above 6 Inches asunder. I saw it also sown the common Way as in Europe, but these Fields are plow'd without leaving Ridges.

The 14th, we advanced 60 Li East-South-East to the Whang-ho; we saw Villages on both Hands, but they were sorry ones; the River was 6 or 7 Li broad in this Place, and it is as much as the Eye can do to reach from one Side to the other. I never beheld a more rapid Stream, but it is not very deep, for being got about a third part over, I observed they reached the Bottom with a Pole; I paid no more than 30 Sols for a Bark which carry'd over all my Baggage. Having pass'd the Whang-ho I rode 20 Li farther to a Town; our Course was about East-South-East, for the Sun did not shine. (H)

The 15th, travelling East by South 70 Li, I arrived at Kay-fong-fû: we found nothing to eat, either on the Road or in the Inns, but Bread not half baked and a little Rice, dress'd after the Chinese Manner; every Body buys and cooks his own Victuals. We lodged in the Suburb without entring the City; for a few Days before, 60 Men having broken into the Mandarin's House, and carry'd off the Tsyen-lyang (I), or Tribute Money, Guards were placed at the Gates to hinder any from going in or out, till they were all taken, as several of them had been already. [This is the Metropolis of Ho-nan.] City Kay-fong-fu.

The 16th, passing along Part of the Walls of the City, I counted the Steps of a Mule Driver, who walk'd before me, and computed that Side of the Town to have been 1000 Geometrical Paces long; the Walls are of Brick, and in good Repair, with little square Bastions at proper Distances. The Country this Day appear'd charming; we saw more Houses and Villages than before, and steered our Course South-Eastward. Having travell'd 55 Li, I pass'd thro' Ching-lyew-hyen, a City inclosed by brick Walls, with Bastions. I lay at Han-kang-chin, a great Borough 25 Li farther. City Ching-lyew-hyen.

The 17th, advancing 30 Li I came to the City Ki-hyen, whose Walls are of Brick, with Towers at certain Intervals; on one Side they seem'd to extend not above 300 Fathom; I left it on the Right. From hence to Tye-fû-tse, the place where I lodged, the Country was full of Villages, whereof I often counted 12 at a time, and pass'd thro' 13 or 14; our Course still East-South-East, and our Stage in all 80 Li. The Road was very finely planted on both Sides with Trees like a Garden Walk, and crouded with People.

Road from Kyang-chew to Nan-king.

Each of these Villages had belonging to it a lofty House like a small square Tower, which the Inhabitants make Use of for securing their Effects in troublesome Times, or when they fear the Irruptions of Robbers, &c. these Houses are the particular Residence of that Class of the People, who live at their Ease, such as Mandarins, Soldiers, &c.

The 18th, I left Tye-fû-tsé, the Gates of which are so low, that my Litter was twice in Danger of being broken. The Road continued to be planted with Trees; at the End of 45 Li, I pass'd thro' Hyan-hi-pû, a large and very long Village; thence 20 Li to Nhing-lû-hyen, where I dined and supp'd, because there were no Inns within 70 Li.

City Nhing-lu-hyen.

This City depends on Quey-te-fû (K); it appear'd to be large, but waste, and poor within; its Ditches are fill'd with Water; its Walls are of Brick, with Towers at convenient Distances. Our Course was East by South. From Kay-fong hither, I found on the Road from time to time these small Towers or Centry Boxes, with Bells in some of them; this Day I pass'd thro' 8 or 9 Villages.

The 19th, having travell'd 80 Li, I came to Tsay-kya-tau-kew (L), a great Borough, where I dined and lay; the continual Rain hinder'd me from estimating the Course. I left Quey-te-fû on the left Hand, which makes me believe we travell'd South-East, supposing the Account they gave of its Situation to be true; the Country was agreeable all the Way. I pass'd by a handsome burying Place, where we saw Marble Lions, in a very thick Wood.

The 20th, I did not proceed because of the Rain; the Ground was become so soft that there was no sure Footing. The 21st, having travell'd 90 Li, South-East, according to the Report of our Muleteers (for the Sun did not shine), I came to Whe-tin-tsye (M), a great Borough; the Plains were all over fine, and the Roads and Villages beset with Trees.

City Yung-ching-hyen.

The 22d, I proceeded 90 Li South East, and partly South. I dined at a large Village, just half way, after which I pass'd thro' the City Yung-ching-hyen; it is small within the Walls, but its Suburbs are very large. This Afternoon, I counted 12 Villages, which I saw all at once on my left Hand; almost all of them have little square Towers, by which they are distinguish'd at a Distance, but we saw no more such Numbers of Trees.

Province of Kyang-nan.

The 23d, having advanced 20 Li, I pass'd through Tung-tye-fû-tsû (N), a small Borough, where the Province of Kyang-nan begins. I dined at Pe-kang-i another Village; our Course was South-East in all 40 Li, and advancing South 40 Li farther, lay at the Village of Sang-pû: all these Villages depend on Fong-yang-fû. I had Mountains all Day long to the Eastward, at 5 or 6 Leagues Distance. The Country was almost destitute of Trees, except in the Villages, which are very numerous, and furnish'd with little square Towers. I saw the Chinese thresh their Corn spread on the Ground, by rowling a Cylinder of black unwrought Marble over it; it was 2 Feet in Diameter, about 2 Feet and an half long, and drawn by two Oxen, with Ropes fasten'd to the Axeltree of the Rowler.

City Syew-chew.

Monday the 24th, at the End of 30 Li, I pass'd near Syew-chew; its Walls appear'd in no very good Condition, but its Suburbs are large. I dined at a Village, 45 Li South-South-East from thence; and lay at another named Fan-chang-tsye, 35 Li farther; the bad Weather and Rain would not permit me to observe the Bearing.

The Houses of these Villages are very poor; we found nothing to eat in them. At Dinner I saw a parcel of Silk Worms, on a Mat, feeding on Mulberry Leaves. Those which were ready to Spin their Silk were put put into Boxes of dry Reeds; the Cods which they make are small; I was told, those of the Province of Che-kyang are twice or thrice as big.

The 25th I travell'd 50 Li, without observing the Bearing, to Lyen-chin-tsye, where I dined; this is a great Borough, where there are two Bridges over two Rivulets, or rather Brooks, which the Rains make navigable for Boats, and run no farther than some neighbouring Villages. I lay at Kû-chin, another Borough 30 Li farther. The Soil was marshy, and not so good as that of Ho-nan; these are Pasture Grounds for Cattle, where I saw numerous Flocks of Sheep. The Rain, which fell the two preceding Days, had so spoil'd the Roads, that I was forced to travel continually in puddles of Water.

The 26th, I proceeded 60 Li, to Sang-pû, but by turning out of the Way so often, to avoid the Water, I travell'd above 80 Li. Twenty Li from Sang-pû, is the City Fong-yang-fû; I believe our Course was South. We were obliged to pass thro' the Water, which in some Places was two or three Feet deep, and in the rainy Season renders travelling very difficult; however, Corn grows there. I took Guides to conduct me thro' the Fields; a Ridge of Mountains appear'd, extending from South-West to South, and even some what Eastward.

The 27th, at the End of 30 Li, I came to a small City, where we cross'd the Whay-ho, which River is about 70 Geometrical Paces broad; it has a Communication with the Whang-ho, and thereby with Nan-king. I lay at Whan-ni-pû, 40 Li farther: all this Country is full of Pasture. Road from Pe-king to Kan-ton.

The 28th I dined at Tſon-kya-pû (o), a large Village, 40 Li, and lay at Che-ho-yi, a great Borough, 30 Li farther; at the Entrance of it is a Bridge, with 30 Posts, over which we croſs'd a little River. I believe our whole Course was South somewhat Easterly, through Roads, which were broken by the preceding Days Rains, but throng'd with People, and full of Villages.

The 29th, advancing 50 Li South, I came to Chû-lû-kyau, another Village, where I dined and supped; about half a League from our setting out, I enter'd among Hills, which are neither high, nor the Road rugged, but I saw few cultivated Lands.

The 30th, having travell'd a League, I was forced to climb a very steep Mountain; The Way up is paved with Stones. There are some Houses upon it, and a stone Arch, 40 or 50 Feet long, under which we pass'd; the Descent is easier.

Forty Li farther, we came to Hyu-chew; this City is encompass'd with a Fosse, fill'd with Water, 60 Fathom wide; it stands on a rising Ground, and the Country round it is well cover'd with Trees; the Suburb thro' which we pass'd, is very large, where we saw some Triumphal Arches and a Tower. City Hyu-chew.

Thence 20 Li South East, is Tan-tye-kan, a Borough, where I dined. I lay at Tſi-i-kyo (p), another Borough, 40 Li beyond. The Plains were full of Rice. I saw them thresh the Corn with a Flail, as in Europe, also squeeze out the Grain with a Marble Rowler, drawn by a Buffalo.

The 31st I proceeded 50 Li East, to Pû-kew; a League before we came to it, we enter'd among Hills, of a pretty easy Ascent, and descended gradually to this Place, which is a great Borough, encompass'd by Walls, carry'd over a Hill, overlooking the River [Yang-tſe-kyang] like a Citadel, only it is too high to command it; it makes a Nook on the East Side, which extends to another Hill where there is a Tower.

The Yang-tſe-kyang is almost a League broad in this Place. Nan-king stands 30 Li South by East of Pû-kew. We landed on the other Side, a good League below Pû-kew to the South-South-East, where we enter'd a River, which, two Leagues thence, brought us to the Gate of Nan-king, along whose Walls we went for the Space of a Mile and half. There were on this River a great Number of Imperial Barks, for the Use of the Mandarins.

In crossing over from Pû-kew, we observed the Course of that great River, as far as we could see, was East-North-East: afterwards nearer Nan-king, North-East, as far as a Hill at Pû-kew, where there is a Tower; and from Nan-king to that Tower it runs North, for the Space of 3 Leagues. They told me when I croſs'd it, that it was 36 Shang deep, that is, 360 She or Feet.

The Road taken from Pe-king to Kan-ton, by P. Bouvet, when sent by the Emperor Kang-hi into EUROPE, in the Year 1693.

THE Emperor having done me the Honour to nominate me for the Voyage into Europe, was pleased that I should travel to Kan-ton, with a Mandarin of the 3d Order, named Tong Lau-ya, and a Portugueſe Jeſuit, whom his Majesty sent to Makau to meet P. Grimaldi, who was return'd from Europe, whither he had been dispatch'd by the Emperor's Orders.

The 8th of July 1693, was the Day fix'd for our Departure; and the Mandarin was charg'd to hasten the Dispatches for this Journey, by the Ping-pû, or sovereign Tribunal (q), of the Soldiers; where it was resolved that I should have 8 Horses for myself and Attendants, and might depart next Day, at what Hour I thought fit.

This Patent of the Ping-pû, which is call'd Kang-ho, consists of a large Sheet of Paper, printed in Tartarian and Chineſe Characters, and furnish'd with the Seal of the Court: it contains to this Effect, " That the supreme Tribunal of Ping-pû gave me this Kang-ho by the " Emperor's Order, who sent me from Court on his own Business, and was willing I should " take my Journey by Kan-ton. It order'd all the Heads of the Tribunals of Cities, and " Places where there were Post Houses, to provide without Delay the appointed Number " of Horses, with all Necessaries on the Road, for the Subsistance of myself, and Retinue; " to lodge me in the Kong-quan, or public Inns, for the Reception of Officers, dispatch'd " from Court; and when I should be obliged to proceed by Water, to furnish me with " Barks and all other Necessaries for my Voyage, &c." the Seal impress'd hereon was square, and 3 Inches broad, without any other Figure or Character than the Name of the Tribunal of the Ping-pû, which on one Side was in Tartarian Characters, and on the other in Chineſe. The Seals of all the Tribunals are of the same form. At the Bottom of the Patent were the Names of the Tartarian and Chineſe Presidents of the Court, with the Date, which was in these Words, " The 6th Day of the 5th Month of the 32d Year of the Reign of Kang-hi." Form of a travelling Warrant.

Road from Pe-king to Kan-ton.

I departed accordingly from Pe-king the 8th of July, at 6 in the Evening. I ſent a Servant before me Poſt, to acquaint the Mandarin, in whoſe Company I was to travel, that I would meet him at the Place appointed, as I did, but not without much Difficulty. We were overtaken by the Night, 3 Leagues beyond Pe-king, and we had 4 more to go; but we went aſtray every Moment, and I wander'd 9 or 10 Hours thro' thick and thin, ſo that it was Day-break before I arrived at the South Gate of Lyang-hyang-hyen, where the Mandarin waited for me. I had ſcarce lighted off my Horſe, when I was obliged to mount again to perform that Day's Journey of 140 Li, that is, two Poſts of 7 Leagues each; the firſt as far as Tſo-chew, the other to Sin-ching-hyen. (R)

Poſts. In all the Cities on the great Roads there are ordinarily I-ma, or Offices, where more than 100 or 150 Poſt Horſes are kept, and when they are at too great a Diſtance, there are Poſt Houſes between. Whoever travels with the Kang-ho, always finds, at the Places where he dines or ſups, freſh Horſes, with a Lodging prepared by the Mandarin of the Place.

Kong-quan, or Inns for the Mandarins. Theſe Lodgings, which they call Kong-quan, ought to be accommodated for the Reception of great Lords; but as there are none to be found in ſeveral Cities, eſpecially thoſe that were ruin'd by the late Wars, the Mandarin cauſes the beſt Inn, which the Place affords, to be prepar'd for that Purpoſe, and erects it into a Kong-quan, by faſtening a Piece of red Silk in form of a Curtain over the Door, and providing a Table and Chair covered with Silk ſlightly embroider'd; this at preſent is all the Furniture of moſt Inns where the Grandees lodge in their Journeys. One never finds a Bed in any of them; it being the Cuſtom for Travellers to carry that Conveniency with them, unleſs they like to lie cool and hard, on a ſingle Mat.

The 10th, our Stage was like the former, that is, of 14 Leagues; 7 Leagues to Hyong-hyen, and as many more to Jin-kyew-hyen. When we arrived at any City, we commonly found the Mandarins without the Walls, cloathed in their Habit of Ceremony, who came to meet us, to do us the more Honour.

We were ſcarcely got to our Inn, when they came to viſit us; beſides the Tables, which we found well enough furniſh'd, the principal Mandarin ſeldom fail'd to ſend each of us another Table full of Meat, boiled and roaſted, with which we treated thoſe who accompany'd us: for beſides our Servants each of us had 4 or 5 Pey-pau, or Ma-pay, Servants of the Poſts, paid by the Emperor. Some of theſe ſerved us for Guides, and others to carry our Baggage, all mounted on Poſt Horſes; not to mention ten or a dozen Troopers armed, with Bows and Arrows to convoy us, whom we changed every Poſt. The Ping-pû had regulated it in this Manner, by another Diſpatch, different from the Kang-ho, which the Tribunal had put into the Hands of Tong Lau-ya.

The 11th, we rode but one Poſt of 7 Leagues to Ho-kyen-fû. The 12th, we advanced 3 Poſts: the firſt of 6 Leagues to Hyen-hyen; the ſecond of Six Leagues alſo, to Fû-chwang-i; and the third of 3 Leagues, to Fû-ching-hyen.

City Te-chew. The 13th, we travell'd two Poſts: the firſt 6 Leagues, to King-chew; the ſecond 7, to Te-chew, a City in the Province of Shan-tong, ſituated on the Side of that long and famous Canal, made for conveying the Tribute of Rice from the Southern Provinces to Pe-king: which is performed every Year in the great and magnificent Imperial Barks, called Lyang-chwen.

The Canal in this Place ſeparates the Province of Pe-che-li, from that of Shan-tong. We found at every Mile and half Diſtance throughout this Road Tſun-tay (S), or Guard Houſes: with a little Terraſs built in form of a Cavalier, to look out, and make Signals in Caſe of Tumults or Rebellions.

The 14th we made two Poſts of 7 Leagues each; one to Ngen-hyen; the ſecond to Kau-tang-chew. One of the two Miſſionaries who was with me, being diſorder'd with riding, was obliged to quit his Horſe, and take a Calaſh, which made us ſhorten our Journeys for ſome time. One has the Advantage in having a Kang-ho, of riding as many Poſts a Day as he pleaſes.

The 15th, our Stage was 2 Poſts of 6 Leagues each; the firſt to Tſin-ping-hyen, the ſecond to Tong-kyew-ell.

The 16th three Poſts: the firſt of 4 Leagues, the ſecond of 8 to Tong-ping-chew, and the third of 6 Leagues to Wen-chang-hyen (T). We arrived there late at Night, becauſe the Stage was long; and notwithſtanding the Diligence of the Mandarins, we were ſtopp'd at two Rivers, where not finding a Bark large enough to carry them, we were obliged to unſaddle our Horſes, and ſwim them over.

From Pe-king to Tong-ngo-hyen, thro' which we only paſs'd, (excepting the long Chain of Mountains, call'd Si-ſhan or the Mountains of the Weſt, which we left on the Right, after our ſecond Days Journey,) all the Country is flat and level, nothing appearing to view but a vaſt Plain; but after we had paſs'd Tong-ngo-hyen, we travell'd for ſome Hours between Mountains, and were much incommoded by the Heat.

(S) Orig. Thun-tay. We don't meet with the Word thun in the Tables of Terms, nor is there any Word beginning with th in the Language, it ſhould perhaps be Tſun-tay or Tun-tay.

(T) The firſt Word of this Name in the French is Voen, which can be no otherwiſe expreſſed then by Wen, or Yuen

The

The 17th our Stage was 2 Posts; one 4 Leagues and a half to Sin-kya-i, the other 4 Leagues to Yen-chew-fu. Before we came to this last City, we found for the Space of two Miles and a quarter, the Country laid waste by a frightful multitude of Grass-hoppers, call'd Whang-chong, that is, the Yellow Insect, from their Colour: the Air was full of them, and the Earth cover'd in such a Manner, even in the great Roads, that our Horses could not move without raising Clouds of them at every Step. These Insects had already entirely destroy'd the Hopes of the Harvest in this Country; however, the Mischief did not extend far, for within a League of the Place, where this Havock was made, all was perfectly safe.

Road from Pe-king to Kan-ton. City Yen-chew-fu. Grass-hoppers.

The 18th we rode three Posts: the first to Tsew-hyen (T) 5 Leagues, the second to Kyay-ho-i, 5 Leagues and an half, and the third to Teng-hyen, 3 Leagues and an half; where the Mandarin, finding no Inn fit to receive us, had us conducted to the Palace of Kong-fu-tse or Confucius. There are the like in all the Cities of China, where the Mandarins and Grandees assemble at certain Times of the Year, to pay their Respects to the Memory of that Prince of the Chinese Philosophers.

Palace of Confucius at Teng-hyen.

The 19th, two Posts of 8 Leagues each, the first to Ling-ching-i, the second to Li-ko-i, in the Province of Kyang-nan. The extreme Heat of the Season as well as Climate, obliged us to travel Part of the Night.

The 20th, we went but one Post of 7 Leagues to Syu-chew, a City of the second Rank, situate on the Southern Bank of the Whang-ho or Yellow River; so named from the Colour of its troubled Waters, mixt with a yellowish Earth, which is continually wash'd off its Channel by the Rapidity of its Stream. This River, tho' large and deep, is not navigable, because it is almost impossible to sail against the Stream without a strong Wind. It often changes its Bed, and sometimes ruins its Banks in such a Manner, as of a sudden to overflow the Plains and drown whole Villages and Cities; it is 5 or 600 Paces broad over-against Syu-chew, where we cross'd it.

Whang-ho or Yellow River.

At our landing on the other Side, we found the Chi-chew, or Governor of the City, named Kong Lau-ya, one of Descendants of Confucius, whose Family has continued in a direct Line for above 2000 Years. We received all sorts of Civility from him; he waited for us by the River Side, where he regaled us with Tea and Fruit; afterwards he came to visit us at our Inn, and sent us Tables loaded with Victuals. Coming to know that my Horse had a troublesome Gate, he offer'd me his own, and sent over Night Men belonging to his Tribunal, 5 Leagues from his City, to prepare Dinner for us next Day. I went to visit him, and recommended to his Protection two Churches which we had in this City, formerly erected by P. Couplet.

Posterity of Confucius.

P. Couplet.

The 21st, we travell'd three Posts; the first to Tau-shan-i, 5 Leagues, the second to Kya-kew-i, 4 Leagues, and the third to Syew-chew, 6 Leagues. From Tong-ngo-hyen hither we had both on the Right and Left a long Chain of desart Mountains; between which we generally found level and well cultivated Plains of vast Extent.

The 22d, we advanced two Stages, one to Ta-lyen-i, 5 Leagues; the other to Ku-ching-i, 7 Leagues.

The 23d, two Stages of 6 Leagues each; the first to Vang-chwang-i, and the second to Hau-lyang-i. As we left Vang-chwang-i we discover'd at a great Distance, towards the South-West, the Mountain In-yu-shan, that is the Mountain of the Agat Seal, because there the Yu-she is found, which is a kind of precious Stone, like Agat, whereof they make Seals of all Sizes. The Imperial Seal is made of this Stone, whence the Mountain has the Name of In-yu-shan.

Agat Mountain.

The 24th, two Stages; one of 4 Leagues and an half to Hong-sin, the other of 6 to Ting-ywen-hyen.

The 25th, three Stages; the first to Chang-kyau-i, 4 Leagues and an half, the second to Fu-ching-i, 6, and the third to Tyen-fu-i, 4 Leagues and a half.

This Day, about a quarter of an Hour before Sun rise, I saw a Phenomenon in the Sky, which I never met with before, or heard of in France, tho' it is very common in the East; especially in Siam and China, where I have observed it above twenty Times, both in the Mornings and Evenings, at Sea and at Land, and even at Pe-king. This Meteor consists of certain Semi-Circles of Light and Shade, which seem to terminate and unite in two opposite Points of the Heavens, namely, in the Center of the Sun, and in the Point diametrically opposite. As all these Semi-Circles terminate in a Point, both in the East and West, that is towards the opposite Points of their Union, and enlarge uniformly towards the middle of the Sky, in Proportion to their Distance from the Horizon; they make a Figure not much unlike the celestial Houses, as they are mark'd on Globes, with only this Difference, that these Zones of Light and Shade are commonly of a very unequal Breadth, and often have Breaks in them, especially when the Phenomenon is not well form'd.

Meteor in the Sky.

As often as I have observed it, (and I saw it four several times during this Journey in less than 15 Days,) I always remark'd that the Weather was extremely hot, the Sky full of Vapours and inclinable to Thunder, and that a great thick Cloud half open stood over-against the Sun. This Meteor seem'd, as to its Figure, very different from those long Streaks of Shade and Light, often seen in the Sky at Morning and Evening, as well in Europe as elsewhere, and which take the Name of Verges (v), or Wands, from their pyramidical Figure.

The Cause of this Phenomenon, appearing rather in Asia than Europe, and in Summer than at other Seasons, seems to me to be owing to the Nature of the Asiatick Lands; which being generally more impregnated with Nitre than those of Europe, fill the Atmosphere, especially in Summer, and when the Sun has greatest Power, with Nitrous Exhalations; which being equally diffused through the Air, render it more fit to reflect the Light, and consequently to form the Meteor.

City Lyu-chew fu.

The 26th, we rode two Stages, the first 3 Leagues and an half to Lyu-chew-fû, the second 6 to I-ho-i. The City of Lyu-chew appear'd to me more populous and better built than any of the Cities I had seen since I left Pe-king. I met with nothing there remarkable, excepting some Triumphal Arches, Towers, and Marble Bridges. There are many Villages on this Road, partly desert and destitute of Houses, which have not been re-built since they were ruin'd by the Tartars, who conquer'd China, and are its present Masters.

City Yu-ching-hyen. Tallow Tree.

The 27th, we made two Stages; one of 6 Leagues and a half to San-kew-i, the other of 2 Leagues to Yu-ching-hyen, and 4 more to Mey-sin-i. This Day we first saw in the Plain several of those extraordinary Trees, which bear the Tallow, whereof they make the Candles used in most Provinces of the Empire.

City Tong-ching-hyen.

The 28th, two Stages; the first 6 Leagues to Lû-ting-i, the second 2 Leagues to Tong-ching-hyen, and then 4 more to Tau-chwen-i. This Day and the four following we travell'd continually between Mountains, infested with Tigers, and thro' very rugged Roads. As the extreme Heat obliged us to set out 2 or 3 Hours before Day, we took Guides who carry'd Torches, that served both to Light us, and scare those fierce Beasts, who are afraid of Fire.

The 29th, we rode two Stages of 6 Leagues each, one to Tsing-kew-i, the other to Syau-che-i.

Province of Hû-quang. City Whang-mey-hyen.

The 30th, three Stages; the first 6 Leagues to Fong-hyang-i, the second 6 more to Ting-syen-i, which is in the Province of Hû-quang, as well as the third of 4 Leagues to Whang-mey-hyen. Altho' the Country we pass'd thro' these three last Days, and the two following, was frightful and incumber'd with long Chains of barren and uncultivated Mountains, yet the Valleys and Plains which separate them in a thousand Places, are very fertile and well improved; nor was there an Inch of arable Land in all that Space, but what was cover'd with very good Rice. I admired here the Industry of the Chinese; for it is astonishing to see how they lay straight all the unequal Ground between those Mountains, that is fit for plowing, and divide, as it were, into Parterres, the Parts that are on a level, and into Terrasses in Form of an Amphitheatre, those which have Risings and Hollows.

Province of Kyang-si. City Kyew-kyang-fû.

The 31st we rode three Stages; the first 4 Leagues to Kong-long-i, in the Province of Kyang-si, the second 6 Leagues to the City Kyew-kyang-fû, on the Side of that great and fine River call'd Kyang, that is to say the River, by Way of Excellence. Over-against Kyew-kyang, where we pass'd it, it is very rapid, and almost a Mile and an half in Breadth. They catch excellent Fish in this Part, and among the rest a kind of Dorado, call'd (w) Whang-yu, or the Yellow Fish, which is very large and of a most delicious Taste. We lodged in a real Kong-quan, or Hotel of the Mandarins; I imagined by the Largeness of its Halls and Apartments, built in form of a Pagod, that it had been design'd at first for an Idol Temple.

As the Roads to Nang-chang-fû, the Capital of the Province, two large Days Journey distant, were very rugged, and the Horses of the Country very bad, we were advised to take Chairs, and made that Day a third Stage of 6 Leagues to Tong-yuen-i, travelling great Part of the Night. The two following Day's Journey being long, instead of four Chairmen, they furnish'd each of us with eight, to relieve one another, and three for our Servants; each of them was carry'd by two Men on Poles, made of two great Bambu's join'd together by means of 2 others, laid across them, we had other Men both to carry our Baggage and light us with Torches, with which Assistance we easily travell'd the most difficult Part of all our Road.

August the 1st, we made our Stage in the same Manner to Te-ngan-hyen. This Stage is no more than 60 Li, or 6 Leagues, but it seem'd to me to be 7 at least. I perceived for the last 4 or 5 Days, that the Li were longer, than they were at our first setting out, and indeed I had often been told, that there was a Difference between the Li or Furlongs in the North, and those in the South, being shortest about Pe-king.

As there were no Inns in this City, fit for lodging us all, they led me to the Temple of Ching-whang, that is, the tutelar Spirit of the City. The Bonza, who had the Care of it, immediately spread a Table, and a little Bed in the middle of the Temple. Altho' the Chinese pay Honours to the Guardian Genii of each Place in these Temples, yet they represent them under a human Form.

Conference between the Jesuit and a Bonza.

On asking this Bonza a few Questions, I found he was exceeding ignorant; he did not know whether the Image he adored, represented some Spirit, or great Personage of Antiquity; what Power they ascribed to it, or what they intended by placing it on the Altar. I forbore asking him any more Questions, for Fear of teaching him Errors which he was ignorant ignorant of. I therefore changed the Converſation, and made a long Diſcourſe, concerning the Exiſtence of the Supreme Being, and his principal Attributes; the Creation of the Heavens, Earth and Man; the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt; the Obligation we are under, of knowing, loving, and ſerving this Supreme Being, as our firſt Principle and ultimate End; to know his Law, and obſerve it. I ſhew'd him, that this Law is the Chriſtian Religion, which I was come from the fartheſt Part of the Earth, to promulge in China; that it is the only one which teaches Man to know himſelf thoroughly, by giving him to underſtand, that he is compoſed of a Body and Soul; the former corruptible and mortal, the latter ſpiritual and immortal, capable of Joy and Grief, Pleaſure and Pain, even after it is ſeparated from the Body by Death; that the Souls of all Men, after their Deceaſe, do, by an irrevocable Decree of their Creator and Judge, receive the Reward of their Merits and good Actions, if they have lived conformable to his Law, by aſcending to Heaven, there to live eternally happy, and enjoy the Preſence of God himſelf; that, on the contrary, if they have deſpiſed or violated this holy Law, they receive a Puniſhment in Proportion to the grievouſneſs of their Crimes, by going to Hell, where they ſuffer everlaſtingly the Rigour of the Flames, kindled by the Breath of an incenſed Deity, &c. Road from Pe-king to Kanton.

All the while I was ſpeaking, which was near two Hours, the Boniza, who appear'd very attentive and touch'd, did not once interrupt me. I concluded by ſhewing the Obligation he was under of ſearching out and following the Truth. I added that, if after what he had heard, he judged, this Truth was to be found in the Religion, whoſe Fundamentals I had explain'd, I counſel'd him, in return for the kind Entertainment he had given me, to allow himſelf to be inſtructed; that it was but a Step to Nang-chang-fû, where there was a Temple dedicated to the true God, and where he would find one of my Brothers, who would expound that Doctrine to him, the knowledge whereof is more precious than all the Treaſures on Earth.

The Bonza received my Advice, and heard my Inſtructions, with equal Signs of Joy. However, I dare not flatter myſelf with having made a Convert of him; his Profeſſion as a Bonza, (without which he muſt have been in miſerable Circumſtances) gave him a comfortable Subſiſtance: and I know by Experience, that this Conſideration is commonly a greater Obſtacle to the Converſion of this ſort of Men, than any Attachment they can poſſibly have, either to their Religion, which they have ſcarce any Knowledge of, or to a State of Life, which Neceſſity alone has obliged them to embrace.

The 2d, we made two Stages in Chairs, 6 Leagues each; the firſt to Kyen-chang-hyen, the latter to a Village 4 Leagues diſtant from Nan-chang-fû, the Capital City of Kyang ſi, where we were to embark. As the City is on the other Side of the River, we found on our Arrival one of thoſe imperial Barks as big as Ships, painted and gilded, which was prepar'd for carrying us acroſs. Imperial great Barks.

As ſoon as we had gotten over, the Vice-Roy appeared with other Mandarins, who invited us to land, and conducted us to a very neat Kong-quan, which is by the River; when we came to the middle of the ſecond Court, the Vice-Roy, with the ſix other Chief Mandarins who accompany'd him, fell on their Knees over-againſt the great Hall, at the Foot of the great Stair Caſe, and turning towards us, he aſk'd in form concerning the Emperor's Health, which none but Officers of this Rank are privileged to do; Tong Lau-ya made Anſwer, and inform'd them that his Majeſty was perfectly cured.

The Vice-Roy and Mandarins then riſing, he cauſed us to enter into the Hall, where they had ſet two Rows of Arm-Chairs, oppoſite to each other, as ſoon as we were ſeated, they preſented us with Diſhes of Tea, after the Tartar and Chineſe Manner, which we drank with Ceremony; after this, we went altogether to a Dinner prepared at the End of the Hall.

As this Entertainment was partly after the Tartar, and partly after the Chineſe Manner, thoſe troubleſome Ceremonies uſed in Chineſe Banquets were diſpenſed with. After Dinner the Vice-Roy and Mandarins conducted us to the River Side, where lighter Barks were got ready, which we demanded for greater Diſpatch; there was one for Tong Lau-ya, one for the 2 other Fathers, and a third for myſelf.

Theſe Barks are very commodious and neat. They are painted, gilded and japanned with their beautiful Varniſh without as well as within. We had a Bed Chamber and a great Parlor with two Windows on each Side; not to mention the other Appartments, for our Servants, and thoſe to lodge the Maſter of the Bark and his Family. Lighter Barks.

The 5th, we got at leaſt 10 Leagues to Fong-ching-hyen, where they brought us Proviſion and Refreſhments. On the Road by Water, there are at the End of every League, Tang, or Guard Houſes, where there are commonly 8 or 10 Soldiers.

The 6th, we paſs'd thro' Fong-ching-hyen, and went to dine 6 Leagues from thence at Chang-ſhû, a famous Place of Trade, for all ſort of Drugs and Medicinal Roots. This Day and the two following we made but little Way, becauſe of the Shallows, which we found almoſt every Moment. We paſs'd thro' ſome Cities, and arrived at Ki-ngan-fû, 40 Leagues from Nan-chang-fû. I ſaw nothing during theſe three Days worth Remark. Our Paſſage was continually between uninhabited and uncultivated Mountains, which form'd two Ridges running parallel, one on each Side of the River. City Fong-ching-hyen. City Ky-ngan-ſi.

The 9th, we went a Shore at Ki-ngan-fû; there we found a Congregation of Chriſtians, at that that time governed by the Franciscans, and under the Care of P. Gregory Ybañes a Spaniard.

Road from Pe-king to Kan ton.

I said Mass in his Church, which was very neat.

The 13th, we pass'd thro' Tay-ho-hyen, and advanced no more than 10 Leagues.

City Tay-ho-hyen

The 11th, we sail'd 10 Leagues farther to Wan-ngan-hyen. The Chi-hyen, or Governor, who is a Christian only in Name, tho' his Wife is very vertuous, shew'd us no Marks of Civility.

City Wan-ngan hyen.

The 12th, we went 11 Leagues to the Village Lyang-kew.

The 13th, in the Morning we sail'd 3 Leagues to Yew-ching-i, and in the Afternon 7, passing the Night 3 Leagues short of Kan-chew-few.

City Kan-chew-fu.

The 14th, we arrived early in the Morning at Kan-chew-fu, a great and very populous City. The Tsong-ping, or Commander General of the Militia of this City's whole District, named Chang Lau-ya, with other Mandarins, came to receive us at the River Side, and invited us to Dinner.

After these Civilities, which we returned the best we could, I went to our Church, where I found P. Gresion, who had labour'd near 40 Years with great Zeal and Success in the Conversion of the Chinese; especially in this City, where he succeeded P. le Faure, who grew old in the Apostolick Labours, and dy'd in the Odour of Sanctity.

As the Tsong-ping was a particular Friend of Tong Lau-ya, our Conductor, and had a great Esteem and Friendship for P. Gresion, we could not refuse the Invitation he gave us to his House, where we had all the Liberty we demanded; only instead of the Comedy, which usually accompanies a Chinese Entertainment, this was interrupted by a Diversion, common among the Tartars, of shooting at a Mark; the Law observed in this Sport is, that he who hits the Mark, obliges the rest to drink his Health in a small Cup of Wine.

Exercise of the Bow.

This Sport came in Vogue about two Years before, when the Emperor Kang-hi perceiving the Effeminacies and Indolence of the Tartars, who are all obliged to learn the Art of War, resolv'd by his own Example to introduce this Exercise among the Grandees, and Prime Mandarins of his Court. That mighty Prince who shot an Arrow with great Strength and Justness, was pleased to spend several Hours every Day in this Recreation. The Mandarins who were obliged to try their Skill at an Exercise which was new to them, diverted the Emperor, and the whole Court at their own Expence. The Confusion they were put into on this Occasion, caused them immediately to have their Children, even those under 7 Years of Age, to be taught to handle the Bow.

Chains of Mountains.

After our Departure from Nan-chang-fu, we found ourselves from time to time between long Chains of Mountains, which stretch themselves along on both the Banks of the River. These Mountains are sometimes so steep that the Chinese were oblig'd to cut a Path along the Foot of them, in at least a Hundred Places, for the Conveniency of those who draw the Barks. Altho' they consist for the most Part of a sandy Earth, cover'd with Herbs, and that the Sides of them are rugged, we saw now and then a Piece of cultivated Land in the Vallies between, or else at the Foot of them, which could scarce suffice for the Support of the Inhabitants (let them be ever so few) belonging to the neighbouring Hamlets. We found the Land pretty well cultivated for 3 Leagues before we came to Kan-chew-fu.

The 15th, we advanced not above 8 or 9 Leagues; the Champion Country seem'd to be even and well cultivated.

The 16th, we sail'd 12 Leagues to Nan-kang-hyen. This Day the River grew so narrow, that it was scarce 30 Paces broad, but the Stream very rapid. We got 10 Leagues farther in the Evening to Lin-chin.

City Nan-ngan fu.

The 17th, we went 12 Leagues to Nan-ngan-fu. These 2 last Days we sail'd continually between Mountains; the River was much more narrow and rapid than before, so that we were forced to increase the Number of those who drew our Barks.

I went next Morning very early to say Mass in the Church, under the Direction of P. Pinuela a Franciscan, born in Mexico, who informing me of his Design of going with me to Kan-ton, fu, a City of the same Province; for we were obliged to travel 12 Leagues by Land, from Nang-hyong-ngan to that City.

We got each of us into a Chair, and having gone 2 Leagues, began to ascend a (r) Mountain by a Road so crooked and so very steep, that they were obliged to cut it in several Places in form of Stairs. They were forced also to cut the Top of it, which is all Rock, to the Depth of 40 Foot, in order to open the Passage to the other Side.

Tho' the Mountains over which we pass'd, are uncultivated and frightful, the Lands between them are till'd and cover'd with as good Rice, as any that grew in the fertile Valleys, spoken of before.

City Nang-hyong-fu.

Entering into the City of Nan-hyong, I found several Christians, who conducted me to their Church, and thence to the River Side, where our Barks were all ready. We were scarce got on Board, when, besides the Tye-tse, or Billets of Civilities, and the Presents of the Mandarins of the Place, they deliver'd us two others from each of the 4 Mandarins of the Province of Quang-tong, who made us a Present af all sorts of Refreshments.

See P. Soucier's Obs. M. th. 4to 1729, Vol. 1. p. 129.

(r) This is the famous Mey-lin mention'd before, p. 7 and 8. P. Gaubil calls it Mé lin, (or Ma-lin) Both Goods and Passengers are carry'd over it, on the Shoulders of Porters.

As

As we deſcended the River, we proceeded that Night and the next Day, about 30 Leagues, as far as Shau-chew-fu, where the French Miſſionaries had a Church, which I viſited. Tong-Lau-ya, whoſe Bark was lighter than mine, had got the Start of me, and I underſtood on my Arrival, that he waited for me at the Tribunal of his Friend, the Mandarin of the Cuſtom-Houſe. I repaired thither to oblige him, and having civilly refuſed the Supper they had prepar'd for us, we return'd to our Barks. Road from Pe-king to Kan-ton. City Shau-chew-fu.

We ſail'd that Night and the Day following about 20 Leagues to In-te-hyen, where we arriv'd towards Noon. Purſuing our Voyage ſtill Day and Night, we got to Tſin-ywen-hyen (Y), the 20th in the Morning, 20 Leagues farther. The River all the Way was bounded on both Sides by ſteep and uncultivated Mountains, with very few Habitations at the Foot of them, but a little farther the Country is well peopled and improved. Cities In-te-hyen, and Tſin-ywen-hyen

From Tſin-ywen-hyen to Quang-chew-fu or Kan-ton, (which, being a Space of 40 Leagues, we ſail'd between the 21ſt in the Morning and the 22d in the Evening) all the Country is pretty flat, well cultivated, and cover'd with the Long-yen and Li-chi, two ſorts of Fruit-Trees peculiar to China, and found only in the Province of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen. Fruit Long-yen, and Li-chi.

About 4 Leagues from Quang-chew we paſs'd thro' Fo-ſhan, one of the greateſt Boroughs in China, which they pretend, contains above a Million of People. We have a Church there, and a Flock of about 10,000 Souls, under the Care of P. Turcotti, a Milaneſe Jeſuit. Fo-ſhan, great Town.

From Nan-hyong to Quang-chew, over-againſt moſt of the Guard-Houſes, by which we paſs'd, there were Galleys with their Flaggs and Streamers diſplay'd, and mann'd with Cuiraſſiers, arm'd with their Lances, Arrows and Muſkets, drawn up in Ranks to do us Honour.

Two Leagues from Quang-chew, the Ywen-ywen, or Intendant General of the Province for the Salt, came to met us; he invited us on Board his Bark, where he had prepar'd a great Entertainment; we return'd him Thanks, excuſing ourſelves, as being a Faſt Day with us. We continued the reſt of our Voyage very ſlowly, and arriv'd about 7 in the Evening at Quang-chew, commonly call'd by the Europeans Kan-ton, which Name comes from that of Quang-tong-ſeng given to it alſo, ſignifying the Capital of the Province of Quang-tong. The Portugueſe pronounce it Kantang. City Quang-chew-fu, or Kanton.

The Mandarins of the Province expected us on the River Side, to enquire in form after the Emperor's Health. We declined their Invitation to the Supper they had prepar'd for us, by making the ſame Apology that we had done to the Ywen-ywen.

They carry'd me to a Kong-quan, which was middling, as to Size, but neat and very commodious. It had two Courts and as many principal Buildings, whereof one, which is at the Bottom of the firſt Court, is a Ting, or great Hall, quite open in Front, for receiving Viſits; and the other, which was at the End of the ſecond Court, was divided into three Apartments; the middleſt of them ſerving for a Hall and Antichamber to the other two, which were large, and furniſh'd with Cloſets. This is uſually the Form of the Houſes of Perſons of any Diſtinction in China. The Kong-quan.

The ROAD by Land from SIAM to CHINA, extracted from the Memoirs of certain Chineſe, who had perform'd the Journey.

TO travel from Siam (Z) to China, the Road taken by the Chineſe, who communicated their Memoirs, it is neceſſary to paſs thro' the Kingdom of Labos. The principal Cities and Settlements which occurr'd in the Way, were Kyang-hay (A), Kyang-ſeng, Mohang-ke-marat (B), Mohang-leng, the Capital City of Labos, Mohang-lê, Mohang-mong, the chief City of another Principality or Province, and Mohang Vinan, which borders on China, or rather belongs to it. Road from Siam to China.

From Kyang-hay, or Mohang-kyay, (for all theſe ſuppos'd Cities or Territories aſſume the Name of Mohang (C), inſtead of which, to avoid Repetitions, I ſhall put the Letter M.) to M. Kyang-ſeng, is reckon'd 7 Days Journey; from M. Kyang-ſeng to M. Kemarat 7 Days; from M. Kemarat to M. Leng 8 Days; from M. Leng to M. Lê 7 Days; from M. Lê to M. Meng 11 Days; from M. Meng turning Northwards they go to M. Vinan, from whence in a ſhort Space they arrive at China.

(Y) In the French, Tſin-yuen-hien.

(Z) The true Orthography of this Name is Si-yang; Siam being the Portugueze Way of writing it.

(B) In the French, Kemarat is join'd with Mohang-leng, as making one and the ſame City, which by the Courſe of the Journal appear to be two diſtinct Places; it muſt alſo be obſerv'd that as Kemarat is not ſpell'd agreeable to the Chineſe Language, which wants the r, and has no Words ending with a t, it may be preſumed that they are the Names given by the Natives, and accommodated to their Pronunciation by the Miſſionaries.

(C) It is written Moang afterwards, and is doubtleſs the ſame Word with Mong, which we find in the Names of a great Number of Places in the Map of Yun-nan, and ſeems to ſignify a Plantation, Colony, or any Body of People. And here it muſt be obſerved, that the Names in this Journal are written incorrectly; the Miſſionary himſelf ſuppoſes the Author of the Memoirs has written Vinan for Yun-nan.

Road from thence to China

In the Way from the Confines of the Kingdom of Siam to Mohang-leng, Capital of the Labos, our Chineſe met with a great Number of Woods, Rivers and Settlements, but with neither wild Beaſts nor Robbers. The greater Part of the Road being unpaſſable with Waggons, they are oblig'd to make uſe of Horſes.

Mohang-leng, Capital of the Labos.

Mohang-leng, Capital of the Labos, has to the South M. Kemarat, to the Eaſt M. Lûan and M. Rong-faa, to the North M. Pût, M. Pling, M. Ken, M. Kaam, M. Paa, M. Saa, M. Beonoy, M. Beoyay, M. Ning-neha, M. Kaan, M. Ghintay; theſe Cities all depend on Mohang-leng, which has neither Walls nor Fortreſſes, being incloſed only with Palliſades; it is in compaſs about 400 Senes or Cords, (each of which contains 20 Siameſe Fathoms.)

Great Foreſt of Pahima-pan.

To the Weſt of this Metropolis, is Mohang-ko-ſang-pyi (c), and further Weſt ſtill, the great Foreſt of Pahima-pan. M. Ko-ſang-pyi was formerly inhabited by a certain People call'd Tay-yay, who poſſeſs'd a Kingdom of ſo great Extent, that it requir'd 3 Months time to travel round it; But at preſent it is no more than a vaſt Foreſt, contiguous with that of Pahima-pan.

The Siameſe have often been heard to ſay, that to the North of Siam, there was a Nation, which had the ſame Religion, Cuſtoms and Language with themſelves, and that they receiv'd their own from them, and even their Name, ſince the Dominions of that People were call'd the Great Kingdom of SIAM. Now theſe People, by the Account of the Siameſe themſelves, are the ſame, which the Chineſe in their Memoirs call Tay-yay (d), and becauſe the Siameſe ſay, their Dominions are govern'd by Prieſts, it is very likely that the Country which the Chineſe name Tay-yay is the Laſſa of the Tartars, which belongs to the Supreme Pontif of the Lama's; and that the City of Ko-ſang-pi is the ſame with that of Barantola, where the Grand Lama keeps his Court, and rules with an abſolute Sway both in Temporals and Spirituals.

The Kingdom of Tay-yay, and Laſſa the ſame.

This appears the more probable, becauſe the Religion of the Lama's is exactly the ſame with that of the Siameſe, or rather of their Prieſts, who are call'd Talapoins. They both worſhip the ſame Idols, and their Habit is of the ſame Faſhion and Colour; beſides the Situation of Laſſa agrees preciſely with what the Chineſe call Tay-yay, and with the Kingdom from whence the Siameſe derive their Religion and Language. Both of them lie to the North of Siam, in a very cold Climate, where it ſnows in December, January, and February. All the Objection to it is, that the Talapoins are ſtrict and conſtant Obſervers of their Laws; whereas the Lama's are more looſe and irregular; but this Difference which relates to Manners does not deſtroy the Conformity of their Religion.

The Kingdom of Labos.

Mohang-leng the Capital of the Labos is ſituate on both Sides of the Menan-tay, or Menan-lay. This River which is full of Rocks, riſes out of a Mountain in the North, call'd Pang-yeng, then deſcending towards Mohang Kemarat it falls into the River Menan-kong, towards Bankiok. The River Siam, has its Source in a Mountain call'd Kyang-daw; and that of Kyang-hay or Kyang-lay diſcharges itſelf into the principal River of Siam commonly called Menan.

In the Capital of the Kingdom of Labos, there is great Plenty of Rice, and ſo very cheap, that for a Fûa, that is, a few half Pence of our Money, one may have 50 or 60 Pounds.

Fiſh is ſcarce, but to make amends, the Fleſh of Buffaloes, Stags, &c. is very plenty, and ſold in the Market. The Months of May, June, and July is the Seaſon for Fruit; whereof all ſorts, found in the Kingdom of Siam, may be had there, excepting the Thûrian or Dûrian, and the Mangûſtan.

Mines of Gold, Silver, and Precious Stones.

Five Days Journey from Mohang-leng Northward, there are Mines of Gold, Silver and Copper, and a kind of red Sulphure, which has a very ſtinking Smell. Two Hundred Senes or Cords from this City, on the ſame Side, there is a Pit or Mine of precious Stones, full 100 Senes in Depth, where they get Rubies, ſome of them as big as a Walnut; alſo Emeralds or green Stones, and they affirm, the King of Labos has one as large as an Orange. There are Stones likewiſe of other Colours. A Brook which runs thro' the Mine, carries ſeveral down its Stream, which ſometimes weigh 2 or 3 Mas, that is, a Quarter or third Part of an Ounce Weight.

As for the Silver Mine, the King draws from it about 360 Catis yearly; they are Chineſe who work in it, and give all the Directions. The Merchants of M. Kemarat, M. Leê, M. May, M. Teng Maa, M. Meng, M. Daa, and M. Pan, repair to this Mine, which is incloſed by Mountains 300 Senes in Height, cover'd with Graſs, preſerved continually freſh and green by the Dew.

Medicinal Roots. Fruit in the Form of a Duck.

There is found here a Medicinal Root, call'd by the Chineſe Tong-quey, and by the Siameſe Kot wha bwa; alſo a kind of Tree, named Vendezhang, which bears Flowers about the Thickneſs of ones Finger, of a very agreeable Smell. When theſe Flowers open, they are of divers Colours, as red, yellow, white, and black; and when the Fruit comes to Perfection, it is ſhap'd like a Duck: There are in the ſame Parts great Numbers of theſe Trees, and it is chiefly in the Place where they abound moſt, that the Dew falls in greateſt Quantity.

(c) This Name, by what follows, appears to be Chineſe.

(d) This Name, uſed by the Chineſe Authors, muſt have been taken from the Labos, if Laſſa be intended thereby; for the Chineſe Name for Laſſa or Laſa, is Tſan and Tſan-li, as will be obſerved hereafter, in the Account of Tibet; but indeed Laſſa appears to be too far diſtant, and lies to the Weſt, not to the Weſt of the Labos, with Hawa or Ava, and other Countries between.

Road from Siam to China.

Trade and Commodities.

The Inhabitants of Mohang Leng traffic with their Neighbours without being at the Trouble of going to them. Their Merchandize consists in precious Stones, Gold, Silver, Tin, Lead, Sulphur, both common and red; Cotton, spun and unspun, Tea, Lack, Sapan or Brasil Wood, and the Medicinal Root Kot wha bwa already mention'd.

The Merchants of Mohang bring them Elephants; The Chinese raw and manufactur'd Silk, Civet, white Hair as fine as Silk. Of this Hair, which is taken from a certain Animal, the great Tufts are made, that adorn the Ears of the Elephant, which the King of Siam rides upon, and hang down to the Ground; as well as the red Tuft, worn by the Chinese on their ordinary Bonnets or Caps. They exchange these Merchandizes for Sapan Wood, Tea, Lack, Cotton, &c.

The Merchants that come from Tay-yay or Pama-hang (F), to the Westward, bring them Iron, yellow and red Sanders, Linnen Cloth, Chints or painted Callico, Venison, a kind of red Medicinal Paste, Opium, and other Commodities of Indûstân; which they exchange for Gold, Silver, precious Stones, &c.

Those of M. Kemarat and M. Kyang-hay, come to M. Leng, to barter their Cows and Buffaloes for Silver, Tin, and Sulphur. M. Leng, or more properly speaking Labos, is tributary to Hawa (F) or Pama-hang, and an Ambassador is sent annually from that Metropolis, to pay their Tribute; this does not hinder the Labos from appointing a Successor, when their King dies; but they are obliged to notify it to the King of Hawa.

The King of Labos employs but one Minister of State. They reckon eight Cities or Places in this Kingdom, each containing a Garrison of 1000 Men. Besides the 360 Catis which he receives yearly from the Mine, Northward from M. Leng, he raises 860 more in the rest of the Kingdom.

Mohang Meng, the Capital of a particular Province, has on the West M. Pan and M. Kaa, on the South M. Tse on the East M. Chiong and M. Kû, both depending on M. Vinan. The whole Country is without the Tropic, for they never see the Sun directly over their Heads.

The Province of M. Meng, is 17 Days Journey from North to South, and about 7 from East to West. They reckon 18 Cities which depend on the Capital. A River crosses it, that rises in a Mountain in the North, and falls into the Menam Kong; this last comes from Moang Chiay, call'd Moang Vinan (G) by the Chinese.

After it has pass'd thro' M. Lê, M. Kyang-seng, and M. Lan-chang; it enters the Kingdom of Kamboya, which it crosses, and falls into the Sea at the Bar of Bonsac (H). This River carries large Barks from M. Kyang-kong and M. Kyang-seng, as far as the Sea. But from M. Lê to M. Vinan it bears none, so that there is a Necessity of travelling by Land.

The Soil of M. Meng produces all Sorts of Fruits, which are found in Siam, excepting the Dûrion and Mangûstan. There are Mines of Kalin or Tin on the West Side; of Silver, Copper and Iron towards the North; and on the South Side there is one of Salt.

Musk Animal.

The Chinese trade with M. Meng, transporting their Commodities on Horses. In this District they take the Creatures which produce Musk; but more especially about M. Pang, M. Chaydaw, and M. Kong, all three depending on M. Vinan; they find many of them also in the District of M. Tay-yay.

This Animal is as large as a young Goat; its Body yields a most agreeable Perfume; it has under its Belly a Purse three or four times as thick as ones Thumb; when it is cut, it seems to be a Piece of Fat, or Bacon; they dry it till it may be reduced to Powder, and then sell it in the Country for its weight in Silver; this Powder is yellowish and of a most excellent Scent. The Natives being prohibited from selling the true Bags to Strangers, they make counterfeit ones of the Animal's Skin, which they fill up with its Blood and other Humours, adding rotten Wood, after which they tie them up and dry them. The Peasants bring great Quantity of them to M. Meng, which they exchange for things of small Value, and those of M. Meng sell them at a pretty dear Rate to Strangers.

City Moang Kemarat.

Moang Kemarat is, as it were, the Capital of a Province or District of the same Name, which is 400 Senes in Compass, and about 8 Days Journey in Length; it is tributary to Hawa. At the time the Chinese pass'd thro' this Country, the Name of its King was Pracpyau Otang; he every Year sends Ambassadors to the King of Hawa with the Tribute, which consists of two small Shrubs, one having its Leaves and Flowers of Gold, and the other of Silver.

M. Kemarat.

M. Kemarat has to the East M. Lê, to the North M. Lang, to the South M. Kyang-seng and M. Kyang-hay; to the East M. Vay, M. Rong, M. Ngong, M. Lahi, M. Maa, and M. Laa; to the North M. Hang, M. Kroa, M. Loey, M. Jang, and M. Pen. From M. Hang to M. Kroa is one Days Journey, and another from M. Loey to M. Jang. These eleven Cities, or Colonies are in the Jurisdiction of M. Kemarat. In this Country they have the Use of Fire Arms, great and small Canon, Muskets, Zagayes, [or Darts] and Cross-Bows.

(F) Orig. Hawa The same doubtless as Ava, call'd by the Chinese Ya-tva, though written otherwise in this Journal; perhaps more conformable to the Pronunciation of the Labos.

(G) Written twice in the French Vinam; this is judg'd by the Missionaries to be Yun-nan.

(H) In the French, Basach.

While

Fugitives from Yun-nan fall upon China

While the Tartars were conquering China, a great Number of Chineſe Fugitives out of Yun-nan fell upon the Territories of their Neighbours and ſubdued them; among the reſt the Inhabitants of M. Komarat, were forced to abandon their City.

Compared to the Chineſe

Before the Chineſe drove thoſe People out, they went duely every Year to trade with them, carrying Velvets and other Silks, Camlets, Carpets, Hair, blew and black Callico, Muſk, Quick-ſilver, Kori Shells, and Chineſe Bonnets, [or Hats] Kettles, and other Utenſils of Copper, precious Stones of a green Colour, Emeralds, Gold, Silver, and China Ware: inſtead of which they carry'd back Cotton Thread, Ivory, an Earth or Medicinal Paſte, call'd Zhadam; a ſort of Medicinal Wood, call'd Ingo by the Portugueſe, and Maha ing by the Siameſe; Opium, a kind of Medicinal Root, call'd Kotſo, and white Linnen Cloth; all theſe Commodities came from Hawa, and the Chineſe went to fetch them in January, February, and March, with an Intent to return the Month following.

A Medicinal Paſte and Wood.

Moang Chay or Moang Vinan, belongs to a Province of China and probably to Yun-nan, if it be not that Province itſelf: for the Chineſe Memoirs ſpeak of 4 Rivers which riſe in it, whereof the firſt runs into the Province of Quang-tong; the ſecond paſſes by M. Chyang-kong and M. Lan-chang; the third by M. Motima; and is call'd Menang-kong, and the fourth which goes to M. Hawa, is call'd Menam-kiû; all the four paſſing out of the Province Yun-nan, at length diſcharge themſelves into the Sea.

INTRODUCTION, to the DESCRIPTION of the PROVINCES.

I HAVE already obſerved, that moſt of the Cities of China reſemble one another ſo nearly, that to ſee one, is almoſt ſufficient to give an Idea of them all. They are for the moſt Part ſquare, when the Ground will permit, and encompaſs'd with high Walls, defended by Towers, built as Buttreſſes at convenient Diſtances. They have ſometimes Ditches, either dry or with Water. There are within the Cities alſo other Towers, either round, Hexagonal, or Octogonal, and 8 or 9 Stories high: Triumphal Arches in the Streets; tolerably handſome Temples conſecrated to Idols, or Monuments erected in Honour of their Heroes, and thoſe who have doneſome important Service to the State: in ſhort there are certain publick Buildings more remarkable for their vaſt Extent than their Magnificence.

To this we may add a pretty many large Squares, and long Streets, ſome very wide, others narrow, with Houſes on each Side, having only a Ground Floor, or one Story at moſt. There one ſees Shops adorn'd with China Ware, Silks, and varniſh'd or japann'd Goods; before the Door of each, there is placed a Pedeſtal, on which is erected a Board 7 or 8 Foot high, either painted or gilded, with three large Characters written thereon, ſuch as the Shop-Keeper chuſes for his Sign, and to diſtinguiſh it from all others; you ſometimes find on it the Names of two or three ſorts of Goods, which are ſold there, and at the Bottom that of the Shop Keeper himſelf, with theſe Words, Pû-hû, that is, he will not cheat you. This kind of double Row of Pilaſters placed at equal Diſtances form a Colonade, which makes an agreeable Proſpect enough.

The Beauty of the Chineſe Cities, conſiſting wholly in theſe Particulars, I thought proper to premiſe this general Account, that I might not be oblig'd to make uſeleſs and tedious Repetitions in ſpeaking of the principal Cities of every Province. For this Reaſon I ſhall confine myſelf to what is moſt remarkable in them, with reſpect to their Situation, Trade, or the Fertility of their Soil; and ſhall enlarge chiefly on thoſe Cities which are of greateſt Reputation, and moſt frequented: Of the reſt I ſhall ſay what is ſufficient to form an Idea of them; and illuſtrate the whole with the Plans of ſuch places as have any thing ſingular.

A GEOGRAPHICAL

DESCRIPTION

OF THE

PROVINCES of CHINA.

PROVINCE I. PE-CHE-LI, CHE-LI, or LI-PA-FU.

PROV. I. Pe-che-li.

THIS Province, which is the first and chief of the whole Empire, is bounded on the East by the Sea; on the North by the Great Wall and part of Tartary; on the West by the Province of Shan-si, from which it is separated by Mountains; and on the South by the Provinces of Shan-tong and Ho-nan. Its Figure is triangular. Bounds and Figure.

It is divided into nine different Countries, each of which has a Fu, or principal City of the first Rank, whereon several Cities depend. These Cities are 140 in Number, of which 20 are Chew, or Cities of the second Rank, and 120 Hyen, or Cities of the third Rank; not to speak of Boroughs and Villages without Number, some as large as Cities, but have not that Name, because they are neither encompass'd with Walls nor Ditches, as the Cities are. Division, and Number of Cities.

The Air of this Province is temperate; notwithstanding, tho' it does not extend beyond the 42d Parallel, the Rivers are frozen during 4 Months of the Year, that is, from towards the End of November to the middle of March. Unless a certain North-Wind blows, they never feel those piercing Colds the Frost produces in Europe, which may be attributed to the nitrous Exhalations that arise from the Earth, and especially to the Clearness of the Sky, the Sun being scarce ever cover'd with Clouds, even in Winter. Air.

The rainy Season is towards the End of July and the beginning of August: At other times it seldom rains, but the Dew that falls every Night moistens the Earth; this Moisture is dry'd up at Sun-rise, and is succeeded by a very fine Dust, which penetrates every thing, even Rooms most closely shut. Tender-eyed People who travel on Horseback, wear a thin Veil for covering their Faces, which, without hindering them to see, defends them from those Whirlwinds of Dust that surround them; or else they take other Precautions, whereof I shall speak hereafter. Weather.

The Soil of Pe-che-li is even, but sandy, and not very fruitful. It produces less Rice than the Southern Provinces, because it has but few Canals; however, besides what is sown along the Rivers, it is sown dry in several Places, and grows very well, but is somewhat harder to boil. All manner of Grain thrives here in abundance, and chiefly Wheat and Millet; here likewise we find all sorts of Cattle, and Pulse, with plenty of Fruit; such as Apples, Pears, Plumbs, Chesnuts, Walnuts, Figgs, Peaches, Grapes, &c. Soil and Produce.

Its Rivers are full of Fish, especially excellent Cray-Fish. The Mountains afford a great deal of Pit-Coal: this they burn instead of Wood, which is very scarce; and considering how long these Mines have supply'd the Province, one would think them inexhaustible.

Among the various kinds of Animals, there is a particular sort of Cats, with long Hair, and hanging Ears, which the Chinese Ladies are very fond of, and rear with a great deal of Tenderness. But this Province is render'd much more considerable by being as it were the Rendezvous of all the Riches of the Empire, and because all the Northern and Southern Provinces strive to outvie each other in furnishing it with the most rare and delicious things they produce.

The Inhabitants are neither so polite, nor so much addicted to the Sciences as those of the Southern Parts; but they are much more Robust, Warlike, and able to undergo the Fatigues and Hardships of War. The same may be said of all the Chinese inhabiting the Northern Provinces.

Prov. I. Pe-che-li.

The First City, Shun-tyen-fu, or Pe-king.

Shun-tyen-fu, or Pe-king, the Capital of the Empire. See the Plan in Plate 4.

THE first City, which is the Capital of the Province and of the whole Empire, is Shun-tyen-fu. It is situated in a very fruitful Plain, 20 Leagues from the Great Wall, and is the ordinary Residence of the Emperors. They call it Pe-king, which signifies, the Court of the North; as the Capital of the Province of Kyang-nan, was named Nan-king, or the Court of the South, when it was the Emperor's Residence. But the Tartars, a restless and warlike People, who made continual Irruptions into the Territories of the Empire, obliged them at length to remove their Court into the Northern Provinces; that they might be near at Hand, to oppose them with the numerous Troops which ordinarily attend the Chinese Monarchs.

This City is almost Square, and divided into two Cities; that where the Emperor's Palace stands is named Sin-ching, or the New City; it is also call'd the Tartar City, because the Houses were distributed among the Tartars, when the present Family was establish'd on the Throne.

The second is call'd Lau-ching, or the Old City; it may be termed the Old Chinese City, because when the Chinese were driven out of the other City, part of them retired into this, while others fled towards the Southern Provinces, being even obliged to quit the Country, because not only the Houses of the New City (built under Yung-lo about 1405, when the Court forsook Nan-king) but also the Lands about it and the Neighbouring Cities, within a certain Distance, were given to the Tartars, with a perpetual Exemption from Taxes and all sorts of Tribute.

In less than fourscore Years the Tartars have multiply'd to such a Degree, that they occupy almost all the New City; the rest is inhabited by Chinese, so that there is not any Part of it empty, as there is in the Old.

Walls. The Compass of the Walls of both Cities together, exclusive of the Suburbs, has been measur'd, and does not exceed 52 Chinese Li [or Furlongs] so that it is less than Nan-king. But there is a vast difference between the Breadth, Length, and Beauty of the Walls of these two Cities; those of [the New City of] Pe-king are stately, and worthy the Capital of the greatest Empire in the World; but the Walls of Nan-king are narrow, and do not appear to exceed those of the ancient City of Pe-king, which are no better than the Walls of the generality of the Cities of China.

A Horseman may ascend the Walls of the New City, by means of a Ramp, which begins at a great Distance. In several Places there are Houses built for a Corps de Guard; the Towers are within Bow-shot of each other; there are some of them at certain Distances, much larger than the rest, and capable of containing small Bodies of Reserve.

Gates. The Gates of the City, which are high and well arch'd, support exceeding large Pavillions, nine Stories high. Each Story is furnish'd with Windows and Loop-holes; and the lowest forms a great Hall, where the Soldiers and Officers, who have been on Guard, or come to relieve it, retire. Before each Gate there is an open Area or Parade (K) of above 360 Feet, (which serves for a Place of Arms) incompass'd by a semicircular Wall of equal Height and Breadth with that of the City. The Entrance of this Parade is never on that Side which faces the great Road into the City: This Road is also commanded by a Pavillion like the former, so that, as the Cannon of the one can play upon the City, the Cannon of the other scowrs the neighbouring Country. All the Gates, which are nine in Number, have a double Pavillion, built in like Manner on the Platforms of the Walls, and furnish'd with Artillery; nor is there need of any other sort of Citadel, this Artillery being more than sufficient to keep the People in Awe.

Streets. The Streets of this great City are exceeding strait, almost all laid out with a Line, at least a League in Length, and about 120 Feet wide, with Shops, for the most part, on both Sides. It is a Pity there is so little Proportion between the Streets and the Houses, which make a mean Appearance, and are very low.

Populousness. It is astonishing to see the infinite Multitudes of People, wherewith these Streets are crouded, without one Woman among them; and the Confusion which is caused by the surprizing Number of Horses, Mules, Asses, Camels, Carts, Waggons, and Chairs, without reckoning the various Crowds of Men, 100 or 200 in a Cluster, which one meets with every now and then, gathered about some Fortune-teller, or Players at Cups and Balls; or listening to Ballad Singers, and others who read or repeat certain comical Stories to make Diversion; or else gaping at a sort of Quacks, who distribute their Medicines, and display their admirable Effects with a great deal of Eloquence. People of Distinction would be stopp'd every Moment, if they had not a Horseman to go before and call to the People to make Way.

All the Riches and Commodities of the Empire are continually flowing into this City. People are carried thro' the Streets in Chairs by Men, or more usually on Horseback. Both sorts of Voiture are easily to be met with in many Places: one may sometimes hire a Horse or Mule the whole Day for 6 or 7 Pence; and as all the Streets are crouded with People, the Muleteers often lead their Beasts by the Bridle, in order to make way. These Men are perfectly acquainted with the Streets and Houses, where the great Folks and principal Citizens reside. There are also Books sold, which give an Account of the Wards, Streets, or Places where every Person lives, who has any public Employment.

(K) There are no Parades in the Plan of Pe-king, but the Reader will find them in that of Chin-ting-fu, in the same Plate.

The

Explanations

A. Wall of the Tartar City, almost Square.
B. Wall of the Chinese City.
1. The Emperors Palace.
2. A Place of pleasure where is an Artificial Mount.
3. The Gates of the Palace & of the outward Inclosure.
4. The Gates of the place of Pleasure.
5. The Gates of the Tartar City.
6. The Gates of the Chinese City.
7. The Great Courts of the Palace.
8. Outward inclosure of the Palace.
9. Church and House of the French Jesuits.
10 House & Church of the Portugueze Jesuits, call'd the Residence of St. Joseph
11. College of the Portugueze Jesuits.
12. Tower of the Mathematics.
13. House of the Society de propaganda fide
14. The Jesuits Burying place
15. Temple of the Earth.
16. Temple where the Emperor Sacrifices to Heaven.

The Tartar City is a great league from North to South and [the Chinese City] a little more than half a league. In the two Cities and their Suburbs are computed more than three millions of people. The walls are cased with Brick, Round those of the Chinese City run Canals.

Latitude [at the College of the Portugueze Jesuits] is 39°. 52'. 54". North. Latitude [at the House of the French Jesuites] 39°. 54'. 0" [And its Longitude] more East than Paris 7h. 37'. 23". [or 114°. 20'. 45". But according to the later Observations of P. Gaubil used by Mr. D'Anville, 7h. 25'. 26" or 113°. 51'. 30". The I prefer with Mr. De l'Isle the Observation which makes it Just 7h. 36'. 0". or 114°. degrees, whence it is East of London 116°. 25'.].

The Governor of Pe-king, who is a Manchew Tartar of Figure, is call'd Kyû-men ti-tû, or the General of the nine Gates, and has under his Jurisdiction not only the Soldiers but the People, in whatever concerns the civil Government or the Public Safety.

Nothing can exceed the Policy observ'd here: it is amazing to see the perfect Tranquillity that is maintain'd among such an infinite Number of Tartars and Chinese; and for several Years together one shall not hear of a House being broken open, or a Man murder'd; for such is the Order observed, that it is almost impossible those Crimes should be committed and the Authors escape unpunish'd.

Guards of the Streets.

All the great Streets, which run in a Line from one Gate to another, and are about 120 Feet broad, have Corps de Guard. Day and Night there are Soldiers with Swords by their Sides, and Whips in their Hands, to chastise all, without Distinction, who make any Disturbance; and to confine whoever resists, or creates any Quarrel.

The lesser Streets, which terminate in the greater, have Wooden Cross-barr'd Gates, thro' which those, who walk within, may be seen by the Corps de Guard, placed over-against them in the great Streets. There are also Soldiers on Duty towards the middle of almost all those Streets. The Cross-barr'd Gates are shut every Night by the Guard, and are seldom open'd, except to Persons with a Lanthorn in their Hand, who are known, and have a good Reason for going out, such as to fetch a Physician. As soon as the first Stroke of the Watch is given on a great Bell, one or two Soldiers walk from one Corps de Guard to the other, playing all the Way with a kind of Clapper, to let it be known that they are on the Watch. They suffer none to walk in the Night, and even question those whom the Emperor sends about Business; if their Answer gives the least Suspicion, they put them in Custody of the Corps de Guard; besides, this Guard must answer every Call of the Centinel who is on Duty.

It is by this excellent Order, observed with the greatest Exactness, that Peace, Silence and Safety reign thro' the City. It must be added that not only the Governor of the City, who is obliged to go the Rounds, arrives when least expected; but also the Officers, who keep Guard on the Walls and Pavillions over the Gates, (where they beat the Watch on great Brass Drums,) send Subalterns, to examine the Quarters belonging to the Gates where they are posted: the least Neglect is punish'd next Day, and the Officers of the Guard are broken.

This Regulation, which prevents Nocturnal Meetings, will without doubt appear very extraordinary in Europe, and be by no means reliss'd by Persons of Quality and Fortune; but, ought not those who are at the Helm in a State, to prefer good Order and the publick Security, to Diversions, which give Occasion to innumerable Attempts on the Effects and Lives of the Citizens? Besides, nothing seems more agreeable to Reason, since the Tartars, a People bred up in Woods, illiterate and unenlighten'd with the true Religion, acting according to these Maxims, root out so many Crimes too common in other States.

Exceeding Neatness of the Houses.

The Empire is indeed at great Expence on this Account, for part of the Soldiers I have mention'd, are employ'd for nothing else but to take Care of the Streets; they are all Foot, and their Pay is large: Besides their watching Day and Night, it is their Business to see that every Body cleans the Street before his Door; that it is swept and watered every Morning and Evening in dry Weather; and that the Dirt is taken away after Rain: And as the Streets are very broad, one of their chief Employments is to work themselves, and keep the middle of them always clean for the Publick Conveniency. After they have taken up the Dirt (for the City is not paved) they beat it, or turning it dry it, or else mix it up with other dry Earth; so that within two Hours after the heavy Rains one may walk all over the City without dirtying himself. Those Writers who tell us, that the Streets of Pe-king are commonly nasty, probably speak with Respect to those of the Old City, which are small, and not kept in such good Order as those of the New; where the Soldiers are continually employ'd to keep them clean, even when the Emperor is absent.

There is a second Wall in the New City, which is low and narrow, but adorn'd with large Gates, where there are Guards; this is call'd Whang-ching, that is, the Imperial Wall. Its South Gate is that of the Palace itself, about a hundred Fathoms from the principal Gate of the City, which looks Southward also, and is call'd by the People Syen-men; altho' its true Name, which is cut both in Tartarian and Chinese Characters, is Ching-yang-men, that is, the Gate facing the Noon-Day Sun.

Imperial Palace described.

This Palace is a prodigious Collection of great Buildings, vast Courts, and Gardens; it is inclosed with a Brick Wall about twelve Chinese Li in Circuit. This Wall has Battlements along the Curtains, and at the Angles is adorn'd with little Pavillions; over each Gate there is a Pavillion more lofty, as well as stronger built, than the former, and surrounded with a Gallery, supported by Pillars resembling our Peristyle: This properly is the Palace, because it contains the Apartments of the Emperor and his Family.

The Space between this Inclosure of the Palace and the first Wall, named Whang-ching, which is above 15 Li in Compass, is taken up chiefly with Houses, as well of the Officers of the Household, as the Eunuchs, and the several Tribunals; whereof some have the Care of providing Necessaries for the Service of the Prince, and others are to preserve good Order, decide Differences, determine Causes, and punish the Crimes committed by the Domesticks of the Imperial Family. Nevertheless when the Crimes are flagrant, and fully proved, these Tribunals of the Palace, named the Inner Tribunals, tranſmit the Criminals to the Exterior Tribunals, which are the Grand Tribunals of the Empire.

Prov. I. Pe-che-li.

Its Architecture and grand Appearance.

Altho' the Architecture of the Imperial Palace be wholly different from ours, yet it ſtrikes the Eye by its Vaſtneſs, the regular Diſpoſition of the Apartments, and the Structure of the Roofs, which have four Sides riſing very high, and adorn'd on the Reſt with a Plat-band of Flower-work, and turn'd up at the Ends; the whole is cover'd with varniſh'd Tiles of ſuch a beautiful Yellow, that at a Diſtance they appear as bright as if they were gilded. A ſecond Roof as glittering as the former, riſing from the Walls, goes quite around, ſupported by a Foreſt of Beams, Joyſts and Spars, all japann'd with green Varniſh, ſtrew'd with Gold Figures. This ſecond Roof with the Projection of the firſt makes a kind of Crown to thoſe Buildings, which has a very fine Effect; and perhaps we ought to judge of the Goodneſs of the Rules obſerved in any Building, according as we find ourſelves affected with the Beauty of it; ſince thoſe received in Europe are rejected by other Nations, and have appear'd good to us, only becauſe we have diſcover'd Grace and Beauty in the Works of the Ancients, who ſeem to have introduced both. Whatever one may think as to the Taſte of Architecture, it is certain that theſe Halls, built in the Chineſe Faſhion, with their Bas-Courts, ſurrounded by Galleries, and ranged one after another in regular Order, form altogether one intire Structure, which is very magnificent, perfectly Auguſt, and worthy the greateſt Empire upon Earth.

The Terraſſes.

The Terraſſes, whereon theſe Apartments are built, contribute alſo much to give them that Air of Grandeur which ſtrikes the Eye; they are about 15 Feet high from the Ground, caſed with white Marble, adorn'd with Balluſtrades of pretty good Workmanſhip, and open only at the Entrance of the Stair Caſes, which are placed on the Sides, and in the Middle, and Corners of the Front. The Aſcent in the middle is properly no more than a Ramp or Slope, conſiſting of one or two pieces of Marble, without either Steps or Reſtings; Nobody is permitted to enter this Way into the Apartments but the Emperor alone, who upon Days of Ceremony is carried thro' in his cover'd Chair.

Theſe Terraſſes, which extend from Eaſt to Weſt, make before the Doors and Windows of the Apartments, a very broad Platform paved with Marble, projecting ſeven or eight Foot all the way beyond the Building. This is the Form of the Apartments or Lodgings of the Emperor, and of the Imperial Hall, named Tay-ho-tyen, (as who ſhould ſay, the Hall of the great Union) which ſtands more towards the South, and is expoſed to the Eyes of all the Mandarins of the Empire.

In the Bas-Court before this Hall the Mandarins range themſelves on Days appointed for the Ceremonies preſcribed by the Laws of the Empire, to renew their Homage, which Ceremonies are perform'd whether the Emperor be preſent or not. Nothing is more uſual than for them to ſtrike the Ground with their Foreheads, before the Gate of the Palace, or one of the Royal Halls, with the ſame Formality and Reſpect, as if he was ſeated on his Throne.

This Hall is about 130 Feet long, and almoſt ſquare; the Cieling is all of carved Work, varniſh'd with green, and charg'd with gilded Dragons. The Pillars that ſupport the Roof within, are ſix or ſeven Feet in Compaſs at the Bottom, and incruſtated with a kind of Paſte, japann'd with red Varniſh. The Pavement is cover'd partly with very ordinary Carpets, made like thoſe of Turky; the Walls are very well white-waſh'd, but without Hangings, Looking-Glaſſes, Branches, Paintings, or any other ſort of Ornament.

The Throne.

The Throne, which is in the middle of the Hall, conſiſts of a lofty Alcove, very neat, but neither rich nor magnificent; and without any Inſcription but the Word Shing, which the Authors of Relations have render'd Holy; but it is not always uſed in that Senſe, for it is ſometimes better explain'd by the Latin Word Eximius, or the Engliſh Words Excellent, Perfect, Moſt Wiſe. On the Platform or Floor before it, ſtand very great and thick Veſſels of Braſs, wherein Perfumes are burnt during the Ceremony, and Candleſticks made in the Form of Birds, large enough to hold Flambeaux. This Platform is continued Northward beyond the Hall, Tay-ho-tyen, and ſerves as a Foundation to two other leſſer Halls, which are hid by the former; one of them is a very pretty Rotundo or circular Room, with Windows on every ſide, and ſhining with Varniſh of divers Colours; there, they ſay, the Emperor repoſes ſometimes, before or after the Ceremony, and changes his Habit.

This round Hall is but a few Paces diſtant from a ſecond, that is longer than broad, the Door of which faces the North; thro' this Door the Emperor is obliged to paſs, when he comes from his Apartment to his Throne, there to receive the Homages of the whole Empire; he is then carried in a Chair, by Chairmen dreſs'd in long red Veſts, embroider'd with Silk, and wearing Caps, adorn'd with Plumes.

Great Court before the Hall.

The Court which is before the Tay-ho-tyen, is the largeſt belonging to the Palace; it is at leaſt 300 Feet long, and 250 wide. Over the Gallery that ſurrounds it, are the Imperial Magazines of Rarities, for the Treaſure or Revenues of the Empire are kept in the ſupreme Tribunal, named Hû-pû. Theſe Magazines are open'd on certain Occaſions, as at the Creation of a Prince, who is to inherit the Crown, an Empreſs, Queen, &c. In one are kept the Vaſes, and other Works of different Metal; in another vaſt Quantities of the moſt beautiful Skins of various kinds; a third contains Habits furr'd with the Skins of gray Squirrels, Foxes, Ermins, and Sables, wherewith the Emperor ſometimes rewards his Servants. There is one for precious Stones, curious Marbles, and Pearls which are found in Tartary. The greateſt of all, conſiſting of two low Stories, is full of Preſſes, where the Silks are kept, made on purpoſe for the Uſe of the Emperor and his Family, at Nan-king, Hang-chew, and Sû-chew; theſe are the beſt in all the Empire, becauſe they are manufactur'd under the Care and Inſpection of a Mandarin, who preſides over thoſe Works, and would be puniſh'd if they were not finiſh'd in the greateſt Perfection.

of

Magazines.

In the other Store-houſes are repoſited Arrows, Bows, and Saddles, which have either been made at Pe-king, brought from foreign Countries, or preſented by great Princes, and ſet apart for the Uſe of the Emperor and his Children; there is one alſo where they collect the beſt Tea, of every kind that China produces, with various Simples, and other the moſt eſteemed Druggs.

This Gallery has five Doors, one to the Eaſt, another to the Weſt, and three in the South Front. Thoſe in the middle are never open'd but for the Emperor; the Mandarins, who come to perform the Ceremony before the Imperial Hall, entring by the Side Doors.

There is nothing extraordinary in this Front; it has a large Court, into which one deſcends by a Marble Stair-Caſe, adorn'd with two great Lions of Copper, and a Baluſtrade of white Marble; it is made in form of a Horſe-ſhoe, on the Side of a little Serpentine River, which runs thro' the Palace, and has Bridges over it of the ſame Materials. It would be endleſs to deſcribe the reſt of the Buildings belonging to this vaſt Palace, but as theſe are the moſt magnificent in the Judgment of the Chineſe and Tartars, they may ſuffice to give the Reader an Idea of the whole.

Palaces of the Emperor's Children.

The Palaces of the Emperor's Children and the other Princes of the Blood, are very neat within, vaſtly large, and built at a great Expence; the ſame Manner runs thro' the whole, both as to the Body of the Work and Embelliſhments. It is a Series of Courts, adorn'd on the Sides with Buildings, and in Front with a varniſh'd Hall, rais'd on a Platform, three or four Feet high, which is border'd with great ſquare Blocks of hewn Stone, and paved with large ſquare Tiles; the Gates generally open into little Streets not much frequented, and have no other Ornaments than two Lions of Braſs or white Stone of very indifferent Workmanſhip, without any Order of Architecture, or Sculpture in Stone, ſuch as is found in the Triumphal Arches.

I ſhall enlarge no farther on this ſuperb Edifice, (the only one throughout that great City, which deſerves Attention) the rather becauſe I ſhall ſpeak of it in another Place. What I ſhall ſay of it there, with the Deſcription I have already given of it, will ſuffice to make it tolerably well known to the Reader.

the Supreme Tribunals of the Empire.

The Tribunals of the ſupreme Juriſdictions are alſo vaſtly large, but ill built, and worſe kept in Repair; they are in no wiſe ſuitable to the Majeſty of the Empire; there are ſix of them, which I but juſt mention here, becauſe I ſhall hereafter ſpeak of them more at large.

The firſt, the Lzhi-pû, propoſes the Mandarins who are to govern the People.

The ſecond, Hû-pû, has the Charge of the Tributes.

The third, Li-pû, is for maintaining the Cuſtoms and Rites of the Empire.

The fourth, Ping-pû, has Care of the Troops and Poſts which are on all the great Roads, and maintain'd at the Emperor's Expence.

The fifth, the Hing-pû, determines Criminal Cauſes.

The laſt, Kong-pû, has the Inſpection of the publick Works.

All theſe Tribunals are divided into different Chambers, among which the Buſineſs is diſtributed; their Number is not the ſame in every Tribunal, ſome of them having much leſs to do than others.

Under theſe ſix ſovereign Courts are alſo divers other Tribunals, which depend on them; for Inſtance, the Kin-tyen-kycn, or Tribunal of the Mathematics, is ſubordinate to that of the Li-pû; it is alſo divided into two Chambers, whereof the principal and moſt numerous, call'd Li-ko, is ſolely employ'd about calculating the Motion of the Stars, and Aſtronomical Affairs: the other named Lû-ko, beſides other Buſineſs more peculiar to it, is employed to determine the proper Days for Marriages, Burials, and other Civil Affairs; about which they give themſelves but little Trouble, copying for the moſt part an ancient Chineſe Book, wherein almoſt all theſe things are already ſettled according to the Year of the Sexagenary Cycle or Chineſe Century.

Theſe ſix ſupreme Juriſdictions never meddle with Affairs of State, but when remitted to them by the Emperor, with Orders to deliberate thereon; for then ſtanding in need of each other, they are oblig'd to agree together, to the end that the Money, Troops, Officers and Equipages may be ready at the time appointed: Excepting in ſuch Caſes, each Court confines itſelf wholly to the Affairs belonging to it, and certainly has enough to do, in an Empire of ſuch vaſt Extent as China. If the different Functions of repairing public Works, the Government of the Forces, the Regulation of the Revenue, the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, and above all the Choice of Magiſtrates, were all united in one Tribunal, it would without doubt produce great Confuſion in the Reſolutions, and a Slowneſs in Proceedings, which would ruin Affairs; for this Reaſon it was neceſſary to encreaſe the Number of Mandarins, both at Court and in the Provinces.

But as in ſo great a multitude it would be difficult to find out the proper Perſon with whom one has Buſineſs; to remedy this Inconvenience, there is a Book ſold, which may be call'd the Preſent State of China, containing the Names, Sirnames and Employments of all the Officers, and diſtinguiſhing whether they are Chineſe or Tartars, Bachelors or Doctors, &c. It takes particular Notice alſo of the Changes made with reſpect to the Officers of the Army, as well thoſe that are in Garriſon, as in the Field; and to ſpecify theſe Changes, without re-printing the Book, they make uſe of moveable Characters.

Emperor's Life-Guard.

All the Tartar Families live in or about Pe-king, and are not permitted to remove from thence without the Emperor's ſpecial Order; hence it is, that the Tartar Troops, which compoſe the Emperor's

Prov. I. Pe-che-li.

Emperor's Life Guard, are always in a manner near his Perſon; here are alſo found ſome Chineſe Troops, who formerly liſted themſelves under the Tartar Banners, and were for that Reaſon call'd the Tartarized Chineſe; they are very well paid, and are always ready to fly on the firſt Order to extinguiſh the Flames of Sedition, wherever they break out, with ſurprizing Secrecy and Expedition.

Theſe Troops are divided into 8 Bodies, each of which has a Banner, diſtinguiſh'd either by the Colour, viz. yellow, white, red and blew, or by the Borders, which are all red, excepting that of the red Banner, whoſe Border is white; green is the Colour belonging to the Troops that are entirely Chineſe, which are thence call'd Lŭ-ki, or the Soldiers of the Green Banner.

Every Tartar Banner has its General, named in the Manchew Language Kûſanta, who has under him certain great Officers, called Meyreynchain, who are like our Lieutenant-Generals, and have under them ſeveral other Officers ſubordinate to each other.

As each Body at preſent is compoſed of Manchew Tartars, Mongul Tartars, and Tartarized Chineſe, the General has under him two General Officers of each Nation, and theſe Officers have likewiſe Subalterns of the ſame Nation. Each Body conſiſts of 10,000 effective Men, divided into 100 Nurû's, or Companies, of 100 Soldiers each (N); ſo that if we reckon the Emperor's Houſehold and thoſe of the Princes, who have their Servants, Po zho nurû with the Pay of the Officers and Soldiers, the common Opinion may be readily allow'd to be true, viz. that there are always 100,000 Horſe at Pe-king.

Forces of the Empire.

We may hence form an Idea of the Forces of the Empire; for if to the Cavalry, already ſpoken of, we add the Infantry which are at Pe-king, thoſe poſted along the Great Wall, (in the innumerable Forts built for its Defence, tho' leſs numerous at preſent than when the Country was in Danger of Invaſions from the Tartars) together with the reſt of the Forces diſpers'd all over the Empire, it will be found that the Number, agreeable to the common Calculation, amounts to at leaſt 600,000 Men: So that China may be ſaid to keep on Foot in time of the profoundeſt Peace, an Army able to reſiſt the moſt formidable Powers, purely to maintain the public Tranquillity, to provide againſt Seditions, and extinguiſh the ſmalleſt Sparks of Rebellion.

Such a vaſt Body as China muſt needs be terribly agitated when once it is in Motion, ſo that it is the whole Policy of the Chineſe Magiſtrates, to prevent and ſuppreſs Inſurrections as ſoon as poſſible. No Favour is to be expected for a Mandarin whoſe People revolt; let him be ever ſo innocent, he is conſider'd as a Man of no Capacity, and the ſmalleſt Puniſhment that can befal him is, to be diſcharg'd from his Employment, by the Tribunal of the Court, to which ſuch Cauſes are always tranſmitted by the Vice-Roys and Governors of Provinces; and thoſe Tribunals deliberate on the Informations, and preſent their Report to the Emperor, who either confirms or rejects it.

Theſe ſovereign Courts have no Superior, except the Emperor or the Great Council; when that Prince thinks fit to aſſemble it on ſome important Affair, already determined by one of thoſe Courts, they preſent their Petitions on the Days appointed, and often confer with the Emperor himſelf, who either approves of or rejects them, by ſigning them with his own Hand. But if he retains them, they wait ſome time for his Orders, which is communicated to them by the Great Mandarin, called in Chineſe, Ko-lau, and in Tartarian, Aliagata.

Form of Petitions.

The Petitions preſented by the Preſidents of theſe ſupreme Courts, who are call'd in Chineſe, Shang-ſhu, and in Tartarian, Aliagamba, ought to have the Subject, which it relates to, ſpecify'd in the Title, and to end with the Opinion of the Court, to which the Affair belongs.

The Emperor diſpoſes in the ſame Manner of all the Employments of the Empire, without being oblig'd to confer them on the Perſons propoſed by the Tribunals, altho' he generally confirms their Choice, after he has himſelf examined thoſe to whom the Employments fell by Lot, in the Manner hereafter explained. As to the principal Poſts of Tſong-tû, Vice-Roy, &c. they are always nominated by the Emperor himſelf.

Emperor's Application to Affairs of Government.

It will ſcarce be believ'd, that the preſent Emperor condeſcends to examine himſelf ſuch Crowds of Mandarins, whereof every Day ſome are advanc'd to higher Employments, and others are Candidates for them; nevertheleſs, it is certainly true, and this ſhews his Care in governing the State: He will ſee every thing with his own Eyes (O), and he will truſt nobody in chooſing Magiſtrates for his People.

Prerogative.

His Authority is abſolute, and almoſt unlimited. A Prince of the Imperial Houſe can neither aſſume the Titles, nor receive the Honours due to him as ſuch, without the Emperor's Permiſſion. When his Conduct does not anſwer the Expectation of the Public, he loſes his Dignity and Revenues by order of the Emperor, and is no longer diſtinguiſh'd, except by the Yellow Girdle, worn by Men and Women of the Imperial Blood, who are allow'd but a moderate Penſion out of the Royal Treaſury.

Cenſors of the Empire.

The Laws allow no way of applying againſt the Abuſe of Authority, but by Remonſtrance. Theſe Laws have eſtabliſh'd publick Cenſors, whoſe Duty it is to give Information to the Emperor by Petitions, which are diſpers'd thro' the Empire, and cannot be rejected by him, without hurting his Reputation; beſides, the Chineſe having annext an Idea of Heroic Bravery to that Employment,

(N) As Tenghiz khan is remark'd to have eſtabliſh'd the ſame ſort of Order among his Troops, it would be worth enquiry, whether he took it from, or communicated it to the Chineſe Tartars.

(O) This may well ſeem incredible in a Monarch of ſo vaſt an Empire, when the petty Princes of Europe are ſo much taken up with other Affairs, that they have not Leiſure to look into thoſe of State.

ployment, ſhould the Emperor treat them ill, he would do them the greateſt Honour, and draw on himſelf odious Names, which the Hiſtorians would with great Care tranſmit to Poſterity.

PROV. I. Pe-che-li.

In ſhort, theſe Cenſors ſeldom or never change their Reſolution. If the Court or the Great Tribunals ſeek to elude the Juſtice of their Complaints, by ſome Rebuff, they return to the Charge, and make it appear that they have not anſwer'd conformable to the Laws. Some of them have perſever'd two whole Years in accuſing a Vice-Roy ſupported by the Grandees, and without being diſcourag'd by Delays and Oppoſition, or frighted by the moſt terrifying Menaces, have at length compell'd the Court to degrade him, to avoid diſguſting the People, and ſullying its own Reputation.

Their Intrepidity.

But if in this ſort of Combat between the Prince and State, in the Name of which the Cenſor ſpeaks, the Prince happens to yield, he immediately receives the Praiſes of the Public in their Addreſſes, and is loaded with Elogies by the whole Empire; the ſovereign Courts of Pe-king return him their Thanks, and what he has done for Juſtice, is look'd on as a ſingular Favour.

It is owing to this good Order obſerv'd at Pe-king, and which influences the other Cities, that the Empire enjoys ſuch a happy Tranquillity and long Peace. This Bleſſing may alſo be attributed in ſome meaſure to the favourable Situation of China, whoſe Neighbours conſiſt of Nations not very populous, half Barbarians, and incapable of attempting any thing to the Prejudice of ſuch a mighty State, while its Forces are well united under the Authority of its Sovereign. The Manchews, who conquer'd it, took Advantage of the Troubles of the Realm, which was fill'd with Rebels and Robbers; and were brought in by the faithful Chineſe, who were deſirous to revenge the Death of their Emperor.

I could not forbear enlarging in my Account of this Capital, becauſe it is, as it were, the Soul of this great Empire, puts it in Motion, and keeps all the Parts of it in Order; but I ſhall be much briefer in ſpeaking of the other Cities, eſpecially thoſe, which have nothing more than ordinary to recommend them. I ſhall only add, that beſides the general Juriſdiction which Pe-king has over the whole Empire by its ſix Supreme Courts, it has alſo, like the other Capitals of Provinces, a particular Diſtrict, which comprehends 26 Cities, whereof ſix are of the ſecond, and twenty of the third Rank.

The Second City, Pau-ting-fu.

Pau-ting-fu is the Reſidence of the Vice-Roy of this Province; it has three Cities of the ſecond Rank, and ſeventeen of the third, within its Diſtrict, which is very agreeable and fruitful. In the midſt of the City there is a little Lake, famous for the great Quantity of thoſe Flowers, elſewhere deſcribed (P), which the Chineſe call Lyen-wha.

Pau-ting-fu.

The Lyen-wha or Water-Lilly.

In travelling from Pe-king into the Province of Shan-ſi, one is obliged to paſs thro' this City; it is one of the moſt pleaſant Journeys imaginable; all the Country is flat, and well cultivated; the Road even, and planted with Trees in ſeveral Places, with Walls to cover and defend the Fields; Men, Carts, and Beaſts of Burthen are continually paſſing backwards and forwards. In the Space of a ſingle League you paſs thro' two or three Villages, without reckoning thoſe you ſee on all ſides. The Rivers are cover'd with very handſome Bridges of ſeveral Arches.

The Third City, Ho-kyen-fu.

THIS City has its Name from its being ſituated between two Rivers. Its Walls are built in a Line, handſome, high, and in good Repair; it is reckon'd almoſt four Miles in Compaſs. On it depend two Cities of the ſecond Order, and fifteen of the third. Its Rivers are ſtor'd with good Fiſh, beſides the Cray-Fiſh, which are very plenty, and exceeding delicious.

Ho-kyen-fu.

The Fourth City, Chin-ting-fu.

THIS is a great City, almoſt four Miles in Compaſs; its Figure approaches an oblong Square; the Walls are handſome, and flank'd with ſquare Towers at certain Diſtances; it ſtands pretty near a fine River, which a few Leagues from thence falls into the Lake Pay-hû.

Chin-ting-fu.

Its Juriſdiction is very large, comprehending thirty two Cities, five of the ſecond, and twenty ſeven of the third Rank. To the North of it are Mountains, where the Chineſe pretend, abundance of Simples and uncommon medicinal Herbs are found. Certain Monuments or Temples are ſeen there, built in Honour of their Heroes, and, among others, one conſecrated to the Memory of the firſt Emperor of the Dynaſty of the Han.

The Fifth City, Shun-te-fu.

THE Diſtrict of this City is not very extenſive, containing only nine, but they are very famous and populous Cities, of the third Order. The Country is render'd very charming and fertile, by the plenty of Water; the Rivers afford divers ſorts of good Fiſh. A very fine Sand is found found there, which is uſed in poliſhing precious Stones, and ſold all over the Empire; they alſo make China Ware of it, but far ſhort for Beauty of that made at King-te-ching, a Borough in the Province of Kyang-ſi. Shun-te-fu alſo produces Touch-Stones for Gold, reckon'd the beſt in the whole Empire.

Shun te-fu.

Prov. I. Pe-che-li.

The Sixth City, Quang-ping-fu.

Quang-ping-fu.

THIS City is ſituated in the Southern Part of Pe-che-li, between the Provinces of Shan-tong and Ho-nan; it has but nine Cities of the third Rank in its Dependance; its Territory is water'd by ſeveral Rivers, which breed very good Fiſh; the Country is agreeable and fertile: It has otherwiſe nothing to diſtinguiſh it from other Cities.

The Seventh City, Tay-ming-fu.

Tay-ming-fu.

THIS City as well as the former, which lies near it, has nothing extraordinary to boaſt of; but the Country is more fruitfull and agreeable, and the Rivers equally full of Fiſh; it has under its Juriſdiction only one City of the ſecond Rank, and eighteen of the third.

The Eight City, Yung-ping-fu.

Yung-ping-fu.

THIS City is advantageouſly ſituated, but its Juriſdiction not large, extending only over one City of the ſecond, and five of the third Order; it is encompaſs'd by the Sea, by Rivers, and by Mountains cover'd with very fair Trees; its Soil is not very fertile, but that Defect is ſupply'd by the neighbouring Bay, which furniſhes it with Plenty of all ſorts of Neceſſaries.

Shan-hay Fort.

Not far from this City is a Fort named Shan-hay, which is as it were the Key of the Province of Lyau-tong; it ſtands near the Great Wall, which, before it aſcends the Hills, extends from the Bulwark built in the Sea, for the Space of a League, in a plain Country.

The Ninth City, Swen-wha-fu.

Swen-wha-fu.

THE Largeneſs of this City, Number of Inhabitants, Beauty of its Streets, and Triumphal Arches, render it conſiderable; it is ſeated amidſt Mountains, and not far from the Great Wall; two Cities of the ſecond, and eight of the third Rank are under its Juriſdiction; beſides ſome Places or Forts along the Wall, which are provided with numerous Garriſons for defending the Entrance into China from Tartary. Its Mountains afford fine Cryſtal, Marble, and Porphyry.

Yellow Rats.

Among the Animals which this Country produces, there are abundance of yellow Rats, larger than thoſe of Europe; their Skins are in great Requeſt with the Chineſe.

Forts in Pe-che-li, along the Great Wall.

Beſides the Fort of Shan-hay above-mention'd, which defends the Paſſage from Lyau-tong into Pe-che-li, the Gates of the Great Wall are defended on the Inſide with ſeveral pretty large Forts, viz. Hi-fong-kew, at 40° 26′ (P), Kû-pe-kew, at 40° 43′ the Emperor uſually paſſes thro' this Gate, when he goes to hunt in Tartary; Tu-ſhe-kew, at 41° 19′ 20″; and Chang-kya-kew, in 40° 51′ 15″ (P); theſe two laſt Entrances are famous, becauſe the Roads which the Tartars, (who are in Subjection to the Empire) take to come to Pe-king, lye thro' them. All the Places along the Great Wall in this Province, are built with Earth, and caſed on both Sides with Brick.

Tyen-tſing-wey.

It would be endleſs and tireſome to give an account of the Cities of the ſecond and third Rank; however I cannot omit one, which, tho' without any Juriſdiction over others, has beyond Compariſon a greater Trade, is more populous and rich than moſt of the Cities before deſcribed; it is named Tyen-tſing-wey, raiſed ſince the Map was made to the Rank of Chew, or Cities of the ſecond Order.

It is ſeated in the Place where the Royal Canal, which comes from Lin-tſin-chew, joins the River of Pe-king. A great Mandarin, named Yen-ywen-i, reſides there, on whom the Officers depend, that ſuperintend the Salt made along the Coaſts of the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shan-tong. All the Ships that fetch Timber from Eaſtern Tartary for Carpenters Work, after croſſing the Gulf of Lyau-tong, named Tyen-tung-wey, come and unload in this Port (Q), which is but 20 Leagues diſtant from Pe-king.

PROVINCE II. KYANG-NAN.

Prov. II. Kyang-nan.

THIS Province which is one of the moſt fertile, trading, and conſequently wealthy of the Empire, is bounded on the Weſt by that of Ho-nan and Hû-quang, on the South by Che-kyang and Kyang-ſi, on the Eaſt by the Gulf of Nan-king, and on the North by Shan-tong. Bounds.

The ancient Emperors conſtantly kept their Courts there, till Reaſons of State obliged them to remove nearer Tartary, and chooſe Pe-king. It is of vaſt Extent, containing fourteen Cities of the firſt, and ninety three of the ſecond and third Rank, all the moſt populous and famous in the Empire, eſpecially for Trade. It is the Reſort of all the Great Barks, for the Country is full of Lakes, Rivers, and Canals, either natural or artificial; which have a Communication with the Great River, Yang-tſe-kyang, that runs thro' the Province, where there are few Mountains to be ſeen, except towards the South. Extent and Number of Cities.

The Silks, varniſh'd Works, Ink, Paper, and in general every thing that comes, both from Nan-king and the other Cities of the Province, which carry on an aſtoniſhing Trade, is much more eſteem'd and dear, than what is brought from other Provinces. In the City Shang-hay only, and the Villages belonging to it, they reckon above 200,000 Weavers of Callico. Commodities and Trade.

The Sea Coaſt in ſeveral Parts abounds with Salt Pits, the Salt whereof is diſperſed almoſt thro' the Empire; a great Quantity of Marble is alſo found there. In ſhort, this Province is ſo plentiful and rich, that it yields annually about 32 Millions of Taëls (*), excluſive of the Duties ariſing from every thing either exported or imported, for receiving of which ſeveral Offices are eſtabliſh'd. Salt Pits.

The Inhabitants of Kyang-nan are civil and polite; they are exceeding ingenious, and have a more than ordinary Inclination for the Sciences; hence this Province is remarkable for producing a great Number of Doctors, who by their Merit attain to the Offices and Dignities of the Empire. Character of the People.

The Province is divided into two Governments; the Eaſtern, the Governor whereof reſides at Sû-chew-fû; and the Weſtern, whoſe Governor has his Seat at Ngan-king-fû, each Government has ſeven Fû or Cities of the firſt Rank within its Juriſdiction. Diviſion.

The Firſt City, Kyang-ning-fu, or Nan-king, Capital of the Province.

IF we may believe the ancient Chineſe, this City was once the fineſt in the World; when they ſpeak of its Magnitude, they ſay, that if two Horſemen went out in the Morning by the ſame Gate, and were ordered to gallop round it different Ways, they would not meet till the Evening. It is certainly the greateſt City in China, its Walls are 67 Li in Compaſs, according to the Meaſure we took of it when we made the Plan, which amount to near 5 great Leagues and an half and 466 Fathom. Nan-king. See Plate V. its Magnitude.

It ſtands but one League from the great Yang-tſe-kyang, from which River Barks come up to it by means of ſeveral Canals, that end at the City; one ſees on theſe Canals Numbers of Imperial Barks, almoſt as large as our middling Ships.

The Figure of Nan-king is irregular, the Hills that are within it, and the Nature of its Soil is ſuch, that it could not be otherwiſe without great Inconveniencies. It was formerly the Imperial City, whence it has the Name of Nan-king, that is the Southern Court, as Pe-king ſignifies the Northern Court; but ſince the ſix great Tribunals, which then were in both thoſe Cities, are all tranſlated to Pe-king, the Emperor has given it the Name of Kyang-ning: it is ſtill in Diſcourſe called by its old Name; but it is never ſuffer'd to be mention'd in the publick Inſtruments. Figure. Name.

This City is much fallen from its ancient Splendor, no Footſteps appear of its Magnificent Palace; its Obſervatory is now neglected, and almoſt deſtroy'd; nothing but the Memory of its Temples, Sepulchres of Emperors, and other ſuperb Monuments remain; being all demoliſh'd by the Tartars who firſt invaded the Empire, to gratify their Avarice and hatred to the Dynaſty then reigning. About one third of it is quite waſte, but the reſt very well inhabited; ſo great a Trade, and ſuch Numbers of People are ſeen in ſome Parts of it, that one would ſcarce believe there is a greater Hurry any where: this would be ſtill more extraordinary, were the Streets as broad as thoſe of Pe-king, which they are not by one half; Nevertheleſs they are ſufficiently handſome, well pav'd, and adorn'd on both Sides with neat Shops richly furniſh'd. State.

In this City one of the great Mandarins reſides, named Tſong tû, before whom are brought important Matters, not only from the Tribunals of both the Governors of the Province, but alſo from that of the Governor of Kyang-ſi. The Tartars have alſo a numerous Garriſon here, under a General of their own Nation, and poſſeſs one Part of the City, ſeparated from the reſt by a ſingle Wall. Government.

The Palaces where both the Tartar and Chineſe Mandarins dwell, are neither ſo ſpacious nor well built as thoſe of the Capitals of the reſt of the Provinces. One ſees no publick Buildings there, anſwering to the Reputation of ſo famous a City, except its Gates, which are Publick Structures.

(*) A Taël is the Value of an Ounce of Silver, and this Ounce in China is equivalent to 7 Livers 10 Sols French, at this Time [that is about 8 Shillings 7 Pence Engliſh.]

exceeding beautiful, and ſome Idol Temples: Such is that where ſtands the famous Porcelain Tower; it is of an Octogonal Figure, each ſide being fifteen Feet in Front; it is twenty Chineſe Fathom high, that is two hundred Feet, and divided into nine Stories, by ſingle Floors within, and without by Corniſhes at the Riſe of Arches, which ſuſtain little Roofs, cover'd with Tiles done over with green varniſh. I ſhall give a Deſcription of it in another Place. This Tower is without Diſpute the talleſt and moſt beautiful of all thoſe to be ſeen in China; where this ſort of Works, named Ta, are ſo common, that in ſeveral Provinces, one meets with them in almoſt every City, and even in the great Towns.

That which renders alſo this City famous, is the great Care it takes to cultivate the Sciences: It ſingly furniſhes more Doctors and great Mandarins, than ſeveral Cities together; the Libraries here are more numerous, the Book-ſellers Shops better furniſh'd, the Printing more beautiful, and the Paper better than any where in the Empire beſides.

Artificial Flowers.

Nothing can be more natural than the artificial Flowers made here of the Pith of a Tree call'd Tong-tſau; this is at preſent become a particular Manufacture, which has increas'd to that Degree in China, within theſe few Years, that there is a great Trade driven with them.

The Satins of Nan-king, which are call'd Twan-tſe, as well thoſe that are flowerd as not, are the beſt and moſt eſteem'd at Pe-king, where thoſe of Kanton are much cheaper; pretty good Woolen Cloath alſo is made here, which is call'd, from the Name of the Town, Nan-king-ſhen. That which is to be found in ſome other Cities is not to be compared to it, as being ſcarce any thing elſe than Felt made without weaving.

Ink.

The Ink, call'd the Ink of Nan king, comes all from Whey-chew, in the ſame Province. Its Diſtrict is full of great Villages, almoſt wholly peopled with thoſe who make or ſell theſe Sticks of Ink which are often adorn'd with green, blew or gilded Flowers; they are of all ſorts of Figures, as Books, Joints of Bambu, Lions, &c.

The Breadth and Depth of the Yang-tſe-kyang render'd Nan-king formerly an excellent Port: The famous Corſair, who beſieg'd it in the late Troubles, paſs'd eaſily up to it; but at preſent the great Barks, or rather the Chineſe Veſſels of Carriage, do not enter the River, either becauſe the Mouth is ſtopp'd up of itſelf, or that the Chineſe out of Policy make no more uſe of it, that the Knowledge of it by Deſcees may be loſt.

Fiſhery in April and May.

In April and May, abundance of excellent Fiſh is caught near the City; during this Seaſon ſome of them are convey'd to the Court, cover'd with Ice, which keeps them freſh, in Barks appointed ſolely for that uſe; theſe make ſuch Speed, that in eight or ten Days time, ſailing continually Day and Night, they arrive at Pe-king, tho' it be more than two hundred great Leagues diſtant; for greater Expedition there are Stages all the Way, where the Men are reliev'd. So long as the Fiſhing laſts, two Barks depart from Nan-king, twice a Week, loaden with Fiſh.

Tho' Nan-king is the Capital of the whole Province, it has no more than eight Cities of the third Rank under its Juriſdiction.

The Second City, Su-chew-fu, Capital of I-tong, or the Eaſtern Part of the Province.

Delightful Situation.

THIS is one of the moſt beautiful and pleaſant Cities in all China; the Europeans, who have ſeen it, compare it to Venice, with this Difference, that Venice ſtands in the midſt of the Sea, and Sû-chew in freſh Water. One may paſs thro' the Streets here both by Water and Land; the Branches of the River and Canals are almoſt all capable of bearing the largeſt Barks, which may even ſail thro' the City, and arrive at the Sea in two Days at moſt.

Trade with Japan.

It carries on a Trade, not only with all the Provinces of the Empire, but alſo with Japan; from which it is ſeparated only by an Arm of the Sea (s), which the little Merchant Ships croſs ſome times in two or three Days.

Its diſtrict.

There is no Country that is more charming, in reſpect of Situation and Climate; that is more populous and thick ſet with Towns and Boroughs, which are ever in Sight; that is better improv'd, there not being an Inch of Ground, but what produces Fruit, Corn or Rice; and laſtly, that more abounds with Rivers, Canals, Lakes, and eſpecially Barks of all Sorts, and Sizes, painted or gilded: ſome full of Perſons of Quality, who are lodg'd in them more decently than in their own Houſes; others loaded with rich Commodities, and ſeveral deſign'd purely for Recreation.

Paradiſe of China.

This City, like Hang-chew in the Province of Che-kyang, is properly a City of Pleaſure; it wants nothing that can contribute to make Life delightful; hence we find an ancient Proverb in the Chineſe Books, Shang yew tyen tang, Hya yew Sû Hang, that is, Above is Paradiſe, below Sû chew and Hang chew; in Effect it may be ſaid that theſe two Cities are the Terreſtial Paradiſe of China.

This City, like Hang-chew, and ſome others of the Empire, may be reckoned three Cities: one within the Walls, which are reputed more than four Leagues in Compaſs; another in the Suburbs, which extend a great way on both ſides of the Canals; and a third in the Barks, which are ſo many floating Houſes, rang'd on the Water for more than a League together in ſeveral Rows; many of theſe Barks equal our third Rate Ships in Bulk.

(s) The Author is to be underſtood here of the Diſtrict of the City, and not of the City itſelf, which he ſeems to confound together, as he does in many other Places; whence it ſeems that this Deſcription is an Abſtract from a more complete one.

The

The whole together yields a Proſpect, which cannot well be deſcrib'd, and muſt be view'd in order to judge how agreeable it is. This great City has but ſix Gates to the Landward, and as many towards the Water. To behold the immenſe Numbers of People that are here continually in Motion, and the Throngs there are in every Place, of thoſe who come to buy and ſell, one would imagine that the Inhabitants of all the Provinces came to trade at Sû-chew. The Embroideries and Brocades that are made at this Place, are in Requeſt throughout the whole Empire, becauſe the Work is good and cheap. It is the Seat of the Vice-Roy of the Eaſtern part of this Province, whoſe particular Juriſdiction contains eight Cities, whereof one is of the ſecond Order, and ſeven of the third; they are all very handſome, and a League and an half or two Leagues in Compaſs each.

The third City, Song-kyang-fu.

Song-kyang-fu.

THIS City is built in the Water, and the Chineſe Ships, or rather Veſſels of Carriage, enter it on every Side, and ſo paſs to the Sea, which is not far diſtant. The extraordinary Quantity of Cotton, and lovely Callico's of all ſorts, wherewith it furniſhes not only the Empire, but alſo foreign Countries, render it famous, and of very great Reſort. Theſe Callico's are ſo exceeding fine, that when they are dyed, one would take them for the fineſt Serge.

It has but four Cities under its Juriſdiction, but it is neither the leſs fertile nor rich on that Score: for, tho' theſe Cities are of the third Order, they may compare with the beſt for Magnitude, the extraordinary reſort of Merchants from all Parts throughout the Year, and the different ſorts of Commerce carry'd on there; ſuch is for inſtance the City of Shan-hay-hyen, where Ships from Fo-kyen are continually entring, and others ſailing out to trade with Japan.

Shang-hay-hyen.

The Fourth City, Chang-chew-fu. (T)

Chang-chew-fû.

THIS is a famous City, and of great Trade, ſituate near the Canal, by which the Barks ſail from Sû-chew into the Yang-tſe-kyang; it is adorn'd with ſeveral Triumphal Arches, and the Sides of the Canal, which lead to it, are lined with hewn Stone. Its Diſtrict contains only five Cities of the third Order, but moſt of them are very fair and well peopled. Vû-ſi-hyen (U) for Example, is a good League and an half in Compaſs, Excluſive of the Suburbs, which are a Mile and an half in Length; it is ſurrounded with a great Ditch in form of a Canal; the Walls are twenty five Feet high, and kept in very good Order; the Waters wherewith it abounds are very good, eſpecially for Tea, to which it gives a very agreeable Flavour, not to be found elſewhere.

Vû-ſi-hyen.

In another City of the ſame Diſtrict, China Ware is made, which, according to them, adds an admirable Smell to the Water us'd for Tea; whence it is preferr'd to the beſt Porcelain of King-te-ching, and brings a conſiderable Trade to the Town.

The Fifth City, Chin-kyang-fu.

Ching-kyang-fû.

THIS is none of the largeſt Cities in the Province, for it is ſcarce three Miles in Compaſs; but it is one of the moſt conſiderable, on account of its Situation and Trade, being one of the Keys of the Empire towards the Sea, and at the ſame time a Place of Defence, where there is a Strong Garriſon; its Walls in ſeveral Places are above thirty Feet in height, and made of Brick, which are at leaſt four or five Inches thick; the Streets of the City and Suburbs are paved with Marble. It ſtands on the ſides of the Ta-kyang (W), which, in this Place, is a Mile and an half broad, and to the Eaſt of a Canal, which they have cut as far as the River.

Six Paces from the Bank, in the River, ſtands a Hill, call'd Kin-ſhan or Golden Hill, becauſe of its agreeable Situation; on the Top of it is a Tower ſeveral Stories high. This Iſland is at leaſt five hundred Paces round, and has its Shores beſet with Idol Temples, and Houſes of Bonzas.

Kin-ſhan.

Oppoſite on the other ſide of the River ſtands Qua-chew; which, tho' it has not the Denomination of a City, and paſſes for no more than a Ma-tew, or Place of Trade, yet it is as conſiderable as the greateſt Cities.

Qua-chew.

The Suburbs of Chin-kyang are a Geometrical Mile in Length, and as populous as the City itſelf, from which they paſs to them over Stone Bridges. There is ſo great a Throng of People in the Streets, and eſpecially at its Port, that one can ſcarce ſqueeze thro' them. There are ſome very agreeable Hills near the Town. Its Juriſdiction is but ſmall, extending over no more than three Cities of the third Rank.

The Sixth City, Whay-ngan-fu.

Whay-ngan-fû.

THIS City, which is ſituate in a marſhy Place, and is incloſed with a triple Wall, is rich, tho' not very populous; it is in Danger of being drown'd, by the extraordinary Increaſe of Water, for the Ground it ſtands on is lower than the Canal, which in ſeveral Places is ſupported only

(T) in the French it is Tching-tcheou-fou, inſtead of Tchang-tcheou-fou, as it ought to be according to both the Map and the Catalogue of Cities before inſerted p. 5.

(U) In the Name of this City I follow the Map rather than the Text, where it is Printed Vouſſie hien, which according to the Engliſh Alphabet is written Vû-tſſe-hyen.

(W) Or Yang-tſe-kyang.

Prov. II. Kyang-nan.

only by Banks of Earth: But two Leagues off, it has a Borough belonging to it, named Tsing-kyang-pû, which is as it were the Port of the River Whang-ho; it is very large, and populous, and the People commonly very busy. There, one of the great Mandarins resides, named Tsong-ho, that is, the Surveyor General of the Rivers, or Grand Master of the Waters. This Mandarin has a great Number of Officers under him, who have each their Divisions, and convenient Stations allotted.

Mohammedans in China.

Beyond the Whang-ho there are certain Towns along the Canal, where the Mohammedans have unsuccessfully endeavour'd to draw a Trade; their Mosques are very high, and not built in the Chinese Taste. Notwithstanding they have been settled there for so many Generations, they are still considered as of foreign Original, and from time to time meet with Insults. A few Years ago at Hang kew in the Province of Hû-quang, the People, provok'd by the indiscreet Behaviour of some of them, destroy'd the Mosques which they had built there, in Spight of all the Magistrates could do.

Marble.

Marble is very common in the District of this City; the Plains produce plenty of Rice and Wheat, and are watered by Rivers and Lakes, where all sorts of Fish are caught. It has eleven subordinate Cities, two of the second, and nine of the third Rank.

The Seventh City, Yang-chew-fu.

Yang-chew-fû.

THE Air of this City is mild and temperate, the Soil agreeable and fertile; it is built on the side of the Royal Canal, which extends from the Ta-kyang, and runs Northward to the Whang-ho or Yellow River. It is a Place of great Trade, especially in all sorts of Chinese Manufactures.

Great Trade in Salt.

That which contributes most to rendering it so populous, is the Sale of Salt, which is made on the Sea Coast in all Parts of its District and Neighbourhood; whence it is convey'd hither by means of Canals made on Purpose, which enter the Great Canal, whereon there is no City as far as Pe-king, comparable to it. This Salt is transported by a great Number of rich Dealers into the Provinces lying in the Heart of the Empire and very far from the Sea.

The City is divided into several Parts by Canals; the People are so numerous, and the Canals cover'd so thick with Barks, that there is free Passage for nothing but absolute Necessaries; there is a Tartar Garrison in the Place.

Over-against the Eastern Part one sees a Bridge and large Suburbs; the Croud is so great at all times, that the Bridge is not large enough to let them pass; this has oblig'd them to settle a Ferry-Boat, thirty Paces farther, which scarce suffices to carry over the People that turn that Way, altho' the Passage is not above twenty Paces over.

Yang-chew, is two Leagues in Circumference, and, including the Suburbs, contains 200,000 Souls. It has only six Cities of the third Rank in its Dependance. The Inhabitants are great Lovers of Pleasure; they educate several young Girls, whom they teach to sing, to play on Instruments of Musick, to paint, and all other Accomplishments that render the Sex agreeable; and afterwards sell them at a great Price to the rich Lords, who place them among their Concubines, that is, their Second-Hand Wives.

The Eighth City, Ngan-king-fu, Capital of the Western Part [I-si.]

Ngan-king-fu.

IT S Situation is charming; it is near the Borders of three Provinces, and tho' it be but five Days Journey from the Capital, yet it has a particular Vice-Roy; this Mandarin keeps a great Garrison, in a Fort that commands the Lake Po-yang, at the Entrance of the Province of Kyang-si and of the River Yang-tse-kyang.

This City is very considerable, on account of its Riches and Trade; whatever is carry'd to Nan-king, passes thro' it; there are but six Cities of the third Rank in its District, which is a very open, agreeable and fertile Country.

The Ninth City, Whey-chew-fu

Whey-chew-fu.

IS the most Southern City in the Province, and one of the wealthiest in the Empire; the Air is wholesome and temperate, tho' it is encompass'd with Mountains. It has within its Jurisdiction no more than six Cities of the third Order. The Inhabitants are reckon'd very expert in Trade; there is not any City, be the Commerce ever so small, without some Dealers from Whey-chew; nor any Bank or Change, in which there are not some of its Inhabitants principally concern'd.

Best Indian Ink made here.

The People there are thrifty and live sparingly; but they are bold and enterprising in Business. In the Mountains there are Mines of Gold, Silver, and Copper; and they say, it is the Country that produces the best Tea. In this City also the best Ink in China is made, wherewith the Shop-keepers of Nan-king are furnish'd. Every body knows this Ink is not liquid like ours, but made up in little Sticks, on which the Makers cut divers Figures of Flowers, Animals, Anticks, &c.

The

The Art of making Ink, as well as all the other Arts which have a Relation to the Sciences, is honourable in China, where there is no attaining to the Dignities of the Empire, but by the Sciences. They alſo prefer all the varniſh'd Works that are made at Whey-chew, becauſe the Varniſh is more beautiful, and they have the Art of laying it on better there than any where elſe. The Earth whereof they make the China Ware, particularly at King-te-ching, is likewiſe found in the Diſtrict of this City, near the Borders of the Diſtrict of Zhau-chew, in the Province of Kyang-ſi.

PROV. II. Kyang-nan.

Beſt Varniſhed Work, and Earth for making China Ware.

The Tenth City, Ning-que-fu.

THIS City is ſituate on a fine River, which falls into the Yang-tſe-kyang. The Ground where it ſtands is uneven and rugged, becauſe ſurrounded with Hills; but its Hillocks afford an agreeable Proſpect, and its Mountains, which are all cover'd with Woods, furniſh the Botaniſts with excellent Medicinal Herbs. There are in this Place a great many Manufacturies for Paper, which is made of a kind of Reeds. It has under its Juriſdiction ſix Cities of the third Rank.

Ning-que-fu.

The Eleventh City, Chi-chew-fu,

PRESIDES likewiſe over ſix Hyen; it ſtands on the Side of the Yang-tſe-kyang (R), and tho' encompaſs'd with Hills, yet its Diſtrict is fruitful, and furniſhes plenty of all the Neceſſaries of Life; in caſe it ſhould want any, it may be ſupply'd by the Kyang, which is continually carrying on its Waters the Riches of ſeveral Provinces.

Chi-chew-fu.

The Twelfth City, Tay-ping-fu.

BY this City's being ſituate on the Yang-tſe-kyang, and by the Rivers wherewith its Plains are water'd, one may readily judge how eaſy it carries on Trade. It may be taken it in ſome meaſure for an Iſland, for it ſtands inclos'd by three Branches of Rivers, which fall into the Kyang; its Diſtrict contains only three Cities, whereof the moſt conſiderable for Riches is Vû-hû-hyen.

Tay-ping-fu.

The Thirteenth City, Fong-yang-fu.

IT ſtands on a Mountain, pretty near the Yellow River, and incloſes ſeveral little Hills within its Walls. Its Diſtrict is very large, comprehending eighteen Cities, whereof five are of the ſecond Rank, and 13 of the third; beſides a great Number of Ma-tew, or Places of Trade, ſettled on the River for the Conveniency of Merchants, and levying the Duties of the Empire. It is eighty Leagues from Eaſt to Weſt, and ſixty from North to South; ſo that is exceeds in Extent our greateſt Provinces of Europe.

Fong-yang-fu.

As this was the Birth Place of Hong-vû, firſt Emperor of the preceding Dynaſty, he reſolv'd to render it famous, by making it a ſtately City, and the Capital of the Empire, which he did in 1367. Having driven the Weſtern Tartars out of China, which they had been in Poſſeſſion of 87 Years, he fix'd his Court at this Place, and named it Fong-yang, that is, the Place of the Splendor of the Eagle. He deſign'd to have made it the moſt large and famous in the Empire; but the Unevenneſs of the Ground, the Want of freſh Water, and moſt of all, the Neighbourhood of his Father's Tomb, cauſed him to change his Reſolution; and by the unanimous Advice of his principal Officers he transferred his Seat to Nan-king, a more beautiful and commodious City, not above thirty two Leagues diſtant.

The Imperial Seat for a ſhort Space.

As ſoon as he had determin'd to quit it, a Stop was put to all the Works that were then going forward. The Imperial Palace, which was to have had a triple Incloſure; the Walls that were to have been nine Leagues in Compaſs, and the Canals which were mark'd out, were all abandon'd. There were but three Monuments finiſh'd, which are ſtill remaining; the Grandeur and Beauty whereof demonſtrate how magnificent that City would have been, had the Emperor purſu'd his firſt Deſign.

Magnificent Plan of a City.

The firſt of theſe Monuments, the Tomb of the Father of Hong-vû, is adorn'd with every thing the moſt beautiful in its kind, that the Chineſe Genius, and Filial Affection were able to invent; it is call'd Whang-lin, or the Royal Tomb.

The ſecond is a Tower, built in the midſt of the City; it is the Figure of an oblong Square, a hundred Feet in Height, divided into four large Stories, raiſed on a Maſſive pile of Brick-work, forty Foot high, a hundred long, and ſixty broad; it is, they ſay, the higheſt Structure in China, and is ſeen at a great Diſtance.

The third is a ſumptuous Temple, erected to the Idol Fo; it was at firſt a little Pagod, where Hong-vû, after having loſt his Parents, retired at the Age of ſeventeen and ſerved for ſome Years as Scullionin the Kitchen; being weary of ſuch a ſlothful Life, he liſted himſelf a Soldier under one of the Chiefs of the Robbers, who had revolted againſt the Tartars. He soon gave Proofs of his Valour, and the Chief, whose Esteem he had gain'd, gave him his Daughter in Marriage; shortly after he was declared his Successor by the unanimous Consent of the Troops.

(R) According to the Map, this City ſtands a Mile, or a Mile and an half from the Kyang on the Eaſt Side.

Prov. II. Kyang-nan.

Upon this seeing himself at the Head of a considerable Party, he aspired to no less than the Throne; his Reputation had already brought a great Number of brave Men into his Army, at the Head of which he attack'd the Tartars briskly, defeated them, and took Nan-king, with several other neighbouring Cities. He did not stay long there, but never ceased pursuing the Tartars till he had driven them entirely out of China. So many Battles he fought were so many Victories, whence he got the Name of Hong-vû, which signifies, a Prince of Valour, that triumphs over every thing.

Stately Temple.

As soon as he came to the Throne, more out of Acknowledgment to those who had entertain'd him in his Misery, than any Trust he put in Idols, he caused the sumptuous Temple I have been speaking of, to be built in Favour of the Bonzas; it begins by a Row of five great Piles of Buildings after the Imperial Manner, flank'd with divers Halls and Lodgings for the Bonzas; to whom he assign'd Revenues for maintaining three hundred Persons handsomely, under a Chief of their Sect, whom he constituted a Mandarin, to govern them independant of the Officers of the City.

This Pagod was call'd Long-hing-sse, that is, The Temple which the Dragon came out of, because the Emperor bears a Dragon and six Griffins for his Arms; it was kept up so long as the last Dynasty continued, but afterwards, during the Civil Wars, it was almost entirely ruin'd, and nothing remains of it now, but the five main Buildings aforesaid.

The present Dynasty of the Eastern Tartars, who succeeded, have taken no Care to repair this Temple; so that there is not above one in twenty of those Idol Priests remaining, who besides are almost reduced to Beggary.

Except these three Monuments, there is scarce any thing to be seen in Fong-yang worth Notice; it has been so intirely ruin'd by the Wars, that from an Imperial City it is divindled to a large Village; it is pretty populous, and well built towards the middle, but in all other parts of it, nothing is to be met with but low thatch'd Houses or open Fields, where they plant Tobacco, in which the Riches, and almost the whole Trade of the Country consists.

In the neighbouring Mountains there is found abundance of Talc, and red Wormwood, used by the Physicians. Its Plains are water'd by fine Rivers, and among others, the great Whay-ho (s), which rises in the Mountains of the Province of Ho-nan, runs thro' the whole Country, and after a long Course, passes thro' the Lake Hong-tse, and falls into the Whang-ho, about thirty nine Leagues from its Mouth.

The Fourteenth City, Lyu-chew-fu.

Lyu-chew-fû.

THE Country, where this City stands, is pleasant, and very fertile; the Lake Tsau, in the midst of which there is an Island, furnishes Fish of all Sorts, and waters the Plains so well, that they produce plenty of all sorts of Grain and Fruit, and especially the best Sort of Tea, on which account chiefly the whole District is famous. They make very good Paper here.

Famed for Tea and Paper.

Its Mountains, especially those which are in the Neighbourhood of Lû-kyang-hyen, are cover'd with very fine Trees; there is a very remarkable Bridge near Lû-ngan-chew. Its Jurisdiction is pretty large, containing eight Cities, two of the second Rank, and six of the third.

The Island of Tsong-ming.

Island of Tsong-ming.

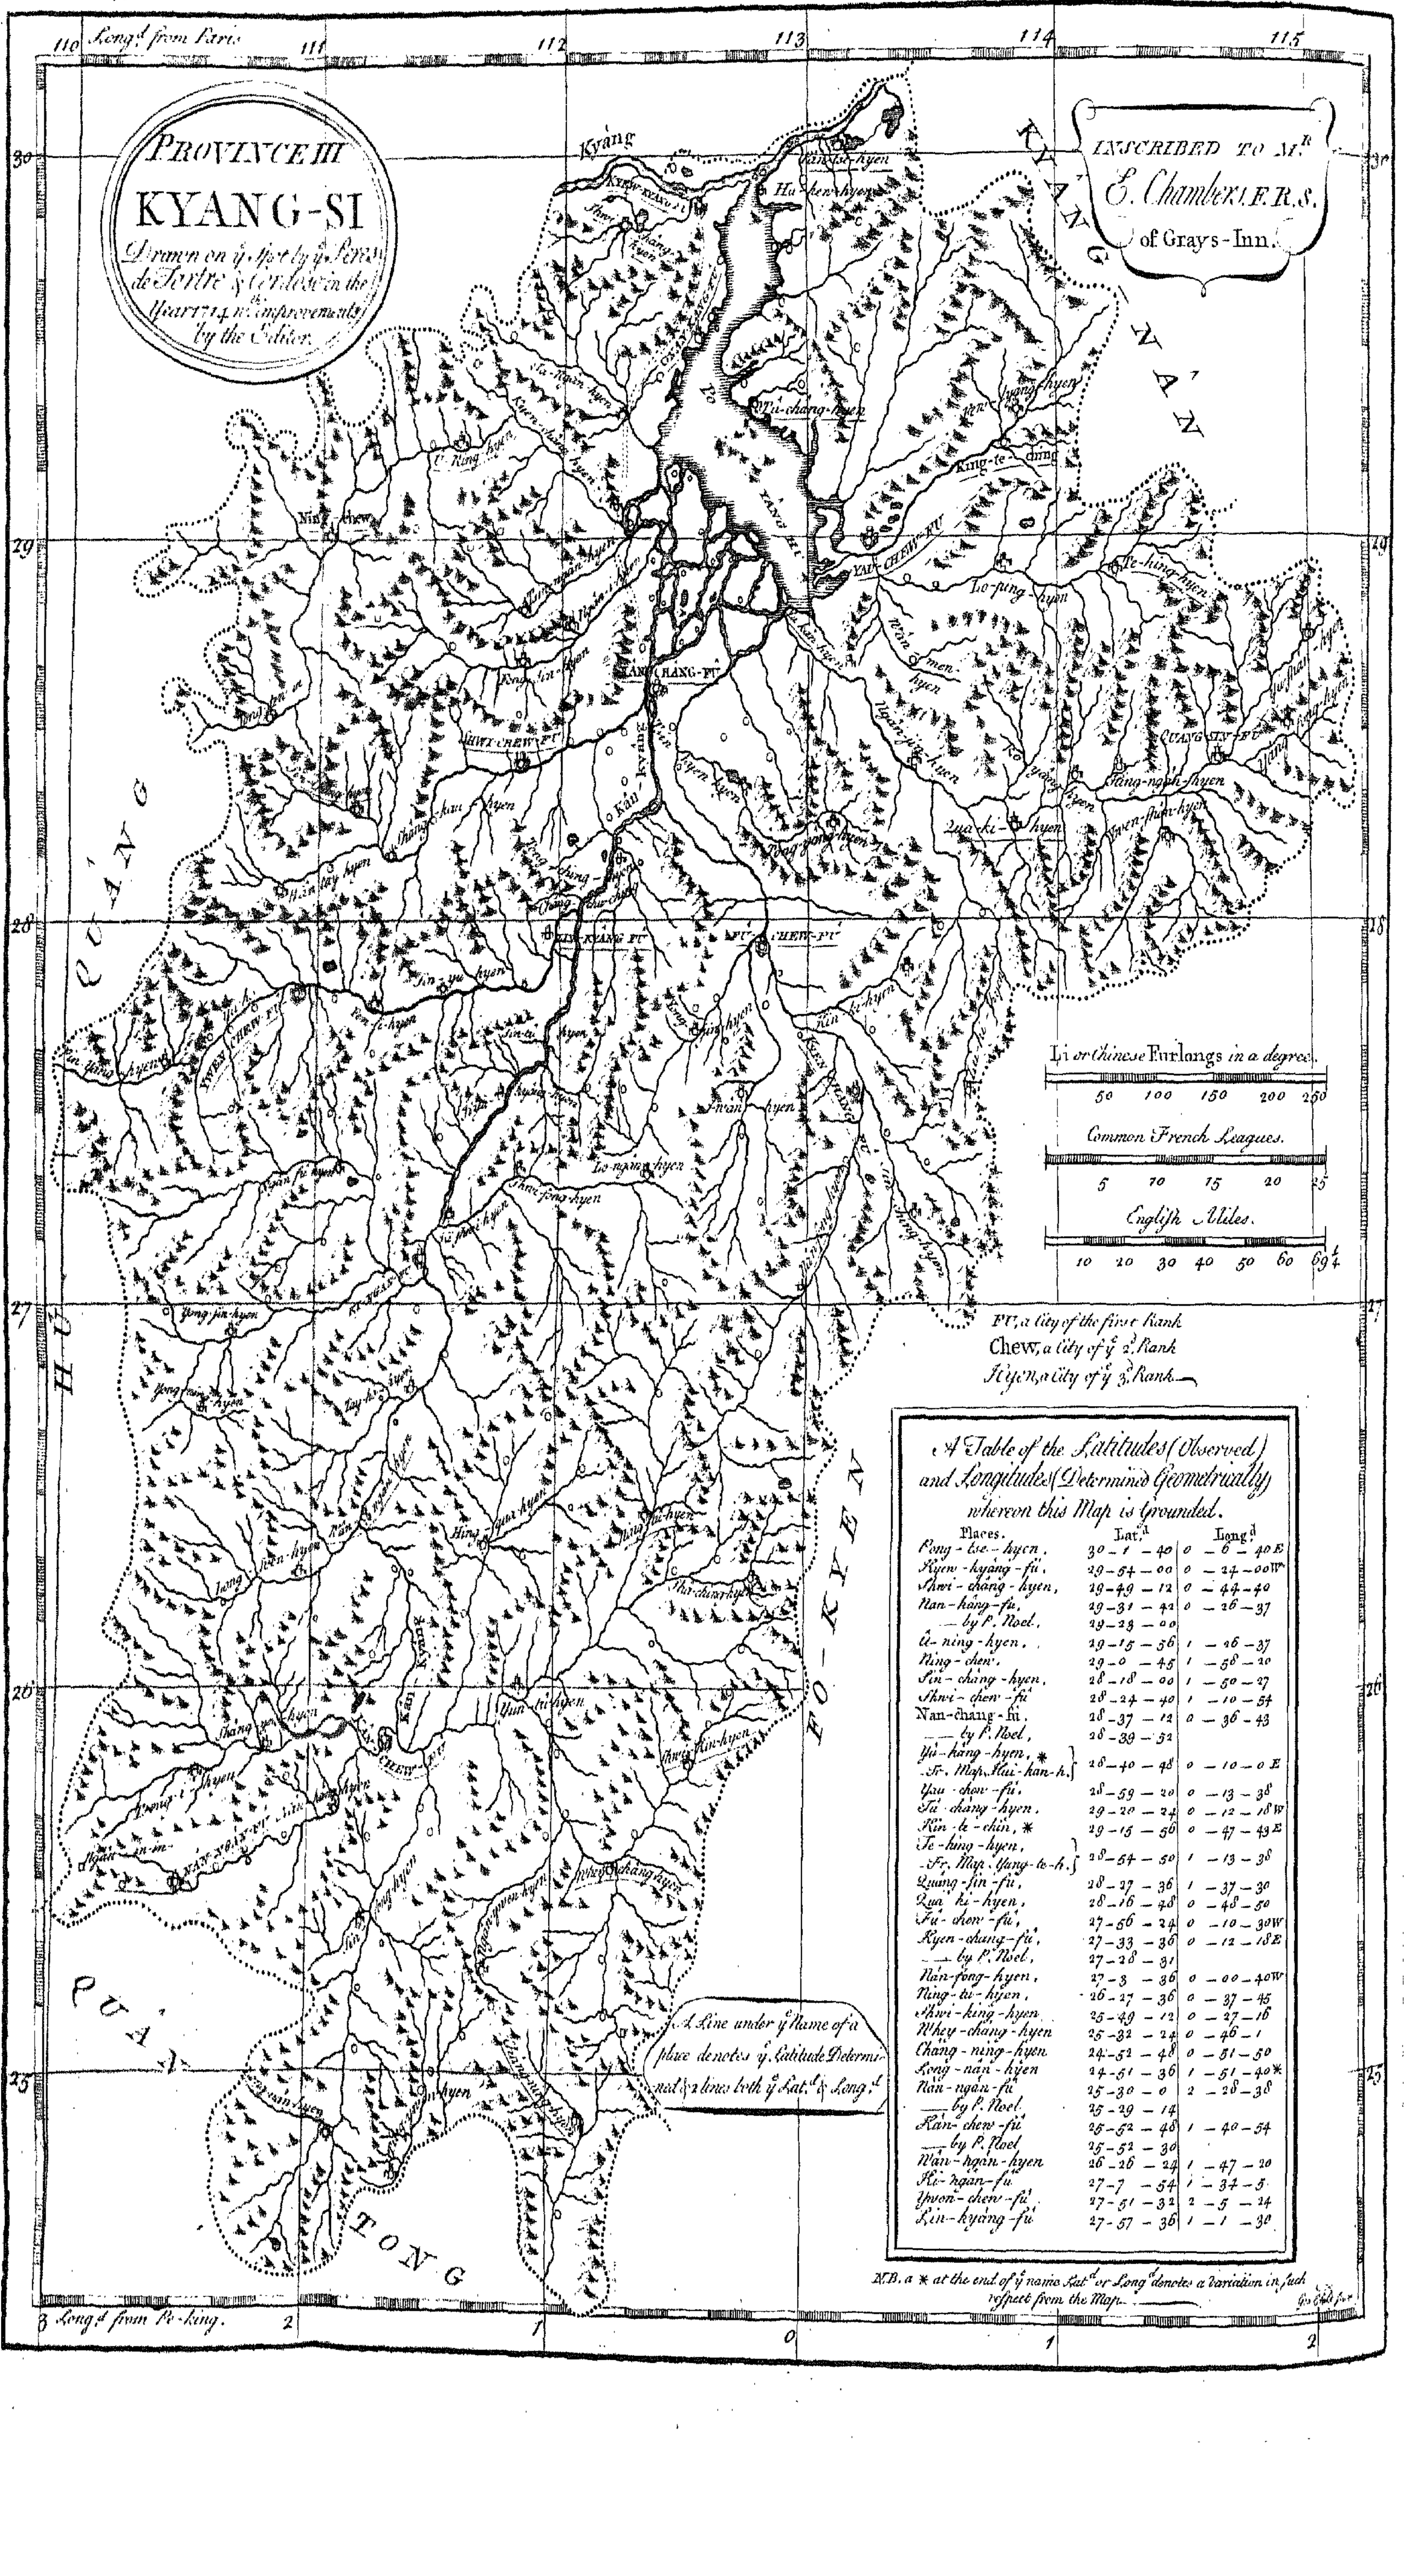
THIS Island, which belongs to the Province of Kyang-nan, is separated from it on the West by an Arm of the Sea, that is not above five or six Leagues over; they pretend it has been form'd by Degrees, of the Earth, which the Yang-tse-kyang brought along with it from the several Provinces that it washes. Wherefore, beside the Name of Tsong-ming, they commonly call it Kyang-shé, which signifies The Tongue of the River, either because, being longer than broad, it resembles a Tongue, or that it lies directly at the Mouth of that great River.



How first Peopled.

Anciently it was a desart sandy Country, over-run with Reeds, where the Robbers and Villains, of whom they wanted to purge the Empire, were banish'd. The first who were transported there, were under a Necessity either of perishing by Famine, or getting their Food by cultivating the Earth; the Desire of Living render'd them active and industrious; they clear'd this uncultivated Land, pluck'd up the Weeds, sow'd a few Grains they brought with them, and in a short time reap'd the Fruit of their Labours. Some Chinese Families, who found it difficult to live on the Continent, took it in their Heads to go and settle there, whither they went and divided the arable Ground amongst them.

These new Comers, not being able to improve their respective Shares, invited other Families from the Continent, to whom they made over for ever part of the Lands, on condition they pay'd a yearly Rent, in the Produce of the Country. The Duty, which the first Proprietors reserv'd, is call'd Kyo-tew, and still subsists.

The Isle of Tsong-ming is about twenty Leagues long, and five or six broad. There is only one City, on it which is of the third Rank, inclos'd with very high Walls, supported by good Terrasses

(s) In the Text it is Hai ho, instead of Hoai ho, as it is elsewhere written, agreeable to the Map.

PROV. OF SHAN-SI

Terraſſes, and ſurrounded with Ditches full of Water; the Champain is cut into an infinite Number of Canals, edg'd with very high Cauſeys, to prevent Inundations; for the Land is even, and void of Hills. The Air is wholeſome and temperate, and the Country pleaſant. PROV. II. Kyang-nan.

Every now and then one meets with large Boroughs, well furniſh'd with Shops, where all things for neceſſary Uſes, and even Pleaſure may be had. Between the Boroughs there are as many Houſes ſcatter'd up and down the Country, as there are Families employ'd in Huſbandry. It is true theſe make no extraordinary Figure, excepting thoſe of the richer ſort, which are built with Brick, and cover'd with Tiles; the Walls of all the reſt are made of Reeds platted, and the Roofs of Stubble. The Trees that are planted on both ſides of the Ditches, which ſurround the Houſes, and are full of running Water, give them an Agreeableneſs which they want in themſelves.

Roads.

The great Roads are narrow, becauſe the Inhabitants are very ſparing of their Land, but lin'd on both ſides with little Houſes of Shop-keepers, who ſell Refreſhments to Travellers. One would almoſt imagine the whole Iſland, in thoſe Places where it is beſt cultivated, to be one Village of an immenſe Extent.

Productions.

The Iſland affords no Game, but there is plenty of large Geeſe, wild and tame Ducks, Hens, Hogs, and Buffaloes, which they reſerve for the Plough. Fruit is ſcarce, the Ground producing nothing but large Limons, ſmall ſour Oranges fit for Sauces; Apricocks, huge Peaches, the Fruit call'd Se-tſe, of which I ſhall ſpeach elſewhere, and large Water-Melons; with all ſorts of Herbs and Pulſe the whole Year round.

Nature of the Soil.

There are three different ſorts of Soil in this Iſland; the firſt lies to the North, and is wholly uncultivated, but the Reeds, which grow there naturally, yield a very conſiderable Income; as there are no Trees throughout the Iſland (T), part of thoſe Reeds is employ'd in building Houſes about the Country, the other part ſerves for Fewel, and ſupply's not only the whole Iſland, but alſo part of the neighbouring Coaſts on the Continent.

The ſecond ſort of Land is that which extends, from the firſt, as far as the Sea on the South-ſide. It affords the Inhabitants two Harveſts every Year, one of Grain in general, which always falls in May, the other is either of Rice or Cotton; the firſt in September, the ſecond ſoon after. Their Grain is Rice, Wheat, Barley, and a kind of bearded-Corn, which, tho' reſembling Rice, is yet of a quite different Nature.

There is a third ſort of Land, which, tho' barren in Appearance, is yet more profitable than the other two; it conſiſts of a greyiſh ſort of Earth, diſpers'd, by Spots of the Bigneſs of two Acres, over ſeveral parts of the Iſle on the North-ſide; it yields ſo great a Quantity of Salt, that thoſe of the Continent are ſupply'd with it, as well as the Iſlanders. It is pretty difficult to account whence it is that certain Portions of Land, ſcatterd here and there over the whole Country, ſhouldbe impregnated with Salt to ſuch a Degree, as not to produce a ſingle Blade of Graſs; while at the ſame time the Lands contiguous to them are very fertile, both in Corn and Cotton. It often happens alſo that the fertile Lands, in their turn, become full of Salt, and the Saline Lands fit for ſowing.

Theſe are ſome of the Secrets of Nature, which the Mind of Man ſtrives in vain to dive into, and ought to make him admire more and more the Grandeur and Power of the Author of Nature.

PROVINCE III. KYANG-SI.

PROV. III. Kyang-ſi.

Bounds.

THIS Province is bounded on the North by that of Kyang-nan, on the Weſt by Hu-quang, on the South by Quang-tong, and on the Eaſt by thoſe of Fo-kyen and Che-kyang. The Mountains, which are in the Southern part of it, and unite with thoſe of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen, are almoſt inacceſſible; but having paſt them, one diſcovers very fine Valleys and Plains exceeding well improv'd.

Inhabitants.

However, it is ſo populous, that notwithſtanding its Fertility, it does not yield much more Rice, than is ſufficient for the Uſe of the Inhabitants; they alſo paſs for being great Oeconomiſts, and their ſordidneſs draws on them the Raillery of the neighbouring Provinces; in other reſpects they are of an excellent Genius, and produce a great Number of able Men, who obtain the Degrees, and are advanc'd to the Magiſtracy.

Produce.

Kyang-ſi is water'd with Brooks, Lakes, and Rivers, which abound with all ſorts of Fiſh, particularly Salmon, Trouts and Sturgeon. The Mountains, with which it is encompaſs'd, are cover'd over with Woods, or famous for their Minerals, Simples, and Medicinal Herbs.

This Province, beſides abounding in all Neceſſaries of Life, is very rich in Mines of Gold, Silver, Lead, Iron and Tin. It furniſhes very beautiful Silks, and the Rice Wine made here is reckon'd delicious by the Chineſe; but what renders it moſt famous is, that lovely China Ware made at King-te-ching, and the Rice it produces, which is much eſteem'd in the Empire, and whereof many Imperial Barks are freighted.

The Lyen-wha, or Water-Lilly.

The Flower of Lyen-wha, ſo much valued in China, is found almoſt every where in this Province; it grows principally in the Lakes, juſt as the Water-Lilly in Europe ſprings up in Standing Waters; but is is very different from the Water-Lilly, as well in the Root and Bloſſom, as the Fruit. Nothing is more agreeable than to ſee whole Lakes all cover'd with its Flowers, which are

(T) That is Trees for Timber, otherwiſe thoſe planted about the Houſes in the Country muſt be excepted.

Prov. III. Kyang-si.

are cultivated every Year, the great Lords keep them in little Ponds, ſometimes in great Vaſes fill'd with Mud and Water, which ſerve to adorn their Gardens or Courts.

This Flower, which ſhoots up above the Top of the Water, the Height of a Yard, or Yard and an half, pretty nearly reſembles our Tulip; it conſiſts of a little Ball, ſupported by a ſmall Filament, much like that which is found in the Lilly; its Colour is either Violet, or White, or partly Red and partly White; the Smell is very agreeable; its Fruit is of the Size of a Hazel-Nut, the Kernel whereof is white and well taſted. The Phyſicians prize it, being of Opinion that it nouriſhes and ſtrengthens, for which Reaſon they preſcribe it for thoſe who are weak, or after a ſevere Sickneſs do not eaſily recover their Strength; the Leaves are long, and float on the Water, they are faſten'd to the Root by long Strings; the Gardeners make uſe of them to wrap their Ware in. The Root is knotty like that of Reeds; its Pith and Subſtance is very white; it is eſtem'd and much uſed, eſpecially in Summer, becauſe it is very refreſhing; there is nothing in this Plant but what is of uſe, for they even make Meal of it, which ſerves for ſeveral Occaſions.

The River Kan-kyang divides this Province into two Parts, which contains thirteen Cities of the firſt Rank, and ſeventy eight of the ſecond and third Rank.

The First City, Nan-chang-fu, the Capital.

Nan-chang-fu.

THIS is one of the fineſt Cities that are ſituate on the Banks of their charming Rivers. It was formerly ruin'd by the Tartars, whoſe Yoke it refuſeing to ſubmit to, they ſet it on Fire, and nothing remain'd of it excepting the Walls; but it has been ſince re-built.

The Compaſs of its Walls is not great, and along the Port the River (u) is pretty deep; that which renders it a Place of ſo great Trade, is the Canals and Rivers, by which it may be enter'd on every ſide. It is not far off the Lake Po-yang, into which the River diſcharges itſelf, after it has collected almoſt all the Waters of the Province, from the Southern End whereof it comes.

China Ware.

The China Ware, which is made in the Diſtrict of Zhau-chew-fû, ſtanding on the Eaſtern ſide of the ſame Lake, is the Commodity wherein all its Trade conſiſts; and indeed it draws a great Number of Dealers from the reſt of the Provinces, for the ſort that is made at Kanton, in the Province of Fo-kyen, and ſome other Places, is not ſo much eſteem'd in China, as Earthen Ware is in Europe; Strangers cannot miſtake it, for it is white as Snow, does not Shine, and is without any Mixture of Colours.

It ſeems that the Water of the Place where the China is made, contributes to its Beauty and Goodneſs, for they do not make ſo good elſewhere, altho' they employ the ſame Materials; theſe Materials are not only found on the Borders of this Province: but alſo in one Place on thoſe of Kyang-nan; what this Earth, is and how it muſt be order'd, will be ſhown hereafter; and as one cannot from a bare Deſcription form an exact Notion of the Nature of the kinds of Stones and Earths, that are employ'd in this Manufacture, I have procur'd Samples of them from China, and put them into the Hands of Mr. de Reaumur, one of the Members of the Academy of Sciences, who is capable of diſcovering whether there are any of the ſame Kind in the Provinces of France.

Eight Cities depend on Nan-chang, whereof ſeven are of the third, and only one of the ſecond Rank. Its Plains are ſo well cultivated, that it is hard to find Places for Cattle to graze in; it has always produced a great Number of Literati, and is full of Perſons of Diſtinction. The Vice-Roy keeps his Court in this City, where there are conſiderable Officers and Magiſtrates. Under the preceding Dynaſty, ſeveral Families of Princes of the Imperial Houſe dwelt there, whoſe Fortune was ſomewhat capricious, but not inglorious. At preſent all the Princes remain at Court, and are not ſuffer'd to leave it.

The Second City, Zhau-chew-fu.

Zhau-chew-fu.

THIS City, which has within its Diſtrict ſeven others of the third Order, has a very beautiful and pleaſant Situation, being built on the North-ſide of the Lake Po-yang, and encompaſs'd with Rivers that fall into the Lake.

All the Country is flat, and render'd extraordinary fruitful by the Rivers that water it, but it is chiefly famous for the beautiful China Ware made at King-te-ching, which is in its Diſtrict.

This Borough, where the true Artificers for Porcelain are to be found, is as well peopled as the greateſt City in China, and wants nothing but Walls to merit the Name. Theſe Places call'd Ching, which are of great Reſort and Trade, are not enclos'd. They reckon in this Borough more than a Million of Inhabitants, who conſume every Day above ten thouſand Loads of Rice, and one thouſand Hogs, excluſive of other Animals, whoſe Fleſh they eat. The Houſes of the Merchants take up a great Deal of Room, and contain a prodigious Multitude of Workmen.

King-te-ching extends a League an and half along a fine River, and is not a Heap of Houſes as might be imagin'd, but the Streets are very long, and interſect each other at certain Diſtances;

Distances, without a Scrap of waste Ground to spare in it. The Houses themselves are rather too close, and the Streets too narrow; in passing thro' them one would think himself in the middle of a Fair, and they ring with the Cries of Porters, who are clearing way. Prov. III. Kyang-si.

It is considerably dearer living here than at Zhau-cheu, because whatever is consum'd must be brought from other Places, even to the Wood for supplying the Furnaces with Fewel, which at present comes from near three hundred Miles Distance; but notwithstanding the Dearness of Provisions, it is the Refuge of an infinite Number of poor Families, who have no Means of subsisting in the neighbouring Towns. They find Employment here for Youths and weakly Persons; there are none, even to the Lame and Blind, but what get their living here by grinding Colours. Anciently they reckon'd no more than three hundred Porcelain Furnaces at this Place, but at present they amount to about five hundred. The Poor, Lame and Blind employ'd.

King-te-ching stands in a Plain, surrounded with high Mountains; that on the East-side, against which it is built, forms, without, a kind of Semicircle. The Mountains on the Sides give Passage to two Rivers, one of them is small, theother very large; which unite and make an handsome Port, within a League of the Place, in a vast Basin, where it loses a good Deal of its Rapidity. One sees sometimes two or three Rows of Barks, following one another the whole Length of this Space; this is the Prospect that presents itself on entring, thro' one of the Straights, into the Port. The Clouds of Flame and Smoke, which ascend in different Parts of it, shew at once the Length, Breadth, and Circumference of King-te-ching; at Night one would think he saw a great City all on Fire, or a vast Furnace with a great many Vent-holes. Situation of King-te-ching.

Strangers are not suffer'd to be at King-te-ching: whoever has not Acquaintances in the Place to answer for his Behaviour, must lodge at Night in his Barks. This Regulation, join'd to that which is observ'd Day and Night in the Borough itself, the same as in the Cities, keeps all in good Order; and establishes perfect Security in a Place, whose Riches would otherwise make it liable to the Attempts of an infinite Number of Robbers.

The Third City, Quang-sin-fu.

ALTHO' this City is situated in the midst of Mountains, which are for the most part very high and of great Extent, it must not be thought that the Country is less cultivated and inhabited. A great Number of these Hills are divided into plough'd Lands, which are no way inferior to the most fertile Plains, and abound with Boroughs and Villages: Some of them are cover'd with great Forests, and others produce good Crystal. There is very good Paper made at this Place, and the best Candles in all the Empire. Quang-sin-fu.

This Country borders on the Provinces of Fo-kyen and Che-kyang. The Conveniency of escaping easily to the Mountains, gave Robbers Opportunities formerly of doing Mischief with Impunity, and the Emperor kept a pretty good Garrison in the City, in order to pursue them. As the Roads, leading into the Province on this Side, are narrow, and like Straights between the Mountains, it is very easy to defend the Passage of them, and in case of an Insurrection in the neighbouring Provinces, to prevent Invasions. The Jurisdiction of Quang-sin-fû extends over seven Cities of the third Rank.

The Fourth City, Nan-kang-fu,

HAS in its District no more than four others of the third Rank, and stands on the side of the famous Lake Po-yang, which is about four Leagues long, and thirty broad; it affords all sorts of excellent Fish, and divides this Part of the Province in two. The Plains produce plenty of Rice, Wheat, Fruits, and Pulse; the Mountains are partly cultivated, and partly cover'd with thick Woods, some of which are five Leagues in Length. A kind of Hemp grows about the Town, whereof they make good Summer-Cloaths. Nan-kang-fu.

The Fifth City, Kyew-kyang-fu,

IS a large City of great Trade, situate on the South-side of the Yang-tse-kyang, pretty near the Place where the Lake Po-yang communicates with that River; thus being inviron'd with Water on the North and East-sides (x), it becomes the Rendezvous of all the Barks, that go and come from the other Cities of this Province, as well as those of Kyang-nan and Hû-quang. Altho' it is near a hundred Leagues from the Sea, they catch Salmon, Dolphins, and Sturgeon in the River which washes its Walls, the Water whereof ebbs and flows at the New and Full Moon; it runs so slowly from this City to the Sea, that its Course is almost imperceptible. Kyew-kyang-fu.

The Sixth City, Kyen-chang-fu.

THIS City is situate on the Borders of the Province of Fo-kyen, in a pleasant and fruitful Country. Five Cities of the third Order depend on it; it is famous still, but was much more so formerly. The Rice Wine made here is pretty good, but the Rice itself is not; so that Persons of Fortune have it brought from some neighbouring Town. However the Land produces a sort of red Rice that is well tasted, and very wholesome. They make a kind of Linnen here of Hemp, which is esteem'd, and worn during the Summer Heats. Kyen-chang-fu.

(x) Rather on the North and West Sides, which are wash'd by Rivers, the Lake being 3 or 4 Miles from it at least.

PROV. III. Kyang-si.

The Seventh City, Vu-chew-fu, or Fu-chew-fu,

Vu-chew-fu, or Fu-chew-fu.

STANDS on the side of a River in a great Plain, sufficiently fertile; the Compass of its Walls is greater than that of any City in France, excepting Paris; its Government may extend twenty or twenty five Leagues, and contains six Cities of the third Rank.

To judge of its ancient Beauty by what still remains, it must have been one of the most flourishing Cities of the Empire, before the last Wars; but since it was sack'd by the Tartars, it is become a Heap of Ruins and Rubbish; in the midst whereof every now and then one sees certain Houses, which are repair'd, and form, as it were, Hamlets, Villages, and Boroughs in the City itself; excepting the East-side, which is well built, and contains almost all the Tribunals of the Mandarins.

They reckon but 40, or 50,000 Inhabitants in the City and Suburbs; the Country, to make amends, is very populous and well improv'd. In several Places they have two Harvests of Rice every Year; and it is out of the District of this City, that most part of the Rice is taken, which the Province is oblig'd to furnish yearly to the Emperor: it is very good, and so white that it dazzles the Eyes.

The Air is very pure and wholesome. Nothing can be more agreeable than its Mountains, from whence descend Brooks and Rivers, which water and fertilize the whole Country, and this makes such plenty of Provisions here. Figs thrive very well; and a Missionary, having planted Vines in his Garden, they produc'd very good Grapes, whereof he made some Wine; but as to other sorts of Fruit they do not ripen kindly, probably because the Soil is too moist.

The Eighth City, Lin-kyang-fu.

Lin-kyang-fu.

IN the District of this City, and three Leagues distant on the side of the great River Kan-kyang, stands a Ching, or Borough, where there is a great Trade for Drugs and Simples; because it is a celebrated Port, where Barks arrive from all the Southern Parts, loaden with Medicinal Herbs, whereof Remedies are compos'd, and where they come from the other Provinces in quest of them. As to the City it is not populous, and has but little Trade; the Inhabitants live very saving, whence they say, by way of sneer, that one Hog serves the City two Days. Its District contains no more than four Cities of the third Order.

It is situated two Leagues and an half from the Kan-kyang, on the side of the River Yu-ho; its Soil is good, and Air wholesome; it produces excellent Oranges, which are sent into the neighbouring Provinces, and indeed almost all its Trade consists in them; the Mountains surrounding it are cover'd with great Trees, or cultivated by way of Terrasses.

The Ninth City, Ki-ngan-fu.

Ki-ngan-fu. Dangerous Passage, &c. p. 83.

NINE Cities of the third Rank depend on this City, which is situate on the side of the Kan-kyang. It is here that one perceives the Danger there is in descending that River; the Stream runs with extreme Impetuosity among several Rocks, which are even with the Surface of the Water, so that one runs a great Risk of perishing, unless he has a skilful Pilot. Hence all Barks that want Pilots are us'd to provide themselves in this City, or at least hire Men to help to steer, till they have past these dangerous Places: for there are eighteen Currents, which require both Strength and Skill, either to ascend or descend them. They call this She-pa-tan. Tho' the Country is uneven, the Plains in it are not less agreeable or fertile. They say that there are Mines of Gold and Silver in the Mountains.

The Tenth City, Shwi-chew-fu.

Shwi-chew-fu.

THIS City stands on the side of one of the Branches of the Kan-kyang; as it is divided by a River in two Parts, each of which is encompass'd by a Wall, it seems to be two Cities. This River bears great Barks at all times, but especially from February to August, when it is swell'd by the Rains.

These two Parts of the City are join'd together by two Bridges, one of Stone with upwards of ten Arches well built; and the other of Boats, which rises and falls according as the Water increases and diminishes.

In one of these Enclosures, call'd the North City, dwell all the Mandarins, both great and small; viz. the Mandarins of the People, the Mandarins of War, and the Mandarins of Literature; whence it is also call'd the Mandarin City. The other part, call'd the South City, contains almost all the considerable Families, the Burghers, and the common People, without so much as one Mandarin among them. As the Gates of both these Divisions are shut, during the Night, in case any Disturbance should happen in the latter, the Mandarin would find it difficult sometimes to suppress it as speedily as might be required.

The

The Air is so mild and wholesome, that they have given it the Name of the Happy. In the Brooks that water the Country, there are found Gold and Silver Sand; its Fields are very fertile, and suffice to furnish its part of the Rice, which is sent to Court; the Mountains and Forests, wherewith they are surrounded, afford a very agreeable Prospect; in these Mountains they get the Lapis Armenus. PROV. III. Kyang-si. Lapis Armenus.

The Eleventh City, Ywen-chew-fu,

YIELDS to none of the rest in fertility of Soil, and plenty of every thing. It is situate on the side of the River Yu-ho; and has in its Neighbourhood a little Lake beset with Houses of Pleasure, where the Inhabitants often go to divert themselves. It furnishes the rest of the Empire with a good deal of Vitriol and Alum; but its District is inconsiderable, as containing but four Cities of the third Order. Ywen-chew-fu.

The Twelfth City, Kan-chew-few.

THIS is a City of great Resort, and may be compared to Rouen for Bigness; it takes its Name from the River whereon it is situate (y), altho' it receives another in that Place call'd Chang-ho (z); its Trade is not inferior to that of the Capital. Kan-chew-fu.

They say its Mountains afford extraordinary Plenty of Medicinal Herbs, as well as those of Quang-sin-fu, at the Foot of which the Chief [Priest] of the Bonzas of the Sect of Tau-tse, (who assumes the magnificent Title of Tyen-se or Heavenly Master) has his Residence.

Between Kan-chew and Nan-ngan, whereof I shall speak by and by, there are nothing but Deserts; but from Kan-chew to Nan-chang for the Space of sixty Leagues along the River, the Country is charming, populous and fertile. The rapid Current spoken of in the Description of Ki ngan fu, is a Days Journey from Kan-chew; it is near twenty Leagues in Length, and when once Vessels have past it, they find themselves in a fine River, six times broader than the Seine at Rouen; and so cover'd with Barks, that at any time of the Day one may reckon above fifty Ships of Burden under Sail. Dangerous Passage.

As this Country borders on the Provinces of Hu-quang, Fo-kyen, and Quang-tong, and was formerly infested with Robbers, who easily escap'd out of one Province into another, a Tau-ye was establish'd here, who is Governor of two Cities of the first Rank; there is also a Custom-House erected for receiving the Duties laid on Goods that pass up and down the two Rivers.

Near the Walls of Kan-chew, and in the Place where these two Rivers meet, there is a Bridge of Boats, which are fasten'd to each other by Iron Chains. Near this Bridge is the Office, where the Receiver of the Custom-House comes every Day, to see the Barks search'd, and examine if they have paid the Duty; one of these Boats is so order'd as to open and shut, for the Barks to pass, after they have been examin'd.

The District of this City is very extensive, containing twelve Cities of the third Rank; and abounds with those Trees from whence the Varnish distills, which is some of the best that China affords.

The Thirteenth City, Nan-ngan-fu.

THIS is the most Southern City in the Province; it is as big as Orleans, very handsome and populous, of great Trade, and much frequented; for here all the Merchandizes must land that go to, or come from the Province of Quang-tong. The Suburbs are larger than the City, which has no more than four Cities of the third Order under its Jurisdiction. Nan-ngan-fu.

In going from Nan-ngan to Nan-hyong, the first City of the Province of Quang-tong on that side, one must travel ten Leagues by Land; at the End of the first two Leagues you come to a Mountain, so steep, that in some Places they have cut it in form of Stairs; the Top of it is Rock to the Depth of forty Feet, which they have been oblig'd to cut in order to open a Passage. Altho' these Mountains are uncultivated, the Spaces between them are improv'd, and as well cover'd with Rice as the most fertile Valleys. Mountain Mey-lin.

PROVINCE IV. FO-KYEN.

THIS is one of the least yet richest Provinces of the Empire; its Situation is advantageous for Navigation and Commerce, and the Climate hot, but at the same time the Air pure and wholesome; as part of it is wash'd by the Sea, they catch abundance of Fishes on the Coast, which being dry'd and salted, are sent into the inland Provinces. Along its Shores, which are very irregular, occasion'd by the many Bays of different Sorts, they have built a great Number of Forts for their Defence. PROV. IV. Fo-kyen. Situation.

It contains nine Fu, or Cities of the first Rank, and sixty Hyen, or Towns of the third Rank; among these nine Fu they reckon Tay-wan, Capital of the Island of Formosa, which I shall describe, as well as Hya-men, or Emoy, a Port of this Province, and the Isles of Pong-hu, lying between that Port and Formosa. Division.

(y) This is the Kan-kyang.

Fo-kyen

PROV. IV. Fo-kyen. Bounds. Soil.

Fo-kyen is bounded by Che-kyang on the North, Kyang-ſi on the Weſt, Quang-tong on the South, and on the Eaſt by the Sea of China.

Its Mountains, by the Induſtry of the Inhabitants, are almoſt all form'd into a ſort of Amphitheatres and Terraſſes, plac'd one over another, and ſow'd with Rice; its Plains are water'd by great Rivers, Torrents and Springs that deſcend from the Mountains, and are dextrouſly convey'd by the Huſbandmen to ſupply the Rice, which never grows but in Water. They have the Art of raiſing the Water to the Top of the higheſt Mountains, and convey it from one to the other, by Pipes of Bambû, with which this Province abounds.

Commodities.

Beſides, Fo-kyen producing whatever grows in moſt of the other Provinces of the Empire, it is render'd exceeding rich by the Trade which its Inhabitants drive with Japan, the Philippine Iſlands, Formoſa, Java, Kamboya, Siam, &c. The Commodities found here are, Muſk, precious Stones, Quick-ſilver, Silk, Hempen-Cloth and Callico, Steel, and all ſorts of Utenſils, made to great Perfection; and they bring from foreign Countries Cloves, Cinnamon, Pepper, Sandal-Wood or Sanders, Amber, Coral, and many other ſuch Goods. Its Mountains are cover'd with Foreſts, full of Trees fit for building Ships, and contain Mines of Tin and Iron; they ſay alſo that they yield ſome of Gold and Silver, but it is forbidden to open them under Pain of Death.

Fruit.

Among the Fruits that it produces, there are excellent Oranges, bigger than thoſe known in Europe, having both the Taſte and Smell of Muſcadine Grapes; the peel comes off very eaſily, is thick, and of a bright yellow; they candy them with Sugar, and tranſport them into other Provinces. Here alſo are found thoſe beautiful red Oranges, which we have deſcrib'd elſewhere.

In this Province alſo, as well as in Quang-tong, there grow two ſorts of Fruit peculiar to China, that are much eſteem'd, and not to be found elſewhere, viz. Li-chi and Long-ywen, ſpoken of at the Beginning of this Work. I ſhall only add, that there is ſcarce any Fruit in the World ſo delicious as the Li-chi, eſpecially that kind which has the little Stone. The Plant call'd Tyen-whа, which grows here, and is uſed by the Dyers in dying Blue, is in far greater Eſteem than that which grows in the other Provinces.

Language.

They ſpeak a different Language in moſt of the Cities of this Province, each of which has a Dialect of its own; Paſſengers find this very inconvenient; the Mandarin Language, which is the only one generally ſpoken throughout China, is underſtood by very few People of this Province. The Inhabitants are ingenious, and fond of Learning the Chineſe Sciences; hence this Province produces a great Number of Literati, who attain to the great Employments of the Empire.

The Firſt City, Fu-chew-fu, Capital of the Province,

Fu-chew-fu.

PRESIDES over nine Cities of the third Order. Beſides the Vice-Roy, the Tſong-tû, who is the Intendant-General both of this Province and that of Che-kyang, reſides here. It is famous for the Advantage of its Situation, the Greatneſs of its Trade, Multitude of its Literati, Fertility of its Soil, Beauty of its Rivers, which carry the largeſt Barks in the Empire up to the Walls; and laſtly for its admirable Bridge of above a hundred Arches, built with fair white Stone, acroſs the Bay. All its little Hills are full of Cedars, Orange and Limon-Trees.

Surprizing Bridge.

They make an exceeding white Sugar, throughout its Diſtrict, where grow abundance of thoſe Trees that bear the Fruits Li-chi and Long-ywen; the firſt is ſo agreeable, that one is never tired of eating it; the ſecond is very good, but leſs eſteem'd than the Li-chi. They dry theſe Fruits, and carry them into all parts of the Empire; but then they are not half ſo pleaſant as when they are newly gather'd, tho' they are very wholeſome, and often given to ſick Folks.

The Second City, Tſwen-chew-fu.

THE Situation of this City is moſt agreeable, and renders it a Place of great Trade. It is built on a Cape, and almoſt encompaſs'd with Water; the greateſt Barks or Chineſe Veſſels of Carriage enter within its Walls. It has within its Diſtrict ſeven Cities of the third Rank.

All theſe Cities are very populous, and carry on a great Trade; their Houſes are uniformly neat, their Streets are pav'd with Bricks, which incloſe two Rows of ſquare Stones, and adorn'd with Triumphal Arches.

Temple.

Among the Temples there is one that deſerves Notice, on account of its two Towers, built with Stone and Marble, ſeven Stories high each; one may walk round each Story by means of Galleries on the Outſide.

Remarkable Bridge.

Not far from the City is a Bridge, remarkable for its Largeneſs as well as Beauty; it is built with blackiſh Stone, has no Arches, but is ſuſtain'd by above three hundred Stone Pillars, which end on both ſides in acute Angles, to break more eaſily the Swiftneſs and Force of the Stream. This Bridge was built by a Governor of the City, who was griev'd to ſee ſuch an infinite Number of Barks periſh continually by the Violence of the Tides; they affirm that this Work coſt him 1,400,000 Ducats. A prodigious Number of Ships, bound for foreign Parts, are every Hour ſetting out from this City and others in its Diſtrict.

The

The Third City, Kyen-ning-fu.

EIGHT Cities of the third Order depend on this City, which ſtands on the ſide of the River Min-ho; it has a pretty good Trade, as lying in the way of all Ships that paſs up and down the River. Kyen-ning fû.

As it ceaſes to be navigable about the City Pû-ching-hyen, thirty Leagues from Kyen-ning, the Goods are landed here, and carry'd by Porters beyond the Mountains as far as a Borough near Kyang-chan in the Province of Che-kyang, where they are embark'd on another River. There are eight or ten thouſand Porters attending the Barks, who get their Livelihood by going continually backwards and forwards acroſs theſe Mountains, which are very ſteep, and the Valleys, which are very deep.

They have made this Road as even as the Nature of the Ground will permit; it is pav'd with ſquare Stones, and furniſh'd with Boroughs full of Inns, for lodging Travellers. At Pû-ching-hyen there is an Office where all Merchandizes pay a Duty, which is apply'd towards repairing the Road.

While the Tartars were conquering China, Kyen-ning underwent two Sieges, and perſiſted in refuſing to ſubmit to their Dominion; but after the ſecond Siege had laſted a long time, the Tartars took it, burnt it entirely, and put all the Inhabitants to the Sword; moſt of the Houſes have been rebuilt ſince, but not ſo ſumptuouſly as before.

Not far from Kyen-ning is Fû-ning-chew, a City of the ſecond Rank, remarkable for having Juriſdiction over two Cities of the third Order, viz. Fû-ngan-hyen and Ning-te-hyen. The Country where they are ſituated is of a vaſt Extent, but almoſt wholly over-run with Mountains, of which thoſe to the North are of difficult Aſcent; however it is in want of nothing, the neighbouring Sea furniſhing it with plenty of every thing. Fû ning chew.

The Fourth City, Yen-ping-fu, (A)

STANDS on the Deſcent of a Hill, at the Foot of which runs the River Minho; by means of ſo agreeable a Situation, it appears like a kind of Amphitheatre to all that are upon the Water, who have a full View of the whole. Tho' not very large, it is reckon'd one of the fineſt Cities in the Empire, and is fortify'd naturally by the inacceſſible Mountains which cover it. There is ſcarce any City beſides this, that can boaſt of having the Water, which deſcends from the Mountains, convey'd by Canals into every Houſe; and, what is another ſingularity belonging to it, the Mandarin Language, which is that of the Learned, is commonly ſpoken by the Inhabitants, whence it may be inferr'd that it was firſt peopled by a Colony from the Province of Kyang-nan. All the Barks of the Province paſs by the Foot of its Wall. Yen-ping-fu.

Sha-hyen, which is one of the ſeven Cities under its Juriſdiction, is commonly call'd the Silver City, on account of the Plenty and Fertility of its Lands, nor are thoſe belonging to the other Cities leſs fruitful. Sha hyen.

The Fifth City, Ting-chew-fu.

THIS City lies among the Mountains which ſeparate the Province of Fo-kyen from that of Kyang-ſi; of theſe Mountains ſome are cover'd with Flowers, eſpecially in Spring, which makes a delightful Proſpect; others, if they were allow'd to be dug, would afford Mines of Gold; others again are ſo prodigious high, as to be almoſt inacceſſible; however the Country furniſhes plenty of all ſorts of Neceſſaries. The Air indeed is not very healthful, nor the Trade conſiderable. Seven Cties of the third Rank depend upon it. Ting-chew-fû.

The Sixth City, Hing-wha-fu.

THE Name given this City, ſignifies a growing Flower, and it muſt be allow'd to be ſituated in the moſt delightful and fertile Country of the whole Province, on the Sea Coaſt. Tho' it has no more than two Towns of the third Rank in its Diſtrict, yet it pays the moſt conſiderable Tribute in Rice of all the Cities. Hing-wha-fu.

Its Diſtrict contains ſo great a Quantity of Boroughs and Villages, that one would take it for one continued City. Some of theſe Boroughs alſo might for their Largeneſs and Beauty be put in the Rank of Cities. Numbers of rich Merchants live there, who trade all over the Empire.

The Roads are very handſome, broad, and almoſt all pav'd with ſquare Stones. The City is adorn'd with ſeveral Triumphal Arches. The Fruit Li-chi is better here than in any other Part of the Province. They catch very good Fiſh of all ſorts at Hing-wha-fû, and the Country furniſhes Silk.

(A) In the Map Yen pin fû, but in the Tabls of Diviſion, p. 5. and of Longitude and Latitude at the End of the Work, it is Yen ping fû, as well as here.

Prov. IV. Fo-kyen.

The Seventh City, Shau-u-fu.

Shau-u-fu.

THIS City, which is, as it were, one of the Keys of the Province, was not very conſiderable formerly; it is however become ſo of late, and its Situation renders it very ſtrong and commodious; it is encompaſs'd with ſeveral Forts or Military Places, which do not differ from the ordinary Cities, except that Troops are there in Garriſon.

Hemp en Linen.

In the Diſtrict of this City, there are Manufactories of very fine Linnen, made of a kind of Hemp, which is much in Requeſt in the Empire, becauſe it is cool in Summer, and when one ſweats never ſticks to the Back. It has no more than four Cities of the third Order under its Juriſdiction.

The Eighth City, Chang-chew-fu.

Chang-chew-fu.

THIS City, which is the moſt Southern of all thoſe in the Province, has ten Cities of the third Rank in its Diſtrict. It ſtands on a River that ebbs and flows, over which to the South of the Town is a very fair Bridge of thirty ſix very high Arches; it is ſo broad, as to admit Shops on both Sides, where all things of Value, that either the Empire or foreign Countries afford, are ſold: for it is not far from Emoy, which is a Place of very great Trade, and Merchandizes are continually paſſing up the River that waſhes the Walls of Chang-chew, which Advantages have render'd it very populous and famous. Its Mountains produce the fineſt Cryſtal imaginable, whereof they make Buttons, Seals, Figures of Animals, &c.

Excellent Cryſtal.

The Inhabitants, who are very ingenious and induſtrious, have a great Talent for Buſineſs.

Large Oranges.

Its Territory abounds with Orange-Trees, the Fruit of which is much larger than the European, and has both the Taſte and Smell of the Muſcadine Grape; they candy them together with the Peel, and tranſport them into foreign Countries as well as all over the Empire. Some Footſteps of Chriſtianity are found in this City, altho' it is not known whether they are of ancient or modern Original: but it is certain that P. Martini ſaw in the Hands of one of the Literati an old Parchment Book in Gothic Characters, which contain'd moſt of the Scripture in Latin; he offer'd a Sum of Money for it, but the Owner would not part with it, tho' he had no Knowledge of the Chriſtian Religion, becauſe it had been long in the Family, and his Anceſtors had look'd on it as a great Rarity.

Hya-men, or the Port of A-mwy.

Hya-men, or the Port of A-mwy.

THIS is a famous Port call'd A-mwy (B), from the Name of the Iſland to which it belongs, for it is properly no more than a Road, that makes one of the beſt Harbours in the World; it is incloſ'd on one ſide by the firm Land, and ſeveral very high Iſlands, which defend it againſt all Winds, and is of ſo great Extent as to receive many thouſand Ships. The Sea is ſo deep that the biggeſt Veſſels may ride as near the Shore as they pleaſe, without the leaſt Danger; and there are continually in the Port a great Number of Chineſe Tranſports, that trade to foreign Countries, not very remote from China. About twenty Years ago, it was much frequented by European Ships, but at preſent very few are bound hither, the Trade being carry'd to Kanton. The Emperor keeps a Garriſon of ſix or ſeven thouſand Men here, under the Command of a Chineſe General.

At entring the Road, you double a Rock, which, riſing ſeveral Foot above the Water, ſeems to divide the Road in two Parts, in the ſame manner that the Mingan divides that of Breſt. Three Leagues from thence there is a little Iſle, having a Hole from one Side to the other, thro' which one may ſee the Light; for this Reaſon it is call'd the Pierced Iſland.

The Iſland of Pong-hu.

The Iſland of Pong-hu.

THE Iſland of Pong-hû forms a little Archipelago, between the Port of A-mwy and the Iſland of Formoſa, which is inhabited only by the Chineſe Gariſon. However a Literary Mandarin reſides there, to watch the Ships that are almoſt continually paſſing and re-paſſing between China and Formoſa, which brings in a conſiderable Revenue to the State.

As theſe Iſles are nothing but Sands or Rocks, all ſorts of Neceſſaries muſt be brought thither from Hya-men or Formoſa, to the very Wood for firing. They afford neiher Buſhes, nor Briars, nor any Trees except one, which is their ſole Ornament. The Port is good and ſecure againſt all ſorts of Winds. Its Ground is ſandy, and the Water from twenty to twenty five Fathom deep.

When the Dutch were Maſters of the Port of Formoſa, the had built a ſort of Fort at the End of the great Iſle of Pong-hû, to defend the Entrance; bt at preſent nothing remains of it, except the Name of Hong-mau-chay, that is, the Fort of the Red-Hairs, for ſo the Chineſe call'd the Dutch. This Port, altho' it is in an uncultivated and uninhabited Country, is abſolutely neceſſary for the Preſervation of Formoſa, which at preſer has no Port for Ships, that draw above eight Feet of Water.

(B) In the French it is written Emouy, which in our Characters ſhould be E mwy or A mwy; the Engliſh call it Amoy, and have a Factory thee; ſome write Ey muy.

Tay-wan,

PROV. IV. Fo-kyen.

Tay-wan, or the Iſland of Formoſa.

Tay-wan (c), or the Iſland of Formoſa.

AS this Iſland has been long unknown, even to the Chineſe themſelves, who, tho' it be juſt at their Doors, did not begin to get footing in it till the Reign of the late Emperor Kang-hi; and as the Government, Manners, and Cuſtoms of the Iſlanders, (very different from thoſe of the Chineſe,) as well as the means by which they were ſubdued, deſerve a particular Relation, I ſhall be more large in my Account of it.

The whole Iſland is not under the Dominion of the Chineſe. It is divided, as it were, in two Parts, by a Chain of Mountains, which begins in the South Part of Sha-ma-ki-tew, and ends at the North Coaſt. Only that part lying to the Weſt of the Mountains belongs to the Chineſe, contain'd between 22° 8′, and 25° 20′ of North Latitude.

The Eaſtern Part, if you will believe the Chineſe, is inhabited by Barbarians; the Country mountainous, uncultivated and wild. The Character they give of them, differs little from that of the Savages of America; they paint them leſs bruiſh than the Iroquois, more chaſte than the Indians, and of a mild and peaceable Diſpoſition. They love and aſſiſt one another, are not covetous or ſelfiſh, making no Account of Gold and Silver, whereof they ſay they have ſeveral Mines; but they are exceeding Revengeful, without Law or Government, living only on Fiſh and the Fleſh of Animals, and in ſhort without Worſhip or Religion. Character of the Natives.

This is the Account the Chineſe give of theſe People, who inhabit the Eaſtern part of the Iſland; but as the Chineſe are not always to be credited, when they ſpeak of Foreigners, I will not vouch for the Truth of it, and the rather, becauſe there is no Correſpondence, but a continual War, between the Chineſe and them.

The Chineſe, who knew there were Gold Mines in Formoſa, before they ſubdu'd it, went in Search of them, as ſoon as they got Poſſeſſion; but as they found none in the Part whereof they were Maſters, they reſolv'd to examine the Eaſtern Part, where they were aſſur'd they lay. Accordingly they equipp'd a ſmall Ship, that they might go by Sea, being unwilling to venture their Lives in croſſing unknown Mountains. The Inhabitants receiv'd them very kindly, and generouſly offer'd them their Houſes, Proviſions, and all ſorts of Aſſiſtance. But all the Endeavours of the Chineſe, during the eight Days they continued there, to diſcover the Mines, prov'd fruitleſs; either by the Fault of the Interpreter, who might apprize the People of their Deſign, or elſe thro' a Politic Fear, being unwilling to give Suſpicion to a Nation, which had Reaſon to be jealous of the Chineſe Power; however that be, of all the Gold they came in queſt of, they found none but a few Ingots, lying in the Cottages, whereof thoſe poor People made no Account. Gold Mines.

The Chineſe, to whom this was a dangerous Temptation, vext at the bad Succeſs of their Voyage, and impatient to get poſſeſſion of thoſe Ingots, reſolv'd on a moſt barbarous Stratagem; having equipp'd their Ship by the Aſſiſtance of theſe good People, who furniſh'd them with all things neceſſary for their Return, they invited their Benefactors to a great Entertainment, as it were, by way of Acknowledgment, and having made them all drunk, cut their Throats when they were aſleep, and ſail'd off with the Ingots. Chineſe Cruelty.

This cruel Action was not long unreveng'd, but the Puniſhment fell on the Innocent; the News was no ſooner ſpread thro' the Eaſtern Part of the Iſle, than the Iſlanders enter'd the North Part belonging to China, where they put Man, Woman, and Child to the Sword, without Mercy, and fired ſome Chineſe Habitations. Ever ſince that time, one Part of the Iſle has been continually at War with the other. reveng'd.

That Part of Formoſa, poſſeſs'd by the Chineſe, certainly deſerves the Name it bears. It is a fine Country, the Air is pure, and always ſerene; It produces plenty of all ſorts of Grain, eſpecially Corn, Rice, &c. and is water'd by many Rivers, which deſcend from the afore-mention'd Mountains. Moſt of the Fruits that grow in the Indies are found here, as, Oranges, Bananas, Ananas, Goyavas, Papayas, Cocos, &c. and there is Room to believe, that if European Fruit-Trees were planted here, they would thrive; ſince one meets with Peach-Trees, Apricocks, Figgs, Grapes, Cheſnuts, and Pomegranates. They cultivate a ſort of Water-Melons, as they call them, which are much larger than thoſe of Europe, and of an oblong Figure, tho' ſometimes they are round; they conſiſt of either a white or red Pulp, and are full of a cool luſcious Juice, very grateful to the Chineſe. Tobacco and Sugar grow here exceeding well. All thoſe Trees are ſo agreeably rang'd, that when the Rice is tranſplanted in Lines and Squares as uſual, the whole Southern Part looks more like a vaſt Garden, carefully cultivated, than a great Plain. Air and Soil.

As the Country, till of late, has been inhabited by a barbarous unciviliz'd People, Horſes, Sheep, and Goats are very ſcarce; Hogs themſelves, ſo common in China, are pretty dear there; but one meets with abundance of Pullets, Ducks, and tame Geeſe; as alſo of Oxen, which ſerve to ride on inſtead of Horſes, Mules, and Aſſes. They break them betimes, and bring them to go as well and ſwift as Horſes; they are furniſh'd with a Bridle, Saddle and Crupper, which often coſt very dear.

You ſee there Apes and Stags in Herds, but Fallow Deer are very rarely to be met with; and if there are any Bears, Boars, Wolves, Tigers, and Leopards, as in China, it is on the Mountains of the Eaſtern Part, for there are none in thoſe belonging to the Weſtern.

Very few Birds alſo are to be ſeen in this Part of the Iſland; the moſt common Sort are Pheaſants, which the Fowlers will not ſuffer to encreaſe. Was the Water of the Rivers as good to drink as they are ſerviceable in fertilizing the Soil, the Iſland would want nothing that was neceſſary within itſelf.

Diviſion into Hyen.

The Chineſe divide the Lands they poſſeſs in Formoſa into three Hyen, or ſubordinate Governments, which depend on the Capital of the Iſland; each of theſe Governments has its particular Officers, who are immediately ſubject to the Governor of that Capital, and he to the Vice-Roy of the Province of Fo-kyen, whereof Tay-wan or Formoſa makes a Part.

Tay-wan-fû.

The Capital, named Tay-wan-fû, is very populous, much frequented, and of great Trade, being equal to moſt Cities of China, for Goodneſs, and the Number of Inhabitants. There one finds every thing that either the Iſland produces, or is brought from other Countries, as Rice, Sugar, Sugar-Candy, Tobacco, Salt, cur'd Veniſon, which is much eſteemed by the Chineſe, all kinds of Fruit, Linnen of divers Sorts, Wool, Cotton, Hemp, the Bark of certain Trees, and Plants reſembling Nettles, abundance of Medicinal Herbs, for the moſt Part unknown in Europe; theſe are the native Commodities, the foreign are Chineſe, and Indian Callicoes, Silks, Varniſh, China Ware, ſeveral things made in Europe, &c. there are very few Mulberry-Trees in the Iſland, and conſequently few Silks of the Country, or Manufactories.

If the Chineſe had Liberty to ſettle in Formoſa, ſeveral Families would gladly tranſplant themſelves thither; but in order thereto they muſt obtain Paſsports from the Mandarins of China, who grant them with Difficulty, and not without taking Security.

The Mandarins are very careful to examine all that paſs into or out of the Iſland, and ſome of them extort Money under-hand. This extraordinary Precaution is the Effect of good Policy, eſpecially as the Tartars are Maſters of China; for Formoſa is a Place of great Importance, and if a Chineſe ſhould ſeize it, he might raiſe great Troubles in the Empire: ſo that the Emperor keeps a Garriſon there of ten thouſand Men, commanded by a Tſong-ping, or Lieutenant-General, two Fû-tſyang, or Major-General, and ſeveral inferior Officers; who are chang'd duely every three Years, or oftner, if there be Occaſion.

The Streets of Tay-wan-fû are all ſtrait as a Line, and cover'd during ſeven or eight Months in the Year, to keep off the Heat of the Sun. They are not above thirty or forty Feet broad, but ſome of them are near a League in Length; all the Houſes on each ſide belong to Dealers, whoſe Shops are adorn'd with Silks, China Ware, Varniſh, and other Goods, rang'd to admirable Advantage, in which Art the Chineſe excel.

Theſe Streets look like charming Galleries, and it would be a Pleaſure to walk in them, if they were leſs crouded with People, and better pav'd; the Houſes are cover'd with Straw, and built for the moſt Part only of Clay and Bambû; the Tents wherewith the Streets are cover'd, hide all that is diſagreeable, letting nothing be ſeen but the Shops.

Tay-wan-fû has neither Fortifications nor Walls; the Tartars don't care to confine either their Forces or Courage within Ramparts; they love to ſcour the Country on Horſeback. The Port is pretty good, and ſhelter'd from all Winds, but the Entrance becomes more difficult every Day.

The Port.

Heretofore it had two Entrances, the one call'd Ta-kyang, where the greateſt Ships ride with Eaſe; and the other Lo-ulh-men, where the Bottom is Rock, and there is not above nine or ten Feet Water, at the higheſt Tides. The firſt Paſſage is impracticable at preſent, for in ſome Places they find but five Feet Water, and the moſt it riſes to is ſeven or eight; beſides, it is every Day choak'd up more and more by the Sea rolling in the Sands.

The Dutch formerly enter'd the Port by this Ta-kyang, and to keep foreign Ships out, at the Point of the Iſle, to the South of the Ta-kyang, they built a Citadel, which would be an excellent one, was it not founded on the Sand; however, it is very fit to defend them from the Enemies they had moſt to fear, that is, the Chineſe and Japonneſe.

Inhabitants of Chineſe Formoſa.

The Part of Formoſa which is ſubject to the Chineſe, is inhabited by two different Nations, the Natives, and Chineſe, who, drawn by Gain, flock from ſeveral Provinces of China. Tay-wan-fû, Fong-ſhan-hyen, and Chu-lo-hyen, are inhabited only by Chineſe, for the third Hyen, of the three abovementioned, is included in the Capital. As to the Natives, there are none but what are the Servants, or rather the Slaves of the Chineſe.

Fort Ngan-ping-ching.

Beſides theſe three Cities the Chineſe have ſeveral Villages, but they have no conſiderable Fort excepting Ngan-ping-ching; it is at the Foot of the Caſtle of Zeland, which is the Name given by the Dutch to the Citadel ſpoken of before. There may be four or five hundred Families at Ngan-ping-ching, with a Garriſon of two thouſand Men, commanded by a Fû-tſyang, or Major-General.

The Chineſe in Formoſa are the ſame as to Government and Manners as in China; ſo that I ſhall only here give an Account of the Genius and form of Government among the Natives.

Cuſtoms of the Natives.

The People of Formoſa, who are ſubject to the Chineſe, are divided into forty five Boroughs or Habitations, call'd She, thirty ſix in the Northern, and nine in the Southern Part; the Northern Boroughs are populous enough, and the Houſes very like thoſe of the Chineſe: but thoſe of the South are no more than a Parcel of Cottages made of Earth and Bambû, cover'd with Straw, raiſed on a kind of Terraſs, three or four Foot high, built in form of a Tunnel inverted, and fifteen, twenty, thirty, or forty Feet in Diameter; ſome of them are divided by Partition-Walls.

There are in theſe Huts neither Chairs, Benches, Tables, Beds, nor any Moveable. In the middle is a kind of Chimney or Stove, rais'd above two Feet from the Ground, where they dreſs their Victuals; their ordinary Diet is Rice, ſmall Grain, and Game, which they take either by running or with Arms; their Swiftneſs is ſurpriſing, and they have been ſeen to out-run Horſes in their full Speed.

The

PROV. IV. Fo-kyen. Iſland of Tay-wan or Formoſa.

The Chineſe alledge as the Cauſe of their Swiftneſs, that till the Age of fourteen or fifteen their Knees and Loins are bound exceeding tight. Their Arms are a ſort of Dart, which they throw the Space of ſeventy or eighty Paces with the greateſt Dexterity; and tho' nothing is more ſimple than their Bows and Arrows, yet they kill Pheaſants flying with as much certainty, as do Europeans with a Gun. They are very ſlovenly in their Diet, having neither Diſhes, Plates, Spoons, nor Chop-ſticks; whatever they have dreſs'd, is put on a piece of Wood or Mat, and they feed themſelves with their Fingers like Apes; they eat their Fleſh half raw, and think it exceeding delicious if it be but ſhewn to the Fire. For a Bed they are content with the Leaves of a certain Tree, very common in the Country, which they ſpread on the Earth or Floor of their Cottages, and ſo lay themſelves down to ſleep. Their whole Apparel is a ſingle Cloth, wherewith they are cover'd from the Waiſt down to the Knees.

Ornaments,

Pride, which is rooted in the Heart of Man, finds means to ſubſiſt amidſt ſo much Poverty; they even pay dearer for it than the moſt polite People, who pique themſelves more on Luxury and Magnificence. Theſe latter borrow Hair from Animals, and Silk from Worms, which they embroider with Gold and Silver; but our Iſlanders make uſe of their own Skin, whereon they imprint ſeveral groteſque Figures of Trees, Animals, Flowers, &c. which puts them to ſuch violent Pain, that the Operation would kill them, was the whole to be perform'd at once. They therefore employ ſeveral Months about it, and ſometimes a whole Year, during which time, they muſt put themſelves every Day to a ſort of Torture, and all to gratify the Ambition they have to diſtinguiſh themſelves from the Croud; for it is not every one that is allow'd to bear thoſe Marks of Magnificence, the Privilege being granted only to ſuch, as in the Judgment of the moſt conſiderable Men of the Borough, have excell'd the reſt in running or hunting.

and Dreſs.

Nevertheleſs, all Perſons are at Liberty to blacken their Teeth, wear Bobs in their Ears, Bracelets above their Elbows and Wriſts, Necklaces and Coronets, conſiſting of ſeveral Rows of ſmall Grains of different Colours; theſe Coronets end with a kind of Plume made of Feathers of Cocks or Pheaſants, which they pick up with a great deal of Care. Whoever repreſents to his Imagination theſe fantaſtical Ornaments on the Body of a Man of an eaſy and ſlender Shape, olive Complexion, with ſleek Hair hanging negligently over his Shoulders, arm'd with a Bow and Dart, all his Cloaths a piece of Linnen two or three Feet long, which goes round him from the Waiſt to the Knees, will have the true Picture of a Native of the Southern Part of Formoſa.

In the North Part of the Iſland, as the Climate is ſomewhat colder, they cover themſelves with the Skins of Stags, kill'd in hunting, whereof they make a ſort of Coat, without Sleeves, ſhap'd much like a Dalmatic (D). They wear a Bonnet in form of a Cylinder, made of the Leaves of Bananas, which they adorn with ſeveral Coronets, plac'd one over another, and faſten'd with very narrow Bands, or little Locks of Hair, of different Colours; on the Top of the Bonnet they place a Tuft or Plume of Cocks or Pheaſants Feathers, like thoſe in the South.

Marriages.

Their Marriages have nothing barbarous in them, they do not buy their Wives, as they do in China; neither have they any Regard to the Fortune of one or the other Party, as is practiſed in Europe, the Fathers and Mothers having ſcarce any Hand in them at all.

When a young Man has a Mind to marry, and meets with a Laſs to his liking, he goes ſeveral Days together with Muſick to her Door; if the young Woman is ſatisfy'd with her Spark, ſhe goes out to him, where they ſettle Terms between themſelves, after which they acquaint their Parents with the Matter, who prepare the Marriage Feaſt. This is made at the Houſe of the Bride's Father, where the Bridegroom continues, looking on it as his own, and himſelf as the Support of it, without ever returning to ſtay at his Father's Houſe; which thenceforth he has no more Regard to, than the Brides in Europe have for the Houſes of their Parents, when they quit them to live with their Spouſes; hence they place their good Fortune not in having Boys but Girls, who procure them Sons-in-Law, that are the Props of their old Age.

Government.

Altho' the Iſlanders in this Diviſion are intirely ſubject to the Chineſe, yet they ſtill preſerve ſome Remains of their ancient Government; each Borough chooſes three or four of the moſt ancient, who are in greateſt Repute for Integrity, to be the chief Judges over them; theſe determine all Differences abſolutely, and if any one refuſes to ſubmit to their Deciſion, he is driven that Inſtant out of the Borough, without Hopes of ever being admitted there again, nor dares any other receive him.

They pay their Tribute to the Chineſe in Grain, the Tails or Skins of Stags, or in other Things of that Nature, which are eaſily procur'd in the Iſland. To regulate what concerns this Tribute, there is in every Borough a Chineſe, who learns the Language, to ſerve as an Interpreter to the Mandarins. Theſe Interpreters, inſtead of procuring Eaſe to theſe poor People, and preventing their being over burthen'd, are ſo many petty Tyrants, who tire out the Patience not only of them, but the Mandarins themſelves, who are forc'd to let them continue in their Employments, to avoid greater Inconveniencies.

However, of the twelve Boroughs that were ſubject to the Chineſe in the South, there remain but nine. Three of them having revolted, they drove out their Interpreters, and united themselves with those of the Eastern Part of the Island, paying no longer Tribute to China; under the present Emperor a great Number of Boroughs have submitted, and they hope, by little and little, that the rest will follow their Example. Tho' these People are reckon'd Barbarians by the Chinese, yet they seem to have truer Notions of Wisdom, than many of the Philosophers of China. One finds among them, by the Confession of the Chinese themselves, no cheating, thieving, quarrelling, nor any Law-Suits, except against their Interpreters, and they practise all the Duties of Equity and mutual Benevolence; whatever is given to any of them must not be touch'd by him, till those who shar'd the Labour partake of the Wages.

Morality.

Religion.

There appear to have been Christians among these Islanders, when the Hollanders were Masters of the Port; we found several of them who understood Dutch, read their Books, and made use of their Characters in writing; we also saw in their Hands some Fragments of Scripture in the same Tongue.

These People adore no Images (D), and even abhor whatever tends that Way; they perform no religious Worship, nor say any Prayers, yet we have seen some who had Knowledge of one God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, in three Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; that the first Man was call'd Adam, and the first Woman Eve, and that they had by their Disobedience brought down the Anger of God on themselves and their Posterity; and that it is necessary to have recourse to Baptism, to wash out that Stain. They are acquainted also with the Form of Baptism, nevertheless we could not tell certainly whether they were baptized or not.

History of Tay-wan.

Altho' Formosa is not far from China, yet the Chinese, according to their History, had no Knowledge of it, before the Reign of the Emperor Swen-ti of the Dynasty of the Ming, about the Year 1430, when the Eunuch Wan-san-pau, returning from the West, was driven thither by a Tempest.

This Eunuch finding himself in a strange Land, whose Inhabitants appear'd to him as barbarous as their Country was beautiful, made some Stay there, in order to get the best Intelligence he could of it, to carry to his Master; but the greatest Advantage he reap'd by his Enquiries, were a few Plants and Medicinal Herbs, which are to this Day employ'd in China with good Success.

In the forty second Year of the Emperor Kya-tsing, and of Christ 1564, Yu-ta-yew, Chief of a Squadron, cruising in the Eastern Sea of China, met a Corsair, named Lin-tau-kyen, who had seiz'd the Isles of Pong-hû, where he had left Part of his Men. He was a proud Man, and ambitious of every Occasion to distinguish himself; as soon as he saw Yu-ta-yew, he sail'd up to him, attack'd him briskly, and had infallibly defeated the Chinese Squadron, if he who commanded it had not had an equal Share both of Courage and Conduct.

Yu-ta-yew receiv'd the first Fire with unconcern, after which he attack'd his Enemy in his Turn; the Fight lasted more than five Hours, when Night coming on, Lin-ta-kyen fled towards the Isles of Pong-hû, with an Intention, after he had refresh'd his Troops, and taken all the rest of his Soldiers on Board, to return and face the Enemy; But Yu-ta-yew, like an experienced Captain, pursued him so closely, that at break of Day Lin-tau-kyen found the Entrance of the Port block'd up by Part of the Enemy's Squadron. His Troops being much diminish'd in the Fight, and intimidated by their Losses, judg'd it dangerous to attempt entering the Port, wherefore he resolv'd to continue his Course, and put into Formosa.

Yu-ta-yew pursu'd him thither, but as he found the Sea shallow, and besides had no Knowledge of the Entrance of the Port, he was unwilling to expose his Ships, and return'd to the Isles of Pong-hû, whereof he made himself Master. He made the Soldiers he found there Prisoners, and after he had left a good Garrison in the Place return'd victorious to China, where he gave an Account of his Discoveries and Expedition. The Court receiv'd the News with Joy, and sent a Literary Mandarin to govern those Isles.

Formosa, says the Chinese Historian, was then an uncultivated Country, inhabited only by Barbarians. Lin-tau-kyen, who had great things in View, not thinking this Island fit for his Purpose in his present Circumstances, cut the Throats of all the Inhabitants that fell into his Hands, and by an unparallel'd Piece of Inhumanity making use of the Blood of those unhappy Mortals to caulk his Ships, put to Sea as soon as he could for the Province of Quang-tong, where he dy'd miserably.

Japanese seize Formosa.

Towards the End of the Year 1620, which was the first of the Emperor Tyen-ki, a Japanese Squadron landed on Formosa; the Officer who commanded it, finding the Country, wild as it was, fit for receiving a Colony, resolv'd to subdue it; for which End he left part of his People there, with Orders to get such Information concerning it, as was necessary for the Execution of his Design.

Dutch arrive there.

About the same time a Dutch Ship, in its Course to or from Japan, was driven by Storm on the Isle, where they found the Japanese in no Condition to oppose them. The Country, according to the Chinese Historian, appear'd charming to the Dutch, and commodious for their Trade; wherefore under Pretence of staying for Provisions and other Necessaries, some of them took the Opportunity to examine the Island.

On their Return on board, they refitted their Ship, after which they intreated the Japa- nese, with whom they were unwilling to embroil themselves, for Fear of hurting their Trade, to let them build a House on the Shore, at one of the Entrances of the Port, which might be of some Benefit to them in trading with Japan. The Japanese at first rejected their Proposal, but the Dutch pressing their Instances, and assuring them that they would take no more Ground than what an Ox-Hide would inclose, they at last consented. (F)

History of Tay-wan or Formosa.

The Dutch immediately went to work, and cutting the Hide into very narrow Thongs, join'd the Ends together, and therewith measur'd out their Ground. The Japanese were at first a little angry at this piece of Fraud; but on farther Reflections pleas'd with the Stratagem, they were pacify'd, and allow'd the Dutch to make use of the Land; accordingly they in that Place built the Fort I have already spoken of, on the Gate whereof are still to be seen these Words: CASTEL ZELANDA, 1634.

The Dutch outwit the Japonese, and built Fort Zelandia.

The Building this Fort render'd the Dutch Masters of the Port, and the only Passage by which large Ships could enter; perhaps the Japanese saw the Importance of it too late. However that be, whether they took Umbrage at the new Fort, or did not find their Account in the Island, which continued still unimprov'd, they soon after abandon'd it, and return'd home.

The Dutch seeing themselves now sole Masters of Formosa, for the Islanders were in no Condition to oppose them, the better to secure the Port, built on the other Side of it, opposite to Fort Zeland, a House fortify'd with four Semi-Bastions, whereof I have also spoken before.

At this time China was all in a Combustion, partly by the Civil War, which laid waste so many fine Provinces, and partly by the War with the Tartars, who at length subdued it, and founded the present Dynasty. One of those who most strenuously oppos'd the latter, was a Person of Condition in the Province of Fo-kyen, call'd Ching-chi-long (G), who from an ordinary Trader was become one of the greatest Merchants in China; This Person fitted out a Fleet at his own Expence, against the Tartars, and was soon follow'd by an innumerable multitude of Chinese Vessels, whereby he became Head of one of the most formidable Fleets that ever appear'd in those Seas; the Tartar offer'd him the Dignity of King, provided he would acknowledge his Sovereignty, which Offer he refused, but did not long enjoy his good Fortune. Happy had his Zeal for Religion (for he was a Christian) equall'd his Fidelity to his Prince and Country, now ready to fall under a foreign Power.

Ching-ching-kong or Coxinga invade Formosa.

His Son Ching-ching-kong (H), who succeeded him in the Command of this numerous Armada, more zealous still for his Country than his Father, undertook divers Exploits; he besieged several considerable Cities, as Hay-ching in the Province of Fo-kyen, which he took after cutting in Pieces the Tartar Army sent to relieve it; also Wen-chew in Che-kyang, Nan-king in Kyang-nan, &c. But his Success did not continue long, for he was at length vanquish'd by the Tartars, and driven quite out of China; he then directed his Views towards Formosa, resolving to expel the Dutch, and establish a new Kingdom there.

In the Year 1661, and the seventeenth of the Reign of Shun-shi, Father of the Emperor Kang-hi, Ching-ching-kong left China, and in his Way to Formosa took the Isles of Pong-hû. The Dutch, who without doubt thought themselves secure on the Side of China, which was still in Trouble, had taken no Care to furnish Pong-hû and Tay-wan with Forces; so that Ching-ching-kong no sooner appear'd, but they fell into his Hands; he left there an hundred of his Ships to guard them, and continued his Course to Formosa.

In the Garrison left to defend the Fort and Port of Formosa, there were but eleven Dutchmen, the rest consisted of Indian Blacks and Islanders; notwithstanding which Inequality the Hollanders resolv'd to defend themselves bravely, which they did.

Ching-ching-kong enter'd the Port with his Fleet, consisting of nine hundred Sail, by the Passage of Lo-ul-men, a great League beyond the Fort of Zeland, and landed Part of his Men, in order to attack the same, both by Sea and Land; the Siege lasted four Months, during which time the Dutch defended themselves by their Cannon, with an unexpected Success. Ching-ching-kong was in Despair to meet with such a Resistance and Courage in a Handful of Europeans, against an Army so numerous as his own. As the Chinese wanted Guns, they had no Hopes of reducing the Dutch otherwise than by Famine, which Method as it required much Time, would give them an Opportunity of procuring Assistance from their Ships at Batavia, or those that trade to Japon.

Ching-ching-kong was fully appriz'd of the Difficulty of his Enterprize; but seeing no Hopes of ever returning to China, while the Tartars govern'd, on whom he had made War, and that if he was shut out of Formosa, he knew not where to retire to, he resolv'd to make a last Effort against the Dutch; these had four Ships in the Port, on board each of which they had put one of their Men with Indians to guard them, the other seven Dutchmen were block'd up in the Citadel or Fort of Zeland.

(F) It is remarkable that the same Stratagem, related here of the Dutch, was used by the Phenicians in Building Byrsa, afterwards Carthage, and there is a Resemblance in the Characters as well as Adventures of the two People.

(G) He is named Chin chi lung in the Dutch Embassies, where it is observed, that he was called by Foreigners Iquon, or Ikoan and Equan; there also we are told, that he aspired to the Empire, was made General of the Chinese Forces*, betray'd the Emperor to the Tartars, and was after all cast in Prison by them, at Peking, where he dy'd.

(H) This must be the famous Coxinga in the Dutch Embassies, for it is there said, that his Son Coxinga and Brothers being (about 1657) informed of his Father's Imprisonment, betook themselves again to the Fleet, and kept the Tartars on the Coast in continual Alarm, till being at length driven out of the Islands Ay, Que-moy, &c. by the Tartars, assisted by the Dutch; he in Revenge, in 1660, sailed with all his Forces to Tay-wan and Formosa, both which Islands, with Castle Zeland, he took in March 1661, after a Siege of 10 Months, treating the Dutch with great Rigour, contrary to Agreement.†

These

The Dutch driven out.

These Ships the Chineſe Captain purpoſed to burn, to this end putting a Quantity of Fire-works on Board ſome of his own Veſſels, and being favour'd by a North-Eaſt Wind, he ſent them driving againſt thoſe of the Hollanders, whereof he burnt three; on this unexpected Succeſs he immediately ſummon'd the Dutch, who were incloſed in the Port, to ſurrender, declaring he would ſuffer them to retire with all their Effects, but if they perſiſted to hold out, he would give them no Quarter. The Dutch, who had only one Ship left, readily accepted of the Offer, and having put their Goods on Board their Veſſel, deliver'd up the Place into the Hands of the Chineſe, and ſail'd away.

Ching-ching-kong having no body now to oppoſe his Deſigns, diſtributed part of his Troops in that Part of Formoſa, which is at preſent poſſeſs'd by the Chineſe. He plac'd a Garriſon at Ki-long-chay, an abandon'd Fortreſs formerly built by the Spaniards, and built one himſelf at Tan-ſhwi-ching, at the Mouth of the River Tan-ſhwi, where the Chineſe Veſſels might lie at Anchor. He pitch'd on the Ground where Chu-lo-yen and Fong-ſhan-hyen ſtand at preſent, and founded two Cities thereon, to which he gave the Names of Tyen-hing-hyen and Wan-nyen-hyen. He erected the Capital of his new Dominions in the Place where Tay-wan-fû now is, and gave it the Name of Shing-tyen-fû; he eſtabliſh'd his Palace and Court at Fort Zeland, giving it the Name of Ngan-ping-fû, which it ſtill retains.

It was then Formoſa began to take a new Form, where he eſtabliſh'd the ſame Laws, Cuſtoms, and Government as in China; but he did not long enjoy his new Conqueſt, dying within a Year and ſome Months, after he had taken Poſſeſſion of the Iſland. He was ſucceeded by his Son Ching-king-may, who having been bred up to Study, took little or no Care to cultivate the Lands his Father had acquired with ſo much Pains and Fatigue, which much diminiſh'd the Courage of his Troops, and their Zeal for his Service.

Ching-king-may.

In the Year 1673, and the twelfth of the Reign of Kang-hi, the Kings of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen revolting, Ching-king-may, being willing to revive the Martial Spirit of his Troops, reſolv'd to join the latter againſt the Tartar; accordingly he fitted out his Ships, and ſail'd to the Coaſts of that Province, but as he would be treated on the Foot of a ſovereign Prince, and the King of Fo-kyen pretended to have the Precedency of him, he was ſo highly incenſed thereat, that he forthwith declar'd War againſt him.

They fought on both Sides with much Reſolution and Courage, but as the Troops of Ching-king-may conſiſted of Veterans, the Victory always fell to him; ſo that the King of Fo-kyen was at length oblig'd to cauſe himſelf to be ſhav'd a ſecond time, and lie at the Mercy of the Tartars. Ching-king-may return'd to Formoſa, where he dy'd ſoon after, leaving for Succeſſor his Son Ching-ke-ſan, who was very young, under the Conduct of Lyew-que-kan and Fong-ſi-ſan, two Officers firmly attach'd to his Intereſt.

Ching-ke-ſan.

The Rebellion of Fo-kyen being intirely ſuppreſs'd by the Tartars, they aboliſh'd the Title of King; and in the Year 1682, which was the twenty firſt of the Reign of Kang-hi, they eſtabliſh'd a Tſong-tû to govern both this Province and that of Che-kyang, which is a Dignity ſuperior to that of Vice-Roy.

The firſt of their Appointment was Tſong-tû yau, who was dexterous, polite, and of an engaging Behaviour; no ſooner was he in the Poſt, than he publiſh'd a general Amneſty, which extended to Formoſa, for all who ſubmitted themſelves to the Dominion of the Tartars; with Promiſe to procure them the ſame Employments, Honours, and Privileges, which they poſſeſs'd under their reſpective Chiefs. This Declaration had the deſired Effect; for moſt of thoſe who, having follow'd Ching-ching-kong, had abandon'd their Country, Wives, and Children, ſeeing themſelves in a foreign, uncultivated, and almoſt uninhabited Land, without Hopes of drawing any conſiderable Advantage from it, were rejoic'd to find ſo good an Opportunity of returning home. Some therefore without any farther Delay left Ching-ke-ſan to go into Fo-kyen, where the Tſong-tû yau receiv'd them with ſo much Curteſy, and ſo well provided for them, that they were quickly follow'd by a great many more. The Tſong-tû yau thought this a proper time to ſubdue Formoſa, and accordingly ſent out of hand a formidable Fleet under the Command of a Ti-tû, or Lieutenant General, to ſeize on the Iſles of Pong-hû. The Ti-tû found more Reſiſtance there than he expected, the Soldiers defending themſelves vigorouſly with the Aſſiſtance of the Dutch Cannon; but at length they were oblig'd to ſubmit to Number and Force.

Submits to the Emperor of China.

The Iſle of Pong-hû being taken, the young Prince's Council judg'd it would be difficult, conſidering the Temper the Troops were then in, to preſerve Formoſa; and without waiting for the Ti-tû to come and attack them in form, they diſpatch'd a Ship to carry a Petition to the Emperor, in the Name of the young Prince, by which he ſubmitted himſelf to his Majeſty. This Petition, faithfuly tranſlated from the Chineſe, is as follows:

The King of Yen-ping, General of the Army, Ching-ke-ſan, preſents this Petition to the Emperor.

" WHEN humbling myſelf at the Feet of your Majeſty, I conſider the Grandeur of " China, which from time immemorial has always ſupported itſelf with ſo much
" Glory, and where an infinite Number of Kings have ſucceeded each other; I cannot help
" confeſſing

" confeſſing that it is the Effect of a particular Providence of Tyen (M), who has choſen your " illuſtrious Houſe to govern the nine Earths (*). Tyen has not made this Change but in order " to render the five Virtues perfect (†), as appears evidently from the good Order and Succeſs " of all your Majeſty's Undertakings. PROV. IV. Fo-kyen.

" When I think with Humility of my Anceſtors, I perceive they were firmly attach'd to the " Intereſt of their Sovereigns, whereby they endeavour'd to make an Acknowledgment for the " Favour they receiv'd from the preceding Dynaſty, at a time when my Family had received none " from your illuſtrious Houſe. It was this Principal of Loyalty to his Prince, which oblig'd " my Grandfather Ching-ching-kong to leave China, and go to grub up the uncultivated Lands " of the Eaſt. My Father Ching-ching-may was a ſtudious Man, who durſt not venture him- " ſelf on the Side of a Precipice; like the Kings of Ye-lang, he was wholly employ'd in " governing and inſtructing his People, confining himſelf to this Corner of the Earth, lying " in the midſt of the Sea, without having other Views. History of Tayowan or Formoſa.

" Hitherto I have enjoy'd Benefits derived from my Anceſtors; I their Grandſon, never ceaſe " to teſtify my Acknowledgments, by continually calling to mind the Favours they have receiv'd " from Heaven, without aiming to aggrandize myſelf on Earth. But now that I ſee your Ma- " jeſty, like the Heavens (N), which by their Height and Extenſion cover all Things, and the " Earth, which by its Solidity ſupports them, always inclin'd to do good, and allay the Effects " of your Juſtice; the Foundation whereon your Majeſty governs China: Now that I ſee your " Majeſty, like the riſing Sun, whoſe Light ſpreads itſelf in an inſtant over the whole Earth; " as ſoon as it appears on the Horizon, and diſpels in a Moment the ſlender Miſts, which it " meets with, on the Surface of the Earth; how dare I think of any thing elſe but applying " my ſelf to my Perfection? which I, a Foreigner, deem the only Means of acquiring Con- " tentment.

" Should I think of ſending my Ships to croſs over to the Weſt (O), I confeſs I ſhould com- " mit a Fault: But alas! What remains of that Race which came into the Eaſt? Is it " not like a feeble Dew, that falls in the Morning, and diſſipates when the Sun appears? " How durſt I then undertake any thing againſt your Majeſty? My Heart is intirely devoted to " you; This Petition diſcloſes its ſincere Sentiments to your Majeſty, who will ſee the Effects " of them.

" I know at preſent that I am not in the right Way, and for the future, I ſhall be ambi- " tious to walk in the Garden of Charity, and in the Retinue of Ki-ling. I ardently wiſh to " ſee Heaven and Earth united in one; the poor People of this Iſland do not want to in- " toxicate themſelves with Liquor, or to ſurfeit themſelves with Victuals; if they are treated " with Mildneſs, they will be more inclin'd to Submiſſion. It is the Nature of Fiſh to retire " where the Water is deepeſt, they have never too much of it, and can live a long time " amidſt the Waves of the Sea. To confirm with an Oath all that I lay before your Majeſty in " this Petition, may I never ſee the Light of the Sun, if theſe are not the Sentiments of " my Heart."

The Emperor's Anſwer to this Petition was, that Ching-ke-ſan ſhould leave Formoſa, and come to Pe-king. But Ching-ke-ſan fearing to go to Pe-king, by a ſecond Petition, (wherewith he ſent his Seals, and thoſe of the Principal Officers) repreſented to the Emperor, that having been born in the Southern Parts, and being likewiſe very unhealthy, he dreaded the Cold of the North; wherefore he intreated his Majeſty to permit him to retire into the Province of Fo-kyen, from whence his Anceſtors came.

This laſt Petition was of no Effect, ſo that this unhappy Prince, who ſaw himſelf almoſt wholy deſerted, was oblig'd to ſurrender Formoſa into the Hands of the Tartars, and go to Peking, where on his Arrival at the Court, the Title of Count was conferr'd on him, in the twenty ſecond Year of Kang-hi, and 1683 of Chriſt.

PROVINCE V. CHE-KYANG.

THIS Province is one of the moſt fertile and flouriſhing as to Trade, in the whole Empire. It is bounded on the Eaſt by the Sea; on the South by Fo-kyen; on the North and Weſt by Kyang-nan and Kyang-ſi, with which it is ſurrounded. They reckon in it eleven Cities of the firſt Rank, whoſe Juriſdictions are like ſo many Provinces, and ſeventy ſeven of the ſecond and third Rank, beſides an infinite Number of very populous Boroughs and Villages. PROV. V. Che-kyang. Bounds and Diviſion.

(M) Here Tyen, which ſignifies both God and Heaven, ſtands for God.

(*) That is the whole inhabited World. The Chineſe divide the Earth into 9 Sorts; 1. Mountains of good Land, 2. Stony Mountains, 3. Land and Hillocks, 4. Black and dry Lands, 5. Moiſt Lands, 6. Sandy Lands, 7. Clay Lands, 8. Yellow Lands, and 9. Red Lands.

(†) Charity, Juſtice, Civility, or the Ceremonies, Prudence, Fidelity, or Honeſty.

(N) Here doubtleſs, in the Original Chineſe, the Word Tyen is uſed, but the Properties of Height and Extenſion requires it to be taken for Heaven, as the Attribute of Providence in the Place above required it ſhould be tranſlated God.

(O) By the Weſt is to be underſtood China, and by the Eaſt, Formoſa.

Prov. V. Che-kyang. Soil.

The whole Country, which conſiſts of well cultivated Mountains, and equally fertile Fields, is cut with Rivers and Canals: which laſt are broad, deep, and lin'd on both ſides with hewn ſtone; they are cover'd alſo with Bridges at certain Diſtances, which join the Plains on both ſides together, ſo that one may travel all over the Province by Water as well as Land. The running Springs and Lakes, wherewith it abounds, contribute farther to its Fertility.

Silk.

Its Inhabitants are very mild, ingenious and polite. The Silks which they make, embroidered with Gold and Silver, are the beſt in all China, and ſo cheap that a Suit of good Silk coſts leſs than one of the moſt ordinary Cloth in Europe. Hence one ſees a great Number of Fields, full of dwarf Mulberry Trees, which they hinder to grow, planting and cutting them almoſt like Vines; the Chineſe being convinc'd by long Experience that the Leaves of the ſmalleſt Mulberry-Trees produce the beſt Silk.

They breed ſo great a Quantity of Silk-Worms in this Province, that we may almoſt ſay it is in a Condition of itſelf to furniſh Japan, the Philippine Iſlands, and Europe with Silk of all ſorts, at an eaſy Price.

All ſorts of Neceſſaries are very plentiful. The Mountains in the South and Weſt Part are cultivated; in other Parts where they are interſpers'd with Rocks, they afford Timber for building Ships and Houſes.

Golden Fiſh.

In the Lakes of this Province the Golden Fiſh are found, which I have deſcribed before; it affords alſo abundance of excellent Cray-Fiſh. In certain Places there grows an infinite Number of Muſhrooms, which are carry'd all over the Empire. After having ſalted, they dry and keep them the Year round. When they want to make uſe of them, by only letting them lye a while in Water, they become as good and freſh as if they had been juſt gather'd.

Gammons, Tallow Tree.

The beſt Hams come from this Province, where alſo that extraordinary Tree grows, call'd U-kyew-mû, which produces the Tallow; likewiſe thoſe Shrubs that bear a very white Flower reſembling the Jaſmin, excepting that it has a greater Number of Leaves as well as a more agreeable Smell; a ſingle Flower is ſufficient to perfume a whole Houſe, ſo that they are in ſuch Eſteem with the Chineſe, that they take the ſame Care to preſerve thoſe little Shrubs, as is employ'd in Europe to defend the Orange-Trees from the Rigour of Weather.

Fruit Pe-tſi.

Altho' the Fruit call'd Pe-tſi is found elſewhere, yet it is much more common in this Province; it grows in marſhy Water, and is as big as a Cheſnut; its Kernel is cover'd with a very thin Skin; the Pulp is White, and full of an agreeable Juice, it is firm and ſomewhat ſour.

Some pretend that if one puts a Piece of Copper Coin with this Fruit in his Mouth, he may break it with his Teeth, as eaſy as the Fruit itſelf; this P. Martini affirms, but other Miſſionaries who made the Trial found it not ſo.

Bambû Canes.

The Canes or Reeds, call'd by the Portugueze Bambû, are found throughout the Empire, but Che-kyang yields more than any other Province, having whole Foreſts of them; theſe Bambu's are of infinite uſe in China; they are very large and hard; and tho' they are hollow within, and divided into Joints, they are very ſtrong, and bear the greateſt Burthens; their Leaves are long, and folded in towards the Ends. Notwithſtanding their Hardneſs, they are eaſily ſlit into very thin Slips, wherewith they make their Matts, Boxes, Combs, &c. As they are by Nature bor'd thro', they are very proper for Pipes to convey Water from one Place to another; or for Teleſcopes, to ſerve either as a Tube, a Caſe, or a Reſt.

The Firſt City, Hang-chew-fu, Capital of the Province.

Hang-chew-fu.

THIS is one of the richeſt and largeſt Cities of the Empire. It is conſiderable, eſpecially on account of its moſt advantageous Situation, prodigious Number of Inhabitants, the Conveniency of its Canals, and its Trade for the beſt Silk in the World.

If you will believe the Chineſe Proverb, it is the Terreſtrial Paradiſe. Its Figure is almoſt round, it is forty Li, or four Leagues, in Compaſs, excluſive of the Suburbs; theſe Li muſt be three hundred and ſixty Paces each, from the Eaſtern Gate to the Northern they reckon ten Li. One of our Miſſionaries, by counting the Steps of the Chair-Men, judg'd that the Li might well be of that Length.

Number of the Inhabitants.

As to the Number of Inhabitants they amount to a Million. A Chriſtian Bachelor aſſur'd a Miſſionary who reſided there, that within the Walls only, without reckoning the Suburbs which are immenſe, the Officers who gather the Tax, had on their Rolls about three hundred thouſand Hû or Families; or, as the Chineſe expreſs it, San-ſhe-wan (P), which ſignifies thirty times ten thouſand.

The Walls of Hang-chew are fair, very high and thick. The Water of the Canal within the City is not good. There are on the Canals of the Suburbs a prodigious Quantity of Barks, inhabited by intire Families, the ſame as at Kan-ton. The Streets are pretty narrow, but the Shops very neat, and the Dealers very rich.

Theſe Streets are all adorn'd with Triumphal Arches, which one meets with, eſpecially in Places of great Reſort, being Monuments rais'd in Honour of the Mandarins, who have diſtinguiſh'd themſelves in the Diſcharge of their Office, or have attain'd the chief Dignities of the Empire. There are beſides in Hang-chew four great Towers, ſeveral Stories high. The Garriſon conſiſts of of ſeven thouſand Men, under the Tſyang-kyun or Tartar General, and three thouſand under the Fû-ywen or Vice-Roy.

Tho' there are large Gardens in the City, and the Houſes are of one Story, it is aſtoniſhing to think how populous it is. The great Streets are throng'd with People like thoſe of Paris, with this Difference, that there are no Women among them. The Tartar Troops have a Fortreſs here, ſeparated from the City by a Wall. The River, call'd Tſyen-tang-kyang, runs near its Walls, where it is a great League in Breadth.

The chief Manufactury for Silk.

It may be ſaid without exaggerating, that Hang-chew is properly the Country of Silk, becauſe the chief Manufacturies are there. They ſay there are ſixty thouſand Workmen within its Walls, and if that be ſo, there muſt needs be ſeveral hundred thouſand in the neighbouring Country, and the Places depending on Kya-hing-fû and Hû-chew-fû; ſince there is ſcarce a Village, howſoever ſmall, but the Silk-Works are going forward in it.

Certain flower'd Taffeties and Satins, named Lin-tſe, and others all plain, but compact and even, call'd Lau-fang-ſe, which are made in this City, are reckon'd the beſt in the whole Empire, and in exceeding great Requeſt.

Charming Lake.

But that which renders this Place delightful, is a little Lake, nam'd Si-hû, which is cloſe to it, and two Leagues in Compaſs. The Water of it is good, and clear as Cryſtal, ſo that the ſmalleſt Stones may be ſeen at the Bottom; on the ſide where the Water is low, it is cover'd over with the Flowers of the Lyen-wha. They have rais'd there on Wooden Stakes open Halls, ſuſtain'd by Pillars, and pav'd with great ſquare Stones, for the Conveniency of thoſe who would walk on Foot. They have alſo made Cauſeys lined with Free-Stone, and over the Openings left for Boats to paſs, built pretty handſome Bridges.

In the midſt of the Lake there are two little Iſlands, whither they uſually repair, after having taken the Pleaſure of the Barks; and where they have built a Temple and Houſes fit for diverting themſelves. The ſides of the Lake are likewiſe adorn'd with Temples, huge Monaſteries of the Bonzas, and pretty handſome Houſes; among which is a little Palace for the Uſe of the Emperor, who lodg'd there, when he travell'd into the Southern Provinces.

The Second City, Kya-hing-fu.

Kya-hing-fû.

ALL this Country is water'd by Lakes and Canals, made by the Induſtry of the Chineſe. The City is great, very populous, and of conſiderable Trade. Its Suburbs are of very great Extent, its Canals and Ditches cover'd with many handſome Bridges, and every Houſe in it rears Silk Worms.

They have brought Canals, whoſe Sides are lin'd with fine Free-ſtone, into every Part of the City. In all the Streets there are handſome Piazzas, under which one may walk out of the Rain. Triumphal Arches are common enough, both within the City and without. There are fifteen Marble Towers, on the ſides of the Canal, to the Weſt of the City, thro' which all the Barks paſs.

Fruit Pe-tſi.

The Fruit, call'd Pe-tſi, ſpoken of before, grows in all the ſtanding and marſhy Waters. In Autumn they catch certain little Birds, which are preſerv'd in Wine made of Rice, and ſold all the Year round. Very good Cray-Fiſh are alſo taken here.

In the Neighbourhood of the City Hay-yen-hyen, which ſtands on the Sea Coaſt, there are Salt-Pits, which yield plenty of Salt. One ſees on all ſides Silk Manufacturies. The whole Country is flat, without ſo much as one Hill. The City contains ſeven others of the third Rank within its Diſtrict.

The Third City, Hu-chew-fu.

Hu-chew-fû.

THIS City takes its Name from the great Lake on the ſide whereof it ſtands, Hû ſignifying a Lake; and is one of the greateſt and moſt conſiderable in China, on account of its Riches, Trade, Fertility of its Lands, and Beauty of its Waters and Hills.

Beſt Pencils made.

It is inconceiveable what a Quantity of Silk is made there. The Tribute pay'd therein by Te-tſin-hyen, one of the Cities depending on it, amounts to five hundred thouſand Taëls or Ounces of Silver. It is alſo the Place in China, where the beſt Pencils for writing with are made. It yields abundance of Tea, and has in its Diſtrict one City of the ſecond Rank, and ſix of the third.

The Fourth City, Ning-po-fu.

Ning-po-fû.

NING-PO-FU, which Europeans (R) have call'd Liam-po, is a very good Port on the Eaſtern Sea of China, over-againſt Japan, and has four Cities of the third Order under its Juriſdiction. It ſtands on the Confluence of two ſmall Rivers, which form the Canal from thence to the Sea. This Canal is capable of bearing Tranſports or Chineſe Veſſels of two hundred Tuns. One of theſe Rivers nam'd Kin, comes from the South, the other call'd Yau, from the Weſt-North-Weſt.

(R) By Europeans are to be underſtood chiefly the Portugueſe. Liam po in Engliſh Characters ſhould be Lyang-po.

Theſe

Prov. V. Chekyang

These Rivers water a Plain encompass'd almost on every side with Hills, which form a kind of Oval Basin, whose Diameter from East to West passing thro' the City, may be ten or twelve thousand Chinese Fathom, which, as I have said, are of ten Feet each. The Length from South to North is much greater.

Cut of Ning-po.

The Plain, which resembles a Garden, as being so level and well improv'd, is full of Villages, and Hamlets. It is cut by a great Number of Canals, form'd by the Waters, that fall from the Hills. The Canal on which part of the Eastern Suburb stands, extends to the very Foot of the Mountains, and divides into three Branches. It may be about five or six thousand Fathoms long, and six or seven broad.

In this Space there are sixty six Canals on both sides of the principal Canal, several of which are broader than it. This great abundance of Water, manag'd with Art, renders the Plain exceeding fruitful, and makes it yield two Harvests of Rice; besides which Grain they sow Cotton and Pulse. Tallow-Trees are very numerous here.

The Whang, or yellow Fish.

The Air is generally pure and wholesome, and the Country pleasant and open. The Sea furnishes plenty of Fish, with all sorts of Shell-Fish, and especially good Cray-Fish; among the rest in the beginning of the Summer, they catch the Fish call'd Whang, that is, Yellow, which are much in Request, being very savory and delicious; but as they will not keep long out of Water, they put them in Glasses, and so transport them into all Parts of the Empire.

City Walls.

The Walls of Ning-po are five thousand and seventy four Geometrical Paces in Compass. In passing from the Western to the Eastern Gate, we reckon two thousand five hundred and seventy four great Paces. Its Walls are built of Free-Stone, in good Repair, and able to withstand any Force, but that of Cannon.

It has five Gates, whereof two look towards the East, because the Port is on that side; not to mention two Water-Gates, as the Chinese call them, which are great Arches, made in the Wall, to let the Barks in and out of the City, for there are many Canals in the South-West part of it. There is not one Building worth taking notice of in the whole Place. Indeed one meets with a Brick Tower, several Stories high; and before the most Southern of the two Gates there is a Bridge over the River Kin, of sixteen flat-bottomed Barks, fasten'd with Iron forty Fathom long.

The most tolerable Pieces of Architecture to be found here, are the Pay-lew or Pay-fan, which we call Triumphal Arches. The Streets, which are narrow, are still more contracted by the Pent-houses over the Shops, so that two of our large Coaches would have much ado to pass. This City was plunder'd and sack'd in the last Wars, but of late Years it has recover'd again. It is provided with a large Garrison.

The Entrance of Ning-po is difficult, especially for great Vessels, there not being above fifteen Feet of Water at the Bar in the Spring Tides. In entring the River, you leave on the left Hand the City of Tin-hay-hyen (s), which depends on it.

Tin-hay-hyen.

This last City, which is an oblong Square, 1000 Toises in Compass, is commanded by a Citadel built on a very high Rock, at the Foot of which Ships must necessarily pass within the Distance of half Pistol-Shot. One Tide brings them up along a very fine River, at least a hundred and fifty Fathom broad, and every where seven or eight deep, with Salt-Houses on both Sides, between which and the Mountains one has a Prospect of Villages and cultivated Plains.

The Chinese Merchants of Siam and Batavia come to Ning-po every Year, to buy Silks, which they know to be the fairest in the Empire. Those of Fo-kyen and other Provinces resort thither continually. The City has also a great Trade with Japan, Nangazaki being only two Days sailing from hence. The Chinese carry thither Silk, raw and manufactur'd, Sugar, Drugs and Wine; and bring back Copper, Gold and Silver.

Island Chew-shan.

Eighteen or twenty Leagues from Ning-po in the Sea, is the Island Chew-shan. The Port is very good, but not commodious for Trade. The English at their first Arrival put in there by Accident, not being able to find out the Way to Ning-po, among so many Islands as are upon the Coast.

The Fifth City, Shau-hing-fu.

Shau hing-fu.

THIS City is situated in one of the finest Plains in the World; it is full of Canals, nor is there any Place, which has a greater Resemblance of Venice, but it has the Advantage of it in this, that the Canals here are fill'd with clear and running-Water.

One may come from all the Places in the neighbourhood to any Part of the City in a Boat. There is no Street without a Canal, so that Shau-hing abounds with Bridges, which are very high, and almost all of one Arch.

On both Sides of each Canal there are very handsome large Streets, paved with great white Stones, for the most Part six or seven Feet long. The City is adorn'd with a Number of handsome Triumphal Arches, and reckon'd at least four Leagues in Compass; for which Reason it is divided into two Hyen or subordinate Jurisdictions, that have their distinct Governors, one of which is call'd Shan-in, the other Quey-ki.

Several of the Houses are built with exceeding white Free-Stone, which is scarce ever seen in the other Cities of China. Theſe Stones are dug out of an almoſt inexhauſtible Quarry in the Mountain Nyau-men-ſhan, two Leagues from the City. Its Walls are encompaſs'd with 2 Ditches, the one within the other without the City, both full of Water as good and as clear as that in the Canals. PROV. V. Chekyang.

(s) Here seems to be a double Mistake, for Tin-hay-hyen, which is on the Island Chew-shan (above nine Leagues from the Mouth of the River of Ning-po) is put instead of Chin-hay-hyen, and this last stands on the right Hand, in respect of those who enter the River.

in

Shau-king is in ſome ſort a City of Literati, for its Inhabitants are the moſt noted in all China, for the Chicane of the Law; tho' otherwiſe they are good Lawyers, and there is no Vice-Roy or Mandarin, but what has an Inhabitant of this City for his Syang-kong or Secretary. It contains within its Diſtrict eight Cities of the third Rank.

The Wine, whereof a good Quantity is made here, is much eſteem'd, and tranſported throughout the Empire. Half a League from the City is a Tomb, which the Chineſe ſay is that of the great Yu, who advanc'd himſelf to the Throne, by the Service which he did his Country at the beginning of the Monarchy, in cauſing the Sea, which had overflow'd part of the Empire to retire; on one Side of this Tomb they have rais'd a ſtately Edifice by orders of the late Emperor Kang-hi, who, in the twenty eighth Year of his Reign, went to ſhew his Reſpect to the Memory of that great Man. Tomb of the Great Yu.

There is near it alſo a remarkable Hill, call'd Hew-ſhan, or the Mountain of the Ape, becauſe it has ſome ſmall Reſemblance in Figure; it is a Place of Recreation, where the People go to regale themſelves. They have built a pretty Room here for that Purpoſe, at the Foot of which there is a very deep Pond, wherein they keep Fiſh of an extraordinary Size; which are accuſtom'd to appear on the Top of the Water, while thoſe within the Hall throw them little Loaves out of the Window, which they ſwallow whole.

The Sixth City, Tay-chew-fu.

THIS City, which has ſix others under it, ſtands on the ſide of a River, in a Country quite over-run with Mountains. Altho' it is not by far ſo rich and conſiderable as the Cities already deſcribed, yet the Neighbourhood of the Sea ſupplies it with all Neceſſaries. Tay-chew-fu.

What it is remarkable for, is a kind of Ray or Thorn-back caught there, whoſe Skin ſerves for ſeveral uſes, and eſpecially in making Scabbards for Hangers. They drive a great Trade with it in the Country, and tranſport it to Japan, as well as thro' the whole Empire.

The Seventh City, Kin-wha-fu.

THIS City ſtands in the middle of the Province, and on the Side of a pretty handſome River, whereinto ſeveral others fall. It was formerly very great, and famous for the Beauty of its Buildings; but its Inhabitants, who are warlike, having long withſtood the whole Power of the Tartars, were at length ſubdued. One part of the City was burnt, which they have ſince re-built, as well as a great Bridge on the Weſt Side, and another Bridge of Boats, which is near the City of Lan-ki-hyen, and much handſomer than that burnt by the Tartars. Kin-wha-fu.

Kin-wha has eight Cities of the third Rank depending on it; they are ſituate partly in the open Fields, partly in Countries ſurrounded with Hills. Rice grows here plentifully, and the Wine made of it is much eſteem'd in the Country.

A great Trade is carry'd on here, with large dry'd Plumbs and Hams, which are in ſuch Requeſt, that they ſend them into all the Provinces of the Empire. Thoſe little Shrubs, whoſe white Flower reſembles the Jaſmin, are found almoſt every where in the Diſtrict, as well as the Trees producing the Tallow, whereof they make very white Candles, which neither ſtick to the Fingers, nor have an offenſive Smell when put out. Tallow Tree.

The Eighth City, Kyu-chew-fu.

THE Situation of this City is agreeable enough; it is built on a fine River, and between two other ſmaller ones that fall into it. It is the moſt Southern City in the Province, and borders on the Provinces of Kyang-ſi and Fo-kyen; but the Road leading into this latter Province, which is three Days Journey diſtant, is very difficult to travel, becauſe of the Mountains which muſt be paſs'd. Kyu-chew-fu.

This Road begins about the City of Kyang-ſhan-hyen, and continues over pretty ſteep Mountains for near thirty Leagues together. On one of them they have made Stairs, conſiſting of more than three hundred ſteps, of flat Stones, which go winding round it, to render the Aſcent more eaſy. There are Inns all the Way at certain Diſtances. There is nothing elſe very remarkable in this Country, where there are five Cities more of the third Order under Kyu-chew. Difficult Road.

The Ninth City, Yen-chew-fu, or Nyen-chew-fu.

ALTHO' this City is ſituate on the ſide of a River which runs hard by its Walls, and near another into which it is diſcharg'd, and bears pretty large Barks, yet it is not to be compar'd to the reſt of the Cities of the Province, either for Bigneſs or the Number and Wealth of the Inhabitants. The Hills and Mountains, wherewith its Territory is incumber'd, render it very uneven. Yen-chew-fu, or Nyen-chew-fu.

Prov. V. Che-kyang. Copper-Mines, and Varniſh. Paper.

Mines of Copper are found there; one meets alſo with the Trees that diſtil the Varniſh, which giver a Value to the Cheſts and Cabinets that are done over with it, and makes them ſo much eſteem'd in Europe. When this Varniſh is once dry, it never melts, nor ſuffers by containing the moſt boiling hot Liquor. The Paper made here is equally eſteem'd, and has a very great Vent. Six Cities of the third Rank are under its Juriſdiction.

The Tenth City, Wen-chew-fu.

Wen-chew-fû. THE Situation of this City is in a marſhy Soil, very near the Sea, and the Beauty of its Buildings have gotten it the Name of little Hang-chew. The Tide comes up to its very Walls, where a great Number of Barks and Chineſe Tranſports find a ſafe and commodious Harbour.

The whole Country is divided betwixt very fertile Plains and Mountains, ſome of which are frightful to look at, eſpecially thoſe towards the Province of Fo-kyen. It has under it five Cities of the third Rank.

The Eleventh City, Chu-chew-fu.

Chu-chew-fû. ALL this Country is environ'd with vaſt Mountains; the Valleys are fruitful, and the Rice cheap, becauſe of the Difficulty of tranſporting it into other Parts. The City is ſituate on a fine River which is navigable to the Sea. The Mountains are cover'd with fair Trees, among which are Pines of an extraordinary Thickneſs; there are ſome of them, as affirm, the Hollow of whoſe Trunk would hold above thirty Men; they uſe them for building Houſes and Ships.

Woods of Bambû. The Sides of the Brooks are cover'd with whole Foreſts of Reeds or Canes, which the Europeans have nam'd Bambû (r); ſome of them are more than twenty Feet high, and the ſmalleſt not leſs than ten. If theſe Canes are burnt when they are green and freſh cut, there runs a Water from them, which the Phyſicians reckon very wholeſome, and give thoſe to drink, whoſe Blood has been coagulated through a Bruiſe or Fall, pretending this Liquor frees the Body from the corrupted Blood. Ten Cities of the third Order are ſubject to Chu-chew.

PROVINCE VI. HU-QUANG.

Prov. VI. Hu-quang. Bounds, and Diviſion.

THIS great Province lies in the middle of the Empire, between thoſe of Ho-nan, Kyang-nan, Kyang-ſi, Quang-tong, Quang-ſi, Quey-chew, Se-chwen, and Shen-ſi. The great River Yang-tſe-kyang croſſing it from Weſt to Eaſt, divides it into two Parts, the Northern and Southern.

TheNorthern Part contains eight Fû, or Cities of the firſt Rank, and ſixty of the ſecond and third Rank. The Southern Part compriſes ſeven Fû, and fifty four Chew and Hyen, beſides Boroughs, Villages, and fortify'd Towns.

The greater Part of this Province is a plain Country, conſiſting of open Fields, water'd on all Sides by Brooks, Lakes, and Rivers; wherein infinite Quantities of all ſorts of Fiſh are caught, and on the Lakes a great Number of Wild Fowl.

Oranges and Limons. Mines of Cryſtal. Simples.

The Plains afford Paſture for incredible Numbers of Cattle, and produce all ſorts of Grain and Fruit, eſpecially Oranges, and ſeveral kinds of Citrons. Its Mountains are very fertile, ſome in Cryſtal, and others in Simples and Medicinal Herbs; from ſome of them they dig Talc, and many others are cover'd with old Pines, fit for making thoſe great Pillars, which the Chineſe Architects employ in their fineſt Buildings. Gold is found in the Sand of the Rivers, and Torrents which deſcend from the Mountains; and there are Mines abounding with Iron, Tin, Tottenague, and ſuch like Metals.

A good deal of Paper is made of the Bambûs growing here; and in the Plains one ſees ſtore of thoſe little Worms, which produce Wax in the ſame manner as Bees make Honey. In ſhort it affords ſuch plenty of all things that it is commonly call'd the Granary of the Empire; and it is a Proverb among the Chineſe, "That the Province of Kyang-ſi might furniſh a "Breakfaſt for China, but that Hû-quang has of itſelf wherewithall to feed the whole Country."

There were formerly in this Province a great Number of Princes deſcended from the Imperial Family of Hong-vû; but that numerous Race has been intirely extirpated by the Tartars.

The Northern Part of the Province.

The Firſt City, Vu-chang-fu, Capital of the whole.

Vu-chang-fû. THIS is both the Capital City of the whole Province and of the Northern Diviſion call'd Hû-pe, where the Tſong-tû of both Parts reſides. It has under its Juriſdiction one City of the ſecond Rank, and nine of the third.

(r) This Word ſeems to be a Corruption of the Indian Name for this ſort of Reed, viz. Mambù.

Vû-chang is as it were the Center of the whole Empire, and the Place from whence it is eaſieſt to keep a Communication with the reſt of the Provinces. This City in conjunction with Han-yang (which is ſeparated from it only by the River Yang-tſe-kyang and the little River Han) forms the moſt populous and frequented Place in all China.

Han-yang.

The City itſelf may be compar'd for Size to Paris; Han-yang (one of whoſe Suburbs extends to the Point where the Rivers Han and Yang-tſe-kyang meet) is not inferior to the moſt populous Cities in France, ſuch for Inſtance as Lyons or Roan; add to this an incredible Number of great and ſmall Barks, part of which are ſpread along the Kyang, and part along the Han for above two Leagues together. There are never reckon'd leſs than eight or ten thouſand Veſſels in this Place, ſome hundred of which are as long and high in the ſides, as moſt of thoſe that lie at Nantes.

Certainly was one only to conſider this Foreſt of Maſts rang'd along the Yang-tſe-kyang, which in this Place, tho' at leaſt a hundred and fifty Leagues from the Sea, is three Miles broad, and deep enough to carry the biggeſt Ships, he would have Reaſon enough to be ſurprized; but ſhould he from an Eminence view that vaſt Extent of Ground, cover'd over with Houſes, he would either not believe his Eyes, or own that he ſaw the fineſt Proſpect of the Kind in the World.

By the Number of Rivers and Lakes wherewith this Province is water'd, one may judge of its Fertility, and what Wealth muſt accrue to it from the eaſy Means which the Yang-tſe-kyang affords it of trading with the whole Empire.

That which it is farther remarkable for, is the fair Cryſtal found in its Monntains, plenty of the beſt Tea, and the prodigious Demand for the Bambû Paper made here.

The Second City, Han-yang-fu.

Han-yang-fu.

THIS City, which is only ſeparated from the Capital by the Yang-tſe-kyang, and is waſh'd alſo by the River Han, whence it takes its Name, has both within and without its Walls ſeveral Lakes abounding with Fiſh and Wild Fowl. Its Situation, and Store of all ſorts of Commodities that the Empire affords, render the Inhabitants exceeding rich.

Several kinds of Oranges and Citrons grow here, but never come to perfect Maturity. It is remarkable for a very high Tower, built formerly in Honour of a young Maiden, whoſe Innocence and Virtue were juſtify'd, as they ſay, by a very extraordinary Prodigy. Han-chwen-hyen is the only City under its Juriſdiction, and is entirely ſurrounded with Lakes and Rivers.

The Third City, Ngan-lo-fu.

Ngan-lo-fu.

THIS City is built on the River Han in a vaſt Plain equally agreeable and fertile. Its Trade with the famous City, before ſpoken of, contributes much to the Riches and Proſperity of its Inhabitants. In other Reſpects it has nothing to diſtinguiſh it. It preſides over two of the ſecond and five Cities of the third Rank.

The Fourth City, Syang-yang-fu.

Syang-yang-fu.

THIS City ſtands on the ſame River Han, and has the ſame Advantage as the former, with reſpect to Trade, and all the Conveniencies of Life. They gather abundance of Gold out of the Sand of its Rivers, and it is likely its Mountains afford rich Mines of it, was it permitted to open them.

However the Lapis Armenus Vitriol, and a green Stone of great uſe in Painting, are dug out of them. They are alſo ſtor'd with old Pines, whereof the Pillars are made, that ſupport the Timber-Work in the larger ſort of Buildings. The Mountains, wherewith one part of its Territory is iucumber'd, render the Country rugged, and the Roads difficult. They produce plenty of Houſe-Leek, and Simples, which the Phyſicians employ with Succeſs. One City of the ſecond, and ſix of the third Rank depend on it.

The Fifth City, Ywen-yang-fu.

Ywen-yang-fu.

THIS is the moſt Northern City in the Province, and neareſt that of Shen-ſi. It ſtands on the River Han, and in a pretty large Plain, encompaſs'd with Mountains, whereof the Hills, having a gentle Deſcent, form a kind of Incloſure, which renders the Country very agreeable.

Theſe Mountains produce ſeveral ſorts of Medicinal Herbs, and abundance of very good Tin. The Soil is fertile every where; a remarkable Shrub grows here, which has no ſmall Reſemblance of the Ivy, in that it climbs and faſtens about Trees; it bears Flowers of a very pale Yellow, and the Extremities of its Branches are as fine as Threads of Silk.

This

Prov. VI. Hu-quang.

This City has ſix others of the third Rank under its Juriſdiction; one of them named Chû-ſhan-hyen lies on the River that falls into the Han: the Water of which is proper for taking Spots out of Silk, and ſharpening Iron Tools, a Virtue doubtleſs owing to its being impregnated with certain Salts.

The Sixth City, Te-ngan-fu.

Te-ngan-fu.

THIS City, which is not far from the Yang-tſe-kyang, is built on a River that falls into it, and by ſeveral Branches has a Communication with divers Lakes in the Neighbourhood.

The whole Country, which is inclos'd on the North by Mountains, and on the South by Rivers that water it, is exceeding fertile. That which it is moſt remarkable for, is a kind of white Wax, made by little white Worms, which are not rear'd in Houſes like Bees, but found in the Fields. They make Candles of this Matter, that are whiter than Wax, and give a clearer Light, as well as a more agreeable Smell.

Wax-Worms

The Seventh City, Kin-chew-fu.

Kin-chew-fû.

THE Diſtrict of this City is conſiderable, including thirteen ſubordinate Cities, two of the ſecond, and eleven of the third Rank. It is handſome enough; ſeveral Lakes that ſurround it, contribute not a little to render the Soil fertile and pleaſant. It is beſides of great Trade, ſcarce inferior to the Capital for Numbers of People, and divided by a ſingle Wall in two Parts, one whereof is poſſeſs'd by the Chineſe, the other by Tartars, who compoſe the Garriſon.

Oranges are plentiful here, but they are all ſomewhat ſour. The ſeveral Lakes, great and ſmall, the ſides of which afford a fine Proſpect, abound with all ſorts of Fiſh. The Reaſon why the Tartars have built a Citadel here is, becauſe it is a Rule with them to be Maſters of a City whoſe Situation renders it of Importance. It is a common Saying, that when one is poſſeſs'd of Kin-chew, he has the Key of China in his Hands.

The Eighth City, Whang-chew-few.

Whang-chew-fû.

THE Situation of this City on the Yang-tſe-kyang, its ſmall Diſtance from the Capital, and the Number of Lakes wherewith it is ſurrounded, renders it a delightful Habitation. Hence it is exceeding populous, and yields to few of the other Cities for Trade. A ſurpriſing Number of Barks arrive here every Day, loaden with all ſorts of Merchandizes.

Its whole Territory is admirably well improv'd, and agreeably diverſify'd, as well by the Rivers and Brooks that water it, as the Mountains that are to the North: ſome of which latter are cover'd with Trees and Foreſts, that are very beneficial to the Inhabitants; they alſo afford Springs, whoſe Water gives the Tea a delicious Taſte.

Springs.

There are caught in the River about this City a great Number of Tortoiſes, ſome very large, others very ſmall, which the Lords keep for their Diverſion in their Gardens and Houſes of Pleaſure. They make excellent Spirits there, which are very ſtrong, take Fire in an Inſtant, and have no bad Smell. There are alſo very good and large Cheſnuts. Its Diſtrict contains nine Cities, one of the ſecond, and eight of the third Rank.

The Southern Part of the Province.

The Firſt City, Chang-cha-fu, the Capital.

Chang-cha-fû, Capital of the Southern Part of the Province.

THIS is the chief City of the Southern Part of Hû-quang, which the Chineſe call Hû-nan. It ſtands on a large River, that has a Communication with the great Lake Tong-ting-hû. The Lakes and Rivers wherewith the Country is water'd, and the Eaſe with which the Huſbandmen convey the Water into the Lands by Machines of their own Invention, whereof I ſpeak elſewhere, renders its Soil rich and fertile, ſo that they need never fear Scarcety, even in time of the greateſt Drought. They catch abundance of Fiſh in its Rivers, and eſpecially very good Lampreys in ſome of them.

Vermillion, and Talc.

The Country is partly plain, partly mountainous. The Hills yield very fine Cinnabar or Vermillion, and abundance of Talc, which the Phyſicians reduce to a Lime, and mix with Wine; they ſay it is a wonderful Remedy for preſerving Health. This Capital has in its Diſtrict one City of the ſecond Rank, and eleven of the third.

Great Feſtival.

The Inhabitants of one of theſe Cities have given Occaſion to a great Feſtival, which in the fifth Month is celebrated throughout the Empire, with much Joy and Pomp. A certain Mandarin, Governor of this City, whoſe Probity and Virtue had endear'd him to the People, happening to be drown'd in the River, they inſtituted a Feſtival in Honour of him; which they celebrated with Games, Feaſts, and Combats on the Water, as if they meant to ſearch for that Mandarin, the Object at once of their Love and Grief. This Feſtival, which at firſt was peculiar to the City, was obſerv'd afterwards all over the Empire.

They

They prepare againſt that Day certain little Barks, long and narrow, which are gilded all over, and carry at one End the Figure of a Dragon, whence they are call'd Long-chewn; in theſe they formerly fought upon the Water, and Premiums were regulated for the Victors; but as this Sort of Diverſion was dangerous, and often attended with fatal Accidents, the Mandarins have prohibited it almoſt every where. PROV. VI. Hu-quang

The Second City, Yo-chew-fu.

THE Situation of the City is admirable, being built on the Side both of the Yang-tſe-kyang, and the great Lake Tong-ting. Yo-chew-fu.

This Lake, which reſembles a Sea, is remarkable for the Greatneſs of its Circumference, (being more than fourſcore Leagues) for the abundance of its Waters, eſpecially at certain Seaſons, (when two of the greateſt Rivers of the Province ſwell'd with Rain diſcharge themſelves into it, paſſing out of it afterwards without any ſenſible Diminution) and for the aſtoniſhing Quantity of good Fiſh that is caught therein. Lake Tong-ting.

The great Number of Barks, and Variety of Commodities that reſort to this City, render it one of the wealthieſt in the Empire.

Its Territory, which is divided by the great Lake juſt now mention'd, contains one of the ſecond, and ſeven of the third Rank; ſome on the Eaſt-ſide of the Lake, and others on the Weſt. It is exceeding fertile every where, and ſtored with different Kinds of Orange and Limon-Trees.

Many of its Mountains are covered with Foreſts, chiefly of Pine-Trees; in ſome of them they find the Lapis Armenus, and Green Stone, which reduced to Powder makes a very beautiful Colour for Painting. Out of others they dig Talc, and little black Stones, the impalpable Powder of which is made uſe of by Phyſicians as an effectual Remedy againſt Diſeaſes of the Throat, and eſpecially the Squincy. Pines.

The Third City, Pau-king-fu.

THIS City is built on the River Lo-kyang, whoſe Waters fall into the Heng-kyang, which has a Communication with the Lake Tong-ting. Its Territory, which conſiſts of fertile Valleys, and very fine Plains, excepting towards the Province of Quang-ſi, where it is mountainous, contains only one City of the ſecond, and four of the third Rank. Pau-king-fu.

To the North of one of theſe Cities, nam'd U-kang-chew, the River is render'd very dangerous for ſailing, by Rocks, down which it falls with aſtoniſhing Rapidneſs. They have erected a brazen Pillar here, to which the Bark is faſtened, till the neceſſary Meaſures are taken for aſcending the River with Safety.

The Fourth City, Heng-chew-fu.

THE Diſtrict of this City is pretty extenſive; one Town of the ſecond, and nine of the third Rank, are under its Juriſdiction. It is ſituate at the Confluence of two Rivers, which incloſe part of its Territory. Its Mountains are very agreeable, and well cultivated, or cover'd with Trees always green. The Country produces all the Neceſſaries of Life; it furniſhes much Game, and contains ſeveral Mines of Gold and Silver, but they are not ſuffer'd to be open'd. Very good Paper is made here; in ſhort, every thing is plenty, nor is it one of the leaſt Cities in the Province. Heng-chew-fu.

The Fifth City, Chang-te-fu.

THIS is a large City, built on the River Twen-kyang, not far from the great Lake Tong-ting, where that River diſcharges itſelf. Its Diſtrict is of no great Extent, compriſing only four Cities of the third Rank; but the Country is the moſt fertile in all the Province, and its River, which is navigable almoſt from the Beginning to the End, cauſes Trade to flouriſh. Every thing grows here in great plenty. Chang-te-fu.

It is remarkable for a peculiar ſort of Orange-Trees, which bear no Fruit till the Seaſon for others is paſt; whence they are call'd by the Chineſe Winter Orange-Trees, but its Fruit has a delicious Taſte.

Its Mountains are full of Fallow Deer, and bear Cedars, whoſe Fruit is not good to eat; but they hang it up in their Chambers, which are perfumed with the ſweet Smell that iſſues from it. Store alſo of Lapis Armenus, and even ſome Manna is found there.

The Sixth City, Ching-chew-fu.

THIS City is ſituate on an Angle made by two Rivers; and the Country is water'd by a multitude of Brooks, which render the Valleys very fertile. Its Mountains, which are numerous, yield abundance of Quickſilver, Lapis Armenus, and Green Stones fit for Painters; nor are they deſtitute of Gold and Silver Mines. The People who inhabit theſe Mountains want the Politeneſs of the Chineſe Commonalty, being of a rude and ſavage Diſpoſition, ſo that they are look'd on as Barbarians. The Diſtrict of this Fû comprizes ten other Cities, whereof one is of the ſecond, and nine of the third Rank. Ching-chew-fu.

Prov. VI. Hu-quang

The Seventh City, Yong-chew-fu.

Yong-chew-fu. THIS is the moſt Southerly City in the Province. It ſtands amidſt Mountains, whoſe Verdure yields a very agreeable Proſpect, and on a River, which a little way from thence falls into the Syang-kyang. The Water of this River is ſo clear and pure, that in the deepeſt Places you may count the Flints and ſmalleſt Pebbles at the Bottom.

Bambûs, and Lyen-wha. Store of Bambûs grow in ſome parts of this Territory, and in others the Lyen-wha, with yellow Flowers; of which Colour it is rare to find any elſewhere. There are eight Cities within its Juriſdiction, whereof one is of the ſecond Rank, and the other ſeven of the third.

Beſides theſe principal Cities there are two more of the ſecond Order, which do not depend on any Fû, or Cities of the firſt Rank, but have a Juriſdiction over other Cities. The firſt is Cities Tſin-chew and Ching-Chew. Tſin-chew, on the Borders of Quey-chew, which has under it three Cities of the third Rank; the ſecond Ching-chew, a great and very populous City, ſtanding between two Rivers, whereon depend five Cities of the third Rank, all on the Borders of the Province of Quang-tong. Altho' this Country is full of Mountains, yet it is well cultivated.

PROVINCE VII. HO-NAN.

Prov. VII Ho-nan. THE Mildneſs of the Climate, and the Fertility of the Lands, render this Province a delightful Country; for which Reaſon it is named by the Chineſe, Chong-wha, or the Flower of the Middle, becauſe it is ſituate almoſt in the middle of China.

Names, Bounds, and It is bounded on the North by the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shan-ſi; on the Weſt by Shen-ſi; on the South by Hû-quang, and on the Eaſt by Shan-tong. It is likewiſe water'd by the Whang-ho, [or Yellow River.]

Diviſion. Beſides the Forts, Caſtles and Garriſon Towns, it contains eight Fû, or Cities of the firſt Rank, and a hundred and two of the ſecond and third.

The Chineſe ſay that Fo-hi, the Founder of their Monarchy, fix'd his Court in this Province; and according to ſome Authors began his Reign about the Year 2952 before Chriſt, which if true confirms the Chronology of the Septuagint.

Air and Produce. The ancient Emperors invited by the Beauty and Fruitfulneſs of the Country fix'd their Seats here, and indeed the Air is temperate, and very healthful. Here every thing that one can wiſh is to be found, as Wheat, Rice, Paſture, a great number of Cattle, Oranges of all ſorts, Pomegranates, and all kinds of Fruit that grow in Europe, in ſuch abundance, that they coſt a Trifle; inſomuch that one ſhall have three Pounds of Meal for a Penny.

Soil. The whole Province is plain, excepting on the Weſt-Side, where there are Mountains cover'd with Foreſts; but on the Eaſt-Side the Land is cultivated with ſo great Induſtry, that one ſeems to travel thro' a vaſt Garden. Hence the Chineſe commonly call it the Garden of China, as we call Touraine the Garden of France.

It is moreover ſo well water'd with Brooks, Springs and Rivers, that for Delightfulneſs no Country can compare with it. The Quantity of Corn, Rice, Silk and Cloth, which it furniſhes by way of Tribute, is aſtoniſhing.

Remarkable Lake. It is farther remarkable for a Lake, which draws to it a great number of thoſe concerned in manufacturing the Silk, becauſe its Water gives it an inimitable Luſtre.

Serpents. In one of its Cities, nam'd Nan-yang, there is a kind of Serpent, whoſe Skin is ſpeckled with little white Spots; this Skin the Chineſe Phyſicians ſteep in a Vial full of Wine, which they make uſe of as a good Remedy againſt the Palſy.

The Firſt City, Kay-fong-fu, Capital of the Province.

Kay-fong-fû. THIS is a great, rich and populous City, ſtanding in a fine Country, in the middle of a large and well cultivated Plain, four Miles and an half from the Whang-ho; there is one Defect however in its Situation, as lying very low, ſo that the Water of the River is higher than the City.

Deſtroy'd by an Inundation of the River. To guard againſt Inundations, they have built great Banks or Dykes for the Space of above thirty Leagues. But in 1642, this City having been beſieged by the Rebels, after the Inhabitants had held out vigorouſly for ſix Months againſt more than a hundred thouſand Men; the Commander of the Troops, which came to its Aſſiſtance, judg'd the only Expedient left for its Relief was, to break down the Banks of the Whang-ho, in order to lay the Plain under Water. But the Inundation was ſo ſudden and violent, that the City itſelf was overflow'd, and three hundred thouſand of its Inhabitants drowned.

P. Roderic de Figueredo, a Portugueſe, who had founded the Church at Kay-fong, and govern'd it for twenty Years with great Zeal, would never quit his Flock in the midſt of Danger; but conſtantly refuſing the Offers of the Mandarins, who preſs'd him to retire in their Barks out of the Place, ſacrific'd his Life to the ſpiritual Welfare and Conſolation of the Chriſtians, whom he confeſs'd, and exhorted to die a holy Death.

Kay-fong appears to have been three Leagues in Compaſs before that Misfortune; and has been ſince rebuilt, but not ſo well as to hold its Place among the handſomeſt Cities of China. Its Diſtrict is very extenſive, and contains four Cities of the ſecond, and thirty of the third Rank. PROV. VII. Ho-nan.

The Second City, Que-te-fu. (B)

THIS City ſtands in a vaſt Plain, and in the middle between two fine Rivers. It has under its Juriſdiction one City of the ſecond, and ſix of the third Rank; all rich and very populous. The Country is flat, without any Hills, and well improv'd; the Air very pure, and Soil fertile in all ſorts of Grain and Fruit, among the reſt Orange and Pomegranates are very plenty. Que-te-fu.

The Third City, Chang-te-fu.

IT lies in the moſt Northern Part of the Province, which is there much ſtreighten'd by the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shan-ſi. This Country, which is of no great Extent, is watered by many Rivers, that render its Soil rich and fruitful, and alſo afford divers kinds of Fiſh: among which one reſembles the Crocodil, and has this remarkable, that if the Fat of it be once ſet on Fire, it is ſcarce poſſible to extinguiſh it till the whole is conſum'd. Chang-te-fu.

Its Mountains, which are not very high, yield Loadſtones, and divers kinds of Wormwood. One of theſe Hills is ſo ſteep and difficult of Aſcent that in time of War the Inhabitants retire thither, and are in perfect Safety. There is on the Top a Plain of large Extent, where they may dwell, as long as they will, ſecure from the Avarice and Violence of the Soldiers. This City has within its Diſtrict one of the ſecond, and ſix of the third Rank. Load-Stones.

The Fourth City, We-kyun-fu. (C)

THIS City ſtands on a River in a ſandy Country, whoſe Soil is leſs productive than the reſt of the Province. It has only ſix Cities of the third Rank within its Diſtrict, which is ſmall, being like the former contracted by the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shan-ſi. On the ſide next this laſt there are ſome Mountains, the reſt is a plain Country, and pretty well improved. Wey-kyun-fu.

The Fifth City, Whay-king-fu.

THE Territory of this City is of very ſmall Extent. It is bounded on the North by Mountains, which ſeparate it from the Province of Shan-ſi, and on the South by the great River Whang-ho, containing only ſix Towns of the third Rank, under the Juriſdiction of Whay-king. Whay-king-fu.

The Air is mild and very healthful, and the Soil no leſs fertile produces all the Neceſſaries of Life in abundance. Simples and Medicinal Herbs are found here in ſuch Plenty, as to ſupply the whole Province.

The Sixth City, Ho-nan-fu.

THIS City, which bears the Name of the Province, ſtands in the midſt of Mountains, between three Rivers. The Chineſe formerly believ'd it was in the Center of the Earth, becauſe it is in the middle of their Empire. Tho' it is ſurrounded with Mountains, yet its Soil is very fruitful. It is very large and populous; its Diſtrict alſo is of great Extent, comprizing one City of the ſecond Rank, and thirteen of the third. Ho-nan-fu. the Center of the Earth.

One of theſe Towns nam'd Teng-fong-hyen is famous for the Tower built there by the celebrated Chew-kong, where he uſed to obſerve the Stars. There is ſtill an Inſtrument to be ſeen which he employ'd to find the Meridian Shadow, in order to diſcover the Height of the Pole, and make other Aſtronomical Obſervations. He liv'd more than a thouſand Years before Chriſt, and the Chineſe pretend he invented the Mariners-Compaſs. Teng-fong-hyen. Invention of the Compaſs.

The Seventh City, Nan-yang-fu.

THE Country about this City which is ſituate on a ſmall River, is very fine; tho' it is of very great Extent, it is notwithſtanding ſurprizingly fertile. Proviſions are ſo plenty that they are exceeding cheap, and numerous Armies have quartered here a conſiderable time, without incommoding the Inhabitants in the Article of Proviſion. Nan-yang-fu.

The City is neither large, rich, nor populous. It is encompaſs'd with Mountains ſome of which produce the Lapis Armenus and breed thoſe Serpents already ſpoken of, which are mark'd with white Spots, and uſed as a Remedy againſt the Palſy. Its Juriſdiction is very large, extending over two Cities of the ſecond, and ſix of the third Rank. Spotted Serpents.

Prov. VII. Ho-nan.

The Eighth City, Yu-ning-fu. (D)

Yu-ning-fu.

THIS City is built on the River Yu-ho. Its Diſtrict, which is very extenſive, is partly plain, and partly mountainous, eſpecially towards the North and South; but at the ſame time it is water'd by ſeveral Rivers, which produces plenty of all ſorts of Grain and Fruit. Two Cities of the ſecond Rank, and twelve of the third depend on it.

PROVINCE VIII. SHAN-TONG.

Prov. VIII. Shan-tong.

Bounds, and Diviſion.

THIS is one of the moſt fertile Provinces of the Empire. It is bounded on the Weſt by Pe-che-li and part of Ho-nan; on the South by Kyang-nan; the Gulf of Kyang-nan waſhes it on the Eaſt, and that of Pe-che-li on the North. It is divided into ſix Countries, containing as many Cities of the firſt Rank, which have under them one hundred and fourteen of the ſecond and third Rank.

Among theſe are not included above fifteen Forts, built at the Entrances of all Ports and Rivers along the Coaſt; neither do we reckon ſeveral Iſlands ſcatter'd over the Gulf, which are equally populous, and afford ſome of them very commodious Harbours for the Chineſe Tranſports, that have an eaſy Paſſage from thence to Korea and Lyau-tong.

Great Imperial Canal.

The great Imperial Canal croſſes part of this Province, by which all the Barks from the South Parts arrive at Pe-king. They carry ſo many ſorts of Commodities, and in ſuch great Quantities, that the Duties ariſing merely therefrom amount to more than ten Millions.

When one conſiders the Length of this Canal, the Thickneſs and Height of the Banks, which are all of Hewn-Stone, very ſolid, and ornamented at proper Diſtances, he cannot help admiring the Induſtry of the Chineſe.

The Numbers of Lakes, Brooks and Rivers, which, beſides the great Canal, water the Province, contribute much towards rendering it one of the moſt plentiful parts of the Empire; nor is this extraordinary Plenty to be interrupted, except by too great a Drought, for it ſeldom rains here, or by the Havock that is ſometimes made by Locuſts.

Produce.

The Soil produces Rice, Millet, Wheat, Barley, Beans, with all ſorts of Grain and Fruit. Fowl, Eggs, fat Capons, Pheaſants, Partridge, Quails, and Hares are exceeding cheap; they catch a prodigious quantity of Fiſh in the Lakes and Sea, of which you may have ſeveral Pounds for a Penny.

Fruit-Trees of all kinds grow here, eſpecially excellent Pears, Cheſnuts, fine wholeſome Peaches, divers ſorts of Nuts, and abundance of Plumbs. They dry the Plumbs and Pears for tranſporting into the other Provinces; but the Fruit which grows in moſt plenty, is that ſort called by the Portugueſe Figgs, and the Chineſe Se-tſe; which are to be found no where but in China, nor in any Province thereof in ſo great abundance as in this of Shan-tong. This Fruit, which I ſpeak of elſewhere, does not ripen till the Beginning of Autumn; they commonly dry them as they do Figgs in Europe, and ſell them all over the Empire; being dry'd, they commonly grow mealy, and are cover'd by degrees with a Cruſt of Sugar; they have an excellent Taſte, ſo that one would imagine he was eating ſome of our beſt dry'd Figgs; ſuch alſo is the ſmaller ſort that grows in Shan-ſi. There is likewiſe another kind of green Figgs, which continue hard, even when ripe, and are cut with a Knife like our Apples in Europe. The Trees that bear them, need no cultivating; but we conceive that if they aſſiſted Nature, by being at the pains to graft them, the Fruit would be truely delicious.

Wild Silk-Worms.

In the Fields certain Worms, reſembling Caterpillars, produce a white Silk, which is faſten'd to the Shrubs and Buſhes, whereof they make Silks, coarſer indeed but more compact and ſtrong than thoſe made of the Silk produced by the Worms that are rear'd in the Houſes.

The Firſt City, Tſi-nan-fu, Capital of the Province.

Tſi-nan-fu.

ALTHO' this City is not on the Grand Canal, yet by means thereof principally is its Trade carry'd on; a little more than a League from it is the Village Lû-kew, ſtanding on the ſide of the Tſing-ho, by which River Goods are convey'd to the Canal; thoſe which are moſt common and peculiar to the Country are, viz.

1. The Stuffs nam'd Kyen-chew, made of Silk, inclining to a greyiſh Colour, which is produced only by the wild Worms, reſembling Caterpillars. Theſe Worms ſpin their Webs on Shrubs, and Buſhes, and furniſh as great Quantities as the domeſtick Worms. This Silk is the more eſtimable, as it coſts in a manner nothing, and is ſo ſtrong, that the Goods made of it are very laſting, and have a tolerable Vent every where. It muſt however be confeſs'd that the Colour is ſometimes neither agreeable nor uniform, and often various; ſo that one may ſay, the Piece is divided into grey, yellow, and white Spaces. One that would have thoſe which are very genteel, muſt take his Choice and pay a Price for them accordingly. PROV. VIII. Shan-tong.

2. Another kind of Commodity that turns to great Account conſiſts in Works of Lew-li, or Chineſe Glaſs, which are made at Yen-ching, a great Borough in the Diſtrict of this Capital; this ſort of Glaſs is more brittle than that of Europe; breaking when expoſed to too ſharp an Air.

Tſi-nan is a very great and populous City. The Lakes within its Walls which ſupply Canals throughout the City, together with the beautiful Buildings, render it very famous. Its Juriſdiction is large, extending over four Cities of the ſecond, and twenty ſix of the third Rank.

This whole Country, which extends to the Sea, abounds with all ſorts of Grain, and nouriſhes numerous Herds of Cattle. Some of its Mountains have Iron Mines. The Lakes ſcatter'd over its Territory are ſtored with Fiſh, and adorn'd with abundance of thoſe Flowers, named Lyen-wha, ſo often mention'd before.

The Second City, Yen-chew-fu.

THE Territory depending on this City is ſhut up, as it were, between two famous Rivers, viz. Ta-chin-ho to the North, and the Whang-ho to the South; beſides ſeveral other Rivers and ſome Lakes, which abound with Fiſh, and render the whole Country exceeding fertile. Here nothing is to be ſeen but cultivated Plains or woody Mountains. The Air is mild and temperate, which renders living here very agreeable. Yen chew-fu.

Its Juriſdiction is of great Extent, conſiſting of twenty ſeven Cities, four of the ſecond and twenty three of the third Rank. One of theſe nam'd Tſi-ning-chew, is not inferior to Yen-chew, either for Bigneſs, multitude of Inhabitants, or richneſs of its Trade. Its Situation, which is towards the (A) Middle of the great Canal, renders it one of the greateſt Marts in the Empire. Tſi-ning chew

Another City, nam'd Kyo-few-hyen, is famous for being the Birth Place of Confucius, the chief Doctor of the Nation. Here the Chineſe have erected ſeveral Monuments, as ſo many publick Teſtimonies of their Gratitude towards that great Man. Birth Place of Confucius.

They affirm that in the Neighbourhood of another little City, call'd Kin-kyang-hyen (B), they formerly gather'd much Gold, whence it had its Name, which ſignifies Earth of Gold. There are alſo divers Parts, eſpecially towards Tong-ping-chew, ſo intermixt with Woods and Fields, that they afford the moſt gay and agreeable Proſpect imaginable. Kin-kyang-hyen.

The Third City, Tong-chang fu.

THIS City, which is ſituate on the great Canal, is equally famous for its Riches and Trade. The whole Country, that depends on it is level, and produces plenty of Grain and Fruits of all kinds; which procure in Return whatever other Parts contribute towards the Support and Pleaſure of Life. Three Cities of the ſecond and fifteen of the third Rank are under its Juriſdiction. Tong-chang-fu.

Among theſe Cities there is a very conſiderable one, call'd Lin-tſin-chew, where the great Canal joins the River Wey-ho (C); it is the Rendezvous of all the Veſſels, and in ſome ſort the general Magazin of all kinds of Merchandizes one can wiſh for.

Few Cities in the Empire are more populous and of better Trade. It is no leſs famous for its Buildings, eſpecially a beautiful Tower of eight Stories, rais'd without the Walls. The Outſide which is of Porcellain, is adorn'd with divers Figures; within it is lin'd with finely poliſh'd Marble of ſeveral Colours. By a Stair-caſe made in the Wall, one goes up to all the Stories, and from thence to very fine Galleries of Marble, embelliſh'd with gilded Iron Rails, which encompaſs the Tower; at the Corner of theſe Galleries hang little Bells, which, when mov'd by the Wind, make an agreeable Tinkling. Not far from this Tower are certain curious Idol-Temples, whoſe Manner would not be diſagreeable to the Taſte of the beſt European Architects. Porcellain Tower.

The Fourth City, Tſing-chew-fu. (D)

THE Territory belonging to this City is partly water'd by Rivers, and partly cover'd with Hills. Beſides the Fertility of its Soil, the Neighbourhood of the Sea ſupplies it plentifully with Neceſſaries. So great a Quantity of Fiſh is caught here, that they are exceeding cheap, and their Skin alone yields a conſiderable Profit. Tſing-chew-fu.

In this Country there grows in the Bellies of the Cows a yellow Stone, call'd by the Chineſe, Nyew-whang; it is as big ſometimes as a Gooſe-Egg, but not more ſolid than the ſofteſt Crayon (E). The Phyſicians of China prefer it to the Bezoar, and ſay, that, when pulveriz'd and taken in hot Water, it is an immediate Cure for Defluxions and Rheums; in the ſame manner as the Stone that grows in the Gall of an Ox, cures the Jaundice. This City has in its Diſtrict one City of the ſecond, and thirteen of the third Rank.

(B) Rather, I preſume, Kin-yang, for I find no Kin kyang in the Map. Beſides Kyang ſignifies a River, but Yang a perfect Matter.

(C) In the French, Oei-ho.

(E) A Crayon is a ſoft Mineral, of which Pencils are made for Drawing, call'd Crayons.

The Fifth City, Ten-chew-fu, (F)

PROV. VIII. Shan-tong.

Ten-chew-fu. IS ſituate on the Sea, where it has a very commodious Harbour. It has a very ſtrong Garriſon and ſeveral Ships of War to guard the Coaſt. Eight Cities depend on it; one of the ſecond, and ſeven of the third Rank.

Part of theſe Cities are within Land, the reſt are very convenient Sea Ports, where they catch abundance of good Oyſters, which are ſerv'd as Dainties at the Tables of the Lords. Altho' the Country be mountainous, yet it is water'd by Rivers that contribute much to its Fertility. The Nyew-whang Stone is found in this City as well as the former. The Bambû's, or Reeds, are here ſquare, contrary to what is uſual, for every where elſe they are round.

Square Bambû.

The Sixth City, Lay-chew-fu.

Lay-chew-fu. THIS City, which is ſituate on a Promontory, is encompaſs'd on one ſide by the Sea, and and on the other by Mountains. Two Cities of the ſecond Rank, and five of the third, are ſubordinate to it. Some of which are alſo waſh'd by the Sea; for Inſtance, Kyau-chew, which is very ſtrong by its Situation. All this Country is render'd fertile by the Rivers that water it. It is intermixt with Plains and Mountains, eſpecially toward the Sea Coaſts.

PROVINCE IX. SHAN-SI.

PROV. IX. Shan-ſi.

THIS Province which is one of the leaſt in China, is bounded on the Eaſt by the Province of Pe-che-li; on the South by that of Ho-nan; on the Weſt by Shen-ſi; and on the North it is ſeparated from Tartary by the Great Wall. It contains five Cities of the firſt Rank, and eighty five [of the ſecond and third,] without reckoning a great Number of Forts built at certain Diſtances, to defend the Great Wall, and render the Roads ſecure. Some of theſe fortify'd Places are larger and better peopled than many of the Cities.

Firſt Inhabited. The firſt Inhabitants of China, as the Hiſtory relates, ſettled in this Province, whoſe Climate is healthful and agreeable. Tho' ſome of its numerous Mountains, are frightful and uncultivated, yet moſt of them are well improv'd, being cut into Terraſſes from Bottom to Top and quite cover'd with Corn.

Produce. In ſeveral Parts of theſe Mountains they find four or five Feet Depth of Earth, without the leaſt Stone; and the Mountains themſelves have very fair Plains on their Tops They are farther remarkable for inexhauſtible Mines of Coal, which is uſed (either in Lumps, or ground and made into Cakes) inſtead of Wood, whereof there is not enough in the Province for Fewel.

Excepting Rice, which grows there with more Difficulty than elſewhere, becauſe the Canals are not ſo numerous; it abounds in all other Grain, eſpecially Wheat and Millet, which are carry'd into the other Provinces. Its Vines produce good Grapes, whereof the Chineſe might make Wine if they would, but they content themſelves to dry them, and ſo ſell them all over the Empire.

This Province furniſhes abundance of Muſk, Porphyry, Marble, and Jaſper of divers Colours. The Lapis Armenus is very common, as well as Iron Mines, which afford great Store of that Metal; whereof they make all ſorts of Utenſils for the Kitchin, which are ſent into the reſt of the Provinces. One meets alſo with Lakes of ſalt Water, which yield Salt; with many hot and boiling Springs.

The First City, Tay-ywen-fu, the Capital.

Tay-ywen-fu. THIS was formerly a very fine City full of beautiful Palaces, where dwelt the Princes of the Blood of the laſt Imperial Family Tay-ming (G). But at preſent it is partly uninhabited; for thoſe grand Edifices have fallen to Decay by Degrees, and at length, been quite deſtroy'd; nor dare any body re-build them, altho' the Place is healthful and agreeable.

Carpets. Beſides divers ſorts of Silks wrought here, as in other Places, there is a particular Manufactory for Carpets, after the Turkiſh Faſhion, which they make of any Dimenſion required. As the Mountains yield abundance of excellent Iron, there is a great Trade driven here in Iron Works.

This City, which is ancient and very populous, meaſures about three Leagues in Compaſs, and is inclos'd with ſtrong Walls. It ſtands on the River Fwen-ho and has a very large Juriſdiction, extending over five Cities of the ſecond Rank, and twenty of the third. Its verdant Hills and Mountains cover'd with Woods, afford an agreeable Proſpect.

(F) Here the Name agrees with the Map; in the Table of Longitude and Latitude it is Teng-chew-fu, as in the Table of Diviſions, p. 6.

(G) In the Orig. Tai-wing tchao; but I have left out the laſt Syllable tchao, or chau, which is only a Chronological Term, that does not belong to the Name, and only ſerves to breed Confuſion, ſince the Author has not tack'd it to the Names of other Families, or even of this in other Places.

On the neighbouring Mountains are to be ſeen very handſome Sepulchres, which take up a great deal of Ground, and are all either of Marble or Hewn-ſtone. At convenient Diſtances are plac'd Triumphal Arches, Statues of Heroes, with Figures of Lions, Horſes, and other Animals, in different Attitudes and very natural. The whole is encompaſs'd with a kind of Foreſt of ancient Cypreſs, planted checker-wiſe. PROV. IX. Shan-ſi.

The Fwen-ho, whoſe Name is found in the moſt ancient Chineſe Books, is neither broad nor deep; yet it contributes to the Ornament and Conveniency of the City, in the ſame Manner as the River Wey does to the City Si-ngan-fû; for tho' neither of them is comparable to the great Rivers, which run by ſeveral Capitals, yet as after a pretty long Courſe they fall into the yellow River, they by that Means have a Communication with the Provinces of Ho-nan and Kyang-nan. The Fwen-ho.

There is at Tay-ywen a ſmall Tartar Garriſon, under an Officer nam'd Ho-tong-ta. The Mancheus who are at preſent Maſters of China, have few Garriſons of their own Nation, and indeed it would be difficult, and almoſt impoſſible to furniſh ſo many Cities, which are either at the Paſſages of great Rivers, on the Frontiers, or on the Sea Coaſt, with Garriſons. So that they are content to garriſon ſome of the principal Cities of the Empire, partly to ſupport the Chineſe Soldiers, who are on the Coaſts, partly to diſpute the Paſſage of the Great River Yang-tſe-kyang, which croſſes thro' the middle of China; and partly to have a watchful Eye upon the Militia of the Provinces of Shan-ſi and Shen-ſi, employ'd for Defence of the great Wall; altho' the Emperor being a Tartar, there is at preſent no great Number of the latter. (D)

The Second City, Ping-yang-fu.

ALTHO' Ping-yang is no more than the ſecond City of the Province, yet it is not inferiour to the Capital, either for Antiquity, Fertility of Soil, Extent of its Diſtrict, or Number of Cities under its Juriſdiction, which amount to thirty four; viz. ſix of the ſecond and twenty eight of the third Rank, whereof ſeveral are very conſiderable; without reckoning an infinite Number of very populous Boroughs and Villages. It is ſituate on the River Fwen-ho, and is more than four Miles in Compaſs. Ping-yang-fû.

The Country which depends on it, is partly plain, partly mountainous; all the Lands are cultivated and very fertile, except in the Neighbourhood of ſome Mountains, which are unimprov'd and perfectly frightful. Two Rivers which divide this Territory do not contribute a little to keep up the plenty that reigns there. On the Weſt and South Sides it is water'd by the River Whang-ho. Near Ngan-i-hyen there is a Lake whoſe Water is as ſalt as the Sea, whereof they make abundance of Salt.

The Third City, Lu-ngan-fu.

THE Territory of this City is not large, for it has under its Juriſdiction no more than eight Cities of the third Rank; but it is agreeably ſituated, almoſt at the Head of the River Tſo-tſang-ho. Altho' the Country it pretty full of Hills, yet the Lands produce all the neceſſaries of Life. The whole Diſtrict is ſpread over with Boroughs and Villages. Lû-ngan-fû.

The Fourth City, Fwen-chew-fu. (E)

THIS City lies almoſt at an equal Diſtance between the Capital and Ping-yang. It takes its Name from the River Fwen-ho, on the Weſt ſide whereof it ſtands (F) in a Place very commodious for Trade. Its Diſtrict is not large, for it contains only one City of the ſecond Rank, and ſeven of the third, almoſt all of which lie between the great River Whang and the Fwen. Fwen-chew-fû.

Altho' the Country is hilly enough, it is not the leſs improv'd on that Account. One meets with Fields, abounding with all ſorts of Grain, thick Foreſts and good Paſtures. They make a Drink here of Rice call'd Yang-tſyû, wherein they ſteep Mutton after a particular manner. They prize this Liquor highly, it is nouriſhing, ſtrong, and very delicious to Chineſe Palates. In this Tract one meets with a great Number of Baths and Springs almoſt boiling hot, whoſe Waters differ both in Colour and Taſte.

The Fifth City, Tay-tong-fu.

THIS City is neither ſo antient nor large as the other Cities of the Province. That which renders it of Importance is its being ſituated in the midſt of Mountains, (wherewith indeed the whole Country is cover'd) and in the only Spot which lies expos'd to the Incurſions of the Tay-tong-fû.

(D) This is a Reaſon grounded on a Falſity in Fact; for neither the Mancheus who govern China, nor the Mongols and other Nations ſurrounding China, are Tartars; nor is the Name Tartars, or rather Tatars, known to thoſe People, in the extended Senſe it is uſed by Europeans; it being peculiar to a particular Tribe, which at preſent ſeems to be extinct, at leaſt as to the Name; the Reaſon therefore, why ſo few Guards are employ'd now about the Walls, is, probably, becauſe the Power of the Mongols being weaken'd, they have ſubmitted or put themſelves under the Protection of the Mancheus; whom formerly they expell'd out of China, under the famous Jenghiz Khan.

(F) It ſtands above two Miles from the River Fwen, according to the Map; and indeed the Author is not very accurate as to the Situations.

Prov. IX. Shan-ſi. the Tartars; hence it is one of the beſt fortify'd Places after the Chineſe manner, and furniſh'd with a numerous Garriſon. Its Territory is ſurrounded with the great Wall, along which there are Forts built from Space to Space, provided with Forces for its Defence. Its Juriſdiction which is very large, extends over four Cities of the ſecond Rank, and ſeven of the third.

In its Mountains are found excellent Lapis Armenus, with abundance of Simples and Medicinal Herbs, which the Botaniſts come in ſearch of from all Parts. Some of them produce a Stone ſo red, that being ſteep'd in Water it is uſed inſtead of Vermilion, for taking the Impreſſion of Seals; others furniſh the Azure, reſembling that which is brought into Europe; and a particular kind of Jaſper nam'd Yu-ſhe, which is very tranſparent, and as white as Agat. In ſhort, there is plenty of Marble and Jaſper of all Colours; and a great Trade is driven in all Sorts of Skins dreſs'd here.

PROVINCE X. SHEN-SI.

Prov. X. Shen-ſi. THIS Province is divided into two Parts, the Eaſtern and Weſtern, which contain eight Cities of the firſt and one hundred and ſix others of the third Rank; beſides a great Number of Forts built from Space to Space along the great Wall.

Of theſe fortify'd Places Kan-chew and Sû-chew are very conſiderable. In the firſt a Vice-Roy reſides, and ſeveral Mandarins, the prinrcipal among whom receive their Orders from none but the Court. The ſecond is of equal Strength, and its Governor very powerful. It is divided into two Parts, whereof one is inhabited by the Chineſe, and the other by Strangers, who come to trade here.

The Air is temperate, the People mild, civil, obliging, and better affected to Strangers, than the Chineſe, who live more towards the North, are. The overflowing of Torrents and Rivers render the Soil very fruitful. This Province yields rich Gold Mines, the opening of which is prohibited; ſo great a Quantity of that Metal is found in the Rivers and Brooks, that an infinite Number of Perſons ſubſiſt by the Profit that ariſes by waſhing the Sand and ſeparating the Gold from it.

Gold-Mines, and Gold-Sand.

Soil and Produce. This Country is ſubject to be infeſted with Locuſts, which eat up the Graſs, and ſometimes deſtroy the moſt plentiful Harveſts. It produces little Rice, but abounds with Wheat, and Millet; which grows here ſo faſt, that during Winter, the Huſbandmen ſuffer their Sheep to browze on it, knowing by Experience that thus it will thrive the better in Spring.

Beſides Grain, this Province furniſhes abundance of Drugs, eſpecially Rubarb, Honey, Wax, Muſk, Red-Lead, perfum'd Wood which reſembles Sanders, and Pit-Coal, whereof there are inexhauſtible Mines.

Minerals. A great Number of Quarries afford a ſoft Stone, or Mineral, call'd Hyung-whang, out of which they cut Veſſels of ſeveral kinds. The Phyſicians look on it as a ſovereign Remedy againſt all ſorts of Poiſon, malignant Fevers, and the contagious Heats during the Dog Days. They infuſe this Mineral in Wine before they make uſe of it; it is of a red Colour inclining to yellow, and ſpeckled with little black Spots; it has a great reſemblance of the Crayon.

Little blew Stones are alſo found there, inclining to black, and interſpers'd with ſmall white Veins; the Chineſe ſay, that being ground and reduc'd to a very fine Powder, they make an excellent Remedy, and even prolong Life.

Animals. Stags and Deer range the Country in Herds; here are alſo abundance of Bears, wild Bulls, and other Creatures reſembling Tigers, whoſe Skins are in much requeſt; a kind of Goats, from whence they take the Muſk, and of Sheep with very long and thick Tails, whoſe Fleſh is very well taſted; not to mention a ſingular ſpecies of Bats as big as Hens, which the Chineſe prefer to the niceſt Pullets.

Of Wool and Goat-Hair mixt, they make a very pretty Stuff much in requeſt; the Hair they uſe, is that which grows in the Winter, as being more fine, becauſe not ſo long. The Birds, call'd the Golden Hens, much eſteem'd for their Beauty, are alſo found in this Province.

All ſorts of Flowers grow here, particularly one much eſteem'd by the Curious, call'd the Queen of Flowers, reſembling the Roſe, but is more beautiful, and has larger Leaves, altho' and Red; yet there are ſome of them red and yellow. The Shrub it grows on is like the Elder-Tree, and to be ſeen in all the Gardens of the Lords; but Care muſt be taken in the hot Climates to ſhelter it from the Sun.

The Eaſtern Part of the Country, call'd I-TONG.

The Firſt City, Si-ngan-fu, the Capital.

Si-ngan-fû the Capital. NEXT to Pe-king this is one of the largeſt and faireſt Cities in China. It ſtands in a great Plain, and is the Reſidence of the Tſong-tû of Shen-ſi and Se-chewn, as well as of the Governor of this Eaſtern Part of Shen-ſi. Its Juriſdiction extends over ſix Cities of the ſecond, atd thirty one of the third Rank.

A Plan of the tribunal of the Tsyang-Kun or Generalissimo of the Army

J. Basire sculp.

This City was for ſeveral Ages the Court of the Chineſe Emperors, and is ſtill very populous, and of great Trade; eſpecially for Mules, which the Inhabitants breed and train ſo dexterouſly, that many of them are ſeen trotting after Horſes at Pe-king, where they ſell for five or ſix hundred Livres apiece: It being the Cuſtom for all Perſons of Diſtinction to have a Servant ride before them well mounted. PROV. X. Shen-ſi. Mules.

The Walls of Si-ngan are very broad, and high, flank'd with Towers at the Diſtance of a Bow-ſhot from one another, and encompaſs'd with a good Ditch. They are almoſt an equilateral Square, but not above four Leagues in Compaſs, tho' commonly ſaid to equal thoſe of Pe-king in that Reſpect. Some of its Gates are very magnificent, and remarkable for their Height.

There is ſtill to be ſeen a Palace where dwelt the antient Kings of the Province, whom the great Extent of Country they poſſeſs'd, and the Valour of their Subjects render'd very powful; the reſt of the Buildings are no better than thoſe of other Cities, the Houſes being according to the Chineſe Faſhion very low and ill enough built; nor is the Furniture ſo neat as in the Southern Provinces, the Varniſh being coarſer, China Ware ſcarcer, and the Workmen not ſo ſkillful. Palace of the ancient Kings

The Principal Forces of the Tartars deſign'd for the Defence of the North of China, are in Garriſon here, under a Tſyan-kyun, or General of their Nation, who with his Soldiers inhabit one part of the City, ſeparated from the reſt by a Wall. The chief Mandarins of the Province, who are here in great Numbers, are moſtly Tartars.

The People of the Country are more robuſt, brave, better able to undergo Fatigue, and even taller than elſewhere; which renders its Militia more formidable than thoſe of almoſt all the other Provinces.

The Mountains of the Territory of Si-ngan-fû, are very agreeable, and abound with Bucks, Does, Hares, and other Game; as well as that ſort of Bats as big as Pullets, ſpoken of before. They alſo afford a kind of Earth, which is white, and highly valued by the Ladies, who infuſing it in Water, make uſe of it to whiten the Complexion.

The Second City, Yen-ngan-fu.

THIS City is ſituate in an agreeable Plain, on the River Yen-ho. Three Cities of the ſecond, and ſixteen of the third Rank, depend on it. It has within its Walls a pretty high Hill, remarkable for the fine Buildings that are upon it. Its Mountains diſtil a bituminous Liquor, which they call Oyl of Stone, and uſe for Lamps. Yen-ngan-fû. Oyl of Stone,

The Country is very rich in Martins, Sables, and other choiſe Furs. It abounds likewiſe with all ſorts of fine Marble; and produces almoſt every where thoſe Shrubs, already deſcribed, which produce the Flowers rear'd, with ſo much Care, in the Gardens of the Grandees.

The Third City, Fong-tſyang-fu.

A Fabulous Bird, which the Chineſe deſcribe with Variety of admirable Colours, and paint ſometimes on their Cloaths and Furniture, gives Name to this Place, which has under its Juriſdiction one City of the ſecond, and ſeven of the third Rank. It is very large and the Buildings handſome enough. The Air is temperate and healthful; the whole Country is well cultivated, and rendered fertile by the Torrents, Brooks and Rivers. Fong-tſyang-fû.

The Fourth City, Han-chong-fu.

THE whole Country of this Diſtrict, containing two Cities of the ſecond, and fourteen of the third Rank, is water'd by ſeveral Branches of the River Han, whereon Han-chong, which is large and populous, is ſituate. The high Mountains and Foreſts, wherewith it is encompaſs'd, render it very ſtrong, and ſerve for Bulwarks. The Valleys are pleaſant, and furniſh plenty of Neceſſaries, as well as Honey, Wax, Muſk, and red-Lead; fallow Beaſts are very numerous, eſpecially Deer, Stags, and Bears; the Feet of theſe laſt, eſpecially the fore-feet, are delicious Morſels with the Chineſe. Han chong-fû.

The Road made formerly over the Mountains, leading to the Capital, has ſomething ſurpriſing in it; upwards of a hundred thouſand Men were employ'd in the Work, which was executed with incredible Diſpatch. They levell'd Hills, and made Arches from one Mountain to another, ſupporting them by Pillars, when the intervening Valley was too wide. Theſe Bridges, which form part of the Road, are in ſome Places ſo high, that one cannot behold the Precipice without Horror; four Horſemen may ride abreaſt over them, and for more Security they have Rails on each Side. At certain Diſtances, there are Villages and Inns for the Conveniency of Travellers. Surpriſing Road.

It is only in the Diſtrict of this City, and ſome particular parts of Tartary, that a very rare Bird of Prey, call'd Hay-tſing, is found. It may be compar'd to our beſt Falcons for Sprightlyneſs and Courage; as ſoon as any of theſe Birds are caught, they are immediately ſent to the Emperor's Falconry.

PROV. X. Shen-ſi.

The Weſtern Part of the Province, call'd I-SI.

The Fifth City, Ping-lyang-fu.

Ping-lyang-fu. THIS City ſtands on a Branch of the River Kin-ho, and abounds with every thing. The Climate is very mild, and the agreeable Proſpect of Mountains ſurrounding it, together with the Rivers which water the Country, render it a charming Habitation. It has within its Diſtrict three Cities of the ſecond, and ſeven of the third Rank.

The Sixth City, Kong-chang-fu.

Kong-chang-fu. THIS is a City of Trade, and very populous, ſituate on the River Whey. The almoſt inacceſſible Mountains which encompaſs it, render'd it formerly a Place of Importance to the Security of the Empire, when they ſtood in fear of Invaſions from the Tartars. They ſhew a Fo-hi's Tomb. Sepulchre here, which the Chineſe ſay is that of Fo-hi, which, if ſo, muſt be the moſt ancient Monument in the World.

Counter-Poiſon. Speckled Stones. It affords plenty of Muſk, and almoſt all its Mountains, yield the Mineral Hyung-whang; which as I obſerv'd before, is a kind of Orpiment, uſed in Phyſic, when very tranſparent, eſpecially againſt the Bites of venemous Inſects; and in malignant and epidemical Diſeaſes, either as a Remedy or an Antidote. Here is alſo found the dark blue Stone, ſtreak'd with white, which, being reduc'd to Powder, according to the Chineſe, preſerves Health. This City has in its Diſtrict three more of the ſecond, and ſeven of the third Rank.

The Seventh City, Ling-tau-fu.

Ling-tau-fu. THIS City ſtands on a River that falls into the Whang-ho or Yellow River. It is famous for the great Quantity of Gold found in the Sand of the neighbouring Rivers and Torrents. The Country is full of Mountains, which abound with wild Bulls, and certain Animals reſembling Tigers, whoſe Skins are in great Requeſt, and uſed for Winter Cloathing.

The Valleys are cover'd with Corn, excepting thoſe near Rivers which are ſtock'd with Cattle, eſpecially Sheep, whoſe Tails are very long, and Fleſh delicious. In ſhort the whole Territory is ſufficiently fruitfull. It comprizes two Cities of the ſecond, and three of the third Rank.

The Eighth City, Kin-yang-fu. (A)

Kin-yang-fu. THIS has always been look'd on as a Barrier againſt the Incurſions of the Tartars. The Ditches encompaſſing it are very deep, and the Walls ſtrong. The River, that almoſt ſurrounds it, and the ſeveral Forts built from Space to Space, join'd to the Mountains and Rivers, by which it is as it were inclos'd, render it a very ſtrong Place, according to the Chineſe manner of Fortifying.

The Country is very fruitful, being water'd by numerous Springs and Rivers. It produces a certain Herb nam'd Kin ſe, that is, gilded Silk, which is conſider'd as an excellent Remedy; alſo a kind of Bean, affirm'd to be an admirable Specific againſt all ſorts of Poiſon. This City has under it only one of the ſecond, and four of the third Rank.

Lan-chew, a famous City of the ſecond Rank, [and Capital of the Weſtern Part of Shen-ſi.]

Lan-chew. ALTHO' Lan-chew is only of the ſecond Rank, and depends on the former, yet it is of eminent Note in the Province, being the beſt City to be met with on the Yellow River. It cannot indeed be call'd large, however it is the Capital of the Weſtern part of this Province, and the Seat of the Governor; becauſe being near the Great Wall, and principal Gates in the Weſt, Succours are eaſily ſent from hence to the Soldiers who defend the Entrance.

The Trade of this City conſiſts principally in Skins, which come from Tartary by way of Sining and To-pa, thro' which they muſt neceſſarily paſs; as alſo in Woolen Stuffs of ſeveral ſorts, whereof a kind of fine Serge, nam'd Kû-zhong, is the moſt eſteem'd; it is almoſt as dear as the common Satin, but is eaſily ſpoil'd, becauſe it is difficult to preſerve it from being Moth-eaten; the coarſer ſort is call'd Ko-he. There is another Stuff call'd Pe-zhong, made of ſhort teas'd Hair, which is ſubject to the ſame Inconvenience, and likewiſe dear. The Myew-zhong is made of Cows-Hair, it is coarſe, and almoſt as thick as Kerſey. They make Cloaths of it, proper for ſnowy Weather, having nothing better for the Purpoſe in this Country.

Laſtly, there is a Stuff call'd Tye-he-myen, made of Thread and Worſted; which might be compar'd to our Linſey-Woolſey, if it was as ſubſtantial and cloſe woven. But notwithſtanding its Trade in theſe Commodities, Lan-chew is not reckon'd a rich City in China.

(A) In the Map Here, it is Kin-yang-fû, in the Table of Diviſions p. 6. Hing-yang-fû, and in the Table of Longitude and Latitude at end of the Work King-yang-fû.

PROVINCE XI. SE-CHWEN.

PROV. XI. Se-chwen.

SE-CHWEN is hardly inferior to any of the other Provinces, either for Extent or Plenty. It is bounded on the North by that of Shen-ſi; on the Eaſt by Hû-quang; on the South by Hû-quang and Yun-nan; and on the Weſt by the Kingdom of Tibet, and certain neighbouring People. It is divided into ten Diſtricts, comprizing ten Cities of the firſt Rank, and eighty eight of the ſecond and third, beſides a great Number of fortify'd Towns and Forts.

The great River Yang-tſe-kyang runs thro' the Province, which is very rich, not only by reaſon of the great Quantity of Silk it produces, but alſo in Iron, Tin, and Lead, in Amber, Sugar-Canes, excellent Loadſtones, and Lapis Armenus; which laſt is of a very beautiful Blue. It abounds alſo in Muſk; Orange and Citron-Trees are very numerous. The Horſes are very much eſteem'd, becauſe they are little, very pretty and exceeding ſwift. Here are likewiſe plenty of Stags, Deer, Partridges, Parrots, and a ſort of Hen with Wool like that of Sheep, inſtead of Feathers; they are very ſmall, have ſhort Feet, and are highly eſteem'd by the Chineſe Ladies, who keep them for their Amuſement. From this Province comes the beſt Rubarb, and the true Root of Fû-lin; which has under its Bark a kind of white ſpongious Subſtance, ſomewhat clammy, which the Phyſicians preſcribe in almoſt all Caſes. There is found a wild ſort in the other Provinces; but it is neither ſo large nor good as this. Se-chwen produces alſo another Root, named Fen-ſe, which bears a great Price, and conſequently is not ſo commonly uſed.

The beſt Rubarb, and true Root of Fû-lin.

As this Province is far from the Sea, it would be difficult to bring Salt hither; to ſupply that Defect, they dig Wells in the Mountains from whence they get ſalt Water, which being evaporated by Fire, leaves a Salt behind; but it is not ſo good for ſeaſoning as that of the Sea.

The Firſt City, Ching-tu-fu, the Capital of the Province.

Ching-tu-fû, the Capital.

THIS was heretofore one of the fineſt Cities in the Empire; but having been ruined as well the as whole Province in 1646, by the Civil Wars preceding the Change in the Monarchy, it retains nothing of its former Splendor: however it is ſtill very populous, and of great Trade. Its Diſtrict, which is very large, compriſing ſix Cities of the ſecond, and twenty five of the third Rank, is interſpers'd with navigable Canals, lin'd with hewn-Stone.

The Territory of Ching-tû is the only one that is plain in all the Province; it is water'd by Canals, cut from the Ta-kyang, which there is very gentle, and rather flow than ſwift; but when (after theſe Branches are re-united into one Channel, and augmented by the River Hin-ſha-kyang) that River paſſes out of Se-chwen into Hû-quang, it becomes very dangerous; as well on account of the Rapidity of its Stream, as its being incumber'd with Rocks, which the Country is full of. The Ta-kyang cannot truely be ſaid to be the broadeſt, deepeſt and moſt navigable River of China, till it has paſs'd Kin-chew. The Breadth of its Mouth in the Oriental Ocean is almoſt ſeven Leagues; but at Ching-kyang-fû itſelf, the neareſt City to the Sea, built on purpoſe to defend the Entrance of it, its Channel is ſcarce half a League broad: as it was found on meaſuring it with Inſtruments, from the famous Mountain Kin-ſhan, which ſtands in the middle of the River, by obſerving the Points whoſe Situations had been before determin'd. This ſhows how little Regard is to be had to computed Diſtances; for altho' that Part of the River is much frequented, the Chineſe have err'd very much in their Eſtimation, on the ſide of Exceſs.

The Ta-kyang or Yang-tſe-kyang.

The Second City, Pau-ning-fu.

Pau ning-fû.

THE Situation of this City between two Rivers, tho' ſmall, renders it agreeable, and of pretty good Trade. Its Houſes are well built. The Country depending on it, which abounds with Muſk, is as it were cover'd with Mountains; which are ſtor'd with Stags and Deer, and for the moſt part afford no diſagreeable Proſpect, eſpecially thoſe that are cultivated and cover'd with Foreſts. It has ten Cities under its Juriſdiction, two of the ſecond, and eight of the third Rank.

The Third City, Shun-king-fu.

Shun-king-fû.

THIS City, which ſtands on a fair River, has in its Diſtrict two Cities of the ſecond, and ſeven of the third Rank. It is ſurrounded with Mountains, whereof ſome are cover'd over with Orange-Trees; and affords more arable Lands than the Territory of the preceding City.

This Country yields abundance of Silk, Oranges of all ſorts, the Root Scorzonera, and a kind of well taſted Cheſnuts; but is remarkable for nothing elſe.

The

PROV. XI. Se-chwen.

The Fourth City, Su-chew-fu. (A)

Su-chew-fû.

THE Situation of this City on the Banks of the Yang-tſe-kyang renders it a Place of great Trade as well as Note; and opens a Communication with ſeveral other Cities of the Province, beſides the Capital. The Country tho' mountainous is very fertile, wanting nothing that may contribute to the Pleaſures or Conveniencies of Life.

The Canes, called by us Bambû, which the Chineſe put to ſo many different uſes, grow almoſt every where in the Territory of this City, which has ten Cities of the third Rank within its Juriſdiction.

The Fifth City, Chong-king-fu.

Chong-king-fû.

THIS is one of the handſomeſt and moſt trading Cities in the Province; reckoning within its Diſtrict three Cities of the ſecond, and eleven of the third Rank. It ſtands at the Confluence of two remarkable Rivers, which facilitate its Commerce with the whole Province; one of them is call'd Kin-ſha-kyang or [the River of] Golden Sand, which in its Way from the Province of Yun-nan collects all the Waters of the Mountains on the ſide of Tartary; the other, which riſes ſtill further beyond the Borders of China, is properly the Ta-kyang, tho' it goes by divers Names according to the Place thro' which it paſſes; but after it has left Yo-chew-fû, it conſtantly retains the Name of Ta-kyang, or Yang-tſe-kyang.

The Great Kyang.

Chong-king is built on a Mountain, where the Houſes ſeem to riſe one above another, in form of an Amphitheatre. The Country depending on it, which is of vaſt Extent, is intermixt with Plains and Mountains. The Air is healthful and temperate; they make very pretty Trunks here of Canes twiſted and painted with divers Colours. The Rivers afford exceeding good Fiſh, whereof the Tortoiſes, eſpecially, are much eſteem'd.

The Sixth City, Quey-chew-fu. (B)

Quey-chew-fû.

AS this City, which ſtands on the great Yang-tſe-kyang, appears as ſoon as ever we enter the Province, they have eſtabliſh'd a Cuſtom-Houſe for receiving the Duties on Goods brought hither. Its Trade renders it very rich. Ten Cities are under its Juriſdiction, viz. one of the ſecond, and nine of the third Rank. Altho' the Country is full of Mountains, yet the Induſtry of the Huſbandman has made it very fertile, there not being ſo much as an Inch of Land uncultivated. It produces abundance of Muſk, and of thoſe Pits from whence they procure Salt; Orange and Limon-Trees are common. In the moſt Northerly Parts, the Mountains, which are very rugged, and difficult of Aſcent, are inhabited by a very clowniſh ſort of People, if compared with the Chineſe Commonalty.

The Seventh City, Ma-hu-fu.

Ma-hu fû.

THIS City, which is ſeated on the Kin-ſha-kyang, has no more than one City of the third Rank under its Juriſdiction. Its Territory, tho' very ſmall, is well watered, and very fruitful. Some of its Mountains are full of Stags, and its Situation procures it the Advantages of Trade.

The Eighth City, Long-ngan-fu.

Long-ngan fû.

ALTHO' this City has only three of the third Rank under its Juriſdiction, yet it has always been look'd on as one of the moſt important Places in the Province, whereof it is, as it were, the Key: Hence it commands over ſeveral Forts, which were of greater uſe formerly than they are at preſent, to defend the Province from Invaſions of the Tartars. The Country is intermixt with ſteep Mountains and fertile Valleys.

The Ninth City, Tſun-i-fu.

Tſun-i fû.

THIS City is conſiderable for nothing, but becauſe it lies on the Borders of the Province of Quey-chew, and may defend the Entrance of it on that ſide. It has in its Diſtrict two Cities of the ſecond, and four of the third Rank. The whole Country is very mountainous; notwithſtanding which it is well watered, and fertile enough in ſeveral Parts.

The Tenth City, Tong-chwen-fu.

Tong-chwen-fû.

THIS is a military Place, as well as the Cities U-mong-tû-fû and Chin-hyung-tû-fû; which are ſo call'd, becauſe the Inhabitants are old Soldiers, who from Father to Son have been bred up to Arms. Beſides their Pay, they have Lands aſſign'd them near the Cities they inhabit. Theſe Troops are diſbanded in time of Peace, but to make them amends, they are diſtributed into all the Frontier Garriſons of the Empire.

(A) In the Table of Latitude and Longitude it is Swi-chew-fû, but elſewhere as in this Place.

(B) In the Map, as here, Quey-chew-fû, but in the 1ſt Table mention'd p. 10. Note A, tis Wey-chew-fû, and in the 2d Table Que-chew-fû.

Beſides theſe Cities of the firſt Rank there are ſome others, which, tho' only of the ſecond Rank, have peculiar Juriſdiction over certain Cities of the third Rank, and many Forts or Places of War, ſuch as theſe following, viz. PROV. XI. Se-chwen.

Tong-chwen-chew, whoſe Diſtrict is very fruitful, being watered by ſeveral Rivers. The Air is very healthful, and the Mountains as well as Plains well cultivated. The Country produces abundance of Canes, which yield exceeding good Sugar; and very populous Boroughs are ſeen in great Number. Tong-chwen-chew.

Kya-ting-chew, whoſe Territory is watered by many Rivers, furniſhes plenty of Rice and Muſk. Kya-ting-chew.

Ya-chew lies neareſt Tibet, and commands ſeveral Forts, built on the Borders of the Province. Ya-chew.

PROVINCE XII. QUANG-TONG.

THIS is the moſt conſiderable of all the Southern Provinces. It is bounded on the North-Eaſt by that of Fo-kyen; on the North by Kyang-ſi, on the Weſt by Quang-ſi and the Kingdom of Tong-king; the reſt is waſh'd by the Sea, where are a good Number of commodious Ports. It is divided into ten Countries, containing ten Cities of the firſt, and eighty four of the ſecond and third Rank; excluſive of ſeveral Forts or military places, together with the City of Ma-kau, and Iſle of San-çian; of both which I ſhall ſpeak, becauſe they are become famous in Europe. PROV. XII. Quang-tong. Bounds.

The Country is partly plain, partly mountainous, and ſo fertile as to produce two Crops of Corn yearly. Whatever can contribute to the Pleaſures of Life abounds here; it alſo furniſhes Gold, precious Stones, Silk, Pearls, Pewter, Quickſilver, Sugar, Copper, Iron, Steel, Saltpeter, Ebony, Eagle-wood, and ſeveral ſorts of Odoriferous Wood. There is likewiſe plenty of all ſorts of Fruits, as Pomegranates, Grapes, Pears, Plumbs, Cheſnuts, and Peaches; which tho' they do not ripen without Difficulty, would make pretty good Sweetmeats. There are others that are excellent in their kind, viz, Bananas, Ananas, Li-chi, Long-ywen, Oranges, and Limons of all ſorts. Produce. Fruits.

There is a particular ſort of Limon, which grows on Trees, full as thorny as the Citron-Tree, but much larger; it bears white Flowers of an exquiſite Odour, from which they diſtil a very pleaſant Liquor. The Fruit is almoſt as big as a Man's Head; its Rind reſembles that of other Oranges, but the Subſtance within is either white or reddiſh, and has a Taſte between ſweet and ſower.

There is another ſort of Fruit, the largeſt any where to be ſeen, which grows not on the Branches, but out of the Body of the Tree; its Rind is very hard, and within it has a great Number of little Cells, containing a yellow Pulp, which is very ſweet and agreeable when the Fruit is full ripe.

Fiſh of all ſorts are caught on the Coaſts, beſides Oyſters, Lobſters, and very well taſted Crabs, and Tortoiſes of an extraordinary Size; the Chineſe make an infinite Number of pretty Curioſities of their Shells. This Province abounds with wild and tame Peacocks, which are carry'd into the other Parts of the Empire; alſo a prodigious multitude of tame Ducks, which the Inhabitants breed with Care. They hatch their Eggs in Ovens or in Dung, and then carry them in little Boats to the Sea-Side, at low Water, to feed on Oyſters, Cockles, and ſeveral Sea-Inſects. As a great Number of Boats go together, conſequently many Flocks of them are intermixt on the Shore; but as ſoon as the Owners ſtrike on a Baſin, every Flock returns to its own Boat, as Pidgeons do to their Houſes. Fiſh.

Another Rarity of this Province is the Tree, which the Portugueze call Iron-Wood; and indeed it reſembles Iron in Colour as well as Hardneſs and Weight, which laſt hinders it from ſwimming on the Water. There is alſo another particular Wood, which they call Roſe-Wood, whereof the Chineſe Joiners make Tables, Chairs and other Moveables: Its Colour is black, inclining to red, it is ſpeckled with Veins, and painted naturally. Iron-Wood. Roſe-Wood.

On the Coaſts and in a Lake of the Iſland Hay-nan they catch Crabs, which, as they affirm, as ſoon as they are taken out of the Water, become as hard as Flints; and prove, as they ſay, a good Remedy againſt burning Fevers. Petrefied Crabs.

There grows alſo on the Mountains a prodigious Quantity of a wonderful kind of Oziers or Willows, no thicker than one's Finger. It creeps along the Ground, and ſhoots forth very long Sprigs reſembling twiſted Cords, which ſo embarraſs the Way, that the Stags themſelves know not how to extricate themſelves. Strange kind of Oziers.

This Ozier, which is very pliable and tough, ſerves for making Cables and Ropes for Shipping; they divide them into very thin Slips, whereof they make Baſkets, Paniers, Hurdles, Chairs, and very commodious Mats, which the Chineſe generally lie on in Summer, becauſe they are cool.

Prov. XII. Quang-tong.

The People of this Province are very induſtrious; and tho' not quick at Invention, they are very expert at imitating any ſort of European Work that is ſhown them, and immediately make ſuch another in great Perfection.

Natives good at imitating.

As Quang-tong is a Maritime Province, and moſt remote from the Court, its Government is one of the moſt conſiderable in the Empire. He who is Tſong-tû of it, is alſo Tſong-tû of Quang-ſi; and for that Reaſon reſides at Chau-king, to be the nearer at Hand for giving his Orders relating to that Province.

The Firſt City, Quang-chew-fu, Capital of the Province.

Quang-chew-fu.

THE City which the Chineſe name Quang-chew, is the ſame which Europeans call Kan-ton (A). It is one of the moſt populous and opulent in China; and perhaps deſerves the firſt Place in this reſpect, ſince to the Trade of the neighbouring Nations it hath added that of Europe. Beſides it ſtands on one of the fineſt Rivers in the Empire, which they have Reaſon to name Ta-ho, [or the great River] eſpecially at Kan-ton; becauſe in its way from the Province of Quang-ſi, it receives another River deep enough to bring up large Veſſels from the Sea to the Town, and by means of Canals extends its Waters into divers Provinces. Its Mouth is large, and more terrible for its Name Hû-men, that is, the Tiger's Gate, than its Forts, which are built only to keep off the Chineſe Pirates. The ſides of this River, the neighbouring Plains, even the little Hills themſelves are well cultivated, and ſtor'd with Rice, or a kind of Trees, which are always green.

The great Quantity of Money, which is brought hither from the moſt diſtant Countries, draws the Merchants of the ſeveral Provinces to this Port, where almoſt every thing that is curious and rare in the Empire may be found. The Inhabitants are beſides very laborious, ingenious, and above all exceeding ſkilful in imitating any Pattern, as has been already obſerved, and embelliſhing their Manufactures: which however are not much eſteem'd at Pe-king, becauſe the Workmen there undervalue them, as being neither ſubſtantial nor well wrought; for generally the Materials they are made of, are too ſcanty or ill choſen, or elſe the Workmanſhip within is too ſlight.

Silks.

Nevertheleſs the Silks made at Kan-ton, call'd Sha, are reckon'd at Pe-king the beſt of that kind; eſpecially the flower'd ſorts, which are wrought open like Lace, and very much worn in Summer, becauſe they are cheap and genteel.

Fo-ſhan.

Tho' the Number of Artificers in this City is almoſt incredible, yet not being ſufficient for its Trade, they have eſtabliſh'd a great many Manufactories at Fo-ſhan, which has render'd it famous thro' the whole Province. During the Troubles wherein Kan-ton was involv'd, the Trade was carry'd to this Borough, which is within four Leagues of it; it is at leaſt three Leagues in Compaſs, is a Place of great Reſort, and in ſhort not inferior to Kan-ton, either for Wealth or Number of Inhabitants; tho' that City taken altogether is reported to contain upwards of a Million of Souls: which is the more credible, conſidering its great Extent, and vaſt Concourſe of People continually in the Streets, altho' one ſcarce ever ſees a Woman among them.

The Vice-Roy reſides at Kan-ton, which has under its Juriſdiction ſeventeen Cities, one of the ſecond, and ſixteen of the third Rank.

There can hardly be a more charming Landſkip than what offers itſelf on entring the River that leads to the Town. It is various, animated and gay; on one ſide Meadows of a moſt lovely Green extend out of Sight, on the other Groves appear, or little Hills which riſe in form of Amphitheatres, and are aſcended by Steps made of green Sods. Sometimes Rocks are ſeen cover'd with Moſs; at other times Villages are diſcover'd among the Copſes; ſometimes Canals preſent themſelves, which form Iſlands, or loſing themſelves in the Earth expoſe to view their beautiful Banks; in ſhort the whole Proſpect is inchanting.

Kan-ton is very large, and, as it were, three Cities united in one; which are ſeparated by fair high Walls, but ſo contiguous that the ſame Gate ſerves to paſs from one to the other. The whole forms a Figure almoſt ſquare, and is not much leſs in Compaſs than Paris; thoſe who live at a Diſtance from the Center, are ſometimes a whole Hour going to make a Viſit in a Chair, and yet there are no very large Gardens or waſte Grounds in the City; only there are ſome pretty good Squares, which are agreeable enough.

The Streets are long and ſtraight, paved with very hard hewn-Stone, and extremely neat, but all narrow, excepting a few, which are adorn'd with Triumphal Arches at certain Diſtances. They are wholly taken up with Shops, and as ſome of them are cover'd, the beſt Shops are there. The Streets are full of People, eſpecially Porters, who commonly go bare-footed and bare-headed; or elſe wear a Straw Hat, of a vaſt Circumference, and an odd Figure, to defend them from the Sun or Rain. Moſt of them are ſeen loaden with Burdens, for they have no Conveniency here for carrying Goods but the Shoulders of Men. Perſons of Condition are carry'd in Chairs.

The Houſes, tho' very neat, are far from being ſtately; almoſt all of them conſiſt of a Ground-Floor, and are built of Earth, ornamented with Bricks, and cover'd with Tiles. Yet

Kan-ton

(A) Kan-ton is a Corruption of Quang tong, the Name of the Province. P. Bouvet, p. 61, ſhews how it came in uſe. It is one great Fault of this Relation, that the proper Names and Terms are ſeldom explained; for the Table of Terms is far from taking in all.

Kan-ton is not deſtitute of handſome Buildings. The Idol Temples, ſurrounded with Cells of the Bonzas, have ſomething ſingular in them: And the Hall of Confucius, as well as the Academy where the Literati aſſemble to compoſe their Exerciſes, are curious Structures. The Ya-men or Palaces of the Mandarins, are alſo beautiful and grand; tho' in a different Reſpect from what we term ſo in Europe.

The River is crouded on both ſides with a prodigious Number of Barks in ſeveral Rows, which contain an infinite Quantity of People, and make a kind of floating City. Theſe Barks lying cloſe together form Streets; each Bark contains a whole Family, and like Houſes is divided into different Apartments; the common People who inhabit them, go out betimes in the Morning, either to fiſh, or work at the Rice, which yields two Crops every Year. At the End of each Street there is a Barrier, which is ſhut every Evening ſoon after the Gates of the City; ſo that every Body is obliged to be at home by the time it grows dark. This Regulation prevents many Diſorders in China, where the greateſt Cities are as quiet in the Night-time as if they conſiſted but of ſingle Families.

The Second City, Shau-chew-fu.

Shau-chew-fu.

THIS City is ſituate between two navigable Rivers, which meet at the Place where it is built; one of them comes from Nan-hyong, and the other from the Province of Hû-quang. The Bank of the River on the Weſt-Side is joined to the City by a Bridge of Boats, and well inhabited. The whole Country, which is ſcattered over with Boroughs, produces abundance of Rice, Herbage, Fruits, Cattle and Fiſh; but the Air is not healthful, ſo that often from the middle of October to December a great Number of the Inhabitants are carry'd off by the Diſtempers that reign there. Six Cities of the third Rank are dependant on it; near one of which there grow black Reeds, which look like Ebony, whereof they make various Muſical Inſtruments.

Fine Monaſtery.

Three Miles from Shau-chew there is a celebrated Monaſtery of the Bonzas, which formerly, they affirm, contained a thouſand of them; nothing can be more charming than its Situation. In the middle of a great Mountain, where it ſtands, call'd Nan-wha, one diſcovers an agreeable Deſart, which extends along a vaſt Plain, intirely encompaſs'd with little Hills; on the Tops of which they have planted Rows of Fruit-Trees, and from Space to Space Thickets, of Evergreens. The Country round about belongs to this Monaſtery, which they ſay was founded eight or nine hundred Years ago.

The Devil, who is the Imitator of God's Works, has his Penitents as well as his Virgins and Martyrs. They pretend that the Founder of this Monaſtery, whoſe Body is worſhip'd here, ſpent his Life in the moſt dreadful Mortification; and that Worms having bred in the Sores, made in his Fleſh by an Iron Chain which he wore about him, he took ſo much Care to improve his Sufferings, that he gather'd them up as faſt as they drop'd off his Body, and put them in their Place again, ſaying, That there was ſtill ſomething to feed on.

The Bonzas his Succeſſors follow his Example, but very ill; for tho' they make Profeſſion of Chaſtity, it is ſaid they are given to all ſorts of Debaucheries. Formerly great Complaints were made by the People, who came hither in Pilgrimage, that they robbed and plundered them; but at preſent Care is taken to prevent the like.

The Third City, Nan-hyong-fu. (A)

Nan-hyong-fû.

THIS is a large trading City, and one of the moſt frequented in the Empire. It ſtands at the Foot of a Mountain, (ſeparating the Provinces of Quang-tong and Kyang-ſi) from which two large Rivers deſcend, whereof one runs Southward, the other Northward; this laſt is divided into ſo many Branches that none of its Waters are loſt, which are continually ſwell'd with the Streams that fall from the Mountains. This City has only two Cities of the third Rank under its Juriſdiction.

Mountain Mey-lin.

Between Nan-hyong, which is the laſt City of the Province of Quang-tong, and Nan-ngan the firſt City of Kyang-ſi, ten Leagues diſtant, lies a great Mountain, call'd Mey-lin; over which there is a remarkable Road, above three Miles in length, with Precipices on each ſide; but as the Way is pretty wide, Travellers are in no Danger from Accidents.

On the Top of the Mountain, from whence one may ſee a great Way into both Provinces, there is a ſort of Temple built in Honour and to the Memory of the Mandarin who cauſed this admirable Road to be made, which is the moſt famous throughout China; becauſe whatever comes either from the Eaſt or South, muſt paſs that Way; whence it is almoſt continually throng'd with People, as much as the Streets of great Cities. The Merchants of the ſeveral Provinces have very lately cauſed a Stone Monument to be erected here, at their own Expence; whereon is inſcribed the Elogy of the Vice-Roy, who had the Care of the Cuſtom-Houſes of the Province of Quang-tong, and cauſed the Duties to be conſiderably leſſen'd.

(A) In the Map, Nan-yong, and in the Table of Diviſions, p. 6. Nan-hyung. Differences of theſe kinds are very common in this Work, nor is it eaſy to determine which is the true Orthography.

The

Prov. XII. Quang-tong.

The Fourth City, Whey-chew-fu.

Whey-chew-fu.

THIS City is almoſt ſurrounded with Water; and the Lands about it, which are the beſt in the Province, are irrigated by abundance of Springs. It has under its Juriſdiction one City of the ſecond Rank, and ten of the third.

The whole Country, which lies near the Sea, abounds with Fiſh, Oyſters, Lobſters, very well taſted Crabs, beſides extraordinary large Tortoiſes, of whoſe Shells the Chineſe make all ſorts of Toys. There are two remarkable Bridges at Whey-chew, one of forty Arches, which covers the two Rivers that meet on the Eaſt-ſide; the other is to the Weſt, built over a little Lake, that waſhes the Walls of the City. This Lake which is but three Miles in Compaſs, is lined with Stone quite round; and the ſides of it are embelliſh'd with Gardens, and ſtately Trees. There are two Iſlands in it which are adorn'd with Pleaſure-Houſes, and joined by a fine Stone Bridge.

In a Mountain of this Diſtrict they catch Butterflies, remarkable for their Beauty and Size; which are ſent to Court, and employ'd in certain Ornaments of the Palace, deſcribed elſewhere.

The Fifth City, Chau-chew-fu.

Chau-chew-fu.

THIS City ſtands near the Mouth of the River Han-kyang, the Sea flowing up to its Walls. It has a magnificent Bridge on the Eaſt-ſide, which is very long, and proportionably wide. Its Diſtrict contains eleven Cities of the third Rank.

This Country is ſeparated by Mountains from the Province of Fo-kyen, and ſo well water'd, that the Soil is every where very fertile; excepting in ſome Places, where it is ſtony and incapable of Tillage.

The Sixth City, Chau-king-fu.

Chau-king-fu.

IN this City, which, according to thoſe who are Judges, is the beſt built and handſomeſt in the whole Province, the Tſong-tu of the Provinces of Quang-tong and Quan-ſi reſides. It is ſituate by the River Ta-ho, on whoſe Eaſt-ſide appears a beautiful Tower, nine Stories high. The Port is very ſpacious, lying at the Confluence of three Rivers, or great Streams, one of which goes to Kan-ton. This Stream is ſo reſtrain'd between two Hills, that often in the time of Rain it overflows.

From Chau-king to Kan ton, both ſides of the River are beſet with large Villages, ſo near each other, that they ſeem to make but one. Among the reſt there is one upon the left Hand, of an extraordinary Length, containing near two hundred Houſes; which appear like ſquare Towers, and ſerve the Inhabitants to retire to with their Effects, in time of Rebellion, or the ſuddain Attack of Robbers. Afterwards you come to the Village Fo-ſhan, ſaid to contain a Million of People.

Village Fo-ſhan contains 1,000,000 Souls.

There are, upon the River only, upwards of five thouſand Barks, each as long as our midling Ships, and containing an intire Family; without reckoning an infinite Number of Fiſhing-Boats, and Canoes for croſſing from one ſide to the other; there being no Bridges over theſe great Rivers.

This Country abounds with wild and tame Peacocks, which are rarely ſeen in the other Provinces, unleſs they be brought thither; alſo with Eagle-Wood and the Pao de Roſa, or Roſe-Wood, as the Portugueze call it, of which the Chineſe make divers very curious Moveables. The Mountains likewiſe produce large Trees, which they call Iron-Wood, on account of its Hardneſs and Weight.

Chau-king has under its Juriſdiction one City of the ſecond, and five of the third Rank.

The Seventh City, Kau-chew-fu.

Kau-chew-fu.

THE Tide comes up as far as this City, ſo that the Chineſe Ships of Burthen may ſail up to it; which Conveniency, with the Fertility of its Land, cauſes great Plenty. It preſides over one City of the ſecond, and five of the third Rank.

This Diſtrict is incloſed partly by the Sea, and partly by Mountains, which are as Walls to it. Here are abundance of excellent Birds of Prey; alſo a ſort of Stone nearly reſembling Marble, which naturally repreſents Water, Mountains, and Landſkips. The Chineſe cut it into Leaves, whereof they make Tables and other Furniture.

Petrefying Crabs.

The Sea produces a kind of Crab, much like the common ſort, which have this extraordinary Quality, that when they are out the Water, they petrefy, without loſing their natural Form. The Chineſe Phyſicians uſe them as an excellent Remedy againſt burning Fevers.

The Eighth City, Lyen-chew-fu.

Lyen-chew-fu.

THIS City ſtands near the Sea, which there forms a very commodious Port for Barks, and Ships of Burden. Its Diſtrict is but of ſmall Extent, comprizing only one City of the ſecond, and two of the third Rank.

The Country borders on the Kingdom of Tong-king, from which it is ſeparated by inacceſſible Mountains. It affords plenty of Peacocks; they fiſh here for Pearls, and make ſeveral pretty Works of Tortoiſe-Shell.

The Ninth City, Lwi-chew-fu.

Lwi-chew-fu.

THE Territory belonging to this City, is the moſt agreeable and plentiful in all the Weſtern Part of the Province. It is almoſt ſurrounded by the Sea, being ſeparated from the Iſland of Hay-nan, only by a ſmall Streight; where, it is ſaid, there was formerly a Pearl-Fiſhery.

It abounds with Boroughs, whoſe Inhabitants ſubſiſt by fiſhing on the Coaſts, which afford plenty of all ſorts of Fiſh. The creeping Ozier, conſiſting of long Shoots, reſembling twiſted Cords, whereof the Chineſe make an infinite Number of pretty Works *, grows every where in the Diſtrict of this City; which has ſubordinate to it three Cities of the third Rank.

* See before, p. 113.

The Tenth City, Kyun-chew-fu (A), Capital of the Iſland of Hay-nan.

HAY-NAN, which ſignifies South of the Sea, is a great Iſland, having to the North, the Province of Quang-tong (B), whereto it belongs, which may be ſeen diſtinctly when the Sky is clear; on the South, the Channel form'd by the Bank of Paracel, with the Eaſtern Coaſt of Cochin china; on the Weſt, part of the ſame Kingdom, and that of Tong-king; and on the Eaſt, the Sea of China.

Its greateſt Length from Eaſt to Weſt is between ſixty and ſeventy Leagues, and its Breadth from North to South, between forty and fifty; ſo that it is near a hundred and ſixty Leagues in Circumference.

Soil.

On the North ſide, the Country is plain for fifteen Leagues from the Coaſt; but on the South and Eaſt ſide, it is covered with very high Mountains. It is only between theſe Mountains, and thoſe which poſſeſs the middle part of the Iſle, that one meets with cultivated Plains; and even theſe Plains, altho' they contain but a very ſmall Portion of the Land, are alſo in many Places ſandy and uncultivated. However the great Number of Rivers, and frequent Rains that follow the Change of Seaſons, render the Rice Fields fertile enough; and as they have often two Harveſts a Year, the Produce ſuffices for the Inhabitants, tho' pretty numerous.

Air unwholeſome.

The Climate of the Southern part is very unwholeſome, eſpecially on account of the Water, which according to the Chineſe is noxious; wherefore they take Care to boil every Morning a Quantity that may ſerve for the whole Day.

Kyun-chew-fu.

Kyun-chew-fu, the Capital of Hay-nan, is ſituate on a Promontory; and Ships come to Anchor under its very Walls. Two ſorts of Mandarins command here, as in all other Parts of China, viz. Literary Mandarins, and Military Mandarins, or Officers of War. It has under its Juriſdiction three Cities of the ſecond, and ten of the third Rank, which are almoſt all on the Sea Coaſt.

Li-mû-ſhan, or Chi-ſhan, inhabited by an independent People.

The greater Part of the Iſland is ſubject to the Emperor of China; none but the Country in the middle, named Li-mû-ſhan or Chi-ſhan being independent. It is inhabited by a free People, who have never yet been conquered, or acknowledged the Authority of the Mandarins; being obliged to abandon the plain Country to the Chineſe, they have retreated to the Mountains in the Center of the Iſland, where they are ſhelter'd from all their Inſults.

Theſe People had formerly an open Correſpondence with the Chineſe: Twice a Year they expoſed to Sale the Gold, which they dug out of their Mines, and their Eagle and Calamba Wood, ſo much eſteem'd by all the Eaſtern People. One deputed by them was ſent to examine the Chineſe Linens and Wares on the Frontiers, while the Principal among the Chineſe Merchants repair'd to the Mountains to view their Commodities; the Bargain being made, the Chineſe Goods were firſt carried thither, after which they faithfully deliver'd them the Things they had agreed for; by this Traffic the Chineſe made an immenſe Gain, whereof the Governor had the greater part.

The Emperor Kang-hi, being informed of the prodigious Quantity of Gold which his Mandarins acquired by this Commerce, for that and other Reaſons, forbid all his Subjects, under Pain of Death, to have any Correſpondence with theſe People. However, ſome ſecret Emiſſaries of the neighbouring Governors, ſtill find means of getting to them by Stealth; but the Profits ariſing from this clandeſtine Trade, for theſe thirty Years paſt, are very inconſiderable to what they uſed to be.

(A) In the Geographical Table as well as the Text, it is written Kiun; but in the Map, Kiong, which according to our way of ſpelling will be Kyong-chew-fu.

(B) The French has, thro' ſome Miſtake, Quang-ſi.

Prov. XII. Quang-tong.

These Islanders therefore scarce ever appear, unless when they are moved, either by Caprice, or the Remembrance of their ancient Liberty, to invade the neighbouring Chinese Villages. They have now and then attempted to surprize some of them; but are such Cowards, and so badly disciplined, that fifty Chinese, tho' far from being good Soldiers, would defeat 1000 of them, their very Looks being enough to put them to flight. Nevertheless there are other Islanders more tractable, who, paying Tribute to the Emperor, are suffered to possess several entire Villages in the Plains, because they hold no Correspondence with those of the Mountains. Many others put themselves into the Service of the Chinese, keep their Sheep, till their Lands, and are subject to the common Days-Work, appointed by the Governors of the different Places; these are dispersed thro' the Plain in the East and South part of the Island; and generally speaking are very deform'd, short, and of a reddish Colour.

Habit. Both Men and Women wear their Hair in a Ring on the Forehead, and on their Heads a Hat made of Straw or Rattan, tied under the Chin with two Strings. Their Habit consists of a Piece of Callico, either black, or of a deep Blew, which covers them from the Waist to the Knees. The Women wear a kind of Waist-Coat of the same, and are farther distinguish'd by blue Streaks on their Faces, made with Indigo, from their Eyes downwards. Both Sexes wear Gold and Silver Ear-Rings, shap'd like a Pear, and very well made.

Arms. Their Arms are Bows and Arrows, which they are not very expert at; and a kind of Hanger, which they carry in a little Basket, fasten'd to their Girdle behind. This is all the Tools they have for doing their Carpenters Work; and to cut Wood and Bushes, when they cross Forests.

Mines. Besides the Mines of Gold in the Heart of the Island, there are others in the North part, of the Lapis Armenus, which they carry to Kan-ton, and is used in painting all the blue Porcellain. The best Wood, both for Scent and Carving, comes from the Mountains of Hay-nan; from whence the present Emperor caused a Quantity to be brought, at a vast Expence, sufficient to build a Palace design'd for his Burying-Place.

Sweet Woods. The most precious of these Woods, next to the Eagle-Wood, is the Wha-li, call'd by Europeans, Rose or Violet Wood, on account of its Scent. There is also a yellow Wood, which is very beautiful and incorruptible; whereof Pillars of a certain Thickness, are of an immense Price, and reserved as well as the Wha-li for the Emperors Service.

Produce. This Island, besides the several kinds of Fruits found in China, produces much Sugar, Tobacco, and Cotton. Indigo is common here; to which if we add the Harvest of the Areca-Nut, the Crop of Rattan, with the different sorts of Fish taken on the Coasts, which are dry'd and salted for Exportation; nobody need wonder that twenty or thirty thousand pretty large Jonks should arrive here every Year from Kan-ton, or scruple to to rank Hay-nan among the most considerable Islands of Asia, on account of its Situation, Magnitude, and Riches.

Ports. The Port, where almost all the Barks of Kan-ton come, is in the North-side of the Island, and form'd by a pretty large River, whose Mouth is defended by two small Forts; but as it has not above ten or twelve Feet Water, Vessels, made after a different Manner from the Chinese, would find it difficult to enter. Trade brings thither all the Merchants in the Island, who have their Factors in other Parts. The Capital City stands about two Leagues from this Port; between them is a great Plain, full of beautiful Chinese Sepulchres, among which there is one with a Cross on it, where lies interred an Italian Jesuit, the first Missionary who landed on this Island.

On the Southern Coast, where the Company's Ships have put in, there is one of the best Ports to be met with, at the Bottom of a great Bay; where Vessels ride at Anchor in twenty Feet Water, within Pistol-shot of the Shore, and six Ships may continue, during both the Monsoons, in the greatest Security.

On the Shores of this Port grow several Maritime Plants and Mandrepores (c) of all kinds; also some Trees which yield Dragons Blood, and several others of different sorts; from which, an Incision being made, there distills a white Juice, that as it hardens, turns red; but is not of a Consistence like Gum or Rosin. This Matter cast into a Perfume Pot, burns slowly, and diffuses a Scent less strong, and more agreeable, than Incense.

There is found among the Rocks, at no great Depth of Water, a certain little blue Fish, which resembles the Dolphin more than the Dorado, and is in greater Esteem with the Chinese than the Golden Fish; but, unluckily, they live only a few Days out of their Element.

Tho' we cannot absolutely deny what is reported in Travellers, of a Lake in this Island, having the Virtue of petrifying whatever is thrown into it; yet there is great Reason to doubt it, because the Islanders know nothing of the Matter; that which may have given Occasion to this Opinion, is those counterfeit Petrifications, which the Chinese make to Perfection, and are very common at Kan-ton. They tell us also, that Pearls are found no where in such Abundance as on the Northern Coasts of this Island; but however true this might have been formerly, it it certain, that at present there is no such thing: Indeed some very small ones are gotten on the Coast of Quang-si, which are very dear; but the Pearls one meets with in China, come from the Indies.

Apes. Among the Animals, this Island breeds a curious kind of great black Apes, whose Physiognomy very nearly resembles the Human, so distinct are the Features; but this Species is scarce. There are others of a grey Colour, which are very ugly and common.

(c) The Mandrepore is a Sea Plant resembling White Coral.

Hay-nan abounds with Game; indeed the Partridges, Quails, and Hares are inferior to those of Europe, but Snipes, Teal, and all sorts of Water-Fowl are very good. There is a kind of Wood-Hen of an excellent Relish. Turtle-Doves are in great plenty, as well as two sorts of Wood-Pidgeons. Stags, and Maron-Hogs, which are a kind of wild Boars, are very common. PROV. XII. Quang-tong.

Here are also several sorts of curious Birds, as Ravens with white Rings about their Necks, like Cravats; Starlings, which have a little Moon on their Bills; Black-Birds of a deep blue Colour, with yellow Ears, half an Inch long, which speak and whistle in Perfection; little Birds, the Bigness of a Linnet, whose Feathers are of a most beautiful Red, and others of a very bright Gold Colour; which two sorts of Birds, tho' of different kinds are always together.

Considering the Islanders travel both by Day and Night thro' the Plains and thick Woods, without Arms, and almost always bare-foot, the Reptiles of Hay-nan cannot be dangerous; and tho' it breeds Serpents and Snakes of a monstrous size, yet they are so timorous, that the least Noise frights them away.

The Port of Ma-kau.

THIS Port is famous for the great Trade carry'd on by the Portuguese (who have been in Possession of it above a Century) when they were Masters of a considerable Part of the Indies; but now they have only a Fortress with a very small Garrison, being in no Condition to maintain many Soldiers. The Port of Ma-kau.

The City is built on a little Peninsula, or, if you will, a small Island, because it is separated from the Land by a River, which is enlarged by the Tides. It is join'd to the rest of the Island by a very narrow Isthmus, across which they have built a Wall.

Those who are at Anchor without, see nothing on all hands but Isles, which form a great Circle; with two or three Fortresses on the Eminences, and some Houses at the end of the Town. These Houses and Fortresses seem to be built on a very high Land, bounding the View on that side; but between this Land, (which indeed is a pretty large Island) and Ma-kau, there is a safe and commodious Port, along whose Shores the City extends.

The Houses are built after the European Fashion, but somewhat low. The Chinese are more numerous than the Portuguese, who are almost all Mongrels, born in the Indies or at Ma-kau, and not being very rich, are in no Esteem with the Chinese.

The Fortifications belonging to Ma-kau are pretty good, and well provided with Cannon; but the Garrison is very weak, and as the Chinese supply it with all Necessaries, they are at no Pains become Masters of it.

There is in the Place a Portuguese Governor, and a Chinese Mandarin, on whom the whole Country depends; his Palace stands in the middle of the City, and whatever he would have done, the Portuguese must obey, especially where the Interest of the Chinese is concern'd.

The Portuguese obtain'd this Settlement in the following Manner: During the Reign of Hong-chi the Europeans traded either at Kan-ton, or Ning-po, in the Province of Che-kyang; but in the time of Kya-tsing, a Pirate named Chang-si-lau, who infested the Seas of Kan-ton, having seiz'd Ma-kau, and besieg'd the Capital of the Province; the Mandarins desir'd the Assistance of the Europeans on Board the Merchantmen, who oblig'd the Pirate to raise the Siege, and pursuing him to Makau, slew him there. The Emperor being inform'd of this Victory, by the Tsong-tu, publish'd a Decree, whereby he gave Ma-kau to those European Merchants, in order to settle there.

The Island of Shang-chwen-shan, or Sançian.

THE Death of S. Francis Xavier, the Apostle of the Indies, and his Tomb, which is still to be seen in this Island, have render'd it remarkable. The Tomb stands on an Eminence at the Foot of a Hill; beside it is a little Plain, cover'd on one side with Trees, and adorn'd on the other with several Gardens. The Island of Shan-chwen-shan, or Sançian.

The Island is not desart, as is reported; for there are five Villages in it, inhabited by poor Fishermen, who live on the Fish they take, and a little Rice which they sow. Here is a Chappel built by the Portuguese Jesuits, about thirty Years ago; it is only of Plaister, but looks very pretty, the Chinese having japan'd it over with red and blue Varnish.

PROVINCE XIII. QUANG-SI.

THIS Province is situate between those of Quang-tong, Quey-chew, Yun-nan, and the Kingdom of Tong-king. It contains twelve Cities of the first Rank, and four-score of the second and third. It produces such plenty of Rice, that for six Months of the Year it furnishes the Province of Quang-tong, which otherwise would not be able to support its numerous Inhabitants. PROV. XIII. Quang-si.

Notwith-

Prov. XIII. Quang-si.

Notwithstanding which it is not to be compared to most of the other Provinces, either for Extent, Beauty, or Trade. Altho' it is water'd by many Rivers, yet only the Parts towards the East and South, are well improv'd, being a flat Country and the Air mild; almost every where else, especially towards the North, it is incumber'd with Mountains cover'd with thick Forests.

Mines of Gold, Silver, &c.

There are in this Province Mines of all sorts of Metals, especially Gold and Silver; which the Chinese out of Policy have always prohibited to be open'd, for fear of occasioning Disturbances. A certain Chain of Mountains having been known, for a long time past, to contain Mines of Gold, Silver, Tin, Copper, and Lead; some Years ago the Governor of a City of the first Rank, in whose District they are, presented a Memorial to the Emperor, wherein he shew'd how to prevent Inconveniences. Among the rest, he observ'd that the Inhabitants offer'd to open them at their own Expence; and proposed that none, either of this or the neighbouring Provinces, should be permitted to work at them, without a Patent from his Mandarin, besides four Persons Security for his Conduct.

The Emperor having sent this Memorial to be examin'd by the Hû-pû, that Court, which superintends the Revenues, approv'd of it, conditionally that, according to what is practised on like Occasions, the Undertakers should give forty per Cent to the Emperor, and five per Cent to the Officers and Soldiers, who presided over the Work. Afterwards the Emperor reserv'd the Gold Mine wholy to himself, and work'd it at his own Expence. There is in this Province a pretty extraordinary Tree, which instead of Pith contains a soft Substance, that serves for Meal, and does not taste amiss. Here are abundance of those Insects, spoken of before, which produce the white Wax. The Cinnamon that grows here, diffuses a more agreeable Odour, than that of the Island of Ceylan (D), and the Silks that are made, bear a good Price; in short, this Country breeds Parrots, Porcupines, and Rhinoceroses.

Plant produces Meal.

Insects that make white Wax.

The First City, Quey-ling-fu, Capital of the Province.

Quey-ling-fû.

THIS City stands on a River (E) that falls into the Ta-ho; and runs with such Rapidity thro' the narrow Valleys, that, tho' it is large, it is not navigable, or of any use for Trade.

The City is remarbable for being built partly after the Manner of our antient Fortifications; but is much inferior to most of the other Capitals.

Etymol. of Quey-ling.

Quey-ling signifies the Forest of the Flowers of Quey; because the Flower call'd Quey, tho' pretty common throughout China, is more plenty in this Province, and especially in the Territory of this City, than elsewhere.

The Flower Quey.

The Tree which produces it, is very large, with Leaves resembling those of the Lawrel; it is little, yellow, and grows in Bunches; it does not remain long on the Tree, and when it falls, another comes in its Place. In Autumn the Tree is cover'd over with these Flowers, whose agreeable Smell perfumes the whole Country.

Best Stones for making Ink.

In this District are found the best Stones which the Literati use to make their Ink of; and Birds whose Feathers are variegated with very bright Colours, and woven in their Silks.

Quey-ling has under its Jurisdiction only two Cities of the second, and seven of the third Rank. It is almost wholly encompassed with savage and barbarous People, who are settled in the Mountains. I have already given an account of them, distinguishing those who are subject to the Chinese Mandarins, from those who live in a State of Independency.

The Second City, Lyew-chew-fu.

Lyew chew-fû.

THE Territory of this City is of great Extent, and well water'd, but full of Mountains, which however abound with Simples, much used by the Physicians. Two Cities of the second, and ten of the third Rank depend on it.

Vû-fwen-lyen.

Among these latter, Vû-fwen-lyen is famous on account of the lively and subtil Wit of its Inhabitants. There is scarce an Examination at Pe-king for the Degree of Doctor, but several Literati of this City obtain it, who are afterwards employ'd in some of the Governments or Magistracies.

The Third City, Kin-ywen-fu. (F)

Kin ywen-fû.

THO' this City is built on a large River, yet it is not the more agreeable; for besides being encompassed with frightful Mountains, those of Quey-chew, which are inaccessible, and inhabited by People who are half Savage, are in its Neighbourhood.

The Valleys lying between these frightful Mountains are interspersed with Villages and Forts. Gold is gather'd out of its Rivers, and the Areka is found every where. Two Cities of the second, and five of the third Rank depend on its Jurisdiction.

(D) More properly Seylan, or Selan with an S.
(F) Here the Name agrees with the Map, but in both the Tables it is spelled, King ywen fû.

The

Prov. XIII. Quang-si.

The Fourth City, Se-nghen fu.

Se-nghen-fu.

THE District of this City is of no great Extent, containing only one City of the second Rank, and two of the third. It is encompassed with Mountains, whose Inhabitants, who were formerly rude, and half Barbarians, but have become civiliz'd by Degrees, since they were incorporated with the Empire.

The Fifth City, Ping-lo-fu.

Ping-lo-fu.

THIS City stands on a River, which, tho' large, is hardly navigable. It runs among very narrow Valleys, interspersed with Rocks, which makes it full of Water-Falls. Its Jurisdiction contains one City of the second, and seven of the third Rank.

All these Cities are inviron'd with Mountains, which render the Country disagreeable; some of them however are cover'd with Orange-Trees; abundance of that white Wax, made by certain Insects, is found here, whereof I have spoken more than once already.

The Sixth City, U-chew-fu.

U-chew-fu.

ALL the Rivers of the Province meet near this City, which borders on Quang-tong; whence it is look'd on as the most considerable for Trade, and of greatest Importance, because it is the Key of that Province. Its District comprizes one City of the second, and nine of the third Rank.

Cinnabar. Tree producing Meal.

The Country is partly plain, and partly mountainous. It produces Red Lead, and a remarkable Tree, nam'd Quang-lang; which instead of Pith contains a soft Substance, employ'd to the same Use as Meal, and of no disagreeable Taste.

Rhinoceros.

Besides the common Animals of China, one meets here with the Rhinoceros; and a kind of Apes, with yellow Hair, which by their Shape, and Shrilness of their Yell, have a great Resemblance of Dogs.

The Seventh City, Sin-chew-fu. (A)

Sin-chew-fu.

THIS City stands at the Confluence of two Rivers, in an agreeable Country, if compar'd with the rest of the Province. The Forests and Mountains, wherewith it is incompassed, have something inexpressibly gay and smiling, especially to such as come from those steep Mountains, on the Spot which strike the Eye with nothing but what is frightful and melancholy.

The Country produces a sort of Cinnamon, much inferior to that of Ceylan, in Goodness and Smell; also those Trees, whose Wood is so hard that it has the Name of Iron-Wood. They make Cloth of a certain Grass, which sometimes bears a greater Price, than the common Silks. A kind of yellow Earth is found here, which they say is a sovereign Remedy against all sorts of Poison. The District of this City is not considerable, containing no more than three Cities of the third Rank.

The Eighth City, Nan-ning-fu.

Nan-ning-fu.

THE Place where this City stands, is almost surrounded with Rivers, and little Lakes. Four Cities of the second, and three of the third Rank are within its District, which is intermixt with Plains and Mountains.

Great Parrots are found here, that are easily taught to speak; also a kind of Fowl, which discharges out of its Mouth Threads of Cotton; and very large Porcupines, which dart very long and sharp Quills at those who approach them. Some of its Mountains produce Iron Mines.

The Ninth City, Tay-ping-fu.

Tay-ping-fu.

THIS City is situate in an Elbow made by a large River, by which it is inclosed on three sides, and fortify'd on the fourth by a Wall running from one Branch of that River to the other.

The Country depending on it is the best in the whole Province. The Soil is fertile, very populous, and well cultivated. It contains a great Number of Forts, as bordering on the Kingdom of Tong-king.

The Inhabitants are look'd on as Barbarians by the Chinese, because they have not much Politeness, and shew a Roughness in their Behaviour, very different from the Chinese Affability. The District of this City contains twelve Cities of the second, and two of the third Rank.

Prov XIII. Quang-si.

The Tenth City, Se-ming-fu. (B)

Se-ming-fu.

STANDS also near the Borders of Tong-king, in a mountainous Country, and not far from the Pillar, which the Tong-kingese have erected to serve for the Limits of their Kingdom, as I have elsewhere remark'd. Its Mountains furnish abundance of Wood, and its District contains only four Cities of the second Rank.

The Country produces all the Necessaries of Life, but the Inhabitants are not near so polite as those of other Parts of the Empire.

The Eleventh City, Chin-ngan-fu.

Chin-ngan-fu.

AS great Part of the District of this City depends on Tong-king, it contains only one City of the second Rank. It was formerly no more than a pitiful Borough, which was afterwards inlarg'd, and inclosed with Walls, in order to make it a City of the first Rank.

The Manners of its Inhabitants does not differ much from those of the Chinese. The Country produces all the Necessaries of Life, and among the rest much Honey and Wax.

The Twelfth City, Se-chin-fu. (C)

Se-chin-fu.

THE District of this City is inconsiderable, containing only two Cities of the second Rank. It is situate almost at the Spring of two little Rivers, which meet near its Walls. The Country is partly plain, partly mountainous. It borders on Yun-nan, and is full of populous Boroughs.

PROVINCE XIV. YUN-NAN.

Prov. XIV. Yun-nan. Bounds.

THIS Province, being one of the richest of the Empire, is bounded on one side by the Provinces of Se-chwen, Quey-chew, and Quang-si; and on the other by Tibet, some savage Nations little known, and the Kingdoms of Ava, Pegu, Laos, and Tong-king. It contains twenty one Cities of the first Rank, and fifty five of the second and third. It is water'd every where by Rivers, whereof several take their Rise from considerable Lakes, which are in the Province, and render it very fruitful.

Gold Sand.

All sorts of Necessaries are very cheap here. The Gold alone that is gathered out of the Sand of the Rivers and Torrents, which descend from the Mountains situate in the Western part of the Province, amounts to a considerable Sum; whence it may be judged that those Mountains contain Gold-Mines, which would produce immense Riches, were they suffer'd to be open'd.

Mines of white Copper. Red Amber, precious Stones, Frankincense and Marble.

Besides the Mines of common Copper, found also in some other Provinces, there are some of a singular kind, named Pe-tong, which is white, both within and without. It produces red Amber, but no yellow; in a word, Rubies, Saphirs, Agats, Pearls, precious Stones, Musk, Silk, Benjamin, a sort of Frankincense, which is much esteem'd, Lapis Armenus, and very beautiful Marble. Some of this Marble, which is of divers Colours, naturally represents Mountains, Flowers, Trees and Rivers, whereof they make Tables and other Ornaments; some think that the Rubies, and other precious Stones, are brought hither from the Kingdom of Ava.

Among the Animals, one meets with excellent Horses, most of them low but strong and vigorous; Stags of a peculiar kind, which are neither taller nor thicker than our ordinary Dogs. The Lords keep them in their Gardens for their Diversion. The Birds, call'd Kin-ki or Golden-Hens, are also found here, which I have described elsewhere.

The People are very strong and courageous; besides they are of a mild affable Temper, and fit for the Study of the Sciences.

The First City, Yun-nan-fu, the Capital of the Province.

Yun-nan-fu.

THIS City has no navigable River, but is built on the side of a large and deep Lake, or to speak in the Language of the Country, on the Coast of the South Sea. It is not many Years since it it was remarkable for its Beauty. Within its Walls, which are three Miles in Compass, it was full of handsome Buildings, and without, adorn'd with pleasant Gardens, two or three of which are still to be seen.

Long. from Pe-king 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11

A Chineſe Prince formerly kept his Court here; the Tartars becoming Maſters of China they gave him the Inveſtiture thereof with the Title of King; but that Prince (D) being weary of the Yoke, and having taken up Arms againſt the Emperor, in 1679, his Family was ruin'd, and dying a while after of old Age, his Troops were of a ſudden diſperſed.

The Trade for Metals is greater here than in any other Province. They make a particular ſort of Silk, named Tong-hay-twan-tſe, that is, the Satin of the Eaſtern Sea, without knowing the Occaſion of this Name. It is made of twiſted Silk, is not flower'd, and without any Gloſs. They dye it of all ſorts of Colours, as they do the Twan-tſe, or common Satin; but it appears neither bright nor lively; they alſo make very good Carpets.

After all, Yun-nan, at preſent, has more Reputation than Wealth; the Shops are but indifferently furniſh'd, the Dealers poor, the Buildings mean, and the Concourſe of People not very great, if compared with what is ſeen in moſt of the other Capitals of Provinces.

In this City the Tſong-tû, or Governor-General of the Provinces of Yun-nan and Quey-chew, reſides, as alſo the Vice-Roy of the Province. Its Diſtrict contains four Cities of the ſecond, and ſeven of the third Rank.

The whole Country is agreeable and fertile, conſiſting partly in little Hils, and partly in large Plains. The Waters are very good, the Climate temperate, and the Canals give an eaſy Admittance to Veſſels.

The Inhabitants are indued with Wit and Courage, and have always been addicted to Arms, or Agriculture. The Horſes that are bred there are ſmall, but hardy and ſtrong. It produces Lapis Armenus and fine Marble. The Trees call'd Roſe-Wood, are alſo found here.

The Second City, Ta-li-fu.

Ta-li-fû.

THIS City, like the Capital, ſtands on a Lake, which is very long, and abounds with all ſorts of Fiſh. It is large, and very populous; the Climate is mild, and the Soil fertile, ſo that it is a very pleaſant Place to live in.

It is here principally thoſe fair Tables and other Ornaments are made of that moſt beautiful Marble, dug out of the Mountain Tyen-ſung; and which is naturally variegated with ſo many different Colours, that one would think the Mountains, Flowers, Trees, and Rivers repreſented thereon were drawn by a ſkillful Painter.

Ta-li has under its Juriſdiction, four Cities of the ſecond, and three of the third Rank.

The Third City, Ling-ngan-fu. (E)

Ling-ngan-fû.

THE whole Country, that belongs to this City, containing four Cities of the ſecond Rank, and five of the third, conſiſts either of Plains, little Hills, and Mountains, which afford no diſagreeable Proſpect; it is water'd by pretty large Lakes, and ſeveral Rivers, that render it fertile, eſpecially in Rice and Wheat. It produces alſo plenty of Honey and Wax, as well as moſt of the Fruits found in the Indies.

The Fourth City, Chu-hyung-fu. (F)

Chû-kyung-fû.

THIS City ſtands in the Heart of the Province, and a very beautiful Country, water'd with ſeveral Rivers, and incloſed on all ſides with fine Mountains, which ſerve inſtead of Bulwarks. The Air is healthful, and the Soil produces plenty of all ſorts of Grain. It abounds alſo with good Paſtures.

The Mountains yield the Lapis Armenus, and a fine green Stone; ſo do ſome of them Silver Mines in Caſe they were open'd. It has but two Cities of the ſecond Rank under its Juriſdiction.

The Fifth City, Chin-kyang-fu.

Chin-kyang-fû

NOTHING can be more agreeable than the Situation of this City. It ſtands on the ſide of a great Lake which lies to the South, and in a Plain encompaſſed with Mountains, which are at a proper Diſtance to render the Proſpect agreeable. Its Diſtrict is of no great Extent, containing no more than two Cities of the ſecond, and two of the third Rank; but it is water'd by Lakes and Rivers that make it fertile, and abound with excellent Fiſh. The Inhabitants make Cotton Carpets, which are much eſteem'd.

The Sixth City, King-tong-fu.

King-tong-fû.

THE Country, where this City ſtands, is full of very high Mountains, which they ſay contain Silver Mines. It abounds with Rice, and its Valleys are well water'd with Brooks and Rivers. Altho' it enjoys the Rank of Fû, there is no other City in its Diſtrict.

(D) This was the famous U-ſan-ghey, who call'd in the Tartars to ſuppreſs the Rebels.

PROV. XIV. Yun-nan.

On the West of it is one of those Bridges, which I have described elsewhere, supported by Iron Chains. The Sight of the Precipices, and Agitation of the Bridge, when many Passengers are on it at once, never fail to terrify those who have not passed it before.

The Seventh City, Quan-nan-fu.

Quan-nan-fu.

THIS City, as well as the former, has no other within its District. It stands on the Borders of the Province of Quey-chew, and is separated, as it were, from the rest of the Province by frightful Mountains. Its Soil is fertile, but the Inhabitants are consider'd by the Chinese as Barbarians, on account of the Rudeness of their Behaviour.

The Eighth City, Quang-si-fu.

Quang-si-fu.

THIS City stands in a little Plain, and on the Side of a Lake. It is quite surrounded with Mountains, and has under it only two Cities of the third Rank, without any thing farther, worthy Remark.

The Ninth City, Shun-ning-fu,

Shun-ning-fu.

IS a very small City, not above a Mile and an half in Compass, surrounded with Mountains, so that the Avenues to it are thro' very narrow Valleys. The Soil is almost every where barren, and the Genius as well as Manners of the Natives as rude as the Climate they inhabit.

The Tenth City, Ku-tsing-fu. (G)

Ku-tsing-fu.

ALTHO' this City is surrounded with Mountains, yet the Country about it is fruitful enough. It commands over five Cities of the second, and two of the third Rank. Their Inhabitants are very laborious, and do not leave an Inch of Land unimprov'd; but they are so litigious, that they spend the best Part of their Effects at Law.

The Eleventh City, Yau-ngan-fu. (H)

Yau-ngan-fu.

THE Territory of this City is sufficiently large, altho' it has but two Cities, one of the second, and the other of the third Rank under its Jurisdiction. It is intermixt with fertile Valleys and Mountains, cover'd with fine Forests. It furnishes abundance of Musk.

Near the City is a Well of salt Water, whereof they make very white Salt. The People of this Country are of a strong Constitution, and naturally warlike.

The Twelfth City, Ko-king-fu.

Ko-king-fu.

THIS City, which is encompassed with Mountains, has no more than one City of the second Rank in its District, which is situate on a Lake, six Leagues in Compass. Its Inhabitants are couragious and brave. They usually go arm'd with Bows and Arrows.

The Country produces Musk and Pine-Apples. Very beautiful Carpets are made here. It is said there are Gold Mines in its Mountains, bordering on the Country of the Si-fan, or Territories of the Lamas.

The Thirteenth City, Vu-ting-fu. (I)

Vu-ting-fu.

THIS City is situate on the Borders of the Province of Se-chwen, in a rich and fertile Soil, water'd with Brooks and Rivers that produce great plenty. It has a pretty large Garrison to defend the Country against any Incursions of the neighbouring Mountaineers.

The Land is well cultivated, and its Pastures are stock'd with numerous Flocks. A great deal of Musk also comes from hence. Some of its Mountains are rugged and steep, and the Passages over them so narrow, that only one Man at a time can clamber up. In time of War the Inhabitants retire to them as inaccessible Holds. It has in its District only two Cities of the second Rank, and one of the third.

The Fourteenth City, Li-kyang-tu-fu. (K)

Li-kyang-tû-fû.

IT is said the Inhabitants of this City and the Territory belonging to it, are descended from the ancient Colonies of the Chinese, who came and settled here. It has no City depending on it, and is surrounded by Mountains, which separate it from the Dominions of the Lamas, wherein no doubt are Gold Mines. The whole Country is well water'd and fertile, yielding Amber and Pine-Apples.

CITIES OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEY-CHEW

J. Basire Sculp.

The Fifteenth City, Ywen-kyang-fu

Prov. XIV. Yun-nan. Ywen-kyang-fû.

STANDS on a pretty large River, call'd Ho-li-kyang, and has no City under its Jurisdiction. The Country consists of Mountains, and Plains water'd by several Rivers. It furnishes Abundance of Silk; produces plenty of Ebony, Palm-Trees, and Areka, which the Inhabitants chew with Betel Leaf. Peacocks are very numerous here.

The Sixteenth City, Mong-wha-fu.

THIS is one of those Cities which has no Jurisdiction over others; it is surrounded with high Mountains, and is remarkable in that there is no Country in the whole Empire, which furnishes so great a Quantity of Musk. Mong-wha-fû.

The Seventeenth City, Yung-chang-fu. (A)

THIS City is pretty large and populous, built like the former, in the midst of Mountains, near an Extremity of the Province, and in the Neighbourhood of People, who are savage, and little known; the Disposition and Manners of the Inhabitants partake of those of their Neighbours. The Country furnishes Gold, Honey, Wax, Amber, and abundance of good Silk. One City of the second, and two of the third Rank are under its Jurisdiction. Yung-chang-fû.

The Eighteenth City, Yungning-tu-fu.

THIS City is situate at the end of the Province, almost touching the Dominions of the Lamas. There is a fine Lake on the East-side of it, with four little Isles in it, which appear above Water in pretty Eminencies. It has no other City under its Jurisdiction. Yung-ning-tû-fû.

Here, as well as in Tibet, Numbers of that sort of Cows are to be met with, whose Tails serve for several Uses. They make Stuffs of them, that are Proof against Rain, and Carpets much esteem'd. The Chinese Officers employ them also in adorning their Standards and Helmets.

The Nineteenth City, Yung-pe-fu.

ALTHO' this City stands amidst Mountains, its Territory is not the less fertile; having large Plains, watered partly by a fine Lake, partly by divers Brooks and pretty big Rivers, but has no City depending on it. Yung-pe-fû.

The Twentieth City, Kay-wha-fu. (B)

THIS City is considerable for nothing but that it borders on Tong-king, and is one of the Keys of the Province on that side. It stands in a Country, intermixt with fertile Valleys and high Mountains. It has no Jurisdiction or City depending on it. Kay-wha-fû.

The Twenty First City, San ta-fu. (C)

THIS last City, which stands on the Borders of the Kingdom of Ava, is properly a Fortress to defend the Frontiers. The whole Country is full of Mountains, which serve it for a Bulwark; and the Valleys are water'd with Rivers, that render the Soil fertile. San-ta-fû.

PROVINCE XV. QUEY-CHEW.

THIS Province, which is one of the smallest in the Empire, is situated between those of Hû-quang, Se-chwen, Yun-nan, and Quang-si. It contains ten Cities of the first Rank, and thirty eight of the second and third. Prov. XV. Quey-chew.

It is full of inaccessible Mountains, whence one Part of it is inhabited by People, who never were subdued, but are perfectly independant, as I have shewn at the Beginning of this Work. [p. 32] Bounds, and Situation.

(A) The first Syllable in the Name of this City, and the following, is spell'd Yong in the second Table of Latitude and Longitude at the End of the Work.

(B) In the same Table it is Que-wha-fû.

(C) This City, as well as Yung-ning-tu-fu, is omitted in the first Table, p. 6.

Prov. XV Quey-chew.

The Emperors, in order to people this Province, have often ſent Colonies hither, and even ſometimes Governors with their whole Families.

It contains abundance of Forts, and Military Places, where numerous Garriſons are kept; but the Tribute which the Province pays, not being ſufficient to maintain them, the Court is oblig'd to make up that Defect by ſending them Supplies every Year.

The Mountains afford Mines of Gold, Silver, and Mercury; alſo part of the Copper, whereof the ſmall Money, current thro' the Empire, is made, comes from hence.

Among theſe Mountains one meets with agreeable and fertile Valleys, eſpecially near the Rivers. Proviſions are cheap, but not in ſuch Plenty as elſewhere, or as they might be, if the Land was better cultivated.

They have no Manufactures for Silks in this Province, but they make Stuffs of a certain Herb, which reſembles Hemp, very fit for Summer-wear.

The Inhabitants breed a great Number of Cows, Hogs, and the beſt Horſes in all China; the wild Fowl, whereof one meets with infinite Quantities, have an excellent Taſte.

The Firſt City, Quey-yang-fu, (D) Capital of the Province.

Quey-yang-fu.

THIS City, which is one of the ſmalleſt in China, is not three Miles in Compaſs. Its Houſes are built partly of Earth and partly of Brick, like thoſe belonging to the Tribunals. The River whereon it ſtands, bears no Boats, whence it has but little Trade; But its Juriſdiction extends over three Cities of the ſecond, and four of the third Rank, beſides abundance of Forts, wherewith it is, as it were, ſurrounded. The Country is plain in ſome parts, and in others full of Mountains, ſome of which are very ſteep.

The Second City, Se-chew-fu. (E)

Se-chew-fu.

SE-CHEW, ſituate at the Extremity of the Province towards Hû-quang, has only ſome Forts under its Juriſdiction. The Country is full of Mountains, and furniſhes Red-Lead, Quickſilver, and divers other Metals.

Its Inhabitans, tho' more civilized than the reſt of the People of the ſame Province, are perfectly ignorant of the Chineſe Sciences. They go ordinarily barefooted, and are ſo inured to Fatigue that they travel over the Rocks with a ſurprizing Swiftneſs.

The Third City, Se-nan-fu.

Se-nan-fu.

THIS City, which ſtands on a fine River, and in a long Plain, has in its Diſtrict three Cities of the third Rank, and ſeveral Forts. It is bounded on both ſides by Mountains, ſome whereof are inacceſſible, there being but one narrow Way to get up any of them.

In time of War, the Inhabitants retire to theſe Mountains with their Effects, to prevent being plunder'd by the Soldiers, who paſs thro' their Country. There alſo a ſavage People hide themſelves, who have ſcarce any Correſpondence with the Chineſe.

The Fourth City, Chin-ywen-fu. (F)

Chin-ywen-fu.

THE Diſtrict of this City is very ſmall, compriſing only ſome Forts, and two Cities of the third Rank; but produces Pomegranates, Oranges, and the beautifulleſt Flowers in all China.

Some of its Mountains are inhablted by People, who having little Communication with the Chineſe, are Booriſh, and next to Barbarians.

The Fifth City, She-tſyen-fu (G)

She-tſyen-fu.

IS ſituate between the two former Cities, and has but a very ſmall Juriſdiction, compriſing a few Forts, and one Town of the third Rank. The People who inhabit the Mountains are of a Diſpoſition and Character very different from that of the Chineſe; both Men and Women go bare-footed, and retain other Cuſtoms very foreign to the Chineſe Politeneſs. The Country yields abundance of Quick-ſilver.

(G) In the firſt Table, She-tſin fu.

The

PROV. XV. Queu-chew.

The Sixth City, Tong-jin-fu.

Tong-jin-fu.

THIS is one of the Frontier Cities towards the Province of Hû-quang. It has only one City (A) and a few Forts under its Jurisdiction. Much Gold is gathered here, nor are there wanting Mines of Copper. Conversing with the Chinese has in some Measure civilized the People, who were formerly cruel and savage.

The Seventh City, Ngan-shan-fu. (B)

Ngan-shan-fû.

THE Country which belongs to this City is full of Mountains, and contains three Cities of the second Order, with five of the third Rank; besides several garrison'd Forts to keep the People of the Neighbourhood in Awe, who live in a State of Independance in their Mountains. The Rivers that water the Valleys and Plains, would render the Country fruitful enough, were the People more industrious.

The Eighth City, Tu-yun-fu. (C)

Tû-yun-fû.

THE Jurisdiction of this City is of very small Extent, containing only two Cities of the second Rank, and as many of the third. It lies next the Mountains, inhabited by the Seng-myau-tsé, People, whom the Chinese were never able to reduce, and who have a Government of their own, as I have already related; it is separated from them only by a River, and certain very steep Mountains.

The Ninth City, Ping-ywen-fu. (D)

Ping-ywen-fû.

THE Country belonging to this City is, like the former, in the Neighbourhood of those wild independent People, who inhabit inaccessible Mountains. It comprizes no more than five Cities, one of the second, and two (E) of the third Rank. The Soil produces excellent Tea, and Oranges of all sorts, They make Cloth of a kind of raw Hemp, very different from that which grows in Europe.

The Tenth City, Wey-ning-fu. (F)

Wey-ning-fû.

THIS City stands on a fine Lake, and in the middle of a Plain, encompassed with high Mountains. It has under its Jurisdiction three Cities of the second Rank, and as many of the third, with several Forts, where there are Garrisons kept, for the Defence of the Country.

(A) By the First Table, p. 6 it appears, that this City is a Hyen, or of the third Rank.

(C) In the Map and first Table as here, but in the second Table Tu-ywen-fû.

(E) Here is a manifest Mistake, for the particular Numbers do not agree with the general; and the First Table makes four Hyen.

ANNALS

OF THE

CHINESE MONARCHS

OR,

A compendious HISTORY,

CONTAINING

The moſt remarkable Events under each REIGN, according to Chronological Order.

The INTRODUCTION.

I HAVE already obſerv'd, it is the common Opinion of thoſe who have endeavour'd to trace the Origin of this Empire, that the Poſterity of the Sons of Noah, ſpreading themſelves over the Eaſtern Parts of Aſia, arriv'd in China about two hundred Years after the Deluge, and ſettled in Shen-ſi. This Province, being thus peopled by the Heads of many conſiderable Families, who multiply'd greatly, new Colonies were ſent into thoſe of Ho-nan, Pe-che-li, and Shan-tong; which in time were united under one Sovereign, whoſe Dominion extended no farther Southward than the River Yang-tſe-kyang.

In the Reign of the Emperor Yu, new Diſcoveries were made Southward, whereof Maps were drawn by that Prince's Order. Thoſe Regions were then but thinly inhabited, nor did the People acknowledge the Emperor of China; but the ſucceeding Monarchs ſettling the Crown on their eldeſt Sons, gave thoſe Countries to their other Children, who went and planted them.

Thus ſeveral petty Kingdoms came to be eſtabliſh'd; and theſe new Inhabitants, being reduc'd inſenſibly to Obedience by ſage and able Sovereigns, learned by Degrees the moſt uſeful Arts and apply'd themſelves particularly to Agriculture; afterwards the Provinces, being united by the Policy or Force of the Emperors, form'd at length this vaſt Empire.

Hence we learn the Origin of thoſe Principalities, or little Kingdoms, (ſo often mention'd in the Annals) whoſe Sovereigns were always either the Sons or the Nephews of the Emperors. It was cuſtomary for the eldeſt, who was inveſted with the ſupreme Authority, to give a Province or Country to his younger Brothers, with Liberty of raiſing Taxes, in order to ſupport a Grandeur ſuitable to their Birth. In after-times certain Perſons were raiſed to the ſame Dignity, either on account of their extraordinary Merit, or for having done important Services. This Partition of the ſovereign Power, altho' dependant on that of the Emperor, has under weak Princes been the Source of infinite Diviſions and civil Wars, that have rent the Empire in Pieces.

All the beſt Chineſe Hiſtorians agree, that the Monarchy was founded by Fo-hi; ſo that whatever ſome Authors advance, who have endeavour'd to carry the Origin higher up, is manifeſtly groundleſs and fabulous. They agree alſo as to the Succeſſors of Fo-hi down to the Emperor Yau, which are ſix in Number, viz, Shin-nong, Whang-ti, &c. but as to the Time of Fo-hi, and the Duration of the Reigns of thoſe ſix Emperors, they confeſs it to be very uncertain

" uncertain, and their Chronology in that part defective. " Some alſo doubt whether the Em-
" perors, plac'd between Shin-nong and Whang-ti, ſucceeded one another; becauſe they might
" poſſibly have been no more than tributary Princes, or great Officers, who were contemporary." (A)

Chineſe Hiſtory certain from the Time of Yau.

However from the Reign of Yau, which began 2357 Years before Chriſt, their Hiſtory is very exact; there we find the Names of the Emperors, with the Length of their Reigns, and an account of the Troubles, Revolutions, and Interregnums that have happen'd, all ſet down very particularly, and with great Fidelity.

" Indeed there are Criticks who diſpute about the Duration of ſome of the Reigns and " Dynaſties, even ſince the Time of Yau. But I was not willing to enter into Diſcuſſions of " this Nature, which would have been tedious, and only ſerved to darken and confound the " Hiſtory; I have therefore, as to this Point, followed the Opinion of our ancient Miſſio-
" naries (B), who were beſt verſed in the Chineſe Learning, and moſt of thoſe who are ſtill
" living; ſeveral of whom give Place to none, either for diligently ſtudying, or well under-
" ſtanding the Books of that Nation. This in general may be ſaid in Behalf of the Chineſe
" Hiſtorians, that they appear to be ſincere, and regard nothing but the Truth; that they " do not ſeem to think the Glory of a Nation conſiſts in its Antiquity; and that they " have no Reaſons, like other Nations, on account of Intereſt, or Jealouſy of their Neigh" bours, to alter or falſify their Hiſtory; which is no more than a ſimple Recital of " the principal Events, proper for the Inſtruction and Imitation of Poſterity. It will be ſaid
" perhaps, that the Shu-king, which contains the Hiſtory of thoſe early Times, and the other Ca-
" nonical Books were deſtroy'd in the Reign of Shi-whang-ti, who ordered them to be burnt,
" under pain of Death; and that conſequently the Loſs of thoſe Monuments muſt render the " Hiſtory very uncertain. This would be a ſtrong Objection, in caſe thoſe Books, which " are in the heigheſt Eſteem with the Chineſe, had been all brought together, and burnt at " one time; but they were diſperſed thro' the Empire, and in the Hands of all the Learned.
" neither were all ſorts of Books proſcrib'd; among the reſt thoſe that treated of Phyſic were " excepted, and in picking them out, means was found of preſerving ſeveral Copies of the reſt.
" The Zeal of the Learned ſaved a good Number of them; Caves, Tombs, and Walls be" came Places of Refuge againſt the Perſecution. By degrees thoſe precious Monuments of " Antiquity were brought to light again; and at length reſtor'd without any Danger under the " Emperor Ven-ti, that is, about 54 Years after."

Sincerity of the Chineſe Hiſtorians.

Objection to the Certainty of the Chineſe Hiſtory.

All the learned Hiſtorians of China are ſo unanimouſly agreed (as to the Authority and Exactneſs of their Chronology, ſince the Time of Yau) that he who ſhould attempt to place the Origin of that Empire nearer our times, would be liable to be ſeverely puniſh'd, as the Broacher of an erroneous Doctrine. And indeed the Chineſe Chronology, as thus ſettled, deſerves intire Credit for the following Reaſons, viz.

Chineſe Chronology vindicated.

I. It is very coherent and circumſtantial.

II. It has not the Air of a Fiction, like that of the Greeks and Romans in the Beginning of their Hiſtories.

III. It is ſupported by ſeveral Obſervations of Eclipſes, which occur in the Courſe of the Hiſtory, and have been found to agree with the Calculations of ſeveral learned Aſtronomers of theſe Times. Nor needs there any other Proof than the Verification of the famous Eclipſe, which happen'd under the Emperor Chong-kang, who reign'd above two thouſand Years before Chriſt.

IV. All the Parts of the ancient Chineſe Hiſtory have been written by Authors, who were contemporary with the Emperors, whoſe Lives they have given us.

V. Confucius, whoſe Authority ought to be of very great Weight on account of his Probity and extraordinary Merit, never calls this Chronology in Queſtion; but on the contrary always ſuppoſes it to be true.

VI. Mencius, the moſt famous of the Chineſe Philoſophers after Confucius, and who liv'd about four hundred Years before the Chriſtian Æra, affirms; that from Shun, whom Yau aſſociated in the Empire, to the Emperor Ven-vang, there paſs'd a thouſand Years. This Authority of Mencius is unexceptionable among the Chineſe. Now from Ven-vang to the time of Chriſt, there are eleven hundred and odd Years, as it appears by the Hiſtory; the Certainty of which is confirm'd in proportion as it advances nearer the preſent Times.

VII. According to this Chronology, the Lives of the firſt Emperors of China correſpond, in reſpect to Length, with thoſe given by Scripture to Mankind in the ſame Ages.

It is true this Chronology appears too long to the Learned of Europe, who have an Intereſt in making it ſhorter; but how can they pretend to retrench the Times that incommode and weaken their Syſtem, without alledging plauſible Reaſons? And what Reaſons can they produce, ſufficient to perſuade the Chineſe to reject one part more than another of their Hiſtory; which runs on in an uninterrupted Series, and is no way inconſiſtent with itſelf from Beginning to End?

Beſides tho' it ſeems difficult to reconcile it with the Vulgat, it agrees very well with the Septuagint Verſion; which having been admitted in the Church for more than ſix Centuries, was approved of in the fifth [General] Council, in the ſame Manner as the Vulgat was approv'd in the Council of Trent. It is certain, that neither of theſe famous Aſſemblies have pretended

Its Agreement with that of the Septuagint.

(A) This Paſſage, and all the other command Part of this Introduction (or Advertiſement, as 'tis call'd in the French) are inſerted from the Preface, according to what is mentioned therein, P. 4. Note 1.

to eſtabliſh either one or other Chronology; on the other hand ſome learned Authors of late have adhered to that of the Septuagint, and found a way of reconciling it with the Vulgat, in reſpect to the Years that paſſed between the Deluge and the time of Chriſt. Thus we ſee that the Points of Chronology, that are or ought to be moſt certain, are conteſted every Day by the ableſt Men; and this Difference of Opinion, together with the Liberty that is allow'd of ſaying what one will within certain Bounds, has ſometimes embarraſſed the Miſſionaries in anſwering Queſtions put to them on this Subject. The late Emperor Kang-hi, perceiving this Diverſity in reading the Religious Books, written by different Miſſionaries, ſome of whom followed the Septuagint, others the Vulgat; How comes it, ſaid he, that your King are not clear? don't you affirm, that they contain nothing but what is ſure and indubitable? They did not want ſolid Anſwers ſufficient to ſatify an European; but what Effect could ſuch have on a Prince, who was but little acquainted with our Religion, and could not conceive how its Doctrines could be true, and its Chronology (B) falſe?

It is eaſy to demonſtrate, that the Chineſe Chronology agrees exactly with that of the Septuagint: for according to the Septuagint there are 3258 Years from the Deluge to Chriſt, and the Chineſe fix the Reign of Yau 2357 Years before Chriſt; whence it follows that from the Deluge to Yau there were above nine hundred Years. So that, ſuppoſing the Poſterity of Noah did not arrive in China for two or even three hundred Years after the Flood, there will remain Time more than ſufficient for the Reigns of Fo-hi, and the ſix Emperors who preceded Yau: for altho' the Chineſe conſider them as the Founders of their Empire, they acknowledge that they can fix neither the Times nor Duration of their Reigns; and that the Succeſſion of their Emperors, with the Length of their Reigns, is to be prov'd unexceptionably only ſince the Time of Yau.

It was not without good Reaſon that I ſaid it only ſeem'd difficult to reconcile the Chineſe Chronology with the Vulgat, ſince a late Writer of Note (C) has found the Interval between the Deluge and Chriſt to contain 3234 Years. And in thus reconciling the Vulgat with the Septuagint, he has of Courſe alſo reconcil'd it with the Chineſe Chronology; for when by adding an hundred Years to the Life of each of Shem's Deſcendants, he follows the Samaritan Text and Septuagint Verſion, he changes nothing in the Hebrew; ſince he only ſupplies what the ſacred Penman ſeems to have omitted deſignedly. (D)

The Place in Queſtion is the 11 Chap. of Geneſis. SHEM, ſays MOSES, v. 10. was an hundred Years old, and begot ARPHAXAD, two Years after the Flood; v. 11. and SHEM lived after he begot ARPHAXAD, five hundred Years, and begot Sons and Daughters; v. 12. and ARPHAXAD lived thirty five Years and begot SALAH.

As a Hundred is a Capital Number, and not accompany'd with an inferior one, when Moſes ſpeaks of Shem's Age at the Time he begot Arphaxad, nothing more can poſſibly be underſtood; but it is not ſo in the twelfth and following Verſes, where he ſpeaks of the Age of Arphaxad and his Poſterity, for there the inferior Numbers ſuppoſe the capital Numbers (which it was not neceſſary to repeat) to be underſtood; and this way of ſpeaking is cuſtomary. Thus when a Man after talking of one Event, which happen'd for Inſtance in the Year 1710, paſſes to another, and ſays it fell out in ſeven hundred and twenty or ſeven hundred and twenty two; every Body knows the capital Number thouſand is to be underſtood. In like manner, tho' according to the Strictneſs of the Letter, Arphaxad was but thirty five Years old, when he begot Salah, yet according to the Senſe of the Vulgat (E) he became a Father at the Age of one hundred and thirty five.

We have no Reaſon to ſuppoſe the ſame Omiſſion in the fifth Chapter of Geneſis, becauſe there the ſacred Text is clear, (F) and will not admit the ſame Conjecture, which the eleventh Chapter offers us, and ſerves admirably well, to reconcile ſacred with profane Hiſtory, as well as the Hebrew Text with the two others: one of which is venerable in primitive Chriſtianity, and the other cannot be ſuſpected of being alter'd. (G)

(B) This is the true Senſe of the Original, which literally render'd, is, And knew not how to ſeparate the Truth of its Doctrines from that of its Chronology.

(C) P. Tournemine.

(D) Doubtleſs the Years were either put originally as they are to denote the preciſe Years of the Patriarchs Ages, when they begat Children; or elſe were altered by the Jews, to ſerve ſome Turn; for what Deſign could the Penman have in omitting theſe Years, if they were neceſſary? Was it to confound and raiſe Scruples in his Readers? I don't wonder the Chineſe Emperor ſhould not be ſatisfy'd with ſuch quibbling, ſtupid Anſwers, however ſufficient they might be to ſatisfy the Majority of Europeans.

(E) This is not a parallel Caſe, nor indeed is it poſſible to find one that is. When we ſpeak of Events in a Chronological Series, the two Capital Numbers, which ſtand for thouſands and hundreds may be omitted; ſo we ſay the Year forty, ſixty ſix, eighty eight; having firſt mention'd the Century, and ſo on till we begin a new Century. This is done commonly, even in Writing; nor is it liable to any Miſtake, becauſe thoſe ſmaller Numbers of Years, or Diviſions of the Century have a neceſſary Reference to the Capital Numbers. But it is very different in ſpeaking of Actions referr'd to the Ages of Men, which are independent one of another, and unconnected with the Courſe of Time. Beſides, in ſpeaking of the Years of the Century, it is allow'd, that the Century itſelf muſt be previouſly mention'd; but here is no previous mention of the Age of Arphaxad, only that he was begotten by Shem, when he was a hundred Years old. Which hundred Years of Shem have no Relation to the Years of Salah's Age; and therefore can in no wiſe ſtand as part of them, or as a Number connectible with them.

(F) How is the ſacred Text more clear in one Place than the other? And why will not the fifth Chapter admit of the ſame way of Reaſoning? For may it not as well be inſiſted, that Enos begat Cainan, not at ninety Years of Age, as is in the Text, but at one hundred and ninety; becauſe Seth being one Hundred and five, when he begat Enos, the Capital Number, Hundred, has Reference to the Ages of all his Deſcendents, which are deſignated by inferior Numbers.

(G) There being an Oppoſition between the two, if the one cannot be ſuſpected of being alter'd, the other muſt be a Corruption (ſuppoſing the Hebrew to be genuine) however venerable it was in Primitive Times.

If we ſtick to the Letter, we ſhall run into almoſt inextricable Difficulties; for the Ages at which the Patriarchs had Children, were proportionable to the Length of their Lives. Is it credible that the firſt ſeven Patriarchs, next after the Deluge, who liv'd three or four hundred Years each, had Children at thirty Years of Age; and yet that the ſucceeding Patriarchs, who did not live half ſo long, had not theirs till they were ſixty or thereabout, Terah at 70, Abraham at 87, Iſaac at 60, Jacob at 84, &c.? Did Noah live to ſee nine Generations ſucceeding one another after the Flood? (F)

Beſides, if this Omiſſion be not allow'd in the Vulgat, there will be no more than 200 Years between the Deluge and the Building of Babel; whence it will follow that Noah, who according to the ſacred Text lived three hundred and fifty Years after the Flood, muſt have been Witneſs of ſo raſh an Attempt. Now is it likely that Noah and Shem, thoſe holy Patriarchs, for whom their Deſcendants had ſo great Veneration, would have ſuffer'd ſuch a preſumptuous and impious Enterprize? (G) Would not ſo exact a Writer as Moſes have told us what was become of Noah, and mention'd the Land where he lived at the time of the Diſperſion of Mankind?

When therefore we read in the twelfth and following Verſes that Arphaxad was thirty five Years old at the Birth of Salah, that Salah was thirty at the Birth of Heber, &c. it is reaſonable to believe the Senſe muſt be, that Arphaxad lived before the Birth of Salah thirty five Years more than Shem lived before the Birth of Arphaxad, which make one hundred and thirty five Years; and that the like muſt be underſtood with reſpect to the Ages of the ſucceeding Patriarchs, at the Birth of their firſt Child. (H)

The Author of this Syſtem ſupports his Diſſertation (I), (which has been approv'd of by Men of Learning in France (*), Italy (‡), and England (†),) by Authority and ſolid Reaſons, which it is not my Buſineſs to repeat here; it being ſufficient for my Purpoſe to ſhew, that in the Judgment of the learned Moderns, the Chineſe Chronology, and the Monuments produced in Confirmation of it, ought not to be rejected, as they have been by ſome, a little too raſhly. (K)

The Chronological Table lately publiſh'd conſider'd.

" I am ſenſible that a few Years ago a Chronological Table was publiſh'd (L), which began " no higher than the Reign of Lye Vang, that is, four hundred and twenty four Years before " Chriſt. It was compoſed by a Chineſe Lord who is ſtill living, and was Vice-Roy of Kai-ton (M), " when the Miſſionaries were baniſh'd thither; but that Lord, to my certain Knowledge, never " had, or aſſum'd the Character of an Hiſtorian, nor had he a Thought of entring into the " Queſtion about the Chineſe Antiquity, much leſs of fixing the Epoch of it at the Period " where his Table commences. So far from that, he would be highly offended, to be ſuſpected " of having retrenched the Reigns preceding that of Lye Vang, or even intending any ſuch " thing; neither durſt any Chineſe publiſh an Opinion ſo contrary to that receiv'd from Reign " to Reign throughout China. That Chronological Table, publiſh'd by him, was copy'd from " a Book intitled KANG-MU; and he had no farther Hand in it, than to adapt the Sexagenary " Cycle, which he has done in a neat and commodious Manner.

" The Author of the Kang-mû is Chu-hi, who in the Chronology follows Se-ma-tſien-kong: " but neither of theſe eminent Writers had the leaſt Thought of re-trenching the three firſt " Families, or even of inſinuating, that the Emperors, whoſe Names are inſerted in the Shu-king " are only fictitious and imaginary Perſons. Should any one in China offer to impute ſuch an " Opinion to them, he would be look'd on as a Viſionary, and might pay dear for his Te- " merity. Both of them begin their Hiſtories with Fo-hi; and we have the Commentaries " of Chu-hi upon the Shu-king (N) and Shi-king, where he always ſpeaks as one who takes the " Reigns and Princes therein mention'd to be real.

" Confucius, well known as to the Age he lived in, ſpeaks in expreſs Terms of the three " firſt Dynaſties, named Hya, Shang, and Chew; and affirms that he practiced the Rites pre- " ſcribed by the laſt. This ſingle Teſtimony would ſuffice in China, to cauſe any Perſon to " loſe his Head, who dared to ſay that thoſe three Imperial Families ought to be ſtruck " out

(F) Some will perhaps object here, that it would be of dangerous Conſequence to deny what is poſitively affirm'd by the Scripture, without ſome Criterion, by which (if it ſeem to contradict) it may be reconcil'd to Reaſon.

(G) See this Argument confuted, Univ. Hiſt. Vol. 1. p. 143.

(H) This way of Reaſoning we have already ſhewn to be unnatural and abſurd; we ſhall only obſerve farther, with Regard to the inconſiſtent and partial Conduct of a certain Set of Men; that let the Literal Senſe of any Text be ever ſo abſurd in itſelf, or injurious to the very Attributes of God, yet if it favours their own Schemes, how hotly will they ſtickle for the Letter againſt common Senſe and Reaſon, nay and call the Oppoſers of it Infidels and Atheiſts? On the contrary, if the Literal Senſe does not ſerve their Turn, how ready are they to oppoſe it themſelves, and endeavour, like our Author, to demonſtrate, that it is abſurd and incredible?

(K) Upon the whole, notwithſtanding all P. du Halde's Pains to eſtabliſh the Veracity of the Chineſe Hiſtory as well as Chronology, at leaſt from the time of Yau; it may yet be queſtion'd from ſeveral Circumſtances, which we ſhall take Notice of in our Notes as we go along. We ſhall only obſerve here, that Conſiſtency, Connexion, and Simplicity are not infallible Tokens of a genuine Hiſtory. In a Word, many of the firſt Reigns ſeem to be fictitious, and to be written by the early Chineſe Hiſtorians; partly to give their Nation the Reputation above all others, for Antiquity, Wiſdom, Politeneſs, wholeſome Laws, and other Advantages; and partly to form Models and Characters for the Imitation of Princes. It ſeems very ſtrange, that not only all their Sciences, but all their Arts and Utenſils, even to thoſe of the Plough and the Kitchen, ſhould be invented by their firſt Emperors; as if there were no Men elſe of Genius or Capacity among them in thoſe early Times.

(L) The Table here meant, is that, publiſh'd at Rome, in 1729, in three large Sheets, by P. Fouquet Biſhop of Eleuthéropolis, formerly a Jeſuit and Miſſionary, intitled, Tabula Chronologica Hiſtoriæ Sinicæ, connexa cum Cyclo qui vulgo Kia-ſi dicitur.

(M) Fouquet gives it as the Work of a young Tartar Lord, named Nyen, very well verſed in the Chineſe Hiſtory, who was living in 1720, when he left China.

(N) In the Original Chu-king.

" out of the Chineſe Hiſtory (R). I do not even believe that any one durſt advance ſuch a " Doctrine in Europe; for either he muſt deny that Confucius himſelf ever exiſted, or ſaid the " Things aſcribed to him; or elſe muſt acknowledge that we have in him an undeniable " Teſtimony (S) of the reality of the three firſt Dynaſties, which compoſe the Shu-king. For " this Reaſon we ought not to believe that Se-ma-wen-kong, and after him Chu-hi reduce the " Epoch of the Chineſe Hiſtory, to the Reign of Lye-Vang, or exclude the preceding Reigns; " they have indeed in the Hiſtory taken Notice, that the Chronology before Lye-Vang ap- " pear'd to them not ſufficiently certain (T); at leaſt ſo far as concerns the Beginning and " End of Reigns, and the Succeſſion of Years compared with the Kya-tſe, or Chineſe Cycles. " And this their pointing out what is uncertain in their Antiquities, is a Proof of their great " Exactneſs and Fidelity.

" Other Critics, leſs ſcrupulous, affirm that the Beginning of the Years of each Reign may be " mark'd diſtinctly from the twelfth Emperor of the Dynaſty of the Chew. Now from that Pe- " riod to the Emperor Lye-Van, where the Chronological Table in Queſtion, commences, they " reckon ſeventeen Emperors.

" Whatever theſe different Opinions of the Critics may be, the Chronology of the Chineſe " Hiſtory may be deduced with Certainty from the time of Yau, to the preſent; ſo far as " relates to the Succeſſion of the Emperors, and moſt remarkable Events during their Reigns. " This will appear more evidently ſtill, from the Diſcourſes of the Emperors themſelves, and " the moſt illuſtrious Chineſe of thoſe Times, inſerted in this Work."

Why no Eclipſes mentioned before Chong-kang.

As the Eclipſe, which happen'd in the Reign of Chong-kang, and has been verify'd by our Aſtronomers, is one of the moſt remarkable Proofs of the Extent of the Chineſe Chronology, it may be aſked, how comes it that the Hiſtory mentions no Eclipſe earlier than the Reign of that Prince?

The Anſwer made by the learned Chineſe, who were conſulted on this Occaſion, was, that it was the Cuſtom in thoſe early times to inſert the Eclipſes; and that the only End of their Hiſtory then was to inſtruct Poſterity, by recording the moſt eſſential Matters relating to the Government: ſuch as the Laws; the Progreſs of Arts and Sciences; the frequent Revolutions and Intrigues by which they were carry'd on; the great Inſtances of Virtue; the Advice given to the Emperors; the good or bad Actions of thoſe Princes, that their Deſcendants might learn, by their Examples, what they ought to practiſe or avoid.

It is alſo very likely, that if Hi and Ho had done their Duty, by informing the Emperor when that Eclipſe was to happen, the Hiſtory had ſpoken of it no more than former Eclipſes. As the Silence of thoſe two famous Aſtronomers was not owing ſo much to Ignorance as Malice, and the Deſign they had of favouring the Treaſon of a Miniſter, who forc'd the Emperor to retreat

(R) This ſort of Argument, which he makes uſe of ſo often, is very frivolous, and only proves how zealous the Chineſe are for their Antiquities, not how genuine thoſe Antiquities are.

(S) Confucius's mentioning thoſe Dynaſties, is far from being an undeniable Teſtimony of their Exiſtence; it only proves at moſt, that the Hiſtory of them was extant in his Time, and that it was commonly believed they had exiſted.

(T) Moſt of the Miſſionaries are of the ſame Sentiments; which are probably grounded on the Authority of theſe Authors, who are the Founders of the Kang mo or great Chineſe Annals, and moſt eſteem'd of all their Hiſtoriographers. P. Fouquet, Biſhop of Eleutheropolis before mention'd, accounts it one of the prime Uſes of the Table he publiſh'd, That it fixes the Æra of the Chineſe Hiſtory, ſo far as is genuine, about four hundred Years before Chriſt; and ſays, there are ſome who think, not without ſtrong Reaſons, that it might be brought lower ſtill. He allows the Chineſe Nation to be almoſt as old as the Deluge, but denies their Hiſtory deſerves much Credit, if you aſcend more than four hundred Years before Chriſt: and this, ſays Mr. Fourmont, is an Opinion at preſent pretty common among the Jeſuit Miſſionaries. [Fourm. Reflex. Critiq. ſur Hiſt. Anc. Peupl. Tom. 2. p. 402.]

Mr. Maigrot, Biſhop of Konon, does not believe the Chineſe Cycle very ancient; he ſays it is without Grounds aſcribed to Whang-ti; and that the Author of the Annals above mention'd firſt apply'd it to Years and Ages, it having been uſed before only to number the Days. He allows indeed of the Exiſtence of the three firſt Races, and even of Shun, Yau, Fo hi, and Shinnung: But denies the Chronology of ancient times to be certain, and ſuppoſes the Annaliſt has adjuſted both the Years and Eclipſes according to his Fancy. Ibid.

P. Premare, in his Letter againſt the Abbé Renaudot (in the Lettres Edifiantes, Tom. 19. p. 457) diſtinguiſhes the Chronology of China into fabulous, uncertain, and ſure. This Remark, he ſays, he takes from the moſt celebrated Chineſe Hiſtorians, who are Enemies to Partiality, and reckon the Times betwixt Fo-hi and Ghey lye wang, uncertain, (that is, not to be ranged according to an exact Chronological Series) and that all preceding Fo-hi is fabulous; yet he allows that China was peopled above 2155 Years before Chriſt; whereof he reckons the Eclipſe of the Sun, which happen'd that Year [and is inſerted in the Chineſe Hiſtory] as a Demonſtration. [Ibid. p. 403.]

As theſe Miſſionaries only give their Opinion on the Chineſe Chronology, without producing their particular Reaſons and Proofs, they only ſerve to create Doubts in their Readers, without affording them any Satisfaction. They are accuſed indeed with raiſing theſe Objections on a religious account; imagining if the Chineſe Chronology be admitted, it will overthrow the Verity of the Scripture Chronology, as being much more extended than the Hebrew. And this is very likely to be a Cauſe of their objecting to it, but it is a very bad one; eſpecially as they have their Choice of the Septuagint or Samaritan, the laſt of which is at leaſt as authentic if not more ſo than the Hebrew.

This is the Opinion of moſt of the Learned of late, and among the reſt M. Fourmont; who vindicates the Certainty of the Chineſe Chronology as well as Hiſtory againſt the Objections of the Jeſuits. He argues (1) that Confucius living in the time of Ling vang one hundred and forty one Years before Ghey lye vang, and writing himſelf the Chun tſiu, containing the Annals of two hundred Years; the Chronology is fixt for eight hundred eighty five Years before Chriſt, that is, to the time of Li-vang, or higher. [Ibid. p. 404.] (2) That the Chineſe having fix'd Epochas and Obſervations of Eclipſes, the Hiſtorians could not miſtake in ranging the Times; which would be a good Argument were thoſe Obſervations frequent enough in early times, as they are not, (3) He aſks, why the Times before Ghey lye vang ſhould not be more certain and exact than the Chronology of the Greek, Latin, and even French Annals? But the Chronology of theſe Nations goes but a ſmall Way back in compariſon of the Chineſe; and yet in that ſmall Space of Time is confeſs'd to be very uncertain towards the earlieſt Periods of it. [Ibid. p. 405.]

Mr. Fourmont makes uſe of other Arguments, by way of Inference, in behalf of the Chineſe Chronology; but he judiciouſly obſerves, that without a diligent Examination of that Variety of Books which he mentions relating to the Chineſe Hiſtory, a Critic will never be able to judge abſolutely of the Truth, either of any Event, or its Date. [Ibid. p. 411.]

With regard to the Commencement of the Cycle, Mr. Fourmont takes Notice, that there is ſome Difference among the Chineſe Authors; ſince Meſſrs. des Miſſions Etrangeres begin the firſt Cycle at the eighth Year of Whang-ti, and P. Couplet at his firſt Year, agreeable to a Chineſe Work compoſed on the Cycle; [Ibid. p. 424] which he believes to be the Reſult of the firſt Attempt of the Chineſe to calculate the Motions of the Heavens. [Ibid. p. 405.] He alſo affirms, that nothing is to be found in profane Hiſtory, ſo conſiſtent and probable, as what occurs in the Chineſe Annals after Whang-ti; between whom and Fo-hi things appear ſomewhat uncertain, and before Fo-hi, all is confeſſedly fabulous. [Ibid. p. 405, 406.]

retreat for Safety Southwards, they were juſtly puniſh'd with Death; and as their Treachery was diſcover'd by means of the Eclipſe, that gave Occaſion to its being mention'd in the Hiſtory.

To prevent the Reader's falling into any Error by augmenting or diminiſhing the Years of each Reign, it is neceſſary to inform him, that the Year wherein any Emperor dies, is reckon'd among thoſe of his Reign; and let his Death happen in what Month it will, tho' his Succeſſor be already proclaim'd, yet the deceaſed Prince has the Honour of having all Affairs diſpatch'd in his Name. The new Emperor ſcarce ever does any thing in his own, till the Year following, unleſs when the Crown paſſes into a new Family; for then the Year of his Reign begins the ſame Day that he aſcends the Throne.

The Uncertainty, with regard to the Length of the firſt ſeven Reigns, has induced me not to commence the Sexagenary Cycles before the Reign of Yau; altho' the Invention of thoſe Cycles, which is a Period of ſixty Years, (as our Century is a Revolution of an hundred) is commonly aſcribed to Whang-ti (u). Nevertheleſs, I ought not to omit what the Chineſe Authors report either of Fo-hi, whom they conſider as the Founder of their Monarchy; or of the ſix Emperors, who ſucceeded him, and govern'd the Empire till the time of the great Yau. (x)

(u) We muſt obſerve here that P. du Halde, by commencing the Cycles in the Reign of Yau, ſeems to have made a conſiderable Alteration in the Chineſe Chronology; firſt we are told the Chineſe begin their Cycles from the firſt Year of Whang-ti, on account of his being the Inventor, or rather Perfector of them; [vid. P. Mart. Sinic. Hiſt. p. 25, 26. & P. Couplet ad Sinic. Chronol. Præf. p. 12] and P. Gaubil expreſly tells us that the Year 1723 wherein he wrote, is the fortieth of the ſeventy fourth Chineſe Cycle: [P. Gaub. de Cyclo Sinic. ap. P. Souciet Obſ. Math. p. 28, 29] whence it follows that the firſt Year of the Cycle will fall in the Year 2697 before Chriſt, coincident with the firſt Year of the ſame Emperor, according to the Chineſe Hiſtorians. In Beginning therefore the Chineſe Cycles at the Reign of Yau, P. du Halde has retrenched ſix Cycles from the Chineſe Account of Time; and ſo falls into the ſame Fault of curtailing the Chineſe Chronology, which he has condemn'd ſo much in others.

Thus the Year 1723 does not fall according to him in the ſeventy fourth Cycle, as it ought to do, but in the ſixty eighth, which begins with him in the Year 1684. It is true P. Couplet tells us, that moſt of the Chineſe Hiſtoriographers do not uſe the Computation of Cycles before the Reign of Yau; And Mr. Fourmont particularly obſerves, that in the Tſu chi tong kyen, or Kang-mo, that is, the Great Annals of Su ma quang (the ſame doubtleſs with P. du Halde's Se ma wen kong) tho' much is ſpoken of the Cycle in the Reign of Whang-ti, and afterwards, yet that it does not begin to be apply'd regularly to the Reign of each Prince before Yau. [Vide Fourm. Reflt. Critiq. ſur Hiſt. Anc. Peupl. Tom. 2. p. 424.] But neither of them ſays that the Cycle which is firſt ſo apply'd by the Chineſe Hiſtorians, is the firſt Cycle; or that they begin to reckon their Cycles from that wherein the Reign of Yau falls. Inſtead of that, the Words of the latter ſeem to imply the contrary; and it has been prov'd from the Paſſage of P. Gaubil before-mention'd, that the Æra of Whang-ti is that, which is in common uſe with the Chineſe; nor is it likely they have two ſorts of Æras. It is probable therefore, that thoſe Hiſtorians who do not compute by Cycles before Yau, connect his Reign with the 6th or 7th Cycle, and not with the firſt; and this ought to be the Caſe, the rather, if all or ſome of the Actions of the Emperors preceding Yau, are in the ancient Books connected with the Years of the Cycle commencing with Whang-ti. But indeed the Authors above-mention'd are ſilent in this, and other Particulars, relating to the Cycle; which yet it is neceſſary to know before we can judge of the Accuracy of the Chineſe Chronology, and how high their Account of Time may be traced with any Certainty.

It is true the Reaſon P. du Halde aſſigns for this Alteration (for he produces no Chineſe Author to give him a Sanction) is the Uncertainty with regard to the length of the Reigns of the firſt ſix Emperors. But on the other hand P. Couplet aſſures us that the Chineſe Hiſtorians agree almoſt unanimouſly therein, notwithſtanding their varying in applying the Cycles. [P. Couplet ubi Supr.] and was it true that they did not, the Reaſon P. du Halde alledges is inſufficient; ſince the Cycles have no Dependance on the Reigns, as the Reigns have on them, and the firſt of them is fix'd by the Chineſe to the Reign of Whang-ti.

In Effect, this Innovation ſeems to have been made for no other End than to make the Chineſe Chronology more conſiſtent with that of the Bible; which is the thing P. du Halde has been labouring at ſo much, thro' his Preface; but who would not ſtrain a Point, even farther than this, to ſerve ſo good a Turn?

However it is eaſy to reduce P. du Halde's Chronology to the current Account of Time in China, or to the Æra of Whang-ti, by adding ſix Cycles to that uſed by our Author.

P. du Halde ſeems to have committed ſtill a greater Innovation, and to begin the Cycles with the firſt Year of Yau's Reign; but on Examination that proves to be an Error, which affects only his firſt Cycle, as we ſhall obſerve when we come to the Reign of that Emperor.

(x) As P. du Halde does not inform us whence he had his Hiſtory, we cannot ſay preciſely whether it is a Tranſlation of, or an Extract from, a Chineſe Author. It contains ſeveral things, omitted by PP. Martini and Couplet; tho' for the moſt part it is the ſame in Subſtance, with what thoſe Authors have already publiſh'd on the ſame Subject. But it is neither ſo copious as the Sinica Hiſtoria of the former, nor ſo ſtrictly Faſti or Annals as the Monarchiæ Sinicæ Chronologica Tabula of the latter; the Cycle not being ſo commodiouſly apply'd, nor the Facts ſo regularly dated, and ranged in Chronological Order.

FO-HI, the First Emperor.

Fo-hi, first Emperor.

HE was born in the Province of Shen-si (G), and chosen on account of his Superior Merit to govern his Countrymen, who call'd him Tyen-tse, that is, the Son of Heaven; thereby to denote that he was more favour'd by Heaven than the rest of Mankind, since it was from thence that he received those exalted, and extraordinary Qualities, which raised him to the Throne.

In these early times, says a certain Author, Men differ'd little from Beasts; they knew their Mothers, but not their Fathers; they were unciviliz'd and rude; they never eat but when press'd

For Instance, the Hya Chau, that is, the Chau of the Hya, or the Space of Time, during which the Hya reign'd; so they say the Shang-Chau, or the Chau of the Shang, &c. [*Voy. Fourm. Reft. preſs'd by Hunger, and when that was ſatisfy'd they threw away what was left; they ſwallow'd the Hair, drank their Blood, and clothed themſelves with the Skins of Animals.

Fo-hi taught them how to make Fiſhing-Nets, and Snares for Birds; alſo to rear Domeſtic Animals, as well for Food as for Sacrifices (H), whereby he provided for the Subſiſtence of his People. This Prince perceiving afterwards that the knotted Cords, which ſerv'd inſtead of Characters, and to inſtruct their Children, were unfit for publiſhing his Laws, and tranſmitting his Documents to Poſterity; he invented the eight Qua, conſiſting of three Lines each, which, differently combin'd, make ſixty four, to ſerve as Symbols for expreſſing whatever he had a mind. Things invented by Fo-hi.

Theſe eight Qua or Symbols, whoſe Lines are either whole or broken, ſignify certain general Things, on which depend the Corruption and Generation of particular Things; one repreſents Heaven, another the Earth, the third Thunder and Lightning, the fourth Mountains, the fifth Fire, the ſixth the Clouds, the ſeventh Water, and the eighth the Wind. He taught them how to make uſe of theſe famous Symbols; and to give the greater Credit to his new Laws, pretended that he had ſeen them inſcrib'd on the Back of a Dragon-Horſe, which roſe from the Bottom of a Lake; he call'd it a Dragon-Horſe, becauſe it was ſhap'd like a Horſe, with the Scales and Wings of a Dragon. The 8 Qua.

He took Occaſion, from this Prodigy having gain'd him Reputation among the People, to create Officers, or Mandarins, under the Name of the Dragon. He call'd one the flying Dragon, and his Employment was to compoſe Books; he call'd another the Dragon that hides himſelf, whoſe Buſineſs it was to make the Kalendar; a third was nam'd the Dragon who inhabits, and he had the Inſpection of the Buildings; a fourth, call'd the Dragon Protector, had the Charge of relieving the People, and preventing their Miſeries; a fifth, under the Name of the Terreſtrial Dragon, had the Care of the Lands; a ſixth was call'd the Dragon of the Waters, whoſe Office it was to procure the Growth of Trees and Plants, as alſo a Communication between Springs. Creates ſeveral Officers of State.

He eſtabliſh'd a Prime Miniſter, and divided the Government of his Realm among four Mandarins; one of whom he ſent to the North, another to the South, the third to the Eaſt, and the fourth to the Weſt; in this Manner he gave Strength to his Laws. The two Sexes were not then diſtinguiſh'd by different Habits, but mix'd together, lived without Shame, and in perfect Ignorance of the connubial Laws. Fo-hi, to reform this Abuſe, ordained that Women ſhould go clothed in a different Manner from Men; and made Laws for conjugal Society, by one of which no Man could marry a Woman of the ſame Name, whether related or not, which Cuſtom continues to this Day; for Inſtance, thoſe of the Name of Yong, Li, &c. can not marry Wives of the ſame Name, altho' remov'd twenty Generations, or of different Families. Makes Laws.

To mitigate the natural Fierceneſs of his new Subjects, and calm wild and turbulent Spirits, he invented Muſic, with the Inſtrument Kin (I); the upper part of which was convex, to repreſent the Heavens, and the under part flat, to repreſent the Earth. If the Harmony invented by Fo-hi was no better than what the Chineſe make at preſent, we cannot conceive how it could have any Effect on the Mind; for this they apologize by ſaying, That the Muſic of Fo-hi was all divine, but that it is a Treaſure they have irrecoverably loſt. Invents Muſic.

Fo-hi dying (K), was buried in a Place called Chin, and was ſucceeded by Shin-nong. A certain Chineſe Hiſtorian places fifteen Princes before Shin-nong, but others following the common Opinion affirm, that theſe fifteen Princes were no more than Lords of tributary Provinces, much like the Chu hew in after times.

SHIN-NONG, the ſecond Emperor.

THE People being exceedingly multiply'd, the Plants and Animals were not ſufficient to prevent Famine. Shin-nong, touch'd with the Miſery of his Subjects, ſtudy'd to render the Earth fruitful; and inventing the Implements proper for Tillage, taught the People to ſow five ſorts of Grain. Hence he got the Name of Shin-nong, or Celeſtial Huſbandman; he taught them alſo how to make Salt of Sea-Water. Shin-nong, 2d. Emp. Invents Huſbandry,

The People becoming ſubject to many Diſeaſes, for which they knew not the proper Remedies, Shin-nong made Trial on himſelf of the Virtues of Simples, and diſcover'd their good and bad Qualities; he conſider'd, ſays the Chineſe Hiſtorian, their Nature whether hot, cold or temperate, and made uſe of them accordingly, as a good King does of his Subjects. In one Day he diſcover'd ſeventy (L) poiſonous Herbs, and had the Art of making them uſeful, that is, he found out the Counterpoiſon: After which he compoſed Books of Medicine, and taught the way to reſtore ſick Folks to their Health; whence he is look'd on as the Author and Prince of Phyſic. Phiſic,

The Simplicity of Manners kept out the Spirit of Contention. Every one had enough to live on; the Laws were few, and there was no Occaſion to multiply them, but the Government was majeſtic and ſevere. Shin-nong introduc'd Commerce, and appointed publick Markets, where the People reſorted about Noon, and having furniſh'd themſelves with what they wanted, return'd quietly home. and Commerce.

(H) Which he offer'd to the Spirit of Heaven and Earth. [P. Couplet Præf. ad Sinic. Chronol. p. 20.]

(I) He invented two Inſtruments, one of twenty ſeven, and the other of thirty eight Strings. Ibid.

(K) He is reported to have begun his Reign 2952 Years before the Chriſtian Æra, and to have ſat one hundred and fifteen Years on the Throne. [Ibid. & P. Martini Sinic. Hiſt. l. 1. p. 21. Art. Fo-hius.]

While

While this Emperor was wholly employ'd about the Good of his Subjects, a tributary Prince, named So-ſha, revolted, and refuſed to obey his Orders. But his Diſobedience was puniſh'd by his own Subjects, who put him to Death; after which every one return'd to his Duty. Nor was there one throughout the Empire, who did not willingly ſubmit to the mild and juſt Government of Shin-nong.

His Death.

He dy'd at Cha-hyang, a Place depending on Chang-cha. A certain Chineſe Author ſays, that Cha-hyang is the City call'd at preſent Cha-lin-chew; which is under the Juriſdiction of Chang-cha-fû, the Capital of the Southern part of the Province of Hû-quang. (M)

Succeſſors uncertain.

Some Hiſtorians place ſeven Emperors between Shin-nong and Whang-ti, viz. Lin-que, Cheng, Ming, I, Lay, Li, and Yu-wang; this laſt was depoſed, and perhaps the reſt were no more than tributary Princes. However, it is certain that the Chineſe Hiſtorians place only Fo-hi, Shin-nong, and Whang-ti among the firſt Emperors to whom Arts and Sciences owe their Riſe and Progreſs.

WHANG-TI (N), the Third Emperor.

Whang-ti, 3d. Emp.

THE Hiſtory relates that Yu-wang was a Prince of a paſſionate and violent Temper; that the People groan'd under the Oppreſſion of his Government; that the tributary Princes revolting, one of them, nam'd Chi-yew, firſt appear'd in Arms againſt him; that the Emperor was depoſed, and Whang-ti, who was but twelve Years of Age, placed by the Princes on the Throne; that the Mother of Shin-nong had a younger Brother, who was hereditary Sovereign of the Principality of Shau-tyen; and that the Wife of the Regulo thereof, in the Reign of Yu-wang, was nam'd Fû-pau, who being much frighten'd with a Noiſe of Thunder, brought forth Whang-ti, on a Mountain call'd Swen ywen. He was according to the Hiſtory a wonderful Child; he ſpoke almoſt as ſoon as he was wean'd from the Breaſt. In his Infancy he diſcover'd a great deal of Wit and Addreſs; in his Youth an exceeding good Nature and Sweetneſs of Temper; and in his Manhood an extraordinary Depth of Judgment and Sagacity.

Invents the Compaſs.

Chi-yew, above-mention'd, was a Prince whoſe reſtleſs Temper and unbounded Ambition occaſion'd great Diſturbances. Whang-ti attack'd and fought three Battles with him; when perceiving that the thickneſs of the Fogs hinder'd him from purſuing his Enemy, and that the Soldiers ſtray'd from following the right Courſe; he contriv'd a Card, which ſhew'd them the South and the other three Cardinal Points; by which means, at length, overtaking Chi-yew, he ſeiz'd and put him to Death. Some ſay that on the Card were engraven the Characters of the Rat and the Horſe, and Underneath a Needle to point out the four Quarters of the World. We ſee here the uſe of the Compaſs, or ſomething like it, of great Antiquity, and expreſly recorded; it is pity they have not explain'd the Method of it, but the Expoſitors knowing only the bare Fact, durſt not venture on any Conjectures of their own. (O)

Makes Roads thro' his Dominions.

Having regulated the moſt important Affairs of the Empire, Whang-ti employ'd his whole Care to make his People happy, by procuring them all ſorts of Conveniencies: he cut thro' and levell'd Mountains, made great Roads to facilitate Commerce, and enlarg'd the Bounds of his Empire; extending it Eaſtward as far as the Ocean, Northward to ancient Tartary, and Southward to the River Kyang, which ſerv'd as a Barrier to his Dominions. He created ſix Ko-lau, or Prime Miniſters, to aſſiſt him in governing the Empire, and made Tſang-kyay, the Mandarin for compoſing the Hiſtory. Ta-nau had the Charge of making the Kya-tſe, or Cycle of ſixty Years (P). This Cycle is compoſed on one ſide of ten Characters, nam'd Tyen-kan, and on the other of twelve, call'd Ti-chi. Theſe Characters ſignify nothing (Q), but ſerve inſtead of Numbers and Signs; the firſt ten are call'd the ten Roots, and the others the twelve Branches. Every Year is mark'd by two of them, that is one of each ſort, which are ſo combin'd, that the ſame two Signs never come together till the Cycle is out. (R)

Creates 6 Ko-lau.

Invents the Kya-tſe or Cycle of 60 Years.

A Sphere and the Kalendar.

Yong-cheng was order'd to make a Sphere and Kalendar; he diſcover'd the Pole-Star and the others that are about it. But what Figure the Sphere was of which he invented, repreſenting the celeſtial Orbs, is not known. In ſhort, by means of ſeveral Experiments he could foretell the Changes of the Weather and Air.

Li-chew's Office was to regulate Numbers and Meaſures. The Method he invented to caſt up any Sum, and which is ſtill in uſe, conſiſts of a little Box, divided in two Parts, croſs'd with ſeveral Iron Wires, thro' which paſs little Balls. On every Wire in the upper Diviſion there

(M) He tranſlated the Imperial Seat fron Ho-nan to Yen-chew in Shan-tong. He is ſaid to have dy'd in his Progreſs thro' Hû-quang, after he had reign'd one hundred and forty Years, and to have been interr'd in the City Tſing. [Couplet, ibid.]

(N) Whang-ti ſignifies the Yellow Emperor.

(O) As P. du Halde does not produce his Authors, to warrant the Antiquity of this Fact, it may have been inſerted into their Hiſtory of late Ages, to do Honour to the Founders of their Monarchy. Indeed as the thing is related it has the Air of a Fiction; nothing can be more abſurd than to ſuppoſe a Compaſs invented to direct an Army in purſuit of a vanquiſh'd Enemy; if they were in View, as it ſhould ſeem they were, being juſt defeated, the Victors had no Occaſion for a Compaſs to direct them; if they were not in View, of what uſe was a Compaſs to find them out? Could they divine on what Point of the Card the Enemy was fled, and yet not know how to find that Point out? In ſhort, was not Whang-ti himſelf ſufficient to ſhew them the Way? However that be, it is not likely, if ſo uſeful a Secret had once been diſcover'd, that it ever would have been loſt.

(P) Theſe Chineſe call this Cycle Lo-ſhe-wha-kya, that is, the Conſtruction of ſixty Converſions. [Couplet Præf. ib. p. 14.]

(Q) Theſe Characters are the Names of Animals.

(R) P. Noel has given a Scheme of this Cycle, [Noel Obſ. Math. & Phyſ. p. 59.] Ologh beigh treats of it at large, [de Epochis Celebr. Cap. 6. p. 42.] but his Tranſlator Greaves has committed many Miſtakes in writing the Names of the Characters, as Dr. Hyde has juſtly remark'd. [Hyde de Menſ. & Pond. Sinic. p. 30.]

there are only two Balls, each ſtanding for five; but every Wire of the lower Diviſion, which is much larger, has five Balls, each of which ſtands for one. When they reckon from right to left, the Numbers multiply the ſame as in Cyphering with us; which Method of caſting Accounts is more ready and ſure than ours with the Pen.

With regard to Meaſures, he took a Grain of Millet to determine the Dimenſion of a Line, reckoning ten Lines to an Inch, ten Inches to a Foot, &c. The various ways of ranging theſe Grains, which are of an Oval Figure, have occaſion'd a Diverſity in the Meaſures under different Dynaſties. and Meaſures.

Under the preſent Dynaſty there are three ſorts of Meaſures, 1. the Foot of the Palace, which is to the Paris Foot as ninety ſeven and an half to a hundred. 2. The Foot of the Tribunal of Publick Works, call'd Kong-pû, uſed by Workmen, is ſhorter by one Line than the Paris Foot. 3. The Taylors Foot, made uſe of alſo by the Mercers, is ſeven Lines larger than the Kong-pû.

To Ling-lun was given the Care of improving Muſic, and to explain the Order and Arrangement of the different Tones. Laſtly Yong-ywen had Orders to make twelve Copper Bells, which repreſented the twelve Months of the Year. Muſic improved.

Whang-ti afterwards invented the Bonnet or Cap, call'd Myen, to ſerve him for a Diadem. This Bonnet dip'd a little before and roſe behind, it was ſeven Inches broad and one Foot two Inches high. He alſo made Habits and Ornaments, proper for his Dignity; his Robe was blew and yellow, to imitate the Colours of the Sky and Earth. After having maturely conſider'd the Feathers of the Pheaſant, and various Colours of Birds and Flowers, he found out the Art of Dying, and order'd that the Stuffs, wherewith the Rich and Poor were cloathed, ſhould be of different Colours. He cauſed ſeveral uſeful Inſtruments to be made, as Machines to pound Rice, Kitchen-Stoves, Cauldrons, &c. and the People began to eat their Rice dreſs'd after different Manners, ſometimes thicker, ſometimes thinner. He caus'd Bridges to be built over Rivers, and Coffins to be made for the Dead. He taught the way of making Bows and Arrows; alſo Wind Inſtruments, as Flutes, Fifes, and Organs; Trumpets that imitated the Voice of the Dragon, and Drums that made the Noiſe of Thunder. Obſerving hollow Trees to ſwim, he caus'd Barks to be made, to which he added Oars. He likewiſe invented Waggons, and order'd Oxen and Horſes to be train'd to draw them. His Subjects dwelling at that time in miſerable Hutts, he drew Models for Building, and caus'd a Palace to be erected, nam'd Ho-kong, where he ſacrific'd to the ſovereign Lord of Heaven. To facilitate Trade, he coin'd Money, which he call'd Kin-tau, becauſe it had the Figure of a Knife-Blade; and regulated the Expences of the Empire ſo well, that its Riches grew immenſe. Various Arts and Inſtruments invented by Whang-ti.

Mankind being tormented, from without by the Rigour of the Seaſons, and within by their Paſſions, dy'd before their Time; therefore Whang-ti having attentively conſider'd the five Elements, the Seaſons of the Year, and the Nature of Man, order'd three Doctors, nam'd Ki-pe, Yu-ſû, and Ley-kong, to examine the Blood-Veſſels, after which he appointed the Remedies proper for every Diſeaſe, ſo that Men lived as long as they ought to do, according to the Courſe of Nature. He order'd the Empreſs to teach the People the Manner of rearing Silk-Worms, to ſpin their Webs, and make Cloaths thereof (A). This Prince enjoy'd not a Moments Repoſe, and tho' he had taught his Subjects to build Houſes, and had a Palace built for himſelf, yet he had no fix'd Abode, but encamp'd with his Soldiers in the Field. Diſcoveries in Anatomy and Phyſic.

He caus'd the Country to be meaſur'd, and divided it into Chew; he eſtabliſh'd ſeveral Principalities, conſiſting of a hundred Li each, wherein he built Cities. According to his Appointment, two hundred and forty Paces in length, and one in breadth, made a Mû, and a hundred Mû one King; ſo that the Pace conſiſting of five Feet, every Mû of Land contain'd ſix thouſand ſquare Feet, and the King ſix hundred thouſand. He appointed alſo, that nine King ſhould be call'd Tſing, and that a Tſing ſhould be allotted to eight Families, each to have one King or a hundred Mû; the King which remain'd in the Middle to belong to the Emperor, and to be cultivated in common by the eight Families. He caus'd four Roads to be made to every Tſing, and farther ordain'd that three Tſing ſhould be call'd Ho-ki; three Ho-ki one Street; five Streets a Town; ten Towns a Tû; ten Tû a She; and ten She a Chew. Diviſion of the Country into Chew, &c.

Whang-ti dy'd on the Mountain King-ſhan, and was interr'd in the Province of Shan-tong. The Chineſe Hiſtorians beſtow on him the higheſt Praiſes: The Virtue and Endowments of this Prince, ſay they, equal Heaven and Earth; his Government was admirable, his Laws firm, and his Conduct unchangeable; he ſcatter'd his Benefits all over the Earth, and we ſtill feel the Effects of his Liberality, inſomuch that tho' he be dead, he may be ſaid to be yet living. He had twenty five Children, whereof Shau-hau ſucceeded him in the Empire. (B)

(A) She alſo taught them the Art of Dying. [Couplet.]

(B) His Seat was at Cho-chew, in the Province of Pe-che-li. He appropriated the yellow Colour to the Emperors, as their Livery, forbidding others to wear it. He invented Aſtronomy, Muſic, and Muſical Inſtruments; alſo Arms, the Bow, Netts, Chariots, Barks, the Art of Building, making Earthen-Ware, Meaſures, and Weights; wrote ſeveral Books on the Method of diſcovering Diſeaſes by the Pulſe. Eighty five Emperors of three Imperial Families, which continu'd 2457 Years, derive their Pedigree from Whang-ti. He dy'd in the fortieth Year of the ſecond Cycle, aged one hundred and eleven Years, whereof he reign'd a hundred. [Vid. Couplet Tab. Chron. Monar. Sinic. p. 1, 2.

SHAU-HAU, the Fourth Emperor.

Shau-hau, 4th Emperor.

THIS Prince gain'd the Esteem and Love of his People by the Mildness and Goodness of his Disposition. It is reported that the Fong-whang (c) appear'd at his coming to the Crown, which was look'd on as a happy Omen; because the Chinese say this Bird never appears but when good Kings are upon the Throne.

The Fong-whang, or Phœnix.

This Fong-whang is a very extraordinary, or rather fabulous Bird, much like our Phœnix; according to the Chinese way of painting it, it resembles an Eagle, but differs a great deal from it, in the wonderful Variety of its Colours.

The Orders of Mandarins distinguish'd by Birds.

From the pretended Appearance of this Bird, the Emperor took the Hint to distinguish his Officers by the Figure of divers Birds, which they wore on their Cloaths; a Custom that is still observ'd. Those of the Literary Mandarins are embroider'd with Birds in Gold, as a Mark of their Dignity; those of the Mandarins of War are adorn'd with Animals, such as the Dragon, Lyon, Tiger, &c. by which Marks the People know the Rank which the several Officers bear in the nine prime Orders of the State.

Kyew, or preaching Mandarins.

Among the Mandarins of the new Creation, some of them, call'd Kyew, were oblig'd to assemble the People; it was the Business of others to govern the five sorts of Artificers, while others had an Eye to the Tillage, and the Manners of the People.

This Prince govern'd his Dominions with much Equity. The Chinese Authors say, he was an exact Imitator of Fo-hi; he reform'd the Measures for Grain, and had a Drum made to beat the Watches; he clear'd the Channels of Rivers, and smoothed the Roads over the Mountains; in short he invented a new sort of Music, that united Spirits with Mortals, and reconcil'd the high with the low; whence he is call'd Ta-ywen.

This Emperor dy'd very old, and left five Sons, whereof four were Men of Merit; but perceiving greater Talents in his Nephew Chwen-hyo, who was Whang-ti's Grandson, he preferr'd him before his own Children to be his Successor in the Empire. (D)

CHWEN-HYO, the Fifth Emperor,

Chwen-hyo, 5th Emp.

WAS so far from distrusting those whose Station he fill'd, that as soon as he was on the Throne, he conferr'd considerable Employments on them, suitable to their respective Capacities. As these Princes had a perfect Knowledge of the Nature of Metals, Waters, Trees, &c. he made one Governor of the Mines, another Master of the Waters, Forests, &c. and being assur'd of their Fidelity, rais'd them afterwards to the most honourable and important Posts.

Unites the Priesthood with the Imperial Dignity.

Towards the End of the Reign of Shau-hau the People began to intrude into the sacred Ministry, each Family affecting to have Sacrificers among them; which Abuse Chwen-hyo reform'd, by uniting the Priesthood to the Crown, and ordaining that none but the Emperor should offer solemn Sacrifices to the Lord of Heaven. This Law has always been and still is observ'd; for the Emperor alone is the Pontif, and has a right to offer Sacrifices in the Temple of Heaven, from which if he be hinder'd by Age or Sickness, he deputes a Prince or some Great Man to perform that Duty in his stead.

Improves Astronomy.

As this Emperor was an able Astronomer, he chang'd the Method of calculating and observing the Celestial Motions; which being to be view'd only at a Distance, he invented an Instrument to give a clearer Notion of them, and shew the Equations, Ascensions, &c.

Regulates the Kalendar

The Interpreters say nothing about the Construction and Figure of this Instrument, which it is probable they were ignorant of. They speak only of the Conjunction of the five Planets in the Constellation She, that happen'd in this Emperor's Reign; but as an able Chinese Astronomer remarks, it is an hypothetical Conjunction, not a real one. (*)

Chwen-hyo regulated the Kalendar also, ordering that the Year should begin the first Day of the Month, wherein the Conjunction of the Sun and Moon should fall nearest the fifteenth Degree

(c) It appear'd before in the time of Whang-ti. (1)

(D) He built Cities for Men to dwell in; caused Chariots to be drawn by Oxen. Kyew-li, or the 9 Regulo's, disturb the Order of Sacrifices, terrifying the People with Spectres and Goblins, which gave Rise to Superstitions, that brought the Empire in Danger. Shau-hau was born, reign'd, and bury'd in Kyo-seu in the Province of Shan-tong (2). Martini makes Kyew-li a single Impostor. (3)

(*) As the Conjunctions of the Planets have always been look'd on as good Omens; these false Conjunctions often occur in the History, especially at the Change of Dynasties. To find one, we need go no farther back than the second Year of the present Emperor, when the Conjunction of 4 Planets was thought sufficient Reason for making 5 of them, in Favour of the new Monarch. The Emperor seem'd rejoic'd at it, and receiv'd the Compliments of the whole Court on that Occasion; every one found his account in it, especially the Tribunal of the Mathematics, which did not err thro' Ignorance. A certain Situation of other Planets in respect of those in Conjunction, was sufficient Ground with them to form an Aspect, which flatter'd the Emperor, and was of Benefit to themselves. This false Conjunction, which is set down in the Registers, may possibly cause Disputes and Objections hereafter. What if 2 or 3,000 Years hence, on calculating this Conjunction of Planets in Europe, they should not find Saturn among them; would that be a sufficient Reason to doubt of the other Facts recorded in the Reign of Yong-ching? It would certainly be none to the Chinese, who being accustom'd to these Flatteries to their Emperors, know how to make Allowance for them.

[This Apology, which in the Original is inserted in the Text, does not free the Chinese History, as it is design'd to do, from a Suspicion of being corrupted in other Respects; on the contrary it shews it is liable to be corrupted, and if in Matters which flatter the Emperors, why not in those which flatter the Antiquity, &c. of the Empire and Nation?]

gree of Aquarius; whence he is call'd the Author and Father of the Ephemerides. He pitch'd on the Time when the Sun was in the middle of the Sign; becauſe then the Earth is adorn'd with Flowers and Plants, the Trees reſume their Verdure, and every thing in Nature revives and ſeems to be produc'd anew.

This Prince, who dy'd very aged, was interr'd at Pû-yang, and ſucceeded by Ti-ko, or Kau-ſin, the Emperor Shau-hau's Grandſon. To the Deſcendants of Chwen-hyo, who were very numerous, were afterwards given (E) ſeveral little Dominions, whereof they were Kings or tributary Princes. (F)

TI-KO, or KAU-SIN, the Sixth Emperor.

Ti-ko, 6th Emperor.

THIS King is greatly extoll'd by the Chineſe Writers; they ſay he had a penetrating Judgment, and ſaw into every thing; that he examin'd all things himſelf, and entered into the minuteſt Particulars. He was popular without loſing his Majeſty, lov'd his Subjects, diſtributed his Bounty every where, reform'd himſelf, and was a religious Worſhipper of the ſovereign Lord of Heaven, whom he ſerv'd reſpectfully. His grand and auguſt Air drew Veneration; his Virtue was eminent; he did nothing amiſs, and kept a juſt Medium in all things. In ſhort there was no Nation, enlighten'd by the Sun, and water'd by Rain, but what took Pleaſure to obey his Orders. He eſtabliſh'd Maſters to teach the People Virtue, and invented Vocal Muſic; Hyen-ho was the firſt, who made Songs by his Order. He appointed others to make different ſorts of Inſtruments, as Flutes, both direct and tranſverſe, a Drum, a Bell, a King, (which is a thin flat Plate, beaten with a Wooden Mallet). He cauſed that Muſic to be play'd, which he nam'd Lû-ing, that is, the Beauty of Heaven, Earth, and the four Seaſons.

Invents Vocal Muſic.

He ſet the firſt Example of Polygamy, by marrying four Wives. He had by the firſt a Son, nam'd Ki, whoſe Deſcendants founded the Dynaſty of Chew; by the ſecond, Sye, whoſe Poſterity founded that of Shang; by the third he had Yau; and the fourth brought him Chi, which laſt was ſo hopeful a Prince, that the Emperor choſe him his Succeſſor before the reſt. (G)

Introduces Polygamy.

CHI, the Seventh Emperor.

Chi, 7th Emperor.

THIS Prince did not anſwer the Opinion at firſt conceiv'd of his Merit, making uſe of his Authority only to ſerve his brutal Pleaſures. The tributary Princes, who were accuſtom'd to obey wiſe Emperors, unable to bear his exceſſive Riots, made him ſeveral Remonſtrances on his Conduct; which having no Effect, they dethron'd and baniſh'd him, ſetting his Brother Yau on his Throne. (H)

There is no applying the Sexagenary Cycle before the Reign of Yau, for tho' invented by Whang-ti, the Duration of theſe firſt Reigns is very uncertain. On the contrary, from Yau to Chriſt the Chronology is perfectly well deduc'd; the Chineſe Authors having ſet down the particular Tranſactions of every Year, even to the Diviſions that have diſturb'd the Empire, and the Interregnums, with the Time of their Continuance; which Reaſons have led me to begin the Cycle with that Emperor. (I)

YAU, the Eighth Emperor, reign'd alone ſeventy two Years, and twenty eight with SHUN, whom he aſſociated in the Empire.

Yau, 8th Emperor.

CYCLE I. Years before Chriſt 2337.

THIS Prince aſcended the Throne in the forty firſt Year of the preceding Cycle (K). He is conſider'd as the firſt Legiſlator of the Nation, and the Model of the Sovereigns. All the Emperors who were jealous of their Reputation, endeavour'd to imitate him and his Succeſſor; and it is at preſent the greateſt Praiſe that can be given to a Chineſe Monarch, to ſay that he is like Yau, Shun, &c.

(E) It is the Emperor always who grants theſe Eſtates to the Princes, either as being his Relations, or on account of their Merit. They hold of the Empire much like the Dukes and Counts of Europe; and if the Emperor is engag'd in War, they are oblig'd to attend him with a certain Number of Troops.

(G) His Seat was at Yen-ſu, a City of Ho-nan. Peace all his Reign. He created his Brothers and their Sons Regulo's in the Province of Se-chwen. He dy'd in the thirty ſecond Year of the ſixth Cycle, ag'd 105. (2)

(H) He reign'd eight Years, being depoſed the fortieth Year of the ſixth Cycle; and is not reckon'd among the Emperors. (3)

(I) We have already ſhewn, p. 135. that this ſeems to be an Innovation in the Chineſe Chronology.

(K) There are two or three conſiderable Miſtakes in the Original in this Place; for P. du Halde by connecting as he does the firſt Year of the Cycle with the Year 2357 before Chriſt, which coincides with the firſt Year of Yau's Reign, not only contradicts himſelf, and committs a great Anachroniſm (in telling us at the ſame time that Yau began his Reign the forty firſt Year of the former Cycle,) but makes the Cycle commence twenty Years earlier than the Chineſe Hiſtorians. When I firſt met with this Paſſage, I concluded P. du Halde had determin'd to overturn the whole Chineſe Chronology, by altering the Beginnings of the Cycles (and conſequently miſplacing the Dates of all Events) as well as retrenching their Number; but on Examination I found the Error went no farther, for his ſecond Cycle (and generally all the reſt of the Cycles) is collated with the right Year before Chriſt. However by referring the Beginning of Yau's Reign to a Cycle preceding the firſt Cycle, he ſeems not only to commit a Soleciſm, no leſs abſurd than to refer to an Olympiad before the firſt Olympiad; but tacitly confeſſes, that he hath retrench'd Cycles from the Chineſe Æra. To have expreſſed himſelf therefore conſiſtently with his new Chronology, he ſhould have ſaid Yau began his Reign twenty Years before the firſt Cycle.

CYCLE I. Years before Chriſt 2337.

Great Character.

The Hiſtorians tell us, that Virtue was natural to him; he was active, laborious, vigilant, and of ſuch Penetration and Underſtanding that he foreſaw every thing. His Moderation and Equity kept the Laws in Force, and at the ſame time made them eſteem'd. He never employ'd his Authority, but for the Good of his Subjects. His Modeſty was equal to his Dignity, and was remarkable even when he receiv'd Homages. His Frugality in his Diet was ſuch, that he contented himſelf with the coarſeſt Meats; he uſed no magnificent Furniture; his Palace was without any Ornaments, and his Cloaths were of Woolen Stuffs during Summer, and of Deer-Skins in Winter. If any publick Calamity happen'd, or one of his Subjects committed a Crime, he imputed the Misfortune to his own Want of Virtue, or as a Puniſhment of Heaven, for his neglecting to inſtruct them. He never viſited his Dominions, without having firſt offer'd Sacrifices to the ſovereign Maſter of Heaven, and his Subjects long'd with as much Impatience for the Happineſs of ſeeing him, as the parch'd Fields thirſt for Rain. In ſhort his Reign was ſo mild and amiable, that his Subjects ſcarce perceiv'd they had a Maſter. The Chineſe Philoſophers are wont to enforce their Maxims of Morality from their Uniformity with the Conduct and Actions of this Emperor and his two Succeſſors; which Conformity, once prov'd, give them an undiſputable Authority.

Aſtronomy cultivated.

Yau, who delighted mightily in obſerving the Heavens, order'd two able Mathematicians, call'd Hi and Ho, carefully to examine the Motions of the Moon and Stars, and make proper Inſtruments for obſerving them; by their Aſſiſtance he regulated the twelve Lunar Months, and re-eſtabliſh'd the intercalated ones, which return'd ſeven times in nineteen Years.

The Empreſs had the Care of breeding Silk-Worms, and teaching Women how to make better Silk Manufactures than had been made before; for the firſt Eſſays were very coarſe, as is always the Caſe, eſpecially in Arts which require much Time and Experience to bring them to Perfection.

The ſix ſupreme Tribunals eſtabliſh'd.

This Prince introduc'd a new Regulation in the Adminiſtration of Affairs, by eſtabliſhing ſix Supreme Tribunals, which ſtill ſubſiſt. His Reputation for Virtue and wiſe Government drew ſeveral neighbouring Nations into his Dominions; but his Subjects had increas'd to ſuch a Degree that there was not Room for ſo many Strangers as came to ſettle in the Provinces; chiefly becauſe the Low Lands were overflow'd; which Inundation was either the Remains of the Univerſal Deluge, as many believe, or occaſion'd by the Rivers meeting with ſome Obſtruction in their Courſe. To recover theſe drown'd Lands, and render them of uſe, he order'd an Officer, nam'd Quen, to drain the Plains by opening a Paſſage for the Waters to the Sea. This Officer, either thro' Negligence or Ignorance, ſpent nine Years to no Purpoſe about this Work, for which he was put to Death. His Son Yu, repairing his Father's Fault, after thirteen Years indefatigable Labour, levell'd Mountains, turn'd the great Rivers into their natural Channels, drain'd the Lakes and Marſhes, confin'd ſeveral rapid Torrents between Banks, and divided the leſſer Rivers into different Canals, which ended in the Sea; by this means he enlarged the Provinces, and render'd them more fertile; nor was ſo important a Piece of Service unrewarded, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

Chineſe Inundation.

Care in chuſing a Succeſſor.

In the mean time Yau thought of chooſing a Succeſſor; wherein he was govern'd, not by the Dictates of Paternal Affection, but the Welfare of his People. Diſcovering his Deſign one Day to the Lords of his Court, one of them ſaid, His eldeſt Son was as worthy of the Throne as of being his Son; and that the People would be ſure to find hereditary Virtue in his Race. to which Yau reply'd: I deteſt thoſe who love the Wicked as much as thoſe who blame the Good. I know what my Son is; under the ſpecious Appearance of Virtue, he conceals real Vices. Which Anſwer ſtop'd the Mouths of all the Courtiers.

Great Self-denial in a Miniſter of State.

Some time after Yau ſent for one of his Miniſters, whom he moſt confided in for his Prudence and Integrity, in order to reſign the Crown to him. But that wiſe Miniſter refus'd the Honour, alledging that the Burden was too heavy for his Shoulders; and at the ſame time propoſed a Huſbandman, nam'd Shun, whoſe Virtue, Probity, and Patience under the ſevereſt Trials, join'd to the Confidence which all good Men had in him, and an infinite Number of other excellent Qualities, rendred him worthy of the Throne.

Yau hereon ſent for Shun, and to make Trial of his Abilities, rais'd him to be Governor of a Province; where he got ſo great Reputation for Wiſdom, Prudence, Moderation and Equity, that at the End of three Years, Yau made him his Aſſociate in the Empire, and gave him both his Daughters in Marriage.

CYCLE II. Years before Chriſt 2277.

The Emperor liv'd twenty eight Years in great Harmony with his new Collegue; and at length perceiving himſelf near his End, he exhorted Shun to govern his Subjects like a true Father, and remember that he was made more for the People, than the People for him; and that an Emperor is exalted above the reſt of Mankind, to no other End but to procure their Advantage, and prevent their Neceſſities. Having ſpoken theſe Words, he departed in the hundred and eighteenth Year of his Age, leaving nine Children behind him; the People, who found in this Prince the Love and Tenderneſs of a Father and Mother, mourn'd for him the Space of three Years.

SHUN,

SHUN, the Ninth Emperor, reign'd alone Fifty Years.

Cycle II. Year before Chriſt 2277.

Shun, ninth Emperor.

YAU dying in the twentieth Year of this Cycle, Shun began the Year following to reign alone, and is reckon'd one of the Chineſe Lawgivers, as well as his Predeceſſor. Soon after Shun truſted the Government to his Miniſters, and ſhut himſelf up for three Years in Yau's Tomb, the more freely to vent his Grief for the loſs of a Prince, whom he conſider'd as his Father; whence the Cuſtom aroſe of mourning three Years for one's Parents.

Cuſtom of mourning three Years for a Parent.

The Chineſe Hiſtorians attribute the Advancement of Shun to the Submiſſion and Obedience he always ſhew'd to his Parents. Tho' he receiv'd nothing but bad Uſage from them, and his Life was often in Danger, he mildly bore all their ill Treatment, ſo that by degrees his Reſpect and Patience wrought a Change in their Hearts, and made them virtuous. From hence the Chineſe Philoſophers deduce two great Principles of Morality; firſt, That however wicked Fathers and Mothers may be, the Children are not the leſs bound to pay them Reſpect and Obedience. Secondly, That there is no Man ſo bad, but may be reclaim'd at laſt by good Offices.

Shun having diſcharged his Duty of Piety and Gratitude towards Yau, took Poſſeſſion of the Imperial Palace, and receiv'd the Homage of all the Tributary Princes. Finding abundance of Gold and Jewels in the Palace, he caus'd a Sphere to be made, exhibiting the Seven Planets; each of which was repreſented by the Precious Stone moſt ſuitable to it. He made new Laws for governing the Realm, and appointed inferior Officers to aſſiſt in the ſix Tribunals eſtabliſh'd by his Predeceſſor. He always honour'd Philoſophers and Men of Learning with his Favour and Protection. He viſited the Provinces every Year; and in his Progreſs rewarded or puniſh'd the Tributary Princes with ſo much Juſtice, that he gain'd the Eſteem and Admiration of the People.

A Sphere of Jewels.

One of his principal Cares was to procure Plenty and to make Agriculture flouriſh; for which end he forbad the Governors, under ſevere Penalties, to exact Days-work from the Huſbandman, as a thing that was a Hardſhip, and tended to ſlaken their Ardor for tilling the Lands.

He was equally careful, not to truſt Governments to any but Perſons of Merit and Capacity. In a word, he made ſeveral other Ordinances, the Wiſdom and Juſtice of which have in all times caus'd him to be look'd on, as one of the greateſt Heroes China ever produc'd. One of theſe Ordinances may appear ſomewhat extraordinary, as it permits any of his Subjects to ſet forth on a Table, expos'd to publick View, whatever he found blameable in his Conduct. He admitted twelve Lords into his Council, ſix whereof were deſcended from Chwen-ho, and ſix from Ti-ko. The Shu-king contains Diſcourſes made by ſome of theſe Lords to the Emperor, concerning the Maxims of a wiſe Government.

Remarkable Ordinance, and

The fifty fourth Year of this Cycle he choſe a Succeſſor; in which Choice he wholly conſulted the Good of his People, preferring Yu to his own Children, on account of his Capacity and Merit, as well as in ſome meaſure to reward the Service he had done the Empire, by draining the Lands that were overflow'd. He lived ſeventeen Years after he had rais'd Yu to the Throne, and the Union was ſo great between theſe two Princes, that the Authority never ſeem'd to be divided.

Love for his Subjects.

The Emperor Shun died the tenth Year of this Cycle, aged one hundred and ten Years, and was bury'd in the Province of Shen-ſi.

Yu, firſt Emperor.

THE eleventh Year of the ſame Cycle, which anſwers to that of 2207 before Chriſt (M), Yu or Ta-yu, that is, Yu the Great, ruled alone, and kept his Court in the Province of Shan-ſi. One of the Sons of Shun, vex'd to ſee a Stranger on his Father's Throne, had a mind to revolt; but being abandon'd both by the Grandees and the common People, his Attempt only ſerv'd to fix the Crown more firmly on the Head of Yu, whoſe great Genius and Virtue had endear'd him exceedingly to the whole Nation.

The Knowledge he had acquir'd of the Nature of Lands, by draining off the Waters, qualify'd him for compoſing an excellent Piece upon Agriculture; treating of the Method of Tilling and Sowing, and manuring Lands with the different kinds of Dung. Afterwards he caus'd the ſloping and riſing Grounds to be levell'd, that the Waters might run towards thoſe Places which had moſt need of it.

He divided his whole Dominions into nine Provinces, and cauſed as many great Brazen Veſſels to be made, with the Map of a Province engraven on each. In after-times theſe Veſſels became very precious, inſomuch that it was believ'd the Security of the State depended on their Preſervation; and whoever could get Poſſeſſion of them thought himſelf ſecure of the Crown. The Empire became hereditary under this Prince, as well as the Prieſthood, which had been before united to the Crown, as it has continued inviolably ever ſince; it being Death by the Law for any Perſon but the Emperor to offer Sacrifice.

To give the Emperor Yu Advice as to his Conduct, was the way for a Man to gain his Favour; and he thought no Employment more worthy of a Sovereign, than that of rendering Juſtice to the People. For this End he was acceſſible at all times; and to make the Admittance more eaſy, he caus'd a Bell, a Drum, and three Tables, one of Iron, the ſecond of Stone, and the third of Lead, to be faſten'd to the Gates of his Palace; on which was an Order fix'd, enjoining all thoſe who wanted to ſpeak to him, to ſtrike on the Inſtruments or Tables, according to the Nature of their Buſineſs. The Ringing of the Bell diſtinguiſh'd Civil Affairs, the Drum was to be beaten for Buſineſs relating to the Laws and Religion; the Leaden Table for Matters concerning the Miniſtry and Government; the Stone Table to denote a Complaint againſt the Injuſtice of ſome Magiſtrate; and ſtriking on the Table of Iron was to expreſs very ſevere Treatment.

He always receiv'd graciouſly, and even with a ſort of Acknowledgement, thoſe who came either to give him Advice, or implore his Juſtice; it is reported, that one Day he roſe from Table twice at the Sound of the Bell, and another Day left the Bath three times to hear the Complaints of People. We find in the Shu-king the Inſtructions he gave the Princes for governing their Dominions, and the Rules he preſcribed with regard to beſtowing Employments and raiſing Taxes.

His Sayings.

He us'd to ſay, that a Sovereign ought to be as cautious of his Conduct, as if he walk'd on Ice; that nothing is more difficult than to reign; that Dangers ſpring up under a Monarch's Feet; that he has every thing to fear, if he gives himſelf wholly up to Pleaſures; that he ought to avoid Idleneſs, chuſe good Miniſters, and follow their Counſels; in ſhort, that when he had once made a wiſe Reſolution, he ought to execute it without the leaſt Delay.

Wine prohibited, and the Inventor baniſhed.

In this Reign I-tye invented the Chineſe Wine, a Drink made of Rice; as ſoon as the Emperor taſted it, he ſhew'd his Diſpleaſure at it, ſaying, This Liquor will cauſe the greateſt Troubles in the Empire. He baniſh'd the Inventor, and forbid the making of it for the future under grievous Penalties. But the Art being preſerv'd, the Law prov'd uſeleſs, and it is at preſent one of the greateſt Delicacies at the Tables of the Chineſe.

TI-KI, the Second Emperor, reign'd Nine Years.

Ti-ki, ſecond Emperor.

ALL the Chineſe rejoic'd at ſo worthy a Succeſſor, and finding in the Son the ſame Qualities which they admir'd in the Father, were more eaſily comforted for their Loſs. The Beginning of his Reign was diſturb'd by a War, declar'd againſt him by one of the Tributary Princes, who had treated his Subjects rigorouſly, and deſign'd to make himſelf independent; the Emperor therefore put himſelf at the Head of his Army, and with the Aſſiſtance of ſix other Tributary Princes ſo reduc'd the Rebel, that it was not in his Power to create new Troubles.

One of the tributary Princes rebels.

The People did not long enjoy the Happineſs they began to taſte under the Government of ſo wiſe a Prince, for he dy'd in the twenty ninth Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son Tay-kang.

TAY-KANG, the Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty nine Years.

Tay-kang, third Emperor erects ſeveral Principalities.

HE began his Reign by erecting ſeveral Territories into Principalities, which he divided among his five Brothers, in order to diminiſh the Jealouſy they might entertain on ſeeing him preferr'd; but this was the only wiſe thing he did during his Reign.

Very different from his Predeceſſors, who were employ'd in governing the State, he abandon'd the Care of it, to give himſelf up to Wine and Women, with whom his Palace ſwarm'd. He ſpent intire Days in the Woods, hunting wild Beaſts; his Horſes and Dogs laid waſte the Plains, and deſtroy'd the Harveſts. The People in general complain'd heavily of this Tyranny; but Cries and Remonſtrances proving ineffectual, they were at length driven to Deſpair, and revolted.

Is depoſed by I.

One of his principal Officers, nam'd I, who was General, and had the entire Confidence of the Army, undertook to depoſe him; accordingly, in concert with the Grandees of the Empire, he ſeiz'd the Prince in the Woods, where he had been an Inhabitant for three Months, and ſending him into Exile, ſet his youngeſt Brother nam'd Chong-kang on the Throne. This Revolution, which happen'd in the forty ſeventh Year of the Cycle, was brought about without the leaſt Diſturbance, not one appearing in behalf of the depoſed Monarch.

CHONG-

CHONG-KANG, the fourth Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

Cycle III. Year before Chriſt 2217. Chong-kang, fourth Emperor.

THE Years that paſs'd from the Depoſition to the Death of Tay-kang are not reckon'd to the Reign of Chong-kang, becauſe he conſtantly refus'd to take the Title of Emperor during his Brother's Life. This Conduct was no leſs prudent than modeſt; he was afraid that I, who had Power and Credit enough to dethrone his Brother, would one day ſerve him in the ſame Manner. Nevertheleſs, as he was beholden to him for the Crown, he found means of providing for his own Security, without being wanting in point of Gratitude. He declar'd that he could not be without the Counſel of ſo able a Miniſter as I, and deſir'd to have him near his Perſon. I was caught in the Snare, not doubting but ſoon to get the Aſcendant over the Prince, and govern the Empire in his Name. The Command of the Army being incompatible with this Employment, Chong-kang gave it to Chew, an able Officer, of approv'd Fidelity.

I plots the Deſtruction of the Imperial Family.

I, ſoon perceiving that he had no Share either in the Emperor's Favour, or Confidence, vow'd in Revenge to deſtroy the Imperial Family; yet he conceal'd his Reſentment: But finding he could not execute his Deſign while Chew was at the Head of the Troops, and that he had no Hopes of corrupting ſo faithful a Subject, he attempted ſeveral times to make the Prince jealous of him, but in vain; nor did he ſucceed any better in his Contrivance to deſtroy him. His laſt Shift was to gain the Grandees by his Bounty; and he had the Addreſs artfully to inſinuate himſelf into the Confidence and Favour of the Prince who was to inherit the Crown, till he had an Opportunity of effecting his Plot without Hazard. In the mean time Tay-kang dy'd the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle, when Chong-kang aſſum'd the Title of Emperor.

Cycle IV. Year before Chriſt 2157.

The ſecond Year, or, according to others, the ſixth of this Cycle, there happen'd a remarkable Eclipſe of the Sun, at the Time of its Conjunction with the Conſtellation Fang (N). Two Aſtronomers, nam'd Hi and Ho (†), who preſided in the Tribunal of the Mathematics, were put to Death, becauſe being overcome with Wine they had not foretold this Eclipſe; and that by a like Neglect to calculate and obſerve the Motions of the Stars, they had diſturb'd the Order of the Kalendar, entruſted by the Emperor to their Care, which is a capital Crime. It is the Opinion of ſome that theſe Mathematicians ſecretly favour'd the Treaſon of I, and ſuffer'd partly on that account.

Chong-kang dy'd the thirteenth Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son Ti-ſyang, the Year following.

TI-SYANG, the Fifth Emperor, reign'd Twenty ſeven Years.

Ti-ſyang, fifth Emperor.

THE Imprudence of this Prince was the Cauſe of the Ruin of himſelf, and almoſt of his whole Family. Inſtead of following his Father's Example, by keeping I out of all conſiderable Employments, Ti-ſyang put his whole Confidence in him; nay, was ſo blind, as to deprive the faithful Chew of his Command of the Army, and give it the Traitor, who by cringing and and flattering was become his Favourite.

I forces the Emperor to fly.

I, ſeeing himſelf reſtor'd to this important Poſt, which Chong-kang had depriv'd him of, began to think of executing his long-conceal'd Deſign. He firſt gain'd the Affections of the Soldiers; by degrees he accuſtom'd them to pay more Regard to his Orders than the Emperor's, and thus drew them over to his Intereſt. In ſhort, he ſet on Foot ſo many Intrigues and Conſpiracies, that the Emperor was forc'd to fly for Refuge to the Courts of two Tributary Princes his Relations.

I, during the Time he was in Favour, made a World of Creatures, whom he rais'd to the chief Poſts in the Empire; yet fearing leſt the other tributary Princes ſhould join the Emperor, he durſt not ſo ſoon declare his Revolt: but having Recourſe to his uſual Stratagems and Artifices, he wrote the Emperor a very ſubmiſſive Letter, full of Proteſtations of Fidelity, intreating him to return to his Palace, and aſſur'd him he would ſoon be convinc'd by Experience, that he had not a Subject more devoted than himſelf to his Intereſt and Service. He added that they were his Majeſty's greateſt Enemies who had given him ſuch ill-grounded Suſpicions; in effect, he accus'd them falſly of ſeveral Crimes, for which they were either baniſh'd or condemn'd to die, and their Places fill'd with Creatures of his own.

Is himſelf ſlain by Han-tſo.

He thought that he was upon the Point of enjoying the Fruit of his deteſtable Crimes, when he periſh'd himſelf by a like piece of Treachery. Among his Creatures there was one Han-tſo, a diſſembling, artful Man, whom he moſt confided in, and to whom he had given full Power over the Army. This ambitious Villain imagin'd he ſhould mount the Throne himſelf, if he could deſtroy both his Benefactor, and his Sovereign, at the ſame time; and had laid his Plot in ſuch a Manner, that he thought he could not fail of Succeſs; for having order'd ſome Soldiers, who were intirely devoted to him, to aſſaſſinate I, as he was hunting, hunting, he gave out that it was done by the Emperor's Orders; and the Death of I was look'd on as a juſt Puniſhment due to a rebellious Subject.

The Emperor and his Family deſtroy'd.

To diſpatch the Emperor, he made uſe of the following Contrivance: He ſent for Kyau, the eldeſt Son of I, who was an active, violent young Man; and exciting him to revenge his Father's Death, furniſh'd him ſecretly with a Body of his Troops for that Purpoſe. Kyau, marching towards the Emperor, who had not time to gather many Forces, defeated his Army entirely, kill'd him with his own Hand, and afterwards extirpated his whole Family.

The Empreſs alone eſcap'd his Fury, who being pregnant, with much Difficulty got to the Mountains. Han-tſo immediately ſeiz'd the Crown, and to reward him who had ſo well ſerv'd his ambitious Views, erected certain Lands into a Principality, which he conferr'd on him.

HAN-TSO, an Uſurper, reign'd Forty Years.

Han-tſo, an Uſurper.

THE Empreſs, who took refuge among the Shepherds in the Mountains, was there deliver'd of a Son, whom ſhe nam'd Shau-kang, and brought up unknown to any body; ſo that the Birth of this Prince was a Secret for ſeveral Years, and he arriv'd to an Age of Maturity before the Uſurper heard of it, who immediately caus'd a ſtrict Search to be made for him; but the Prince being inform'd of it, retir'd, and became a Domeſtic at the Court of one of the Tributary Princes, where he paſs'd for a Shepherd's Son. But his Maſter perceiving ſomething grand and noble in his Air and Behaviour, beyond what could be expected from a low Birth and Country Education, he ſent for him one Day; and in private aſk'd him ſeveral Queſtions, concerning his Family, in ſo very kind a Manner, that Shau-kang, judging he ought not to diſſemble the Matter, told him ingenuouſly all the Misfortunes of his Houſe, as he had heard them related by his Mother. The Prince, who was acquainted with them himſelf, embrac'd him tenderly, and gave him his Daughter in Marriage, with part of his Principality for a Portion. Shau-kang having now a better Opportunity of ſhewing his excellent Qualities, made it appear, that he was worthy of the Throne.

CYCLE V. Year before Chriſt 2097.

His Father in Law without Delay wrote to all the Miniſters and Nobles, who were in the Intereſt of the late Emperor; and being ſure of having the People on his Side, who abhorr'd the Tyrant, and wiſh'd for their lawful Sovereign, he rais'd an Army, and the eighteenth Year of the Cycle attack'd Han-tſo, who making no great Reſiſtance, was defeated, taken Priſoner, and put to an infamous Death. At the ſame Time Shau-kang aſcended the Throne of his Anceſtors with general Acclamations.

SHAU-KANG, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Twenty two Years.

Shau kang, ſixth Emperor.

AS ſoon as Shau-kang was inaugurated, he order'd the General of his Forces to purſue the Accomplices of the Uſurper and Murtherer of his Father. Kyau ſtood on his Defence, but his little Army being cut to pieces he was taken Priſoner, and beheaded. By the Death of theſe Rebels, Tranquillity was eſtabliſh'd in the Empire, the Laws re-aſſum'd their former Vigour, and the Emperor frequently aſſembled the Tributary Princes to reform the Abuſes that had crept into the ſeveral parts of the Government. His Orders were exactly obey'd, and the People liv'd with Satisfaction under ſo wiſe an Adminiſtration. His Reputation drew Embaſſies from foreign Princes, and his Reign was as glorious as peaceable. He dy'd in the fortieth Year of the Cycle, and the next Year his Son Ti-ſhu ſucceeded him.

TI-SHU, Seventh Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

Ti-ſhu, ſeventh Emperor.

THIS Reign offers nothing remarkable; the ſovereign Authority, which was ſo firmly eſtabliſh'd by the late Emperor, and the Reputation that he on the Throne had acquir'd for Arms, kept the Princes, the Great Men, and the common People in perfect Obedience. The Empire enjoy'd a profound Peace, nor durſt any body diſturb it; there were indeed ſome Commotions towards the Sea-Coaſt, but they were quell'd as ſoon as they aroſe. This Prince dy'd the fifty ſeventh Year of the Cycle, and the Year following his Son Ti-whay aſcended the Throne.

TI-WHAY, Eight Emperor, reign'd Twenty ſix Years.

Ti-whay, eighth Emperor. Art of Navigation known early.

PEACE and good Order had put the Empire in ſo flouriſhing a Condition, that the neighbouring Nations ſent Ambaſſadors in the ſixtieth Year of the Cycle, to the new Emperor, offering to put themſelves under his Protection, and pay an annual Tribute. It appears by the Hiſtory, that the Ambaſſadors came by Sea, and conſequently that the Art of Navigation was then known.

CYCLE VI. Year before Chriſt 2037.

This Prince growing effeminate, during a long Peace, became a Slave to his Pleaſures; he ſpent the reſt of his Life ſhut up in his Palace, among his Women and Eunuchs, without ever ſhewing shewing himself to the People, and left the Care of the Goverment intirely to his Ministers. He dy'd the twenty third Year of the Cycle, and the twenty fourth was succeeded by his Son Ti-mang.

DYN. I. HYA.

CYCLE VI. Year before Christ 2037.

TI-MANG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Eighteen Years.

THIS Reign was much like the former; the Prince was not indeed so addicted to Pleasure as his Father, but his Life was equally indolent and idle; all that he did worth Notice, was removing his Court towards the Yellow River, and visiting some of the Maritime Parts of his Dominions. He dy'd in the fortieth Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Ti-sye, who began his Reign the Year following.

Ti-mang, 9th Emperor.

TI-SYE, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Sixteen Years.

THIS Prince was commendable for his Love of Justice, as well as his Care to prevent Disturbances, and maintain Peace in the Empire. The petty Sovereigns of the neighbouring Nations, who were become his Tributaries, came in Person to do him Homage, and put themselves under his Protection; to reward their Fidelity, he honour'd them with certain Titles of Dignity and Distinction. He dy'd the fifty seventh Year of the Cycle, leaving the Crown to his Son Ti-pû-kyang.

Ti-sye, 10th Emperor.

TI-PU-KYANG, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Fifty nine Years.

IT is surprising, that during so long a Reign, nothing should happen worthy a Place in the Chinese History; which only applauds the Equity of this Emperor, and the Tranquillity of his State.

Ti-pû-kyang, 11th Emp.

He dy'd in the fifty-sixth Year of the Cycle. His Son Kong-kya, whom he had nominated his Successor, gave Way to the Power of his Uncle Ti-kyong, who forcing him out, usurp'd the Throne; but at the end of forty three Years he recover'd the Possession.

CYCLE VII. Year before Christ 1917.

TI-KYONG, Twelfth Emperor, reign'd Twenty one Years.

THIS Usurper ascended the Throne peaceably the fifty-seventh Year of the Cycle; and to deprive Kong-kya of all Hopes of ever recovering it, nominated his Son Ti-kin his Successor. This is all the History says of a Prince, whom Ambition had rendered unjust and unnatural. He dy'd the seventeenth Year of the Cycle.

Ti-kyong, 12th Emperor.

CYCLE VIII. Year before Christ 917.

TI-KIN, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty one Years.

THE Usurpation continued as long under the Son as the Father, but his Debauches rendring him contemptible and odious to the People, some of the feudatory Princes studied to depose him. Nevertheless, he possess'd the Throne till his Death, which happen'd in the thirty-eighth Year of the Cycle; but he could not secure it to his Son, it being restor'd to the Prince, who had been dispossess'd by his Uncle.

Ti-kin, 13th Emperor.

KONG-KYA, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty one Years.

THIS Prince, who was the lawful Heir of the Throne, did not answer the People's Expectation. More than forty Years of Adversities should have taught him to govern his Passions; instead of that, as soon as he got the Power in his Hands, he gave himself wholly up to them, and became the most lewd and effeminate Prince that ever reign'd.

Kong-kya, 14th Emperor.

He left the Government of the State to his Ministers, of whom he made a bad Choice, bestowing the most important Places on Flatterers rather than Persons of Merit; and to applaud his Extravagancies was sufficient to entitle a Man to the principal Employments of the Empire.

His Conduct brought him in such Contempt, that the tributary Princes refus'd to pay him Homage, and a voluptuous Course of Life had effeminated him to that Degree, that he durst not use his Authority, to bring them to their Duty.

Ching-tang, the Founder of the following Dynasty was born the fifth Year of the Cycle, and the ninth Kong-kya yielded the Crown, by his Death, to his Son Ti-kau.

CYCLE IX. Year before Christ 1857.

TI-KAU, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd Eleven Years.

BY the Vices of the late Emperor the Throne began to totter in his Family; nor did his Son labour to fix it more secure: But copying after his Father, he made his Palace the Seat of the most infamous Pleasures; and shortning his Days by excessive Debauchery, dy'd in the twentieth Year of the Cycle, his Son Ti-fa succeeding him.

Ti-fa, 16th Emperor.

TI-FA, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Nineteen Years.

HISTORY ſays nothing either of the Vices or Virtues of this Emperor, mentioning only the Homage which was pay'd him by the tributary Princes on his Advancement to the Throne, and his Misfortune in being the Father of Kya, the moſt wicked of all Men; who ſucceeded him in the fortieth Year of the Cycle, (Ti-fa dying the Year before,) and was the laſt Prince of this Dynaſty.

KYA, Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Fifty two Years.

Kya, 17th Emperor the Nero of China.

THE Cruelty and infamous Actions of this Emperor have caus'd him to be look'd on as a Monſter. His Name is ſtill as odious in China, as that of Nero is in Europe; and one cannot give a bad Prince a worſe Character than to ſay, He is another Kya. He was indeed born with good Qualities, and endow'd with extraordinary Strength; but theſe Advantages were totally obſcur'd by the Vices to which he abandon'd himſelf.

He had a Wife ſtill more wicked and cruel than himſelf, whoſe Orders he blindly obey'd. He made nothing of ſhedding the Blood of his Subjects every Day, to pleaſe the Humour of this barbarous Princeſs; and both of them carry'd their Brutality to ſhameful Exceſſes. Kya cauſed a pretty large Space of Ground to be dug, reſembling a Lake, and filling it with Wine, ordered three thouſand of his Subjects to jump into it. There was a private Apartment in the Palace, where, by the Order, and in the Preſence of the Emperor and Empreſs, the moſt abominable Vices were committed.

CYCLE X.
Year before Chriſt 1797.

Theſe ſcandalous Proceedings turning the Hearts of the whole Empire againſt them, the Princes, Great Men, and People were on the Point of taking up Arms, but were reſtrain'd by the chief Miniſters; who having ſtill ſome Remains of Tenderneſs for his Perſon, repreſented in an humble Manner, the imminent Danger which his licentious Tyranny expoſed him to. But theſe Remonſtrances only made him more furious; one of the Miniſters, who ſpoke to him, being condemn'd and executed in his Preſence. However the Rage of the Emperor did not abate the Zeal of theſe wiſe Miniſters; they addreſs'd a Memorial to him, wherein they boldly reproach'd him with his Murders, his Cruelty, and the horrid Actions of his Life. He had ſcarce read it, when tranſported with Fury, he reſolv'd to put the Authors to Death.

Ching-tang, one of the tributary Princes, who was moſt eſteem'd for his Wiſdom and Virtue, and deſcended from Whang-ti, having join'd his Remonſtrances to thoſe above-mention'd, was for his Zeal caſt into Priſon, the twenty firſt Year of the Cycle; but he did not long remain confin'd.

Is oppoſed by his Subjects.

Theſe Violences, which encreas'd every Day, cauſing all the Orders of the State to unite againſt the Tyrant; they unanimouſly choſe Ching-tang to ſupply his Place, and forc'd him to proclaim War againſt the Emperor; in doing which, this virtuous and diſintereſted Prince declar'd, he had no Right to the Crown, and that he took up Arms, only to bring the Emperor to Reaſon, and a Senſe of his Duty. His Army was ſoon completed, each of the Princes furniſhing him with Troops. The Emperor on his Side began to raiſe Forces; but the Diſaffection was ſo general that he could only bring together a handful of Men. Nor had he better Succeſs, for all his fair Promiſes, with the Tartars, by whom he was equally abhorr'd.

Feigns Repentance,

Seeing himſelf thus abandon'd by every body, he had Recourſe to Diſſimulation; he acknowledged his Crimes, and ſeem'd to repent, deſiring no other Favour than that they would grant him his Life.

Ching-tang hereon relented, and believing this Change to be ſincere, not only ſpared his Life, but reſtor'd him the Crown; then quitting the Command of the Army, he return'd into his own little State, ſetting an Example of Moderation and Diſintereſtedneſs, which was admir'd by the whole Empire.

The Emperor was ſcarce re-ſettled on the Throne, but he fell again to his old Vices; nay, raiſing Forces in haſte, he march'd againſt Ching-tang, whom he treated as a Traitor and Rebel. But when the two Armies met, the Emperor's Soldiers deſerted to Ching-tang, who had put himſelf in a Poſture of Defence, and throwing their Arms at his Feet, acknowledg'd him for their Sovereign.

Kya, who had now no other Courſe but to fly, baniſh'd himſelf, by going out of the Empire; and after three Years Exile, ended a Life which has render'd his Name and Memory odious to Poſterity.

The Second DYNASTY, call'd SHANG, which comprehends Twenty eight Emperors, in the Space of Six hundred forty four Years.

DYN. II. SHANG. CYCLE X. Year before Chriſt 1797.

CHING-TANG, Firſt Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

Ching-tang, 1ſt Emperor.

THIS Prince aſcended the Throne the thirty ſecond Year of the Cycle, and gave to the Imperial Family the Name of Shang; which belong'd to the little State he had long govern'd in Quality of a King, or tributary Prince. His Modeſty, Gentleneſs, Juſtice and Application to Affairs, had already gain'd him the Admiration of the People, and he was acknowledg'd Emperor by all the Provinces, with univerſal Applauſe. He alone thought himſelf incapable of ſuſtaining ſo weighty a Burden, and aſſembled his Miniſters, and the Grandees of his Court, no leſs than three times, in order to reſign a Crown, which, he ſay'd, any other would wear more worthily than himſelf. He added, that it was ſufficient for him, that he had deliver'd his Country from the Perſecution of the Tyrant; that he was contented with the ſmall State which Heaven had allotted him; and that it was a great Grief to him to ſit on the Throne to which he was not the lawful Heir.

Inſtance of his Modeſty, and

The Grandees of the Empire perſiſted in remonſtrating to him, that he ſat on it by the particular Direction of Heaven; that Heaven, touch'd with the Misfortunes of the People, had choſen him to be the Deliverer of his Country; and that this appear'd viſible enough from the unanimous Concurrence of all the Orders of the State, who would have no other Sovereign but him.

Ching-tang, whoſe Conduct was ſincere, yielded at length to the preſſing Inſtances of the Nobles, and govern'd the Empire with the ſame Modeſty as had induc'd him to refuſe it. He immediately abrogated the cruel Laws of his Predeceſſor, and eſtabliſh'd others full of Wiſdom and Equity. A Miniſter nam'd I-in, whoſe Merit, Prudence, and Fidelity were perfectly well known to him, being honour'd with his Confidence, was plac'd at the Head of his Council, and aſſign'd the Command of his Armies. The Soldiers, who before had been us'd to plunder, were brought under the ſtricteſt Diſcipline, and in a ſhort time Order and Tranquillity reign'd throughout the Provinces. Every Place rung with the Benedictions which the People heap'd upon a Prince ſo ſtudious to make them happy. He caus'd to be engraven on all the Veſſels, which were for the Uſe of the Palace, the moſt eminent Maxims of Morality; that both himſelf and his Officers might have continually before their Eyes thoſe Principles by which they ought to ſquare their Conduct.

Tenderneſs for his Subjects.

He gave a very ſignal Proof of his Tenderneſs towards his Subjects, in the Time of a univerſal Drought, (which laſted ſeven Years, without one Drop of Rain, and perhaps is the ſame mention'd in Geneſis (P)) attributing ſuch a Calamity to his own Faults, he devoted himſelf a Victim for the Welfare of his People; after that he had obſerv'd a rigorous Faſt, he laid aſide the Ornaments of his Dignity, had his Hair cut off, which then was worn very long, and being bare-footed, in the Poſture of a Criminal, lifted up his Hands towards Heaven, and entreated the Lord to ſpare his Subjects, and let the whole Weight of his Wrath fall on him alone. Hiſtory relates, that at the End of his Prayer the Sky became cover'd with Clouds, and a general Rain follow'd, which render'd the Earth fruitful, and reſtored Plenty. The Death of this Prince, which happen'd the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, put the whole Empire in Mourning, and every one lamented for him as if he had loſt his Father.

His eldeſt Son Tay-ting dying before him, the Crown devolv'd to his Grandſon nam'd Tay-kya.

TAY-KYA, Second Emperor, reign'd Thirty three Years.

Tay-kya, 2d Emperor.

THE Beginning of the Reign of this Prince made all afraid of his Adminiſtration; far from treading in the Steps of his Grandfather, his Conduct was directly oppoſite, and ſuch as was likely to draw on him the Contempt and Averſion of his Subjects. I-in, that wiſe Miniſter, already mention'd, in whom Ching-tang placed his whole Confidence, made uſe of his Authority, which was very great, to remonſtrate to the new Emperor the Abuſes that he made of a Power, which Heaven had intruſted him with, ſolely for the Good of his People. He related to him the Examples of Divine Wrath, on vicious Princes, and endeavour'd to inſpire him with the Love of Virtues proper for a Sovereign.

(P) That is Gen. 41, according to P. Couplet *. But we ſee no Reaſon why they ſhould be the ſame, which would be to ſuppoſe this Famine to have afflicted all Countries over the Earth, at leaſt from Egypt to China; beſides the Chineſe Famine falls about the Year 1760 before Chriſt, that of Egypt in 1708.

DYN. II. SHANG. Cycle X. Year before Christ 1797.

As the young Prince gave no Attention to the wholesome Advice of so wise a Minister, this latter bethought himself of an Expedient; the Rashness of which could hardly be excus'd, if his Integrity and the Uprightness of his Intentions had not been well known. He caus'd a House to be built near the Tomb of the late Emperor, and there shut up Tay-kya, that he might have Time to reflect on his ill Conduct; and form himself, over the Ashes of his Grandfather, to those Virtues of which he was so perfect a Pattern. At the same time he declared himself Guardian both of the Prince and the Empire. The Emperor, who had been blinded by the Splendor of his high Fortune, profited by his Disgrace, and for three Years together made wholesome Reflections on the Misfortunes which his Misconduct had plung'd him into, and on the Virtues requisite for governing a great Empire. When the Sincerity of his Change could be no longer doubted of, the Minister himself went to him; and conducting him to the Throne, from whence he had made him descend, proclaim'd him Emperor a second time, and caus'd him to be acknowledg'd by all the People: who unanimously loaded with Praises both the Docility of the Prince and the Moderation of the Minister.

Bold Proceeding of a prime Minister.

Cycle XI. Year before Christ, 1737.

Tay-kya took the severe Behaviour of his Minister to him very kindly, always respected him, as if he had been his Father, and followed his Counsels in every thing. Thus he govern'd the Empire with much Wisdom. The tributary Princes, who had begun to revolt, return'd with Joy to their Duty; and all the Orders of the State were perfectly submissive, while this Prince liv'd. He dy'd the seventeenth Year of the Cycle; his Successor was Vo-ting, another Grandson of the Founder of this Dynasty.

VO-TING, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty nine Years.

Vo-ting, 3d Emperor.

THIS Prince, who descended from Ching-tang, did not disgrace the Blood from whence he sprung, but was Heir to his Virtues, as well as to his Crown. Like him, he plac'd all his Confidence in I-in, but this wise Minister dy'd in the eighth Year of his Reign, and the twenty-fifth of the Cycle; when the Emperor, to testify his Gratitude and Esteem for so great a Person, honour'd his Memory by pompous Obsequies, which were worthy the Imperial Majesty. The loss of the Father was repair'd by his Son I-pû, who was endow'd with the same great Qualities, and equally merited the Confidence of the following Emperors. Vo-ting dy'd in the forty-seventh Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Brother Tay-keng.

TAY-KENG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

Tay-keng, 4th Emperor.

Cycle XII. Year before Christ 1677.

HISTORY relates nothing of this Emperor and the two following, except the Year they began their Reigns, and the Year they dy'd. This Emperor dy'd the eleventh Year of the Cycle, and his Son Syau-kya succeeded him.

SYAU-KYA, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

Syau-kya, 5th Emperor.

ALL we know of this Emperor is, that he reign'd peaceably like his Father, assisted by the same Minister, whose Counsels he follow'd, and dy'd the twenty-eighth Year of the Cycle. He was succeeded by his Brother Yong-ki.

YONG-KI, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Twelve Years.

Yong-ki, 6th Emperor.

THIS Prince was the Son of Vo-ting, but not by the same Mother as the two preceding Emperors. Some Disturbances began in his Reign, by certain tributary Kings, or petty Princes, refusing to come, according to Custom, to the Assembly, which the Emperors held from time to time. He dy'd the fortieth Year of the Cycle, the Crown descending to his Brother Tay-vû.

TAY-VU, Seventh Emperor, reign'd Sixty Years.

Tay-vû, 7th Emperor.

Cycle XIII. Year before Christ 1617.

Wise Answer of a Minister.

HE was Son of the same Mother as Yong-ki. It is reported that at his Accession to the Crown, a Mulberry-Tree in the Palace was cover'd with Leaves in seven Days, and three Days after became wither'd. The Prince was terrify'd at this Accident, which he look'd upon as foreboding some Revolution or great Misfortune. He therefore consulted I-pû, and desir'd to know what he thought of it; that Minister answer'd, "that Virtue directs Omens, "and renders them good or bad. Govern your Subjects with Justice, continued he, and no-"thing will be able to disturb your Repose."

The Emperor receiv'd Advantage by this Lesson. His Zeal and Application to administer Justice to his People were so great, that he gave Audience daily betimes in the Morning, and did not end it till he had heard all the Parties who appear'd. His Love of Justice made him ador'd by the People, who reckon'd him equal to the greatest of his Predecessors. The tributary tary Princes never abſented themſelves from the Aſſemblies convoked by him, and his Orders were always punctually obſerv'd. DYN. II. SHANG.

Among the Laws, which he either eſtabliſh'd or reviv'd, one was, that in every Town a certain Number of old People ſhould be maintain'd out of the publick Treaſure, which Cuſtom is ſtill kept up. After he had reign'd in Peace ſeventy five Years, he dy'd in the fifty-fifth Year of the Cycle, in the Province of Ho-nan, whither he had remov'd his Court, and was ſucceeded by his Son Chong-ting. Cycle XIII. Year before Chriſt 1617.

CHONG-TING, Eighth Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

THE frequent Inundations of the Whang-ho, or Yellow River, oblig'd this Emperor to abandon the City in the Province of Shen-ſi, where he kept his Court, and to remove it, firſt into the Province of Ho-nan, and afterwards into that of Pe-che-li. His Reign was diſturb'd by the Inhabitants to the South of the River Yang-tſe-kyang, who made Irruptions into his Provinces, and committed all ſorts of Rapines. He immediately ſent Forces, who cut theſe Banditti in Pieces, and by that means prevented the like Inroads for the future. This Expedition re-eſtabliſh'd Peace in the Empire; but the Emperor did not long enjoy the Fruits of his Victory, for Death ſeiz'd him the eighth Year of this Cycle, and his Brother Vay-jin aſcended the Throne. Chong-ting, 8th Emperor. Cycle XIV. Year before Chriſt 1557.

VAY-JIN, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Fifteen Years.

AT this Time began the Civil Wars between the Brothers and Children of the deceas'd Emperors, for the Right of Succeſſion. Theſe Wars laſted near two hundred Years, but Hiſtory mentions no Particulars about them. All that we find concerning this Emperor, is, that he was reſpected and belov'd of his Subjects; that he dy'd in the twenty-third Year of the Cycle, and Ho-tan-kya his Brother ſucceeded him. Vay-jin, 9th Emperor.

HO-TAN-KYA, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Nine Years.

HE fix'd his Court in a City of the Province of Ho-nan, ſituated on an Eminence, which prevented its being overflow'd by the Inundation of the Whang-ho. There is nothing remarkable related of this Prince, who dy'd in the thirty-third Year of the Cycle, and left the Crown to his Son Tſû-yê, who was very worthy of ſucceeding him. Ho tan-kya, 10th Emp.

TSU-YE, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Nineteen Years.

THIS Emperor had had a very prudent and able Ko-lau, or Prime Miniſter, call'd Yen; by following whoſe Counſels he preſerv'd the Empire in profound Peace, and kept the Tributary Princes in perfect Submiſſion. Tho' the Emperor never gives Principalities or little States to any but the Sons or Nephews of Emperors, yet he did to this Miniſter; on Condition however, that he ſhould always remain in the Palace near his Perſon, for the Advantage of conſulting him whenever he would; nor was he ſuffer'd to govern in Perſon his little Dominion, till after the Death of this Emperor, which happen'd the fifty-firſt Year of the Cycle, his Son Tſû-ſin ſucceeding him. Tſu-yê, 11th Emperor.

TSU-SIN, Twelfth Emperor, reign'd Sixteen Years.

THE Brothers of the [late] Emperor would have uſurp'd the Crown, to the Prejudice of the lawful Heir, under Pretence of being of an Age more proper for the Government than their Nephew. They had already begun to make Parties, and would have created great Diſturbances by dividing the Grandees of the Empire, if the Ko-lau, Yen, had not by his Authority and Skill put an End to the Conteſt. Theſe were but the Seeds of Ambition, which afterwards will appear more flagrant; when, without regard to either Juſtice or the Right of Blood, we ſhall ſee the Princes uſurping the Inheritance of their Nephews. The Death of the Emperor happen'd in the ſeventh Year of the Cycle, and his Brother Vo-kya ſucceeded him. Tſû-ſin, 12th Emperor. Cycle XV. Year before Chriſt 1497.

VO-KYA, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

TSU-TING, Son of the late Emperor, was not able to reſiſt his Unkle, who uſurp'd the Crown, and enjoy'd it more fortunately than he deſerv'd. The Uſurper's Deſign was to transfer it to his Son; but his Meaſures were diſconcerted by the Addreſs of the lawful Heir, who aſcended the Throne immediately after the Death of Vo-kya, which happen'd in the thirty-ſecond Year of the Cycle. Vo-kya, 13th Emperor.

DYN. II. SHANG.

TSU-TING, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty two Years.

Tsu-ting, 14th Emperor.

TSU-TING could not, without ſecret Indignation, ſee the Crown which belong'd to himſelf on his Unkle's Head. But he diſſembled his Reſentment, and inſinuated himſelf ſo dexterouſly into the Uſurper's Favour, as to gain both his Friendſhip and Confidence. He took his Meaſures with ſo much Wiſdom and Secrecy, that he aſcended the Throne without the leaſt Violence, excluding his Couſin, the Uſurper's Son. He govern'd the Empire with equal Wiſdom, and before his Death gave a great Example of his Modeſty; by leaving the Choice of a Succeſſor to his Miniſters, in caſe they judg'd his Son had not Virtue and Merit enough to govern his Subjects. Accordingly they choſe Nan-keng, the Son of Vo-kya, who had been baniſh'd out of the Empire. Tſu-ting dy'd the fourth Year of this new Cycle, and Nan-keng ſucceeded him.

Leaves the Choice of a Succeſſor to his Miniſters.

CYCLE XVI. Year before Chriſt 1437.

NAN-KENG, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

Nan keng, 15th Emperor.

ALTHO' Nan-keng was agreeable to the Miniſters, yet their Choice was not generally approv'd of, the Provinces declaring for the Son of the late Emperor. So that there were two powerful Parties in the State, which made cruel War on each other; but the Party of Nan-keng being the ſtronger, kept him in Poſſeſſion of the Empire. He remov'd his Court into the Province of Ho-nan. This Prince was ſucceeded by Yang-kya, the Son of Tſu-ting.

YANG-KYA, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

Yang-kya, 16th Emp.

THE Diviſions in the Imperial Family caus'd great Troubles in the Empire. The Tributary Princes began to withdraw their Obedience from their Sovereign, openly refuſing to pay the Tribute; and were on the Point of rendring their little Governments independant, which would have endanger'd the Overthrow of the Monarchy, when the Emperor dy'd, in the thirty-ſixth Year of the Cycle; and was ſucceeded by Pwan-keng, his Brother, who uſurp'd the Throne, to the Prejudice of his Nephew.

PWAN-KENG, (a) Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty eight Years.

Pwan-keng, 17th Emp.

THIS Prince, altho' an Uſurper, was the Reſtorer of the Empire, by his Merit, and Application to Government. He kept his Court in the Province Shan-ſi, and began his Reign with reviving the ancient Laws of Ching-tang, which had been in a manner aboliſh'd, thro' the Negligence of his Predeceſſors. He took that great Emperor for his Pattern, and endeavour'd to imitate him. He made it a Rule, never to intruſt the important Charges, either of his Court, or Empire, to any but thoſe of his Subjects who had moſt Capacity and Merit. He puniſh'd with Severity the leaſt Tendency to Rebellion. In ſhort he eſtabliſh'd ſo good Order throughout the State, that the Tributary Princes all return'd to their Obedience, paid him the uſual Tribute, and renewed their Homage. Being ſenſible that the Uſurpation of the Brothers of the Emperors was the Cauſe of the late Troubles, he reſolv'd to remedy an Evil which he was guilty of himſelf, and made an Order to ſecure the Crown to their Children. However, this Decree, ſo wiſe, and proper to prevent new Diſturbances, was of no uſe, with reſpect to himſelf; for in as much as he dy'd without Iſſue, in the fourth Year of the Cycle, his Brother Syau-ſin ſucceeded him.

CYCLE XVII. Year before Chriſt 1377.

SYAU-SIN, Eighteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty one Years.

Syau-ſin, 18th Emperor.

THIS Emperor inherited the Crown, but not the Virtues of his Brother. He left the Government intirely to his Miniſters, to follow his Pleaſures; and thoſe who flatter'd him in his Exceſſes, and the Love of Idleneſs, had moſt of his Favour. In ſhort his inactive and effeminate Life had like to have deſtroy'd all the good Order, which his Brother had eſtabliſh'd in the Empire. By his Death, which happen'd in the twenty-fifth Year of the Cycle, the Crown fell to his Son Syau-yé.

SYAU-YE, Nineteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty eight Years.

Syau-yé, 19th Emperor.

THIS Prince had an Education ſuitable to his Birth; and the wiſe Governors, who had the Care of it, did not in the leaſt doubt but he was worthy of the Throne he was deſtin'd to. But he no ſooner ſaw himſelf Maſter of this great Empire, but he forgot the the go od Inſtructions that had been given him, and follow'd the pernicious Courſes of his Father, whom he imitated in every thing. He would have been remarkable only for his Vices, and diſorderly Life, if he had not given Being to a Son, who is to this Day reverenc'd, as one of the greateſt and beſt Emperors that China ever had. This Son, nam'd Vû-ting, ſucceeded his Father, who dy'd the fifty-third Year of the Cycle.

DYN. II. SHANG. Cyc. XXVII. Year before Chriſt 1377.

VU-TING, Twentieth Emperor, reign'd Fifty nine Years.

VU-TING was yet young when he aſcended the Throne. He truſted the Government of the Empire with his Prime Miniſter, during his three Years Mourning, and ſhut himſelf up in a Houſe near his Father's Tomb, in order to lament his Death, and to beg of Heaven to aſſiſt him in acquiring the Virtues ſuitable to his Station. The Time of his Mourning being expir'd, he return'd to his Palace; where he ſaw in a Dream a Man, preſented him by Heaven, to be his Prime Miniſter; and as he beheld him attentively, the Features of his Face were ſo ſtrongly imprinted in his Fancy, that he drew an exact Portrait of him, when he awoke. Then he aſſembled his Miniſters, and having related to them his Dream, and ſhew'd the Picture to them, ſent ſome truſty People, to ſeek for the Perſon whoſe Picture they had ſeen. They found him in a Village among a Company of Artificers; his Name was Fû-ywe, a Maſon by Trade. They carry'd him immediately to Court, where a great many Queſtions being propos'd to him, relating to Politics, the Virtues proper for a Sovereign, and the reciprocal Duties of Princes and Subjects, the different Charges of the Empire; &c. he made himſelf admir'd by every one, by the Juſtneſs, the Propriety and Eloquence of his Anſwers

Vû-ting, 20th Emperor. Cycle XVIII. Years before Chriſt 1317.

Then the Emperor addreſſing himſelf to the poor Mechanic, It is you, dear FU-YWE, ſaid he, whom Heaven has choſen to aſſiſt me with your wiſe Leſſons. I look on you as my Maſter, and do you conſider me as an unpoliſh'd Looking-Glaſs, which you are to finiſh; or as a feeble Man, ſtaggering on the Brink of a Precipice, whom you are to guide; or as a dry and barren Soil, which you are to cultivate. Neither flatter me, nor ſpare my Faults, that by the Inſtruction of you and my Miniſters I may acquire the Virtues of my Grandfather CHING-TANG; and reſtore in theſe unfortunate Times the Moderation, Equity, and Mildneſs of his Government.

Fû-ywe proſtrated himſelf according to Cuſtom before the Emperor, whom he found always very ready to receive his Inſtructions. Theſe may be ſeen in the Shu-king, whereof I have given an Abſtract; and by following them Vû-ting not only became a Patern for good Princes, but his Reputation, extending to the moſt diſtant Nations, induc'd them to come and ſubmit themſelves to him.

This Prince dy'd in the fifty-ſecond Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son, call'd Tſû-keng.

TSU-KENG, Twenty firſt Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

THIS Reign was ſo ſhort, and the State in ſuch excellent Order, that the Emperor had no other Care but to preſerve it. He wore the Crown no longer than ſeven Years, leaving it to his Brother Tſû-kya in the fifty-ninth Year of the Cycle.

Tſû-keng, 21ſt Emperor.

TSU-KYA, Twenty ſecond Emperor, reign'd Thirty four Years.

THE great Virtues of Vû-ting, whoſe Loſs was ſtill regretted, render'd the Vices of Tſû-kya more odious. They had not forgot the Wiſdom, Modeſty and Meekneſs of the Father, and they found in the Son a Prince full of Pride and Haughtineſs, who deſpis'd his Subjects, and was given to all manner of Debauchery. Such a diſorderly Conduct occaſion'd many Commotions in the Empire, and ſeem'd to foretell the approaching Ruin of this Dynaſty.

The twenty ſeventh Year of the Cycle is remarkable for the Birth of Ven-vang, whoſe Name is ſtill rever'd on account of his Virtues. The Emperor dy'd the thirty third Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son Lin-ſin.

LIN-SIN, Twenty third Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

THIS Prince was, like his Father, a Slave to his Luſts; and ſo far from taking any Care of his Empire that he not only left the Government of it wholly to his Miniſters, but even forbid them to give him any Accounts of publick Affairs, that he might not be interrupted in his infamous Pleaſures.

AS short as this Reign was, it appear'd too long to the Chinese. They speak of Vû-yê as an impious and wicked Prince, who could not fail to draw on himself the Vengeance of Heaven. He was kill'd by Thunder, as he was hunting, the third Year of the Cycle, his Son Tay-ting succeeding him.

About this time some Islands to the Eastward were peopled by Chinese Colonies; and there are some who say Japan began then to be inhabited.

TAY-TING, Twenty sixth Emperor, reign'd Three Years.

Tay-ting, 26th Emperor.

THIS Emperor began his Reign by declaring War against a Tributary Prince, whose little State was call'd Yen. It is in the Province of Pe-che-li; and Pe-king, which is at present the Metropolis of the Empire, was one of the Cities belonging to it. His Death, which happen'd the sixth Year of the Cycle, hindred him from finishing the War; which was continued by his Son, who succeeded him.

TI-YE, Twenty seventh Emperor, reign'd Thirty seven Years.

Ti-yé, 27th Emperor.

THIS Emperor continuing the War, which his Father had begun, against the Prince of Yen; he gave the Command of his Forces to a General, call'd Ki-lyê, who defeated that little Sovereign, and having driven him out of his Territories, reduc'd him to the Condition of a private Man. The Emperor was so well pleas'd with the Conquest, that he gave that Principality to his General, and made it hereditary to his Family. Ki-lyê govern'd it seven Years, and at his Death his Son Ven-vang succeeded him, who afterwards founded the third Dynasty.

Ti-yé had three Children, two of which were by a Wife of the second Order, who were born before their Mother had the Title of Queen. The third, who was by the Empress, was lawful Heir to the Crown; but being very young, and of no promising Talents, his Father was induc'd to prefer the elder of the two others. The Empress herself to please him came into his Measures: But this Choice was oppos'd by the Ministers, who declar'd it to be contrary to the Imperial Laws, and that they would acknowledge none for their Lord, but the Son of the Empress, nam'd Chew. They had Cause to repent it afterwards, for Chew was a cruel Tyrant; whereas the Prince whom the Emperor had chosen, was indow'd with all the good Qualities requisite for a Sovereign. The Emperor dy'd the forty third Year of the Cycle.

CHEW, Twenty eighth Emperor, reign'd Thirty three Years.

Chew, 28th Emperor, a cruel Tyrant; but exceeded by his Wife Ta-kya.

PRIDE, Luxury, Debauchery, Tyranny, and Cruelty, mounted the Throne with this Prince. He marry'd a Woman nam'd Ta-kya, who was the most beautiful, but at the same time the most barbarous and wicked Person in the whole Empire. She would have all things directed according to her Caprice and imperious Humour; and if the Ministers fail'd to conform to her Opinion, in either their Representations or Counsels, they were immediately driven from the Palace, or condemn'd to Death. To disapprove what was done by her Orders, was accounted Rebellion; and she persuaded her Husband that he could not be absolute Master of his Subjects, unless he made himself dreaded by them. For that Purpose she invented a kind of Punishment, terrible to think of: She caus'd a brazen Pillar to be erected, which being made red hot, by means of a great Fire, the condemn'd Person was forc'd to embrace it, till such time as his Flesh was consum'd to the Bone. It was an agreeable Diversion to her, to see the unhappy Victims of her Fury suffer, and to hear the dreadful Shrieks, caused by the Exquiteness of the Torture.

One of the Ministers of Chew, in order to insinuate himself into his Favour, and merit his Confidence, made him a Present of his Daughter, who was a great Beauty, but at the same time very virtuous. The Daughter, who detested this Action of her Father, resisted with an

an heroic Courage, the criminal Addreſſes of the Emperor; whoſe Love thereat changing of a ſudden into Fury, he ſlew the young Virgin with his own Hands, and cutting her Body in Pieces, caus'd it to be ſerved up at her Father's Table. Another Miniſter was ſo aſtoniſh'd at this Barbarity, that, not being able to contain his Indignation, he took an Opportunity to repreſent the Horror of the Action to the Emperor, who rewarded his Zeal with preſent Death.

DYN. II. SHANG. CYCLE XX. Year before Chriſt 1197.

Theſe cruel Executions did not intimidate the wiſe Ven-vang, who had the Courage vigorouſly to oppoſe ſuch Inhumanities. The Tyrant, who ſtill reſpected his Virtue, did not treat him with the ſame Rigour, as he had done others, but ſent him to Priſon, to puniſh his Raſhneſs, as he call'd it. The principal Subjects of Ven-vang's little State, quite diſmay'd at his Impriſonment, aſſembled themſelves; and believing that they might eaſily obtain their Prince's Liberty by Preſents, that would flatter the Emperor's debauch'd Inclinations, among other things ſent him a young Girl of very great Beauty. Chew, as they had ſurmis'd, was ſo taken with her Charms, that he immediately order'd Ven-vang to be releas'd; whoſe Joy was doubled, to ſee himſelf both freed from his Confinement, and remov'd from ſo corrupt a Court. This Prince was dearly belov'd by his People; and tho' his Dominions were but ſmall, yet he was as much reſpected throughout the Empire, as Chew was hated.

Impriſons Ven-vang.

Ven-vang was eminent for his Sweetneſs of Temper; his Love of Juſtice; the Care he took in having young Men brought up according to the pureſt Maxims of Morality; the good Reception he gave wiſe Men and Philoſophers, which brought a great Number of them to his Court; the Pleaſure he took in hearing their Diſcourſes; his preferring Perſons of Virtue and Merit to Employments; the Reſpect he ſhew'd to thoſe of his Family, who were his Seniors; in ſhort all theſe excellent Qualities join'd to his Modeſty, Frugality, and Application to publick Affairs, gain'd him ſo great Reputation among the Princes, who were his Equals, that ſeveral of them made him the Arbiter of their Differences.

Ven-vang's Character.

It is related, that two petty Kings [or Regulo's] who were always in War about the Limits of their States, having agreed to refer their Pretenſions to his Deciſion: As ſoon as they enter'd his Territories, they obſerv'd that his Subjects ſtrove to outdo one another, by reciprocal Proofs of Friendſhip and Kindneſs; that none durſt even take up any thing which happen'd to be drop'd on the Roads, every one ſaying it did not belong to him; and that thoſe who had Lands, gave a part of them to their reduc'd Friends for their Subſiſtence. When they arriv'd at Court, they were ſurpriz'd at the Unanimity and good Underſtanding, which they found among the Grandees, who were Strangers to Artifice, Diſſimulation and Intrigue.

Inſtance of his good Government.

On ſeeing ſuch great Order in the State, What Buſineſs have we here? ſay'd one of them, What will VEN-VANG think of our Diſputes? What Notion will he have of us? They therefore without proceeding any further in the Buſineſs, inſtantly accommodated the Difference between themſelves; and inſtead of inſiſting on their Rights and Pretenſions, ſtrove who ſhould yield up moſt Lands to the other.

The Reputation of Ven-vang became ſo great, that forty Tributary Princes choſe him for their Sovereign; perceiving that he alone could remedy the Evils which afflicted the Empire. But he dy'd ſoon after he had obtain'd that Dignity, leaving his Principality and his Riches to Vû-vang his ſecond Son, whom he preferr'd to his eldeſt, becauſe he would not enter into his Views of dethroning the Emperor. The eldeſt diſcovered a peculiar Greatneſs of Soul on this Occaſion; for he did not make the leaſt Complaint of any Injuſtice done him: and that he might not diſhonour the Memory of his Father, he retired beyond the River Yang-tſe-kyang towards the Borders of Se-chwen, where he founded the two Kingdoms of Yuê and Hû.

Kingdoms of Yuê and Hû, erected.

In the mean time Chew grew more cruel every Day, as well thro' Habit as the Influence of Ta-kya, who was in effect Sovereign; the Emperor always confirming whatever Laws ſhe propos'd. It is ſaid to be owing to her, that little Feet is accounted one of the greateſt Ornaments of the Sex; her own being very ſmall, ſhe bound them tight with Fillets, affecting to make that paſs for a Beauty which was really a Deformity. However the Women all follow her Example; and this ridiculous Cuſtom is ſo thoroughly eſtabliſh'd, that to have Feet of the natural Size is enough to render them contemptible.

Original of little Feet in China, and of

It is likewiſe ſaid, that the great Number of Candles, which ſhe caus'd to be lighted up in the Palace every Night; to ſupply, as it were, the Abſence of the Sun, and continue the Day, gave riſe to the Feaſt of Lanterns, which is annually celebrated on the fifteenth of the firſt Month the Feaſt of Lanterns.

Chew became daily more hateful to his Subjects, who groan'd under his tyrannical Government. His neareſt Relations ſeeing him running headlong to his Ruin, thought it their Duty to lay before him his ill Conduct. He would have put one of his Uncles to Death, who took that Liberty, if he had not counterfeited Madneſs. However, he impriſon'd him to diſcover whether it was real or pretended; but he acted his part ſo well, that he deceiv'd the Tyrant. Another of them, thinking he ought to run any Riſque to reclaim his Nephew, went to the Palace with ſurpriſing Intrepidity, prepar'd for the worſt that could happen, and was immediately ſtrangled by the Emperor's Orders; who afterwards caus'd his Heart to be pluck'd out, and had the Barbarity to view it for ſome time, not ſo much to ſatisfy his Curioſity, as to ſatiate his Revenge.

Chew's Cruelties.

So great Inhumanities, carry'd to ſuch a Length, provok'd at laſt the whole Empire to revolt. The Princes and Grandees intreated Vû-vang to put himſelf at the Head of an Army, and and give the Tyrant Battle, promiſing to furniſh him with what Forces ſhould be neceſſary. Vû-vang deſir'd Time to conſult what was the Will of Heaven; and in the mean time continued the Preparations for War, which had been put in great Forwardneſs by his Father. As ſoon as he found himſelf in a Condition to declare his Intentions, as if he had the Orders of Heaven, he march'd againſt Chew, who, at the Head of a more numerous Army, advanc'd to meet him. As ſoon as the Signal was given for Battle, the greater part of the Imperial Troops went over to Vû-vang.

Chew burns himſelf and Chew ſeeing himſelf betray'd, fled in Deſpair to his Capital, and entring into his Apartment, ſet it on Fire, that he might not fall into the Hands of a rebellious Subject; this happen'd the ſixteenth Year of the Cycle. Notwithſtanding all the Care that was taken to extinguiſh the Flames, half of the Palace was burnt to Aſhes, and Vû-vang enter'd it as a Conqueror, where the firſt Object which appear'd to him, was the Empreſs, Ta-kya, whom he ſlew at one Stroke with his Sword. Hereupon the Tributary Princes, and the Grandees of the Empire, unanimouſly elected him Emperor, and he became the firſt Founder of the third Dynaſty, call'd CHEW. *

Ta-kya is ſlain.

The Third DYNASTY, call'd CHEW, which comprehends the Reigns of Thirty five Emperors, within the Space of Eight hundred and Seventy three Years.

VU-VANG, Firſt Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

DYN. III. CHEW. Vû-vang, 1ſt Emperor.

THIS new Emperor fix'd the Imperial Seat in the Metropolis of the Province of Shen-ſi, call'd at preſent Si-ngan. He began his Reign, as uſual, with offering Sacrifices to the Lord of Heaven, and re-eſtabliſhing the Laws and Cuſtoms which his Predeceſſor had in ſome meaſure aboliſh'd.

I. He made ſtrict Enquiry into all the Acts of Injuſtice that had been committed in the preceding Reign, and apply'd himſelf to redreſs them.

II. He ſet at Liberty many Perſons of Merit, who had been impriſon'd.

III. He ſent for to Court, Ki-tſû, the Uncle of the Tyrant, who, to ſave his Life had feign'd himſelf mad; and frequently conſulted him in Aſtronomy, Politics, and the Science of Government. His Inſtructions are to be ſeen in the Shu-king, a Book hereafter ſpoken of. The Emperor rewarded this learned Man, by giving him and his Poſterity the Kingdom of Korea, and made it in a manner independant; for they were only oblig'd to come every new Reign to deſire the Conſent and Protection of the Emperor.

Gives Korea to Ki-tſû.

IV. He reſtor'd ſeveral illuſtrious Families, which had been almoſt wholly unnobilitated; and gave the Deſcendants of the Emperor little Sovereignties to ſupport their Rank with Decency.

Erects ſeveral Principalities.

One Prince of the Family of Shin-nong was ſettled in the Province of Shen-ſi; another of the Family of Whang-ti had for his Share a Country in the Province of Hû-quang, that was call'd The Kingdom of Tſû; a third, deſcended from Yau, had ſome Territories about Pe-king, which was nam'd the Kingdom of Sû; another, who was of the Race of Shun, obtain'd Lands in the Province of Ho-nan, under the Title of the Principality of Chin.

V. He erected fifteen other Principalities, which he gave to fifteen of his Relations; not foreſeeing that ſo many Sovereignties, tho' holding of the Crown, would in time become a Source of unhappy Wars. He alſo rewarded ſeveral of his Miniſters with Eſtates not much inferior to the former, and rais'd others to the chief Dignities of the Empire.

The Fame of his Wiſdom and Generoſity reach'd the moſt diſtant Countries; and ſeveral foreign Princes, who refus'd doing homage to Chew, came preſently to pay Vû-vang the ancient Tribute, and put themſelves under his Protection.

Falling ſick, Chew-kong offers his own Life for his Recovery.

Vû-vang having in the ſecond Year of his Reign been attack'd with a dangerous Diſtemper, which it was fear'd would prove fatal, all the Court was alarm'd. Chew-kong, his Prime Miniſter caus'd Sacrifices to be offer'd in the Palace for the Emperor's Recovery; in the midſt of the Ceremony, lifting up his Hands towards Heaven, and praying with a loud Voice, he offer'd his own Life in Sacrifice, to ſave that of a Prince which was of ſuch Importance to the State. The Hiſtory informs us that the Emperor grew better next Day, and in a little time recover'd.

This Action of the Prime Miniſter was greatly applauded; and the Emperor was ſo affected with it, that he inſerted it with his own Hand in the Secret Regiſters, which are kept in the Palace in Coffers of Gold. He govern'd with the Tenderneſs of a Father, and was indefatigable in public Affairs to the Day of his Death; which happen'd the twenty third Year of the Cycle. He was ſucceeded by his Son Ching-vang.

* [Chew, which is] the Name of the Dynaſty, is [both written and] pronounced differently from [Chew] the Name of the late Emperor.

CHING-

DYN. III. CHEW.

CHING-VANG, Second Emperor, reign'd Thirty ſeven Years.

Cycle XXI. Year before Chriſt 1137.

Ching-vang, 2d Emperor.

DURING the tender Years of this Prince, which render'd him incapable of Governing, his Uncle Chew-kong, who was Prime Miniſter, and whoſe Virtues were generally acknowledg'd, took upon him the Care both of the Empire, and the Education of the Emperor: over whom he plac'd an able Governor, capable of inſtructing him in the Royal Virtues; and ſhew'd ſo much Diſintereſtedneſs in the Adminiſtration of Affairs, that the Tributary Princes very readily paid him the cuſtomary Homage.

Nevertheleſs his Virtues could not ſcreen him from the Malice of his Enemies; who perſwaded the Emperor, that he abus'd his Authority, by making a great many Creatures, and deſign'd to uſurp the Imperial Dignity. Theſe Calumnies, which were whiſper'd about, coming to the Miniſter's Ears, he took a Reſolution of retiring from Court; which was an Affliction to all People, who were convinc'd of his Probity, and Zeal for his Nephew's Intereſt. On the contrary, the young Emperor was overjoy'd to be from under the Tuition of his Uncle, and took upon him the Government of Affairs with great Alacrity. But he quickly experienc'd the Weight of the Burthen which he had on him; and the ill Succeſs which conſtantly attended him, having made him ſenſible of his own Incapacity, he ſent for the Secret Records of the Empire, to conſult them, and find out a way to free himſelf from the Difficulties he was plung'd in. In running them over, he met the Place where his Father had minuted down the generous Action of Chew-kong, who had devoted himſelf to Death, to ſave the Emperor's Life. Being ſenſibly affected with ſuch an extraordinary Inſtance of Love in a Subject to his Prince, he grew aſham'd of his Diſtruſt; and perceiving how much he ſtood in need of ſo great a Man, he went himſelf that inſtant to the Place where Chew-kong had retir'd, and with Tears entreated him not to forſake him, but to aſſiſt him with his Counſel. Chew-kong was thus reinſtrated in his former Honours and Dignities, wherein he gave continual Proofs of his Zeal for the Glory of his Prince, and the Good of his State.

Brings back Chew-kong, who had retired from Court.

It is reported of this Emperor, that in the fifth Year of his Reign, growing fond of the Recreations which he had uſed in his Childhood, one Day in play with his youngeſt Brother, by way of Joke, he gave him the Patents of a ſmall Sovereignty. On which the Kolau, Sû ya, his Governor ſay'd, that the Preſent, tho' made in jeſt, became a ſerious Matter, as ſoon as it went out of the Hands of the Sovereign; that a Prince was diſhonour'd by breaking his Word; and that the Law, which oblig'd him not to enter too raſhly into any Engagements, oblig'd him alſo to keep his Promiſe. Thus, at the ſame time, he both did his Brother Favour, and receiv'd ſolid Inſtruction, which was of advantage to him.

Is rebuk'd by his Governor.

The Emperor following the Inſtructions of his firſt Miniſter, govern'd his Dominions with great Wiſdom; by which means he acquir'd ſuch high Reputation, that the King of Cochin-China ſent Ambaſſadors with Preſents, to congratulate him on having a Subject of ſo extraordinary Merit as Chew-kong; and they were receiv'd with the higheſt Marks of Eſteem and Friendſhip. After they had their Audience of Leave to return into their own Country, Chew-kong gave them an Inſtrument, which on one ſide pointed towards the North, and on the oppoſite ſide towards the South, to direct them better on their Way home, than they had been directed in coming to China. This Inſtrument was call'd Chi-nan, which is the ſame Name the Chineſe now give to the Sea-Compaſs; whence it is believ'd that Chew-kong was the Inventer of the Compaſs. (R)

The Compaſs invented.

This great Miniſter, who was ſo greatly admir'd both at home and abroad, dy'd the thirty third Year of the Cycle, in the hundredth Year of his Age; and the Emperor, to ſhew his Gratitude to him by ſome remarkable Token, caus'd him to be bury'd near his Father's Tomb, with the ſame funeral Rites as were cuſtomary at the Interments of the Emperors. Sometime after the Emperor aſſembl'd the States of the Empire, where he order'd that every Prince ſhould forbid the immoderate Uſe of Wine in his Dominions, as being the Source of infinite Misfortunes, and the Deſtruction of Families. This Prince dy'd the fiftieth Year of the Cycle, and left his Crown to his Son, call'd Kang-vang.

KANG-VANG, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty ſix Years.

Kang-vang, 3d Emperor.

Cycle XXII. Year before Chriſt 1077.

THIS Emperor being remarkable for maintaining Peace both at home and abroad, he took the Opportunity of this Tranquillity to apply himſelf to govern his People with Gentleneſs, and endeavour to make them happy.

One of his Maxims was, That the Joy of a Prince depended on that which reign'd among his Subjects; and that he ought not to take any Pleaſure when his Subjects were in Diſtreſs.—— He aſſembled the States frequently, and from time to time viſited the Provinces of his Empire.

He was principally attentive to promote Agriculture, the Care of which he truſted to one of his Miniſters, nam'd Chau-kong. He us'd to decide the Diſputes that aroſe among the Huſbandmen, ſitting under an old Willow-Tree; which was preſerv'd from being cut down, out of Reſpect, and became famous in the Poetry of the Chineſe.

So-

DYN III. CHEU. Cycle XXII Year before Christ 1077.

So ſtrict a Regard was had to Sincerity and keeping Promiſes, that the Priſoners were let out every Morning to till the Lands, and in the Evening return'd to Priſon again. Kang-vang dy'd the twenty fifth Year of the Cycle, extremely lamented by his Subjects, and was ſucceeded by his Son Chau-vang.

CHAU-VANG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Fifty one Years.

Chau-vang, 4th Emp.

ONE ſingle Paſſion, to which this Prince was intirely devoted, eclips'd all his Virtues, and caus'd him to neglect the Care of his Empire. He was ſo given to Hunting, that he minded nothing elſe; the Havock which his Horſes and Dogs made in the Fields, drove the People to Deſpair, who were continually lamenting to ſee their firſt Harveſts ruin'd by an Army of Hunters, which perpetually follow'd him.

Cycle XXIII. Year before Chriſt 1017.

This ill Conduct drew on him the univerſal Hatred of his Subjects, who ſeeing no end of their Sufferings, at length conſpir'd his Death, and invented the following Stratagem, to prevent their being diſcover'd. Knowing that the Emperor, in his return from Hunting, was oblig'd to croſs a River, which was pretty broad, and that Barks were order'd to attend his Paſſage, they prepar'd one ſo built as to fall in Pieces preſently. The Emperor went into it with ſome of his Nobles, but they had ſcarce got to the middle of the River, before the Planks ſeparated at once, and the Veſſel ſunk to the Bottom. Thus periſh'd this Prince, the ſixteenth Year of this Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son Mo-vang.

It is ſaid that in the ſixteenth Year of his Reign, and forty firſt of the former Cycle, Fo was born in India; who was the Author of the abominable Sect of the Bonzas, and of the Doctrine of Metempſychoſis: which was firſt introduc'd into this Empire, the ſixty fifth Year after Chriſt, under the Protection of the Emperor, as will be related in its proper Place.

MO-VANG, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Fifty five Years.

Mo-vang, 5th Emperor.

THE excellent Qualities of this Prince, and his Zeal for Juſtice, ſoon gain'd him the Hearts of his Subjects, and made them the more eaſily forget one remarkable Failing he had, which was an extreme Fondneſs for Horſes. When he viſited the Provinces, he had great Numbers in his Train, and always rode on Horſeback, or in a Chariot drawn by Horſes, moſt magnificently equipp'd; his Pleaſure lay in making a pompous Appearance.

Marches againſt the Tartars.

Some of the Barbarians of the Southern Parts having revolted, he ſent an Army againſt them, commanded by Kau-fû, who intirely defeated them; for which piece of Service the Emperor rewarded him; with the Principality of Chau, in the Province of Shan-ſi. This Succeſs incourag'd him to turn his victorious Arms againſt the Tartars, from which his Son-in-Law endeavour'd to diſſwade him: repreſenting to him that Wars ought never to be undertaken, unleſs there was an abſolute Neceſſity for it; that they were often more prejudicial to the Conquerors than the Conquer'd; that the Deſolation of one's own Country, and the Exhauſting of the Revenues were the ordinary Conſequences of them; and that in ſhort a virtuous Prince was more inclin'd to Peace than War.

His Maxims.

Theſe Remonſtrances proving ineffectual, Mo-vang advanc'd at the Head of a very powerful Army to the Borders of Tartary. The Tartars hearing of his March, made the beſt of their Way into the Heart of their Country, with their Tents and Cattle; ſo that the Emperor finding no Enemies to fight with, was oblig'd to return, after having fatigu'd and impair'd his Army with long and troubleſome Marches. He then repented that he had not taken his Son-in-Law's Advice, and promis'd him never to form an Undertaking of the Kind, without his Approbation. This Prince's Maxim was, That a Sovereign ought always to guard againſt Deceit and Flattery; and that he will be eſteem'd only in Proportion as thoſe who are about him are virtuous.

Cycle XXIV. Year before Chriſt 957.

KONG-VANG, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Twelve Years.

Kong-vang, 6th Emperor.

THIS Prince began his Reign with an Action ſo cruel, that it would have been a perpetual Blot upon him, if he had not made Amends for it, by his future Conduct, which was full of Equity and Juſtice. He often us'd to walk by the Side of a Lake, in a Country call'd Mye, where the moſt beautiful Maidens at thoſe times made their Appearance, with three of whom he fell deſperately in Love; but they perceiving the Danger they were in, abſented themſelves from the Walk. This ſo enrag'd the Emperor, that in the firſt Tranſports of his Fury, he commanded all the Inhabitants of Mye to be maſſacred. He repented this moſt unjuſt and barbarous Action all the Days of his Life; and by a continual Courſe of of Equity and Moderation, which took off the Odium, he merited to be rank'd among the beſt of Princes. He dy'd the twenty third Year of the Cycle, and left the Crown to his Son Ye-vang.

THE Memory of this Prince had been bury'd in Oblivion, if his Negligence had not afforded Matter of Railliery to the Poets of his Time, by whoſe ſatirical Deſcription he is only known. He dy'd in the forty eighth Year of the Cycle, (deſpis'd of all Men,) without being able to ſecure the Crown to his Children; his Brother Hyau-vang ſeizing it by Violence.

HYAU-VANG, Eighth Emperor, reign'd Fifteen Years.

Hyau-vang, 8th Emperor.

THIS Uſurper maintain'd himſelf peaceably on the Throne by his Merit and Addreſs. His only Fault was being over fond of Horſes, whereof he had a great Number; expending large Sums to procure the beſt and moſt rare that were to be had in all Parts. Fi-ſhi, a mean Fellow, whom he had made his Maſter of the Horſe, inſinuated himſelf into his Favour, barely by his Skill in managing Horſes. He us'd to ride them in the Emperor's Preſence, who one Day was ſo delighted with his extraordinary Addreſs, that he gave him a Principality in the Province of Shen-ſi; one of whoſe Deſcendants founding the following Dynaſty, deſtroy'd the Family to which he ow'd his Advancement.

In the time of Hyau-vang, there fell Hail-Stones of ſuch prodigious Bigneſs, that both Men and Beaſts were kill'd with them. He dy'd the third Year of the Cycle, and his Son I-vang ſucceeded him.

I-VANG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Sixteen Years.

I-vang, 9th Emperor.

THE diſorderly Conduct of this Prince and his want of Merit render'd him very contemptible to all his Subjects; he had no Talents, and was ſo timerous that he could neither make any Anſwer to his Miniſters, when they came to him for Orders, or to give an account of their Adminiſtration. He could never bring himſelf to give Audience to foreign Ambaſſadors, or receive in Public the Homage of the Tributary Princes. He dy'd the nineteenth Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded the Year following by his Son Li-vang.

LI-VANG, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Fifty one Years.

Li-vang, 10th Emperor. a Tyrant.

THIS Prince was proud, ſelf-conceited, prodigal, and cruel. The Wealth which he drew from his Subjects by Exactions, could ſcarcely ſatisfy his Paſſion for Riches, which he ſpent laviſhly and without Judgment; the Miſery of his People was extreme, and nothing was heard every where but Complaints and Lamentations. Several Manifeſtos were publiſh'd, repreſenting the cruel Inhumanity of the Emperor, in menacing Terms.

Theſe Clamours and Repinings of an oppreſs'd People only increas'd his Fury; and he caus'd Search to be made after thoſe whom he ſuſpected to be at the Head of the Malecontents, in order to puniſh them with the utmoſt Severity. As he was conſcious how odious he had made himſelf to his Subjects, he ſuſpected that all their Diſcourſe was on his ill Conduct, and therefore he forbid them, on Pain of Death, to converſe together, or even whiſper to one another; ſo that you might ſee all the Inhabitants of the Metropolis, walking the Streets with Eyes caſt down in mournful Silence, and ſhunning each other. Chau-kong, one of his moſt faithful Miniſters, having often in vain remonſtrated to him on the Severity of his Government, ventur'd at length ſo far as to repreſent, that he was not plac'd on the Throne to make his People miſerable; that it was much eaſier to ſtop an impetuous Torrent, than reſtrain the Tongue; that the Methods us'd for that Purpoſe only encreas'd the Violence of it; and that the forc'd Silence, which he had impos'd on his Subjects, ſeem'd to forebode ſomething more dangerous and terrible, than the Liberty which they had of complaining.

The Prediction of this Wiſe Miniſter prov'd but too true; for the fifty ſecond Year of the Cycle the People quite driven to deſpair, like a Torrent which has broken down its Banks, ruſh'd of a ſudden into the Palace, in order to aſſaſſinate the Tyrant; who having fled at the firſt Noiſe of the Tumult, eſcap'd their Fury. But they murder'd all his Family, excepting his youngeſt Son, whom Chau-kong had ſecretly convey'd home, in order to conceal him from the Rage of the Multitude; but they coming to hear of it, beſieg'd the Houſe, and demanded the young Prince with Threats. Being ready to force their way in, Chau-kong, after a ſevere Conflict betwixt his Loyalty and Paternal Affection, at laſt deliver'd them his own Son inſtead of him; whoſe Throat they inhumanly cut before the Father's Face.

DYN. III. CHEW. Cyc. XXVI. Year before Chriſt 837.

Li-vang henceforward liv'd in Obſcurity, a Wanderer, and Fugitive; all Chau-kong could do to appeaſe the People, and to re-eſtabliſh him on the Throne, was to no Purpoſe, ſo that the Throne was vacant for ſome Years.

SWEN-VANG, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Forty ſix Years.

Swen-vang, or Siven-vang, 11th Emp.

LI-VANG, dy'd in his Exile, the tenth Year of the Cycle; and the Throne was fill'd by the young Prince, whom Chau-kong had ſav'd from the Fury of a revolted Nation. This faithful Miniſter having had time to inform the People, after what manner the right Heir to the Crown had been preſerv'd, and how worthy he was of the imperial Dignity, he by Degrees brought them to Obedience; ſo that at the Death of Li-vang, Swen-vang was acknowledg'd Emperor.

As he was ſtill very young, Chau-kong and another no leſs faithful Miniſter, were appointed to be his Tutors, and to take Care of his Education. They acquitted themſelves of this important Employ with great Zeal, and their Royal Pupil was equally obſervant of their Inſtructions. Of this he gave ſufficient Proofs, as ſoon as he was of Age to govern by himſelf; inſomuch that it was ſaid in his Praiſe, that he reſtor'd the happy Times, when the Throne was fill'd by the great Yu and the wiſe Ching-tang.

Reſtores Peace to the Empire,

The Cruelty and Diſorders of the preceding Emperors had driven from Court the Wiſe Men and Philoſophers, who finding they could not put a Stop to theſe Evils, retir'd into the Deſarts and Mountains, there to ſtudy Wiſdom more at Eaſe. The young Emperor recall'd them from their voluntary Exile, and by his kind Treatment and Liberality fix'd them near his Perſon; all the Diſcontent likewiſe which his Father's Tyranny had caus'd was remov'd by his Virtue. The Tributary Princes took a Pleaſure to do him Homage, and imitate him in governing their reſpective States; whereby all the Members of the Empire reſum'd the moſt perfect Subordination.

which he extends beyond the Yang-tſe-kyang.

Some of the Nations of the South, who were ſeparated from China by the great River Yang-tſe-kyang, taking Advantage of the Independency in which they liv'd, plunder'd the neighbouring Provinces; againſt whom Swen-vang ſent an Army commanded by excellent Officers, who quell'd their Arrogance, and forc'd them to ſubmit to the Laws and Cuſtom of the Empire. The Prince dy'd the fifty ſixth Year of the Cycle, and his Son Yew-vang ſucceeded him.

YEW-VANG, Twelfth Emperor, reign'd Eleven Years.

Yew-vang, 12th Emp. Cyc. XXVII Year before Chriſt 777.

THIS Prince had very great Faults, without any of the good Qualities ſo much admir'd in his Father, which made him contemptible. Among others he ſuffer'd himſelf to be enſlav'd by a Paſſion, which was the Cauſe of his Ruin, as well as of great Troubles in the Empire. He was ſo deſperately in Love with a Concubine, nam'd Pau-tſe, that for the Sake of her and her Son, he put away the Empreſs, and diſinherited the lawful Heir to the Crown. The Prince with the Empreſs his Mother retir'd to his Uncle, who had a Principality in the Province of Shen-ſi.

Extravagantly fond of a Concubine.

Notwithſtanding all this Tenderneſs for Pau-tſe, Yew-vang had no great Pleaſure in the Enjoyment of her, becauſe ſhe was naturally of a ſplenetick and melancholy Temper; to remove which he had recourſe to all ſorts of Inſtruments, that might inſpire her with Gaiety and Mirth.

His mean Condeſcenſions to pleaſe her,

He was then at War with the Weſtern Tartars, and had given Orders that when the Soldiers ſaw Fires lighted, they ſhould immediately take their Arms, and attend his Perſon. This Signal, which ought never to be us'd but in Caſe of Neceſſity, he often order'd to be given without any real Occaſion, looking on it as a proper Diverſion for the Object of his Love; who was highly delighted to ſee the Hurry that the Soldiers were in to run to the Emperor, in order as they thought to fight in his Defenſe, and then to ſee how much ſurpriz'd and aſham'd they look'd at having had ſo many fatiguing Alarms to no Purpoſe.

She took great Pleaſure alſo in the Noiſe made by the Tearing of Silks, and the Emperor to humour her in this odd Fancy, debas'd himſelf ſo far as to be tearing them continually in her Preſence.

puniſh'd in his Death.

Nevertheleſs the Emperor was diſpleas'd that his Son had abandon'd him, and ſent an Order to his Brother to bring him to him immediately. His Brother anſwer'd, that he would not obey his Orders, till the young Prince ſhould be declar'd lawful Heir to the Empire; which ſo provok'd Yew-vang, that he inſtantly declar'd War againſt him. This Prince, not being in a Condition to oppoſe the Emperor's Forces, join'd the Tartars, and in the Night-time attack'd the Imperial Camp. The Fires were immediately lighted, but the Soldiers, who had been deceiv'd by this Signal ſo often before, diſregarded it, looking on it as the uſual Game to divert Pau-tſe; in the mean time the Camp was forc'd, and the Emperor ſlain. This happen'd the ſeventh Year of the Cycle, and Ping-vang his Son ſucceeded to the Empire.

PING-VANG, Thirteenth Emperor, Fifty one Years.

Ping-vang, 13th Emp. Tartars defeated.

THE Tartars, who were introduc'd into the Empire, taking Advantage of the Confuſion which the Emperor's Death had caus'd among the Chineſe Troops, plunder'd wherever they came, and made divers Conqueſts. The Tributary Princes being alarm'd at it, united their Forces to oppoſe this Torrent, which threaten'd to overwhelm them.

Among theſe Confederate Princes, the Kings of Tſin and of Wey diſtinguiſh'd themſelves for their Valour, drove back the Tartars, and recover'd the Lands they had conquer'd. This Succeſs put an End to a foreign War, but gave Riſe to civil Commotions, ſtill more dangerous. Theſe two Kings kept Poſſeſſion of the Lands which they had taken from the Tartars, in Right of Conqueſt, and looking on themſelves as independent, refus'd to pay Homage to the Emperor, under Colour that he had lent them no Aſſiſtance. This Example produc'd fatal Conſequences, which the Emperor brought on himſelf, by removing his Court from the Province of Shen-ſi to that of Ho-nan. This Caution was imputed to the Fear wherewith the melancholy Fate of his Father had inſpir'd him; and it was not doubted but his Deſign in retiring farther from the Neighbourhood of the Tartars, was more for the Security of his own Perſon than that of the Empire. Several Tributary Princes, ſeeing themſelves abandon'd, follow'd the Example of the Kings of Tſin and Wey, and made themſelves independant. There were three eſpecially, who ſignaliz'd themſelves by their Uſurpations, and founded three conſiderable Kingdoms. The King of Tſi ſeiz'd the Southern Part of the Province of Shan-tong; the King of Tſû took the Provinces of Hû-quang and Kyang-ſi; and the King of Tſin uſurp'd the greateſt Part of the Province of Shen-ſi.

Several Kings throw off their Dependance,

Theſe three Princes no longer acknowledging any Superior, follow'd the Dictates of their Ambition; and ſeeking only to enlarge their Dominions by the Spoil of their Neighbours, made War againſt each other. The Emperor endeavour'd to put a Stop to their Proceedings, and enjoin'd them to live in Peace, but they deſpis'd his Authority. Theſe Wars laſted ſeveral Ages, and were not at an end in the Life-time of the celebrated Philoſopher Confuçius, whoſe Hiſtory begins here, which he has intitul'd Chun Tſyû. Ping-vang dy'd the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by Whan-vang his Brother's Son.

WHAN-VANG, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

Whan-vang, 14th Emp. Cyc. XXVIII. Year before Chriſt 717.

WHAN-VANG aſcending the Throne at this difficult Juncture, endeavour'd to bring the Tributary Princes to their Obedience by gentle means; but theſe proving ineffectual he had Recourſe to Arms, wherein he was not more ſucceſsful. His Army being defeated, and himſelf wounded, he gave up all Hopes of re-eſtabliſhing his Authority in the revolted Provinces, and was content to preſerve thoſe which remain'd to him. He dy'd the twenty firſt Year of the Cycle, and his Son Chwang-vang ſucceeded him.

CHWANG-VANG, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd Fifteen Years.

Chwang-vang, 15th Emperor.

THIS Prince came to the Crown contrary to the Will of ſeveral of the Miniſters, as well as of his Father, who nam'd for his Succeſſor the Son of one of his Concubines, call'd Kew. But one of the Grandees, who had great Authority at Court, having repreſented to the reſt of the Grandees and Miniſters that this Injuſtice done to the lawful Heir, would neceſſarily occaſion a civil War, and give a fatal Blow to the Imperial Authority, which totter'd but too much already, moſt of them approv'd of his Reaſons, and acknowledg'd Chwang-vang.

Conſpiracy of Kew defeated.

Notwithſtanding this, Kew had a Party, which form'd a Plot to aſſaſſinate the Emperor. The Chief of the Conſpirators (who were three Years before their Deſign was diſcover'd) being one of the Council, and a Perſon of great Credit; the Miniſter, who had taken ſo much Pains to place Chwang-vang on the Throne, counſel'd him to ſeem not to know any thing of the Conſpiracy, but to ſend for the Traitor as if he wanted his Advice on ſome important Affair. The Conſpirator coming to Court was ſtabb'd by a Soldier, who had Orders for that Purpoſe; and Kew on this fled to the King of Yen. His Flight and the Death of the chief Plot ſecur'd the Emperor on the Throne; but the revolted Princes conſtantly maintain'd their Independency: and even the King of Tſi, by governing according to the Advice of his Ko-lau, or Prime Miniſter, call'd Quen-chu, got ſo great an Aſcendant over them, that they ſeem'd as if they had depended entirely upon him; and durſt untake no Affair of Moment without his Approbation. The Emperor dying in the thirty ſixth Year of the Cycle, the ſame Ko-lau had ſuch Influence in the State, as to procure almoſt all the Suffrages of the Miniſters and Grandees in Favour of Li-vang; who was a Relation of the Ti-vang, 16th Emperor. Growing Power of the King of Tsi.

THE Crown, by natural Right, descended to one of the Nephews of the late Emperor; but he was excluded from it by the Election of Li-vang, who was supported by the King of Tsi, his Relation. This Tributary Prince enlarg'd his Power to the great Prejudice of the Imperial Authority, and usurp'd the Title of Pa, that is to say, the Chief of other Princes, the greater Part of whom acknowledg'd him in that Quality. But this Title, which others also assum'd after his Example, lasted but one hundred Years, and then was abolish'd. Li-vang dy'd the forty first Year of the Cycle, and his Son Whey-vang succeeded him.

WHEY-VANG, Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

Whey-vang, 17th Emp.

THE first six Years of this Reign were Peaceable, but this Tranquillity was afterwards disturb'd by the Tartars who inhabit to the North of the Province of Shan-si; against whom the Emperor sent an Army, commanded by the King of Tsi. This Army attacking them while they were besieging Tay-tong-fu, forc'd their Camp, put them to the Rout, and oblig'd them to retreat with Speed into their own Country. This Victory, and the Trust Whey-vang repos'd in the King of Tsi, gave him such Authority, that he wanted nothing of being Emperor but the Title; and his Ambition, which was still greater, would have put him upon dethroning his Master, if he had not apprehended that the other Princes, who were his Equals, would have oppos'd his Advancement to the Throne.

First King of Japan.

It is positively affirm'd, that Japan began to be govern'd by Kings in the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle, and the sixteenth of this Emperor's Reign.

Cyc. XXIX. Year before Christ 657.

The Emperor dy'd the sixth Year of this Cycle, and was succeeded by his eldest Son, call'd Syang-vang.

SYANG-VANG, Eighteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty three Years.

Syang-vang, 18th Emp.

SYANG-VANG, altho' very young, observ'd in his Father's Time, that the King of Tsi's Ambition was without Bounds, that his Authority increas'd daily, and that he aim'd at making himself Master of the Empire: Therefore as soon as he was on the Throne, he resolv'd to restrain his ambitious Designs; but as he could not effect it by open Force, he made use of a Stratagem, which prov'd successful.

Defeats the ambitious Designs of the King of Tsi by a Stratagem.

The King of Tsi had found means through the Intrigues of his Prime Minister to assemble all the little Sovereigns that were dependant on the Imperial Crown. This was a kind of Convocation of the States, which none but the Emperor had a Right to summon. His Design was to engage these Princes to acknowledge him for their Sovereign; when the Emperor made use of the same Occasion to cause the rest of the Princes to be jealous of him. To this Purpose he sent a skilful Embassador with Letters to the Assembly. The Order of the Ceremony is, that when a Letter comes from the Emperor, it should be plac'd on a Table magnificently adorn'd; and that the same Honours should be paid to it, as to the Emperor himself, before it was open'd.

The Ceremony was perform'd by all the Tributary Princes, except the King of Tsi; who seem'd to be at a stand, and had even refus'd to comply, if his Prime Minister had not made him sensible on one side, that his Conduct would give Distrust to the Princes assembled, who were in Reality his Equals; and on the other expose his own Orders to be treated with no more Regard by his Subjects, than he had treated the Emperor's. This Prince follow'd such wise Counsel against his Will, and put off the Execution of his Design to a more favourable Opportunity. In the mean time this public Proof of his Submission had great Influence on the other Princes, and help'd not a little to confirm them in a due Submission and Dependance on the Emperor; which restor'd the Government to its ancient Form.

His Son Sho-tay retires to the King of Tsi, who soon after dies.

Syang-vang was beginning to enjoy the Pleasures of Peace, when it was disturb'd by the Discontent of his Son, Sho-tay; who left his Court the fifteenth Year of the Cycle, and put himself under the Protection of the King of Tsi. At the same time a Tributary Prince of the Province of Shen-si openly revolted; but the Emperor soon defeated him with the Help of an Army of Tartars, whom he had brought over to his Interest by marrying the Daughter of their Chief. He was soon after deliver'd from his Fears of the King of Tsi, who dy'd of old Age; and the Wars which arose among his five Sons, who disputed the Sovereign Power, together with the Division which ensu'd thereon in that Kingdom, seem'd to promise the Emperor lasting lasting Ease. As therefore he thought he had nothing more to fear, he divorc'd his Tartar Spouse (whom he had marry'd for political Reasons) under Pretence that she was a Stranger.

DYN. III. CHEW. Cyc. XXIX. Year before Christ 657.

The Chief of the Tartars being highly provok'd at this Affront, resolv'd to be reveng'd. He sent therefore for Sho-tay, who was quite destitute of Help, and promis'd to make him Emperor, if he would join with him, which he did; and they both march'd to the Capital of the Empire, from which the Emperor was oblig'd to fly. Sho-tay caus'd himself to be proclaim'd, while his Father wander'd about like a Fugitive, imploring Assistance of the Tributary Princes. But having receiv'd from them the Succours he expected, with which he form'd two Armies, one of them besieg'd the Metropolis, enter'd it in Triumph, and punish'd with Death the rebellious Prince; the other Army defeated the Tartars, and re-establish'd Syang-vang upon the Throne. This Event happen'd the seventeenth Year of the Cycle, when the Empire was restor'd to its former Splendour, and the Emperor enjoy'd it peaceably to his Death; which happen'd the thirty ninth Year of the Cycle, and his Son King-vang succeeded him.

KING-VANG, Nineteenth Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

King-vang, 19th Emp.

THE Empire began to flourish when this Prince took Possession of it; but his Reign was too short for the Good of his People, who were always praising his Mildness, Wisdom, and Moderation. He dy'd the forty fifth Year of this Cycle, as much lamented by his Subjects, as he had been tenderly lov'd by them, and left his Crown to his Son Quang-vang.

QUANG-VANG, Twentieth Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

Quang-vang, 20th Emp.

THIS Reign was equally short, and applauded by the People as the preceding. Quang-vang had inherited all the good Qualities of his Father, and the new King of Tsi was not in a Capacity to cause any Disturbance, being hated by his Subjects, because of his Cruelties, and want of Application to Government. A Prince, who was his Kinsman, having given him Advice with regard to his Conduct, he was so provok'd at it, that he sent a Ruffian, who had neither Fear nor Remorse, to assassinate him. The Villain, who was to pretend some Business from the King of Tsi, to make surer of his Blow, went betimes in the Morning to the Palace: where, finding the Prince seated on his Throne, receiving Petitions, and administring Justice, he became seiz'd with Horrour at the Thought of staining his Hands in the Blood of so good a Sovereign; and not daring to return to his Master without having executed his Orders, slew himself at the Door of the Palace.

Ting-vang, 21st Emp.

THE whole Care of this Prince was to keep Wars at a Distance, to preserve the Empire in profound Peace, and cause the Laws to be put in Execution.

On the fourteenth Day of the ninth Month, in the fifty fourth Year of the Cycle, Lau-kyun was born in the Province of Hû-quang; who is the Founder of one of the two principal Sects, which have infected the Empire, and whereof I shall speak hereafter. He taught, that the Soul died with the Body; that the Happiness of a Man consisted in Voluptuousness; and confining all Felicity to this Life, he pretended to have found out a way to prolong it beyond its natural Term; hence this Sect was call'd the Sect of Immortals. It easily found Admittance among the Grandees, who flatter'd themselves that by embracing it they should prolong their Days. However there is Reason to believe, that the Founder of this impious Sect confess'd a Supreme Being, which he call'd Tau; for he says in one of his Treatises, "That "this Tau has no Name that is suitable to him; that he created the Heaven and the Earth, "without being corporeal; and that, tho' he is himself immoveable, he gives Motion to all "things." This has occasion'd some to think, that his Doctrines, where they are very bad have been much corrupted by his Disciples. He dy'd at the Age of eighty four Years; as did this Emperor in the twelfth Year of the Cycle, and his Son Kyen-vang succeeded him.

the two Philoſophers who broach'd them, were Yang and Me; the former held, that all Men were to be lov'd alike, as well Strangers as thoſe of the neareſt Kin; the latter would have every Man to mind his own Affair, without having the leaſt Concern about the reſt of Mankind, or even the Emperor himſelf.

LING-VANG, Twenty third Emperor, reign'd Twenty ſeven Years.

Ling-vang, 23d Emp.

THE Chineſe Hiſtory relates, that this Prince was born with Hair on his Head, and a Beard on his Chin. He is chiefly prais'd for his Wiſdom and Prudence, in having preſerv'd his Authority, and the Peace of the Empire, tho' all the Tributary Princes were continually at War among themſelves.

The forty ſeventh Year of this Cycle, was remarkable for the Birth of Kong-fû-tſe or Confucius, ſo often mention'd, whom the Chineſe account the greateſt Philoſopher of their Nation; He was born in the Province of Shan-tong, the fourth Day of the eleventh Month. When he was but three Years old, he loſt his Father Sho-lyang-ho, who was Prime Miniſter in the Principality of Tſû.

Great Inſtance of Modeſty and Self-denial.

The Death of the King of U gave Riſe to a Diſpute between his two Sons, which is without Example; for the eldeſt, to whom the Crown belong'd, reſolving to reſign it to his younger Brother, who refus'd it, plac'd him on the Throne as it were by Force, put on him the Royal Ornaments, and ſaluted him as his Sovereign: But the latter left the Palace ſecretly, and hid himſelf in the Deſarts, ſo that the elder was at laſt oblig'd to wear a Crown, for which he had ſuch a noble Contempt.

The Emperor dy'd the fifty third Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son, call'd King-vang.

KENG-VANG, Twenty fourth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

King-vang, 24th Emp. Cyc. XXXI. Year before Chriſt 537.

THIS Emperor is blam'd for his Negligence in the Affairs of Government, and his Indolence, with Reſpect to what paſs'd in the Empire. For which Reaſon the King of U alter'd his Deſign, of ſubmitting himſelf to the Empire and its Laws: ſo that inſtead of ſending Ambaſſadors to the Imperial Court, he ſent them to that of the King of Lû, who was of the Family of the Chew, and govern'd his Subjects according to the Laws eſtabliſh'd by the Emperors of this Dynaſty.

The Wars, which had continu'd ſo long among the Tributary Princes, having caus'd great Confuſion in the Government of their reſpective States; the King of Ching, who reign'd in the Province of Shen-ſi, began to think of reſtoring Order in his own. His Prime Miniſter, a Perſon of known Ability and Merit, to whom he had committed this Truſt, entring into his Maſters Views, began with reforming the Abuſes which long Uſe had eſtabliſh'd in the Court. He renew'd the ancient Laws that had been made by the beſt Princes, divided the Lands equally, and ſhew'd ſo much Wiſdom therein, that the Rich did not complain of what had been taken from them to ſupply the Wants of the Poor. His Regulations on this Head were theſe; viz.

I. That the Lands ſhould be divided into nine equal Parts, whereof the ninth Part ſhould be the Domain, and cultivated at the common Expenſe.

II. That all People indifferently ſhould be permitted to fiſh in the Lakes and Ponds.

III. That the Magiſtrates ſhould have an Eye particularly to all Widows, old Men and Women, who have no Children, and to Orphans, in order to aſſiſt them in their Neceſſities.

Confucius marries and divorces his Wife.

Confucius marry'd at the Age of nineteen Years, contenting himſelf with one Wife, by whom he had one Son. A while after he divorc'd her upon ſome Pretence; but the true Reaſon was, that being freed from the Cares of a Family, he might purſue his Studies with greater Application; in effect, he made ſuch a Progreſs in various kinds of Knowledge, that in a few Years he became the moſt learned Doctor of this Empire.

The Emperor dy'd the eighteenth Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son, call'd Meng-vang. This Prince reign'd but a few Months, in which time he had a Son born, whoſe Birth gave Riſe to two powerful Factions in the Empire. The principal Courtiers declar'd this Infant Emperor, and nam'd Guardians to govern the Empire in his Minority; while ſome of the Governors of the Provinces, alledging in their Excuſe his tender Age, and the Uncertainty of his Life, proclaimed the [ſecond] Brother of Meng-vang. Both Parties proceeded to Arms, but this laſt Faction being the ſtrongeſt, took the Metropolis, and plac'd King-vang on the Throne; whoſe Name tho the ſame [in Sound] as his Father's (s), yet it is written in different Characters, and has a different Signification.

KING-

DYN III. CHEW. Cyc. XXXI. Year before Chriſt 537.

KING-VANG, Twenty fifth Emperor, reign'd Forty four Years.

King-vang, 25th Emp.

CONFUCIUS had already acquir'd ſuch great Reputation, that he was follow'd by three thouſand Diſciples, of which ſeventy two were diſtinguiſh'd by their Learning; and in this laſt Number there were ten, who were ſo accompliſh'd in all ſorts of Knowledge, that they were call'd by way of Excellence, The Ten Philoſophers.

Confuçius is made Prime Miniſter of the Kingdom of Lû.

The thirty eighth Year of the Cycle Confuçius was preferr'd for his great Merit to be Prime Miniſter of the Kingdom of Lû, his native Country. Thro' his wiſe Counſel the Face of Affairs was ſoon chang'd throughout the Land; he reform'd the Abuſes that had crept into it, and reſtor'd Honeſty in dealing; he taught young Men to reſpect the old, and honour their Parents, even after their Deceaſe; he inſpir'd the fair Sex with Mildneſs and Chaſtity; and caus'd Sincerity, Uprightneſs, and all other civil Virtues to prevail among the People. The Love of Juſtice became ſo univerſal, that if any thing happen'd to be drop'd on the high Roads, nobody durſt meddle with it, but the Perſon it belong'd to; in ſhort he eſtabliſh'd ſuch perfect Order and Union in all Parts of this State, that it ſeem'd like a well govern'd Family.

King of Tſi aſſaſſinated by his Prime Miniſter, who uſurps the Crown.

About this time the King of Tſi was aſſaſſinated by his Prime Miniſter, who ſeiz'd the Crown. This Uſurper ſuſpecting the Fidelity of his new Subjects, and fearing the Power of the King of Lû, courted his Friendſhip, and at the ſame time laid a dangerous Snare for his Virtue. He reſtor'd the Lands conquer'd by his Predeceſſors, and made him a Preſent of a young Maiden, who beſides being exceeding pretty, had a charming Voice; ſhe was order'd to employ all her Charms, and the uſual Arts of her Sex, to inſpire the King of Lû with Love.

Confuçius reſigns his Poſt and retires.

Confuçius employ'd all his Eloquence to diſuade his Prince from receiving ſuch a pernicious Preſent; but Love was ſtronger than Reaſon, and what the Philoſopher foreſaw came to paſs; for the Prince minding nothing but his Miſtreſs, and the Diverſions he made for her, neglected the Care of the State, ceas'd to adminiſter Juſtice, and deſpis'd the Counſels of the Wiſe Men who were at his Court. Confuçius finding that he could no longer maintain the prudent Maxims which he had eſtabliſh'd, laid down his Place of Prime Miniſter, and retir'd out of the Kingdom. Mean time moſt of the Tributary Princes were ſtill at War together, wherein the King of U periſh'd miſerably in Battle againſt the King of Ywê, which is at preſent the Province of Che-kyang.

The fifty ſecond Year of the Cycle, the Family of Tſau, which had twenty five Kings in the Space of ſix hundred and thirty ſix Years, was entirely extinguiſh'd by the King of Song.

His Death.

Confuçius ends about this Time the Hiſtory of the Wars of the Tributary Princes, which had laſted two hundred Years; and dy'd the fifty ninth Year of the Cycle, in the ſeventy third Year of his Age, and the forty firſt of this Reign. The Chineſe pay the greateſt Veneration to the Memory of this Philoſopher. He is look'd on as the Maſter and Doctor of the Empire. His Works have ſo great Authority, that to make the leaſt Alteration in them would be puniſh'd as a Crime. Whenever any Diſorder ariſes in Point of Doctrine, a Quotation out of his Works decides it at once; ſo that the moſt obſtinate among the Learned are oblig'd to ſubmit. His Poſterity are ſtill in being, and enjoy the greateſt Privileges; which have always ſubſiſted, whatever Revolutions have happen'd in the Empire.

Kingdom of Chin deſtroyed.

In the ſixtieth Year of the Cycle, the Kingdom and the Family of Chin, which continu'd ſix hundred and forty five Years, under Twenty four Princes was entirely deſtroy'd by the King of Tſû. The Emperor dy'd the ſecond Year of this Cycle, and left his Crown to his Son Ywen-vang.

IF the Reign of this Emperor had been longer, the Power and Dignity of the Empire had been compleatly re-eſtabliſh'd, through the Wiſdom and Mildneſs of his Government. The ancient Laws of his Predeceſſors were beginning to revive, and moſt of the Tributary Princes were return'd to his Obedience, excepting the King of Lû; who refus'd to come to the Aſſembly of the States, which the Emperor had conven'd, not looking on himſelf as a Vaſſal of the Empire. On this the Emperor caus'd him to be proſcrib'd as a Rebel, which is the firſt Inſtance we find of that ſort of Puniſhment. The Prime Miniſter of that Prince being diſcontented, came to the Emperor, who gave him the Command of the Army; with which he fought ſeveral Battles, conquer'd almoſt the whole Province, and ſent Ambaſſadors with Preſents to the Emperor, deſiring the Inveſtiture of that Principality; which was granted him, on Condition that he pay'd the ordinary Homage and Tributes. The Kingdom of U, which had ſubſiſted for ſix hundred and fifty Years under twenty petty Kings, was ſubverted at that Time by the King of Ywê.

THIS Prince found the Empire almoſt reſtor'd to its ancient Splendour, and maintain'd the Dignity of it, by his wiſe Conduct. The Empreſs dying, he liv'd in Celibacy; being an admirable, tho' rare Example of Continency, whence he was ſurnam'd the Chaſte.

Kingdom of Tſay deſtroy'd

The thirty firſt Year of the Cycle, the King of Tſû, put an end to the Principality of Tſay, which had continu'd ſix hundred and ſeventy ſix Years under twenty five Princes.

This Emperor dy'd the thirty ſeventh Year of the Cycle, leaving three Sons, who were old enough to reign. The eldeſt, call'd Ngan, ſucceeded him, but he only reign'd three Months, and was murder'd by his Brother Sû; who enjoy'd the Fruits of his Crime no longer than five Months; being aſſaſſinated, under Pretence of revenging the Parricide, by his youngeſt Brother, Kau-vang, who aſcended the Throne without the leaſt Oppoſition.

KAU-VANG, Twenty eighth Emperor, reign'd fifteen Years.

Kau-vang, 28th Emp.

ALTHO' this Prince uſurp'd the Crown without Oppoſition, yet the barbarous Action, by which he made his way to it, diſgrac'd him throughout the Empire; and furniſh'd moſt of the Tributary Princes with a Pretence to refuſe paying him the uſual Homage, or to acknowledge him for their Sovereign. He had a Brother, call'd Whan-kong, whom he remov'd, out of Policy, from Court, by giving him a Principality in the Province of Ho-nan; one of whoſe Deſcendants was the laſt Emperor of this Dynaſty.

In the Kingdom of Tſi, a very numerous Family, call'd Tyen, having become exceeding powerful by their great Credit and Riches; they made themſelves popular by their Liberality, and growing proud of the Authority they had acquir'd, caus'd the People to rebel, who ſecretly made away with their King. But to remove the Suſpicion of their having been the Rigicides, they plac'd his eldeſt Son on the Throne, and made the youngeſt Prime Miniſter; however, as they had divided all the great Poſts and Governments among themſelves, they left the Prince nothing but an empty Title, and kept all the Power in their own Hands.

Kau-vang dy'd the fifty ſecond Year of the Cycle, and was ſucceeded by his Son Ghey-lye-vang.

GHEY-LYE-VANG, Twenty ninth Emperor, reign'd Twenty four Years.

Ghey-lye-vang 29th Emp.

ABOUT this time the cruel Wars between the Tributary Princes began again, and laſted near three hundred Years. The Hiſtorians call theſe times Chen-que, or the warlike Ages. Each Prince aim'd at the Empire, and endeavour'd to deſtroy his Rival. The Emperors had ſcarcely any thing left them except their Dignity; and had the Affliction to ſee both their Authority and their Provinces taken from them by Degrees. The Hiſtory tells us, that the nine Brazen Veſſels, which Yu, the Founder of the firſt Dynaſty, caus'd to be made, repreſenting the Provinces of the Empire, ſhook of their own accord; which was look'd on as a Preſage of the Evils that threaten'd the State.

Miſerable State of the Empire.

The Wars begin again among the Tributary Princes.

The Kingdom of Tſin was divided among four Princes, who had conquer'd it. One of them, who was become famous by gaining ſeveral Battles, form'd the Deſign of ſeizing the other three Parts, but was prevented by Death. However his Son Chi-ſyang, who ſucceeded him, being equally unquiet, and ambitious to enlarge his Territories, picked a Quarrel with the Kings of Han and Ghey; who choſe rather to deliver up the Places, which he unjuſtly demanded by his Ambaſſador under Pretence of making Satisfaction for Injuries receiv'd, than engage their Subjects in a bloody War.

Chi-ſyang, who breathed nothing but Hoſtilities, thought to have made the King of Chau, another of his Neighbours, truckle in the ſame manner; but that Prince not only diſmiſs'd his Ambaſſador without giving him any Anſwer, but engaging the injur'd Kings of Han and Ghey to join him with their Forces, the Army of Chi-ſyang was intirely defeated, and himſelf ſlain. The King of Chaû having ſubdued the Dominions of his Enemy, enter'd them in Triumph, and put all his Family to Death. Not content with this Vengeance, he caus'd the Corps of Chi-ſyang to be brought before him; and cutting off his Head made a Cup of his Scull, out of which he us'd to drink, being varniſh'd over for the Purpoſe. One of the Officers moſt firmly attach'd to Chi-ſyang, was ſo enrag'd at this Affront done to the Memory of his Maſter, that he attempted ſeveral times to ſlip into the Palace of the King of Chaû, and murder him; but being diſcover'd, he was put to death.

There was another War between the King of Lû and the King of Tſi. The former gave the Command of his Army to a brave General, nam'd U-ki, who entring the Kingdom of Tſi, gain'd a great Victory, took five important Places, and would have puſh'd his Conqueſts farther, if a Peace had not enſu'd between the two Kings. This Officer was as ſober as he was valiant; he liv'd like one of the common Soldiers, and equally ſhar'd with them the Fatigue as well as the Gain; whereby he inſpir'd his Troops with that Vigour to which he ow'd his Succeſs rather than to his Valour.

The Emperor dy'd the Sixteenth Year of the Cycle, and his Son Ngan-vang ſucceeded him.

NGAN-VANG, Thirtieth Emperor, reign'd Twenty ſix Years.

Ngan-vang, 30th Emp.

HISTORY relates nothing concerning this Emperor, excepting the Year of his Reign; and only gives an account of the Wars among the Tributary Princes.

U-ki the famous General.

The King of Ghey had engag'd in his Intereſt the famous General U-ki, juſt now mention'd, of whoſe Wiſdom he had conceiv'd as high an Idea as of his Valour. One Day diſcourſing familiarly with him, concerning his Wealth, and the Strength of his Kingdom, which Nature had fortify'd with inacceſſible Rocks: U-ki made Anſwer, that he deceiv'd himſelf much, if he plac'd his Security in ſteep Rocks; and that the Power and Grandeur of a State conſiſted in the Virtue and Application of the Perſon who govern'd.

His Saying to the King of Ghey.

This Anſwer encreas'd his Eſteem with the Prince, who having declar'd War againſt the King of Tſin, gave U-ki the Command of his Army; with which he attack'd the Enemy, entirely defeated them, and forc'd the King to ſue for Peace. Theſe and other no leſs glorious Actions gain'd the General the Affection of the Prince, who to recompenſe him, made him his Prime Miniſter. The Grandees diſpleas'd hereat, endeavour'd to render his Fidelity ſuſpected; and ſuggeſted to the King that it was not prudent to put a Stranger into the moſt important Poſt in the State. U-ki, being inform'd of the ill Offices they were doing him, left the Kingdom ſecretly, and retired to the Court of the King of Tſu; where his Merit being ſoon known he was plac'd at the Head of the Army, and having gain'd ſeveral Battles, againſt different Princes, oblig'd them to ſeek the Amity and Alliance of his Maſter. The Great Men envying his Proſperity, they endeavour'd to ruin him with the King; but not ſucceeding in their Deſign, they conſpir'd againſt their Sovereign as well as his Favorite; who diſcovering the Plot, all thoſe concern'd in it were either baniſh'd the Kingdom or put to Death. U-ki after this changed the Form of the Government, by limiting the Authority of the Grandees and Miniſters, and lodging the Power ſolely in the King. This Reform in the State render'd it ſo flouriſhing that it became formidable to the neighbouring Princes; who conſpir'd with the Governors and Magiſtrates of the Kingdom, to deſtroy a Man, who had render'd his Maſter ſo much their Superiour in Power and Authority. Accordingly he was found murder'd in his own Houſe.

THIS Prince had ſcarcely any thing elſe but the Title of Emperor; the Imperial Authority being ſo little reſpected that the Tributary Princes not only refus'd to acknowledge him for their Sovereign, but alſo threaten'd to declare War againſt him if he oppos'd their Deſigns, or blam'd their Conduct. They being prepoſſeſs'd with an Opinion, that the Crown belong'd to the Poſſeſſor of the nine Vaſes of Copper, which the great Yu had caus'd to be made; each of them ſtrove to get the Poſſeſſion of them, in order to uſurp the Authority over the reſt. The Emperor, to defeat their Deſigns, was oblig'd to have them thrown into a deep Lake, from which it was impoſſible to get them out.

Has nothing left but the Title.

IF this Prince had poſſeſs'd Strength and Courage enough to have taken Advantage of the Diviſions and Wars, which reign'd among the Tributary Princes, doubtleſs he would have reſtor'd the Empire to its former Grandeur: but his Cowardice and Sloth, in which he exceeded his Predeceſſor, contributed more than any thing to the abaſement of his Dignity, and the extinction of his Authority; while the King of Tſin encreas'd to ſuch a Degree that he kept the other Princes in Subjection to him, and had the Imperial Authority, tho' not the Dignity. Five Kings, viz. of Tſû, Chau, Han, Ghey, and Yen, joined their Forces to oppoſe his formidable Power; but the King of Tſin defeated their Army, and might have deprived them of their Kingdoms, if a more important Concern had not call'd him elſewhere. Two Princes of the Weſtern Part of the Province of Se-chwen, who were independant of the Empire, were at War together, and each demanded Aid from the King of Tſin; who believing it was eaſy to take Advantage of their Difference, and join thoſe vaſt Countries to his own, marched to the Aſſiſtance of one of theſe Princes, and defeated the Army of the other, who was found dead in the Field of Battle; in ſhort he oblig'd the Prince, whom he had aſſiſted, to pay him Homage, and an annual Tribute.

At the ſame time the King of Ghey, one of the Confederates, having no Hopes of living either eaſy, or ſecure in his Dominions, while he had ſo powerful a Prince for his Enemy, became his Tributary, and pay'd him the ſame Reſpect and Submiſſion as if he had been Emperor. The King of Tſin granted him his Friendſhip and Protection the more willingly, as by the Kingdom of Ghey, he could more eaſily enter and ſubdue the Territories of the other Princes of the Eaſt.

THIS Prince's Reign was not more happy for being ſo long; when he came to the Throne, the Imperial Authority was almoſt annihilated; and tho' he wanted neither Parts nor Virtue, yet the State was too weak to undertake any thing that might give the leaſt umbrage to ſuch a powerful Prince as the King of Tſin.

Honour paid to the Memory of a virtuous Miniſter.

At this time a Ko-lau of the King of Tſû, nam'd Kiv-yen, who had gain'd the Hearts of all, by his Probity and Uprightneſs, fell a Sacrifice to Envy, and was unworthily depriv'd of his Honours; not being able to ſurvive his Misfortune, he threw himſelf into the River and was drown'd. The People were ſo ſenſibly afflicted at his Loſs, that they preſerve the Memory of it by a Feaſt; which is ſtill celebrated annually on the fifth Day of the fifth Month, when they ſail about the Rivers in ornamented Barks, as if they were in ſearch of that virtuous Mandarin, in order to bring him to life again.

Cyc. XXXV. Year before Chriſt 297.

Mencius dy'd the ninth Year of this Cycle, in the eighty fourth Year of his Age, and is look'd upon as the greateſt Philoſopher of the Empire, except Confucius. His Works are held in high Veneration, and his Deſcendants enjoy great Privileges. Mean time the King of Tſin followed cloſely his ambitious Deſigns, and inſenſibly clear'd the way to the Empire, by underhand ſupporting the War among the Tributary Princes; each of whom aſk'd Succours from him, which he readily furniſh'd them with, that they might deſtroy one another, and leſſen the Number of the petty Sovereigns. Thus the Kingdom of Song, which had ſubſiſted three hundred eighty one Years, under thirty two Princes, was deſtroy'd by the Kings of Tſi and Tſû; and the Principality of Lû, which had been govern'd by thirty four Sovereigns, was ſubdu'd by the King of Tſû. This laſt alſo invaded the Territories of Ghey, who became tributary to him.

King of Tſin dethrones the Emperor.

After this Chau-ſyang King of Tſin, no longer concealing his Deſign upon the Imperial Crown, offer'd to the Sovereign Lord of Heaven a Sacrifice, with the ſame Ceremonies which none but the Emperors were allow'd to perform, by which publick Act he openly declared his Pretenſion to that ſovereign Dignity. At that time there was no Prince powerful enough to diſpute it with him, except the King of Tſi; but Chau-ſyang gained a compleat Victory over him, and immediately ſent part of his Troops to dethrone the Emperor, whoſe Army was ſo ſmall, that it was defeated at the firſt Attack; and this unfortunate Prince was forced to implore the Clemency of the Conqueror, to acknowledge him for his Sovereign, and yield up to him the few Cities that remained in his Hands. This Submiſſion ſaved him his Life, which he ended the Year following in the Province of Shan-ſi, whither he retired.

As ſoon as the Emperor's Misfortune was publickly known, ſeveral of the Princes, particularly the King of Han, haſten'd to pay Homage to the King of Tſin. Nevertheleſs, as he he was not acknowledg'd by the whole Empire, and there were ſtill ſome Princes, who adher'd to the Family of Chew, they elected Chew-kyun, one of the Grand-ſons of the Brother of Kau-vang, the twenty eighth Emperor of this Race.

THE Beginning of this Prince's Reign is remarkable for his Inroad into the Territories of the King of Ghey. At firſt he won ſeveral Battles, which ſo alarm'd the other Princes, that fearing after he had gotten the Empire, he would diſpoſſeſs them of their Dominions, five of them viz. the King of Han, Tſu, Yen, Chau, and Tſin, join'd the King of Ghey; their Forces conſiſted of two hundred thouſand Men, who defeated the Emperor's Army, and oblig'd him to quit the Territories which he had conquer'd.

IF the Confederacy form'd by the ſix Kings, above mention'd, for their common Defenſe, had continu'd, they might eaſily have maintained their Ground againſt the Forces of Shi-whang-ti; but their Ambition ſoon diſuniting them, they made War on one another, and ſo weaken'd themſelves by the Deſtruction of their Armies, that by little and little they became a Prey to Shi-whang-ti; who having ſubdu'd them one after another, put them to death with all the Males of their Families, excepting the King of Tſi, whom he reſerv'd for a more lingring and cruel Puniſhment; for he ſhut him up in a Park, planted with Pine-Trees, where he allow'd him only juſt as much Food as was neceſſary to ſupport Nature. This unfortunate Prince, by theſe means grown deſperate, refus'd to eat any of the Proviſions which they brought him, and ſtarv'd himſelf to Death.

Subdues the Confederate Kings, and puts them with their Families to Death.

The King of Han avoided the Fate of the other Princes, by delivering up himſelf with his Troops and Dominions to the Emperor; he liv'd at Court with the Honours belonging to his Rank, and as he had both Abilities and Experience, Shi-whang-ti often diſcours'd with him upon the Maxims of Government.

Except the King of Han, who ſubmits.

The Admiral of a little Fleet, ſent to ſome of the Japaneſe Iſlands (r), aſſur'd the Emperor in the Account he gave him of his Expedition, that nothing could be more advantageous to the Trade of the Empire, than to have a Colony ſettled there; and to engage him more more effectually in that Deſign, he told him that one of the Iſlands produc'd a ſovereign Remedy againſt all ſorts of Diſeaſes, and even Death itſelf.

The Emperor, fond of living long to enjoy his Conqueſts, was caught with this Bait, and ſent him back with Ships, Soldiers, and three hundred young Men, with as many marriageable Maidens. The Admiral arriving at an Iſland, built a City, of which he declar'd himſelf Sovereign; in a ſhort time the Country was peopled, and the Inhabitants are proud of deriving their Original from the Chineſe.

Builds the Great Wall.

Shi-whang-ti having obſerv'd in viſiting his Empire that the Northern Provinces, eſpecially Pe-che-li, Shan-ſi, and Shen-ſi, were much expoſed to the ſudden Incurſions of the Tartars; he ſent a formidable Army, which having driven them back a great way beyond the Frontiers of the Empire, he immediately put in Execution the Scheme he had form'd to ſecure his Country againſt ſuch dangerous Neighbours, by building a Wall from the Sea to the Extremities of the Province of Shen-ſi. In the forty ſecond Year of the Cycle, he caus'd Ships loaded with Iron, to be ſunk into the Sea, to ſecure the Foundation; one third part of the Men in the Empire, who were of a certain Age, were employ'd in the Work; and the Architect was oblig'd under Pain of Death to join the Stones ſo well with Mortar, that not a Nail could be driven between.

There were large Arches built for the Paſſage of Rivers, as alſo Forts along the Wall, at proper Diſtances for Garriſons, and Gates in the moſt convenient Places, to facilitate Commerce, and invade Tartary on Occaſion. It was ſo thick that ſeven or eight Horſemen could ride abreaſt on it, and ſo ſolid that it is almoſt all ſtanding to this Day; but, what is more ſurpriſing, is, that the whole was finiſh'd in five Years time.

Publiſhes a Decree to burn all the Books which treated of Hiſtory or the Sciences.

This ſtupendous Work was enough to immortalize the Founder; but not ſatisfy'd with having Compariſons made between him and his Predeceſſors, much to his Advantage, he pretended he had eclipſed all their Glory, and that Poſterity might have none to talk of but himſelf, he endeavour'd to deſtroy the very Remembrance of them. For this end he publiſh'd a Decree, commanding his Subjects on pain of Death to burn the Books call'd King, and all the Works of Confuçius, which tranſmitted the Virtues and Actions of thoſe great Emperors; he only excepted thoſe that treated of Architecture and Medicine. To countenance theſe deſtructive Orders, he framed ſeveral Pretences: Theſe Books, ſaid he, were uſeful when the Empire was divided among various Sovereigns, that the People might be govern'd by the ſame Laws; but now that it is under one Monarch, it is the ſame Spirit which governs and animates the whole. Theſe Sciences, added he, to which an infinite Number of Men apply themſelves, ſerve only to encourage Idleneſs, while Agriculture, which is the Source of Happineſs to the People, is neglected. In ſhort, according to him, theſe Books contain'd the Seeds of Rebellion, and thoſe who made them their Study went ſo far in their Pretence to reform the State, that if the wiſe Commands of the Prince, which muſt vary according to the ſeveral Occaſions, were not conformable to the ancient Laws of the Empire, they took the Liberty raſhly to condemn his Conduct, and with their ſeditious Diſcourſes kindled a Spirit of Diſobedience and Rebellion.

This Decree was executed by the Governors with the utmoſt Severity; they made the ſtricteſt Search for theſe valuable Books, and the Men of Learning, who were found with any of them in their Cuſtody, were put to Death; however, ſome Copies of them were ſav'd, as I have mention'd in another Place. This Decree of the Emperor, and the Severity with which it was put in Execution, have made his Name odious to Poſterity, and the Loſs of theſe ancient Monuments is much bewail'd by the Chineſe, at this Day. A profound Peace ſucceeding after a twenty five Years War, the Emperor made ſeveral new Laws, and alter'd others. As he had ſeveral Children, ſome of his Miniſters adviſ'd him to create the Younger, Sovereigns of certain Provinces; but the Emperor putting them in mind of the Troubles which the erecting ſuch Principalities had caus'd under the preceding Dynaſties, rejected that Method; and inſtead thereof order'd Palaces to be built for them in ſeveral Cities, where they ſhould be maintain'd at the Emperor's Expence, and treated with the Reſpect due to their Birth, but have no Authority over the People. This Cuſtom has been obſerv'd almoſt ever ſince, and in latter Reigns they have been oblig'd to reſide in the Metropolis, and to follow the Court.

Which has render'd his Name odious Makes Laws.

Rejects the Advice to erect Principalities for the Maintenance of the younger Children of Emperors, which he appoints another Way.

Shi-whang-ti, who was not us'd to be at reſt, reſolv'd to make a ſecond Progreſs, through the Eaſtern Provinces of the Empire, and took his ſecond Son with him; but falling dangerouſly ill on the Road, he dy'd in the thirty ſeventh Year of the Cycle.

Finding himſelf drawing near his End, he wrote a Letter to his eldeſt Son, declaring him Emperor, and deliver'd it together with the Seals of the Empire to his ſecond Son, in order to ſend them to his Brother; but as ſoon as the Emperor was dead, the young Prince reſolv'd to place the Crown on his own Head. The only way to ſucceed in this Affair, was to engage Li-ſſé, the Prime Miniſter, in his Party, who had great Authority in the Empire; he indeed rejected the firſt Propoſal, but on new Sollicitation, his own Intereſt and the Merit of the young Prince at length prevail'd with him; and being in great Eſteem, his own Example drew almoſt all the Suffrages over to the young Prince. The eldeſt Son, who had got together ſome Forces, in order to maintain his Right, finding that moſt of the Provinces had already acknowledg'd his Brother Emperor, was oblig'd to ſubmit; but the Steps he had taken, being look'd upon as Crimes of high Treaſon, he was order'd to kill himſelf.

EUL-SHI, Third Emperor, reign'd Three Years.

Eul-ſhi, 3d Emperor, miſled by the Advice of a perfidious Miniſter.

THIS Prince, who was both an Uſurper and a Murderer of his Brother, during the ſhort time that he reign'd, ſhew'd how unworthy he was of the Crown. He choſe the greateſt Enemy of the Family of Tſin for his Ko-lau, or Prime Miniſter, who affected a great Zeal for his Perſon, tho' ſecretly he was endeavouring to extirpate all his Race; and indeed the Emperor's Inclinations too well ſeconded the Views of the Traitor.

This Prince had told him ſeveral times, that, Life being ſhort, he would paſs it as pleaſantly as poſſible, and indulge himſelf in an unbounded Looſe of Pleaſure.

The Ko-lau upon this adviſed him to remove all the Miniſters and Governors appointed by his Father, who, he ſaid, would be continually diſturbing his Pleaſures with their Remonſtrances, and Threatnings, and put in their Places ſuch as he was ſure would have a regard to his Quiet. The Emperor follow'd this pernicious Counſel, and all Employments were fill'd with Creatures of the Ko-lau.

The Complaints and Murmurs which enſued in all the Provinces upon this Change, made the People, (who were burthen'd with Taxes to ſupply the Emperor's Expences in building Palaces, Parks, and fine Gardens,) ready to revolt. Add to this, that the ſmalleſt Faults were puniſh'd in the ſevereſt manner; and that often the Governors gratify'd their private Reſentments, under Pretence of pleaſing the Emperor, and executing his Orders.

One of the Generals of the Army, who had been ſent into the Eaſtern Provinces, to quell ſome Troubles, was the firſt that revolted; and engag'd the Troops to proclaim for Emperor the Lawful Heir, who was Son of the eldeſt Brother, and to dethrone the Uſurper, who had murder'd him.

The Riſe of Lyew-pang.

At this Juncture there appear'd a Freebooter, call'd Lyew-pang, who from a private Soldier was become Captain of a Troop of Vagabonds. He was endow'd with great Qualities, being courageous, mild, and moderate; tho' a ſtrict Obſerver of the Laws of Military Diſcipline among his Companions. He was alſo naturally eloquent and perſuaſive, eſpecially when he declaimed againſt the Luxury and Indolence of the Emperor. A great Phyſiognomiſt meeting him on the Road, threw himſelf at his Feet: By the Lines of your Face, which, ſays he, I have carefully examin'd, I know you will be Emperor, and I render you beforehand the Reſpects, which a Subject owes to his Sovereign. I have a Daughter, who has not her Equal for Beauty and Wiſdom in the Empire; her I offer you in marriage, ſo ſure I am, that my Prediction will one Day come to paſs. Lyew-pang charm'd with this Diſcourſe accepted the Offer, and was inſtantly marry'd.

He marries a Fortune-Teller's Daughter;

defeats the revolted General;

Mean time the revolted General form'd a Deſign to make himſelf King of Tſû; and marching towards one of the Places of that Kingdom, which he hop'd to take in a ſhort time, the Governor ſeeing the Danger he was in, begg'd Aſſiſtance of Lyew-pang: who by his Preſence and the Terror of his Name caus'd the Enemy to retreat, and thus deliver'd the City. But the Governor, inſtead of acknowledging the Service, ſhut the Gates againſt his Deliverer.

and becomes General of a great Army.

Lyew-pang, being inform'd by a Letter faſten'd to an Arrow, which was ſhot into his Camp, that the Governor's Ingratitude had caus'd a Sedition in the City, immediately beſieg'd, and ſcaling the Walls, took it. The Governor having been ſlain at the firſt Attack, the Inhabitants declar'd for the Conqueror, who enter'd with his Army in Triumph; and thus from being Captain of the Vagabonds, he became of a ſudden General of a great Army, as well as Maſter of a rich Booty. Hereupon he caus'd red Enſigns to be made, and began to entertain Hopes of fulfilling the Prediction of the Fortune-Teller.

In the mean time, tho' the Emperor's Throne ſhook under him, yet it could not rouſe him out of that dead Lethargy, into which the Love of Pleaſure had thrown him; and the perfidious Ko-lau, inſtead of endeavouring to recover him, precipitated his Ruin, by his pernicious Advice; he falſly accuſed of Crimes the Miniſters and Governors, who were beſt affected to the reigning Family, and had them immediately put to Death. Such a Career of Covetouſneſs and Cruelty making the People deſperate, many Cities, and even whole Provinces, received thoſe who came to take Poſſeſſion of them, looking on them as the Avengers of publick Liberty. So that in the ſecond Year of Eul-ſhi, ſeveral Provinces revolting, choſe their own Sovereigns; and thus all the Kingdoms roſe again, which had been deſtroy'd by the Dexterity of Shi-whang-ti, particularly thoſe of Tſi, Yen, Chau, Ghey, and Tſû.

Several Kingdoms riſe up again.

Lyew-pang ſerves the King of Tſû,

The King of Tſû, who was the moſt powerful, having taken into his Service the brave Lyew-pang, ſent him and two other Generals, with each an Army under his Command, to attack the Emperor ſeparately; promiſing to beſtow the Kingdom of Tſin on any of the three, that ſhould take the Metropolis, and drive the Emperor out of it.

defeats the Emperor's Forces.

The Chineſe Monarch concluding, that if he defeated the King of Tſû, he could eaſily ſubdue the reſt, ſent a large Body to oppoſe his three Generals; one of whom was beaten by the Imperial Army, which at length was routed in its Turn by the General of Tſû, named Hyang-hyu.

On this they ſent to Court for a Reinforcement, but the Deputy being oblig'd to return without having had an Audience of the Ko-lau, they with their General join'd the Forces under Hyang-hyu.

DYN. IV. TSIN. Cyc. XXXVI. Year before Christ 237.

The Emperor murdered by his Ko-lau.

The Ko-lau hearing of the Deſertion of the Imperial Army, and fearing that his Treachery ſhould be ſuſpected, to prevent the Puniſhment which he juſtly dreaded, brought an Aſſaſſin into the Palace, who murder'd the Emperor in the twenty fourth Year of his Age, and the third of his Reign. Thus periſh'd miſerably a Prince, who pav'd his Way to a Throne by the Murder of his Brother.

Mean while the Ko-lau, who had ſhut himſelf in his Palace, pretending to be ſick, came out in haſte, as if he wanted to diſcover the Regicide and his Accomplices, and the better to make this Shew of his Fidelity paſs unſuſpected, he plac'd Ing-vang, who was Grand Nephew to the Emperor, on the Throne.

ING-VANG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Forty five Days.

Ing-vang, 4th Emperor, puts to Death the treaterous Ko-lau.

THIS Prince had been but three Days Poſſeſſor of the Crown, when he diſcover'd that it was the treacherous Ko-lau, who had murder'd the late Emperor. But as it was hazardous to puniſh ſo powerful a Miniſter openly, he pretended to be ſick, and commanded his Son to ſtab the Traytor, when he came alone, according to the Privilege of his Place, to ſpeak with him in private. This was put in Execution, and the Empire thereby deliver'd from a Monſter, who diſpos'd of all Employments, and arbitrarily deprived the Miniſters and Governors, both of their Subſtance and Life. Afterwards they put to Death all his kindred to the third Generation.

Lew pang dethrones the Emperor, and puts an End to the Dynaſty of the Tſin.

In the mean time Lyew-pang was advancing towards the Capital: which when the Emperor heard, he drew out all his Troops that were in Garriſon, to ſtrengthen his Army. Lyew-pang on his ſide making uſe of Stratagem, ſent abundance of his Soldiers, under Pretence of being Deſerters, into the Imperial Camp; where they corrupted great Numbers, craftily perſuading them that it was their Intereſt to follow Lyew-pang: who heing inform'd that the Imperial Army was ready to mutiny, came upon it ſuddenly and defeated it. The Emperor finding himſelf forſaken by his Subjects, and fearing Death more then the Loſs of his Crown; threw himſelf at the Conqueror's Feet, and deliver'd him the Seals and other Marks of the Imperial Dignity. Lyew-pang entred the City in Triumph, which he gave Leave to his Soldiers to plunder, excepting the Palace, where he found immenſe Riches; forbidding them under the ſevereſt Penalties to uſe any of the Inhabitants ill.

The Fifth DYNASTY, call'd HAN, which had Twenty five Emperors in the Space of Four hundred and twenty ſix Years.

KAU-TSU, Firſt Emperor, whoſe Name before was LYEW-PANG, reign'd Twelve Years.

DYN. V. HAN. Kau-tſu, 1ſt Emperor, comes to an Agreement with Hyang-hyu, LYEW-PANG was the Founder and firſt Emperor of this Dynaſty, under the Name of Kau-tſu. At firſt he only aſſumed the Title of King of Tſin; becauſe he had taken the Capital of the Empire, in the Name of the King of Tſu, who had promis'd to give him that Kingdom.

Hyang-hyu(A), the other General, who as hath been obſerved had alſo been ſent to dethrone the Emperor, was vext to find that Lyew-pang, through his Expedition and Addreſs, had depriv'd him of the Glory and Principality to which he aſpir'd; and as he was brutiſh and cruel, and at the Head of a numerous and well diſciplin'd Army, it was fortunate for Lyew-pang, that he prevented its coming to an open Rupture. This was effected by means of an Interview, procur'd by the Father of Hyang-hyu, at which the Generals being reconcil'd, they afterwards entred the Metropolis together.

who murders the dethron'd Emperor.

Hyang-hyu, not pleas'd with the Clemency and Mildneſs of Lyew-pang, and to ſhew his hatred to the Princes of Tſin, ſet the City and the Imperial Palace on Fire; had the Tombs of the Princes of Tſin ſearch'd, and their Bones thrown into unknown Places; and with his own Hands murder'd the dethron'd Prince, whom Lyew-pang had treated with great Reſpect ever ſince his Misfortune.

A great number of the late Emperor's Soldiers, who were among his Troops, having murmur'd at his Cruelty, he caus'd their Arms to be taken from them by Stratagem; after which they were ſurrounded by his Army, who cut all their Throats without Mercy, by his Orders.

Orders. So many barbarous Actions render'd him abhorr'd by the Soldiers, as well as the People; and ſerv'd as a Foil to ſet off the Juſtice, Clemency, and Moderation of Lyew-pang. DYN. V. HAN.

As Hyang-hyu had made himſelf abſolute in the State of Han, and plac'd Garriſons in moſt of the Cities, he next reſolved to murder his Maſter, to whom he owed his preſent Fortune; whereby he propoſed both to attain the Empire, to which he had long aſpired, and be revenged on him for having preferr'd Lyew-pang before him, in giving him the Principality of Tſin. With this Deſign he ſet toward the City of Kyew-kyang, in the Province of Kyang-ſi, where the King of Tſu was. This Prince to honour his General, came himſelf to meet him, and was immediately aſſaſſinated. Lyew-pang being grieved at the Misfortune of this Prince, who was his Benefactor, order'd the moſt magnificent Obſequies poſſible for him; which gain'd him ſtill more the Affection of the People, who join'd with him to revenge the Death of their Sovereign. The two Generals, who from this time were at War together for the Imperial Crown, having fought ſeventeen Battles, with various Succeſs, at laſt Lyew-pang entirely defeated his Antagoniſt's Army, who ſlew himſelf to avoid falling into his Enemy's Hands.

Cyc. xxxvi. Year before Chriſt 237.

Hyang-hyu aſſaſſinates the King of Tſu.

Is defeated by Lyew-pang, and kills himſelf.

A Soldier, who found his Body on the Ground, cut off his Head, and carry'd it to Lyew-pang, after which it was fix'd on a Spear, and ſhew'd to all the Inhabitants of Tſu. The Conqueror uſed his Victory with Moderation; he order'd a magnificent Funeral for Hyang-hyu, to ſhew the Eſteem he had for his Valour, and gave his Father the Sovereignty of a Province.

This War being ended, he conven'd a General Aſſembly of the Eſtates of the Empire; wherein he was declared Emperor, under the Name of Kau-tſu, by all the Tributary Princes, Grandees, and Governors of the Provinces. He kept his Court at firſt in the Province of Shen-ſi, but afterwards remov'd it into that of Ho-nan, where it continued one hundred ninety ſix Years, under twelve Emperors.

Lyew-pang declared Emperor.

At a great Feaſt which he gave to his Officers and Soldiers, with whom he talk'd very familiarly, he aſk'd them, to what they attributed his Advancement to the Empire; they making Anſwer in flattering Terms, aſcribed it to his Merit, Valour, and other great Qualities; You are miſtaken, reply'd the Emperor, it is owing to this, that I knew how to diſtinguiſh the different Talents of thoſe whom I honour'd with my Confidence, and to give them ſuch Employments as they were moſt fit for.

The Maxim to which he aſcribed his Advancement.

Kau-tſu falling ſick, nam'd his Son Whey-ti for his Succeſſor, appointing him Miniſters in whom he might confide; he dy'd the forty third Year of the Cycle. The Chineſe Hiſtory beſtows on him the higheſt Elogies.

WHEY-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

THE Empire expected great things from this Prince, he being endow'd with Abundance of Meekneſs, and Moderation, as well as great Courage. But theſe Virtues were defac'd by much greater Faults; his immoderate Love for Women ruin'd his Health, and his Complaiſance for his Mother induced him to intruſt her with the Care of the Empire.

Whey-ti, 2d Emperor, intruſts his Mother with Affairs.

This Princeſs aſſum'd the whole Authority to herſelf, and was generally hated for her Cruelty and other Crimes. She removed the Miniſters and Governors, according to her Fancy, and diſpoſed of their Places to her Creatures. The ordinary Inſtrument of her Revenge was Poiſon, which ſhe cauſed to be given ſecretly to thoſe ſhe wanted to get rid of.

Her wicked Practices.

The King of Tſi, who was the Emperor's eldeſt Brother, coming to viſit him, when he was ſick, had been diſpatch'd in the ſame manner, if the Emperor himſelf had not taken the fatal Cup, which ſhe had preſented him, out of his Hand.

Whey-ti dy'd the fiftieth Year of the Cycle, being oppreſs'd with Infirmities, which his looſe Life had brought upon him. Lyu-hew, his Mother, fearing that they intended to ſet one of the Emperor's Brothers on the Throne, pretended to have a Child, which ſhe bought of a Countrywoman and declared herſelf his Guardian; but conſidering that the Cheat was in Danger of being diſcover'd, while the Mother lived, ſhe caus'd her to be ſtrangled.

She ſets up an Impoſtor on her Son's Death.

LYU-HEW, the Uſurper, reign'd Eight Years.

THIS Princeſs was not ſatisfy'd to have raiſed her Family out of the Duſt to the higheſt Dignities of the Empire, but ſhe wanted the Tributary Crowns at her Diſpoſal; and put to Death one of her Miniſters who had the Courage to tell her, that thoſe Dominions belong'd of Right to the Princes of the Family of Han, and that her Huſband had ſworn all the Governors to maintain that Right even by Force of Arms, if Neceſſity required it. However, ſhe thought herſelf powerful enough to fear nothing; and in effect gave the Sovereignty of ſome Provinces to her own Relations, on Condition of paying her Homage.

Lyu-hew, the Uſurper.

After this ſhe murder'd the young Child, to which ſhe was Guardian, and by ſo doing diſcover'd the Secret of the Artifice which her Ambition had prompted her to. Her Relations alſo abuſing their good Fortune, behav'd themſelves with ſo much Arrogance and Pride, that the Nobles combin'd together to reduce them to their former deſpicable Condition, when this wicked Princeſs was taken away by a ſudden Death, in the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle.

Her Memory was so odious, that nobody would take the Part of her Family; so that all her Relations were massacred throughout the Empire.

They proceeded immediately to elect an Emperor, and chose the Sovereign of a small State, who was the second Son of Kau-tsû. He ascended the Throne without Opposition, and took the Name of Ven-ti.

VEN-TI, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

Ven-ti, 3d Emperor, Restores the Empire to its former Lustre.

UNDER the Reign of this Prince the Empire recover'd its ancient Splendor; and his Virtues gain'd him in a little time the Love of the Nobles as well as the People.

In the Sacrifices which he offer'd, according to Custom, to the Lord of Heaven, he first pray'd for the Happiness and Prosperity of his Subjects, then for the Preservation of his Person. He was so frugal, that he would not suffer the least Alteration to be made in the Furniture of his Palace, nor to be served in Gold or Silver Plate; and prohibited his Wives, even the Empress herself, to wear Silks, that were either embroider'd or of various Colours. He testify'd his Tenderness for the People, by remitting the Duty on Salt, and one half of the ordinary Taxes; also by ordering all the poor old Men in every Province, after they were arrived to the Age of fourscore, to be maintain'd at his own Expence.

Wholesome Regulations.

There being a Mint for Copper Money no where but in the Metropolis, whereby the Imperial Treasure found an Advantage, but the Public suffer'd in Proportion to the Distance of Places; he permitted the Coinage of them all over the Empire, ordering, that this sort of Money should be made round, with a square Hole in the middle for the Conveniency of carrying it. The preceding Wars having laid waste the Country and ruin'd Agriculture, which is one of the principal Supports of the State, he cultivated the Earth with his Royal Hands, in some sort to enoble that laborious Profession. He caused Mulberry-Trees to be planted, and Silk-Worms to be bred in his Palace, in order to induce the Grandees to follow his Example; obliging the Empress and his other Wives to employ themselves in Needlework, that they might set a Pattern of Industry to the Chinese Ladies. He protected Learning, and gave leave for the Books, which had been saved from the Fire, to be produc'd. In his Reign the Art of making Paper was also first discover'd, by grinding Bambû in Mills made on Purpose; every thing before being written on Leaves, or the Bark of Trees, with an Iron Pencil; instead of which they invented likewise Pencils made of Hair, and Ink which is dissolv'd in Water on a Piece of Marble. While this Prince was thus employ'd in making his People happy, the Tartars made several Inroads into the Empire, but were repulsed with Loss, and driven a great Distance from the Frontiers. The most distant Nations were so affected with the Fame of his Virtue, and Wisdom of his Government, that the Provinces of Quang-tong and Quang-si voluntarily offer'd to submit to his Laws, and pay'd him Tribute; on which he sent Ambassadors to receive their Homages. The only Fault which this Prince is accused of, is his Weakness in giving credit to a certain Impostor, who presented him with a very costly Liquor, assuring him that, if he drank it, it would make him immortal.

Indian Ink invented.

The Tartars repulsed.

Quang-tong and Quang-si submit to his Laws.

He dy'd in the forty sixth Year of his Age, and the twenty first Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son King-ti.

KING-TI, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

King-ti, 4th Emperor.

THIS Prince was remarkable for his Mildness and Clemency. One of his first Acts was to mollify the Rigour of Punishments which were then inflicted on Criminals; but he re-establish'd the Taxes, which his Father had reduc'd to one half, alledging as a Reason, that since Agriculture was restored, the Imperial Treasure ought to be put in a Condition to support the Occasions of the State.

The great Indulgence of those who had the Care of the Education of the young Princes, occasion'd great Disorders in his Reign. As it was the Custom for the Children of the Tributary Princes to be educated with those of the Emperor, the eldest Son of King-ti made a Feast for one of them, whom he had taken a particular Affection for, above the rest; in which he carry'd the Debauch to such Excess, that having quarrell'd with his Favorite, he stabb'd him dead with a Knife. The Father hearing of his Son's Death, swore to revenge it, and engag'd in his Quarrel six other Tributary Princes, who join'd Forces with him. The Emperor, to prevent their Designs, sent an able General with an Army against them; who had the Policy to draw the Enemy into a Province, where they had Difficulty to meet with Provisions, while himself, fortify'd in his Camp, had plenty of all things necessary for the Subsistance of his Army.

The rash Action of his eldest Son occasions a War in the Empire.

The Confederates perceiving they should soon be afflicted with Famine, resolv'd to divide their Forces, and attack the Camp on all sides at once. But being repulsed with very great Loss, they fell into a disorderly Flight, on which the Imperialists made a dreadful Slaughter; and the six Princes were either kill'd by the Emperor's Soldiers, or kill'd themselves to prevent falling into the Enemy's Hands.

VU-TI, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Fifty four Years.

Vû-ti, 5th Emperor, an excellent Prince.

THE Prudence, Moderation, and Valour of this Prince, his Application to Government, his Love for the Sciences, and particular Regard for learned Men, made him eſteem'd as one of the greateſt Emperors that ever reign'd in China. As ſoon as he had perform'd his Father's Obſequies, he ſent for all the chief Philoſophers in the Empire to his Court, to conſult them upon the Meaſures of his Government. And as he was naturally inclin'd to War, he thought they would have incourag'd his Inclination, by adviſing him to attempt the Conqueſt of ſome neighbouring Countries, that he might eſtabliſh Order and Tranquillity therein; but he was mightily ſurpriſed to find theſe Wiſe Men perſuading him to maintain Peace, and avoid the moſt juſt Wars, which ſooner or later prove fatal to a State.

This made him give over the Thought of ſuch Projects, however fond he was of them, and apply himſelf to the Cares of Government, which he reliev'd with Hunting, the only Recreation he delighted in. He had for that Purpoſe a Park, encloſed with Walls of vaſt Extent, where all ſorts of Game and Fallow Beaſts were kept; but reflecting that ſo much Land lying uncultivated was a Loſs to his People, he choſe rather to deprive himſelf of that innocent Pleaſure, than give them Cauſe to complain, and thenceforth contented himſelf with the ancient Parks belonging to his Predeceſſors.

His Laws.

He made ſeveral Laws, very conducive to the Peace of the Empire. The Extent of Land, given in Sovereignty to any Prince, was not to exceed one hundred Li ſquare; But ſome of them had ſo encreaſed their Quantity, that they poſſeſs'd above a thouſand Li. He remedy'd this Abuſe, by ordaining that, whenever a Prince ſhould die, his Eſtate ſhould be equally divided among his legitimate Children, not thinking it juſt that only one ſhould be enrich'd, while the reſt, thro' Indigence, were unable, with Decency to perform the Honours indiſpenſably due to their Father's Memory. He order'd withall, that for want of lawful Heirs, thoſe Sovereignties ſhould revert to the Crown.

Reſtores the ancient Books.

In order to promote the Sciences he commanded the learned Men, whom his Liberalities had drawn to his Court, to put in Order thoſe ancient and precious Books which had eſcap'd the general Deſtruction; cauſing them to be taught publickly; as alſo the Moral Maxims of Confucius and Mencius. Theſe Books were Manuſcripts, Printing not having been invented till within fifty Years before the Chriſtian Æra.

Deluded with the Liquor of Immortality.

The good Qualities of this Prince were tarniſh'd by his Weakneſs, in giving Ear to Impoſtors, who promiſed him an Elixir, which ſhould render him immortal; once, when one of theſe Chemiſts brought him this Liquor of Immortality, and ſetting it on the Table earneſtly intreated him to drink it for an Experiment; one of his Miniſters, who had endeavour'd in vain to cure him of his Credulity, took up the Cup ſuddenly and drank it himſelf. The Emperor being incenſed that his Miniſter had deprived him of Immortality, reſolved to puniſh him with Death; to which the Miniſter reply'd with a Smile, If this Drink, Sir, hath made me Immortal, how can you put me to Death? But if you can, how doth this frivolous Theft deſerve it? This Anſwer ſoften'd the Emperor, who, tho' he applauded the Wiſdom of his Miniſter, was not thoroughly cured of his Weakneſs.

Cyc. xxxviii Year before Chriſt 117.

Puniſhes an Impoſtor.

Some time after a Magician appear'd at Court, who undertook to ſhew the Emperor one of his Wives of the ſecond Order, who was dead, and had been tenderly beloved by him. The Impoſtor pretended ſhe inhabited the Moon, where ſhe enjoy'd the Effects of drinking the Liquor which render'd People immortal; and having order'd a Tower to be built, affirm'd that by his Power over Spirits, he would cauſe her to deſcend therein as often as the Emperor pleaſed. The Emperor aſſiſted at the conjuring Ceremonies, but the Immortal was deaf to the Voice of the Magician, who fearing to be puniſh'd, had recourſe to this Artifice. Having on a piece of Silk written the Reaſons, which hinder'd the Concubine from deſcending from the Moon, he cauſed a Cow to ſwallow it; after which pointing to the Beaſt, I know not, ſays he to the Emperor, in a fearful Tone, what Crime we have committed, but I ſee in the Belly of this Creature things that ſurprize me; command it, O Prince! to be open'd in your Preſence. The Cow was accordingly open'd, and the piece of Silk found in its Belly. But after examining the Writing, they diſcover'd it to be the Impoſtor's own Hand, who not able to deny it was put to Death. This Hiſtory ſerves for a Subject to ſeveral Comedies.

Repels the Tartars and conquers ſeveral Countries.

Vû-ti won four great Victories over the Tartars; and, after having driven them far beyond the Great Wall, he carry'd his victorious Arms into the Kingdoms of Pegu, Siam, Kamboya, and Bengâl; dividing the vanquiſh'd Countries among the two Generals, and other Officers, who had conquer'd them. He built ſeveral Cities there, and honour'd the two Generals with the Title of King. Theſe Chineſe ſoon contracted the Manners and Inclinations of the Tartars, and proved in time the greateſt Enemies of their Mother Country.

Origin of the Kin or Manchew Tartars.

One of theſe Tartar Kings, to prevent the Reſentment of the Emperor, threw himſelf upon his Mercy, ſubmitted to pay him Tribute, and ſent his eldeſt Son to be educated at his Court. The Emperor was greatly pleaſed with this young Prince, who, beſide a graceful Shape, had a very lofty Air, mixt with a ſurprizing Sweetneſs; and being charm'd with his Dexterity in managing Horſes, made him firſt his Maſter of the Horſe, and afterward General of his Army: honouring him with the Name of Kin (u), to diſtinguiſh him from the Tartars, as if he had been a Native of China.

Vû-ti names a Succeſſor and puts the young Princes Mother to Death.

When Vû-ti drew near his End, he declar'd the Son of one of his Concubines his Succeſſor. This young Prince, whom he loved better than any of his Children, was no more than eight Years of Age; but he appointed him for Guardian one of his Miniſters, in whom he had an entire Confidence. And fearing that the Mother of the young Emperor ſhould ſtir up Troubles in the State, as Lyu-hew had done, he reſolv'd to put her to Death, for the many Crimes ſhe was accuſed of; allowing her the Favour however of chooſing what Death ſhe would die.

The Emperor dy'd the thirty firſt Year of the Cycle, and the ſeventy firſt of his Age, and the young Prince Chau-ti ſucceeded him.

CHAU-TI, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

Chau-ti, 6th Emperor.

Wiſe Conduct.

THIS Prince, tho' very young, diſcover'd good Diſpoſitions, and a Prudence far above his Years; being very tractable to the Inſtructions which he receiv'd from the wiſe Guardian which his Father had appointed him. He began his Reign by rewarding the Officers who had ſerv'd the State well; by ſending juſt and able Magiſtrates ſecretly into the Provinces, to enquire if the People were oppreſs'd; and by providing for the Poor in a time of Dearth, when he ordain'd that the rich People, who had more Corn than was neceſſary for their Subſiſtence, ſhould furniſh the poor with as much as they wanted, and be oblig'd to ſow enough to ſupply them. To make them Amends, he remitted the Taxes on all ſort of Grain; by which wiſe Regulation he ſav'd the Lives of infinite Numbers of indigent People.

Care to provide for the poorer Subjects.

Makes Peace with the Tartars, and dies greatly lamented.

Equally careful of the Repoſe and Happineſs of his Subjects, he concluded an honourable Peace with the Tartars; but did not long ſurvive it, dying without Male Iſſue, in the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, before he was quite twenty two Years old, mightily lamented by the Empire, on account of his excellent Qualities.

Hyau-ti his Succeſſor being vicious is ſoon depoſed.

Hyau-ti his Uncle ſucceeded him, with the Conſent of the whole Nation, who ſoon repented their Choice; for he was negligent of the Government, had no Tenderneſs for the People, ſpent both Day and Night in Debauches, and deſpis'd all good Counſels, which oblig'd the Miniſters and Nobility to depoſe him.

They went to the Palace, and ſeiz'd the Seals, and other Enſigns of the Imperial Dignity, declaring he had forfeited his Authority; and then ſent him to the little State, whereof he had been Sovereign before; not one of his Subjects or Domeſtics finding Fault with what was done, ſo odious and contemptible he had render'd himſelf. They choſe in his Place Swen-ti, who was Grand-Son of the Emperor Vû-ti.

SWEN-TI, Seventh Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

Swen-ti, or Siun ti, 7th Emperor.

THE Misfortunes which this Prince ſuffer'd in his Youth, did not a little contribute to thoſe Virtues which render'd him worthy of the Empire. He had been educated in a Priſon, where the Princeſs his Mother was ſhut up by the Command of the Emperor; who ſuſpected her, tho' falſely, of deſtroying the Princes and Princeſſes of the Royal Blood, by Witchcraft and Sorcery. The Keeper of the Priſon was very careful of him, and Swen-ti, as ſoon as he was Emperor, rewarded him with a Principality.

This Prince was of eaſy Acceſs, of a very mild compaſſionate Nature to the Unfortunate, and very conſtant in his Application to State-Affairs.

Re-eſtabliſhes Cenſors.

As he reſolved to govern alone, he re-eſtabliſh'd an Officer, ſuppreſs'd by his Predeceſſors, whoſe Buſineſs it was to put the Emperor in mind of his Faults, and to exhort him to reform his Conduct, when he departed from his Duty.

He cauſed exact Information to be given him of the Behaviour of the Governors and Magiſtrates of the People; gave Audience often, eſpecially to Widows, Orphans, and poor Folks. He permitted all his Subjects to preſent him Memorials; becauſe in that Form they could better explain, and he give more Attention to their Caſe, than in Audiences.

Reduces the Laws.

He reduc'd the multitude of Laws to a certain Number of Articles, and diſannull'd the reſt, which ſerv'd only to perplex the cleareſt Matters, and to perpetuate Suits.

In the forty eighth Year of the Cycle there were dreadful Earthquakes, which ſeparated Mountains, and fill'd up Valleys; and as ſuch Accidents were not common, they ſtruck the greater Terror among the People, who look'd on them as a Sign of the Anger of Heaven, and the Fore-runner of ſome greater Calamity. Tan-yu, a King of the Tartars, ſent Ambaſſadors to pay the Emperor Homage, and to acknowledge himſelf his Tributary. As it was ſuſpected that their Intentions were not ſincere, and that they came only to diſcover the Strength of the Empire, and prevent War being declar'd againſt their Nation before they had recruited themſelves, it was reſolv'd at firſt not to admit them to Audience; but perceiving by the fine Furs which they brought, that this Step was taken ſolely for the Advantage of having free Liberty of Trade they were graciouſly receiv'd, and treated as Envoys of an Ally. YWEN-TI, Eighth Emperor, reign'd Sixteen Years.

THE ſingular Taſte this Prince had for Learning, and his Reſpect for learned Men, whom he invited to his Court, and often convers'd with, made him indeed a great Scholar, but not a Great Prince, tho' he did not want ſeveral good Qualities. He is prais'd particularly for his Moderation, his Love to his People, and the Frugality he diſcover'd after he was Emperor, being uſed to ſay, That He who could be contented with little, would want nothing. He regulated his Houſe by this Maxim; he leſſen'd the Number of his Domeſtics, and retrench'd all Superfluities in his Diet, Furniture, Stables, and Equipage; retaining only juſt as much of every thing as was purely neceſſary. Ywen-ti, 8th Emperor. Is moderate and frugal,

But theſe good Qualities, and many more, were quite obſcur'd by the bad Choice of his Servants having regard neither to their Capacities nor Experience; to expreſs themſelves politely and eloquently, was with him the higheſt Merit, and all that he required in his greateſt Miniſters. Hence having no other Views than their own Promotion, they fill'd the Court with Factions and Cabals, endeavouring to deſtroy one another, and get the Aſcendant over the Prince; who by his Credulity and Weakneſs ſuffer'd himſelf to be led into all their Meaſures. So that by Degrees they turn'd all Perſons of Merit and Experience out of the Management of Affairs, and put their own Friends and Relations into their Places. but ruins his Affairs by a bad Choice of his Officers,

Notwithſtanding the Peace which had been concluded with the Tartars, the Troops that were poſted along the Walls took two of their Princes Priſoners; who truſting to the former Treaty, were hunting in the Mountains, and beheaded them both. who violate the Peace with the Tartars,

The Emperor, inſtead of puniſhing the Commander of thoſe Troops for this piece of Treachery, rewarded him for it; but hearing that the Succeſſor of one of thoſe Princes, was levying numerous Forces, to revenge that infamous Breach of Peace; in order to appeaſe him, and prevent the War, he was oblig'd to give him a Princeſs of the Imperial Family in Marriage, with a conſiderable Dowry. A Civil War was ready to break out in the Empire, among the numerous Parties form'd by the Miniſters; when the Emperor dy'd in the twenty ſixth Year of the Cycle, and the forty third Year of his Age. He was ſucceeded by his Son Ching-ti. and create Factions.

CHING-TI, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Twenty ſix Years.

THIS Prince's Fondneſs for Women and Wine, plung'd him into all manner of Vice, and infamous Pleaſures. Out of that blind Reſpect which he had for the Empreſs his Mother, who was of the Family of Lyang, he conferr'd the moſt important Places of the Empire on her Relations, without conſidering the Prejudice he was doing to himſelf and his own Family. A Nobleman, who had the greateſt Share of the Government in the former Reign, not thinking it for his Honour to remain at Court, aſk'd Leave to retire, which was granted; but he was murder'd on the Way to one of his Country Seats, by order, as was believed, of the Emperor. Ching-ti, 9th Emperor. His Exceſſes.

He fell ſo violently in Love with an Actreſs, as ſhe ſang in his Preſence, that he drove his lawful Wife out of the Palace, to make Room for her, whom he declar'd Empreſs; and that the Meanneſs of her Father's Extraction might be overlook'd, he gave him a Principality. But his Miniſters having in ſeveral Petitions reproach'd him with ſo ſhameful an Alliance, he order'd them all to be put to Death; and yet theſe are but a ſmall part of his brutal Crimes. Violent Paſſion for an Actreſs.

A ſudden Death deliver'd the Empire from this Monſter, in the fifty firſt Year of the Cycle. He left no Iſſue, but was ſucceeded by his Nephew Hyau-ngay-ti.

HYAU-NGAN-TI, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

Hyau-ngan-ti, 10th Emperor, Reforms the Government.

THO' this Prince was but eighteen Years old when he came to the Crown, yet they conceiv'd great Hopes from his Mildneſs and Moderation; as well as the Reſolution he took immediately to reſtore Order in the Empire, and comfort the People.

He began by diſplacing ſeveral Governors, whom he thought unworthy of their Employments; and depoſed the Prime Miniſter, whoſe Family was grown ſo exceedingly in Power and Credit, that it even ſeem'd to counter-balance the Sovereign Authority. He made ſeveral other Regulations, which were very neceſſary, and gave great Expectations of a moſt happy Reign, had his Life been prolong'd.

Tan-yau does Homage in Perſon.

In the fifth Year of his Reign, Tan-yu, King of the Tartars, having obtain'd Leave to come in Perſon to pay Homage to him, was receiv'd in a very magnificent Manner, and a firm Peace was eſtabliſh'd between the two Nations.

The Emperor dy'd the Year after this happen'd, at the Age of twenty five, being the ſame Year that Chriſt was born. They placed on the Throne a Prince deſcended from Ywen-ti, the eighth Emperor of this Dynaſty, who was but nine Years old.

HYAU-PING-TI, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Five Years.

Hyau-ping-ti, 11th Emp.

THE Empreſs, Grandmother to the young Emperor, very imprudently truſted the Government, during his Minority, in the Hands of one Vang-mang, whom ſhe made Ko-lau, or Prime Miniſter. This Man join'd an unbounded Ambition to Deceit and Art; and made no Scruple to commit the moſt cruel Actions, to gratify the ſecret Deſire he had of uſurping the Sovereign Authority.

Vang-mang made Prime Miniſter.

His firſt Step towards it, was to get rid of his Aſſociate in the Miniſtry, who was a Man of Merit; and having thus made himſelf abſolute, his whole Care was to ſtrengthen his Party. He erected ſeveral new Principalities, and beſtow'd them on thoſe who were moſt devoted to his Intereſt. He even dared to offer Sacrifice to the Lord of Heaven; and tho' he did it in the Emperor's Name, his Deſign was to accuſtom the People to ſee him perform thoſe Functions, which belong'd ſolely to the Imperial Dignity. In ſhort he ſpread ſham Reports of Prodigies, by means of his Creatures; who took much Pains to perſuade the People that by thoſe Signs Heaven declared that Vang-mang was ſent for the Relief of the Empire.

Cyc. XL. Year of Chriſt 4.

In the ſecond Year of the Cycle, the treacherous Vang-mang mix'd Poiſon with the Emperor's Food, which in a few Days reduc'd him to the laſt Extremity. The Traitor, who pretended to be pierced with Grief at the Danger the young Prince was in, made the Palace reſound with his Cries, offering Vows continually to Heaven, for his Recovery, and even devoting his own Life as a Sacrifice for the Emperor's; by which means he avoided the Suſpicion of his Crime.

Poiſons the Emperor.

However, he did not think it proper, at this Juncture, to uſurp the Crown, but placed it for the preſent on the Head of a young Infant of two Years old, call'd Zhu-tſe-ing, who deſcended from Swen-ti, the ſeventh Emperor of this Dynaſty.

Zhu-tſe ing, or Ju-tſe-in, 12th Emp.

THE Infancy of this Prince maintain'd Vang-mang in the Power which he had aſſum'd, and he made uſe of it, to increaſe his Party by his Favour; but three Years were ſcarcely at an end, before he depoſed the young Prince, and proclaim'd himſelf Emperor.

VANG-MANG, the Uſurper, reign'd Fourteen Years.

Vang-mang, a Uſurper.

AS ſoon as the Uſurper was plac'd on the Throne, which he had obtain'd by the blackeſt Crimes, he gave to his Family the Name of Tſin, which ſignifies New; and indeed the Empire receiv'd a new Face from the Alterations which he made in it. He divided the Empire into nine Provinces, and each Province into ſeveral Diſtricts, over which he ſet Governors in whom he could confide; he alſo created ſeveral new Principalities, to increaſe the Number of his Dependants. After taking theſe and ſome other Precautions, the Tyrant began to think his Authority ſo well fix'd, that it was not in the Power of any thing to ſhake it; but he ſoon found himſelf miſtaken. The Empire was preſently in a Flame, ſeveral numerous Armies appearing, ſome of which were commanded by the confederate Lords; who were call'd Che-mû-i, becauſe the Soldiers had painted their Eyebrows, red, to diſtinguiſh themſelves from their Enemies. The other Armies were commanded by two Brothers, of the Family of Han, whoſe Names were Lyew-ſyew and Lyew-ing. Theſe Wars laſted a long time, and were very bloody. The nineteenth Year of the Cycle, the Country was peſter'd with ſuch multitudes of Graſhoppers, that they devour'd the Harveſt, and cauſed almoſt a general Famine, which occaſion'd abundance of Inſurrections and Robberies.

In the twentieth Year, the Uſurper's Army was entirely defeated, his Palace plunder'd and burnt to the Ground, his own Throat cut, his Body cut in pieces, and his Head put on a Pitchfork and publicly expoſed, for the Mob, to make Sport with. The victorious Army elected Whay-yang-vang Emperor, who was a Deſcendant of King-ti, the fourth Emperor of this Dynaſty.

WHAY-YANG-VANG, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

THE looſe and effeminate Life, which this new Emperor led, induced the Army who had ſet the Crown on his Head to take it from him again, as being unworthy to wear it. They gave it firſt to Vang-lang, who was an Impoſtor, pretending himſelf to be the Son of Ching-ti, the ninth Emperor. But the Cheat being ſoon diſcover'd, they cut off his Head, and elected in his Place Lyew-ſyew; who aſſum'd the Name of Quang-vû-ti, and was deſcended from the tenth Son of King-ti, the fourth Emperor of this Dynaſty.

Whay-yang-vang, 13th Emperor.

QUANG-VU-TI, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty three Years.

THIS Prince removed his Court from the Province of Shen-ſi to that of Ho-nan, and made himſelf famous by his Politics, and warlike Atchievements. The homely Education which he had at firſt in the Country, where he ſhar'd the Labour and Wants with the meaneſt Peaſants, made him ſenſible of the Miſeries of the People. Beſides he was mild, affable, liberal, and very fond of learned Men; whom he ſent for to Court from all Parts, and gave them honourable Employments.

Quang-vû-ti, 14th Emp.

At a time when he paſs'd thro' the Country, where he was born, in viſiting the Provinces, he ſent for ſeveral Huſbandmen, who were his Countrymen, and admitted them to his Table. Being inform'd, that one of his old Friends, call'd Nyen-quang, a Fiſherman, was living, he ſent for him, received him honourably, and paſs'd the whole Night in Diſcourſe with him, about their paſt Adventures.

Inſtance of his Affability and Generoſity.

He was twelve Years employ'd in ſubduing the Rebels, and ſettling the Peace of the Empire. Mean time the Army, the Soldiers of which had painted their Eyebrows red, choſe an Emperor of the Family of Han, call'd Pwan-tſe, who being defeated, went to the Emperor, threw himſelf at his Feet, and intreated his Clemency. The Emperor uſing his Victory with Moderation, granted him not only his Life, but gave him a Principality. The Chineſe Annals ſay, that in the twenty eighth Year of the Cycle, the laſt Day of the ſeventh Moon, there was a total Eclipſe of the Sun, which happen'd ſooner than it ought to have done by the Calculation. I leave it to Aſtronomers to examine, if this Eclipſe is the ſame which happen'd at the Death of Chriſt.

MING-TI, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd Eighteen Years.

THIS Prince is extoll'd by the Hiſtorians for his Prudence, Clemency, and Judgment. He eſtabliſh'd an Academy of Sciences in his Palace, for the Education of young Noblemen of the Empire; Strangers were alſo admitted into it, and he was often preſent himſelf at their Exerciſes.

Ming-ti, 15th Emperor, Eſtabliſhes Academies in his Palace.

He cauſed the Pictures of the moſt eminent Men, both in time of Peace and War, to be painted, with which he adorn'd one of his Halls. He was mightily applauded for his choice of the Daughter of one of his beſt Generals for Empreſs; this Lady, who was a Pattern of Diſcretion and Modeſty, never wearing any Cloaths that were embroider'd.

The Whang-ho, or Yellow River, having often overflow'd the neighbouring Country, whereby Cities and Fields receiv'd conſiderable Damage; the Emperor, to prevent theſe Inundations, cauſed a Bank to be raiſed, which was ten Leagues long, and employ'd one hundred thouſand Men at Work.

Having dreamt in the ſecond Year of the Cycle, that a Man of Gigantick Size appear'd to him, it brought to his Mind an Expreſſion often in the Mouth of Confuçius, viz. that the Holy one was in the Weſt, with which he was ſo deeply affected, that he ſent immediately Embaſſadors to India, in Queſt of the true Religion.

CHANG-TI, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

Chang-ti, 16th Emp.

THE Reign of this Prince was very pacifick, being neither diſturb'd by Wars, or any Commotions: which is attributed to the Fame of his Wiſdom and Prudence; to his Affection for his People, whoſe Taxes he leſſen'd; to the Protection he granted to Men of Learning; and to his Averſion to Luxury and ſuperfluous Expence. He often reminded his Subjects of the wiſe Oeconomy of the Ancients; and ſetting it as an Example to the Nobility and Magiſtrates, forbid all Magnificence in their Tables, Habit and Furniture of their Houſes. He dy'd the twenty fifth Year of the Cycle, in the thirty firſt Year of his Age; and his Son Ho-ti, who was but ten Years old, ſucceeded him.

HO-TI, Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

Ho-ti, 17th Emperor. Extends his Arms as far as Ta-tſin, or Judea.

AS this Prince was very young, the Empreſs, his Mother, became his Guardian. His Power was extended to very remote Countries, by the Valour and Conduct of one of his Generals, call'd Pan-chau; who oblig'd a great number of Sovereigns to pay Homage to the Emperor, and to crave his Protection. It is ſaid that he advanced as far as Judea, which the Chineſe call Ta-tſin, ſpending ſeveral Years in theſe Expeditions.

The Emperor having thro' Jealouſy divorced his Wife, who ſoon after dy'd with Grief, he made Empreſs in her ſtead, the Grand-Daughter of one of his Generals. She was a Princeſs of extraordinary Merit, and what is rare in Perſons of her Sex, well ſkill'd in all the Chineſe Learning; which Accompliſhments ſtill receiv'd greater Luſtre from her Modeſty. When thoſe who came according to Cuſtom to felicitate her Advancement, offer'd her Preſents; ſhe would accept of nothing but a few Pencils, and a ſort of Paper, which had been newly invented.

Firſt gives Power to the Eunuchs.

Ho-ti was the firſt who gave exorbitant Authority to the Eunuchs of the Palace, by advancing them to the higheſt Places in the Empire, which was the Occaſion of great Troubles and Diſorders afterwards.

NGAN-TI, Nineteenth Emperor, reign'd Nineteen Years.

Ngan-ti. 19th Emp.

AS this Prince was but thirteen Years of Age, the Empreſs, his Mother, was veſted with the Sovereign Authority; which ſhe was ſo well pleaſed with, that ſhe prolong'd her Regency much beyond the Term preſcrib'd by the Laws.

In a time of great Scarcety, ſhe viſited the Priſons herſelf, and gave the People all the Relief ſhe was able. Apprehending, that a Dominion of ſuch vaſt Extent as the Empire, could not be durable; ſhe releaſed great Numbers of foreign Nations, and ſovereign Princes, who had ſubmitted to the Emperor, from the Obligation of Homage, and reduced the Empire within narrower Bounds.

About this time there was a famous Pyrate, call'd Chang-pe-lû, who after infeſting the Seas of China for five Years, was taken and beheaded.

Several Earthquakes happen'd in this Reign, eſpecially one in the eighth Year, which extended over great part of the Country, the Earth opening in ſeveral Places, and making great Havock.

SHUN-TI, Twentieth Emperor, reign'd Nineteen Years.

THE Beginning of the Reign of this Prince was signalized by several Victories, which he obtain'd over the Barbarians.

The Empress, who had poison'd the Concubine, Mother of Shun-ti, did not long outlive her Crime; and the Emperor being inform'd of it, in Revenge forbid she should have the funeral Honours, which were due to her Dignity.

In the fourth Year of his Reign he made a Law, whereby no one could be admitted into the Magistracy, before he was forty Years old, unless he had some extraordinary Merit to supply the Want of Age.

Rebellion of Ma-myen.

In the ninth Year of the Cycle a great Number of Vagabonds uniting, form'd a considerable Army under the Command of one Ma-myen; who, being flush'd with Success in plundering several Cities of the Southern Provinces, began to aspire even to the Empire; but he was slain before he could accomplish his bold Design.

CHE-TI, Twenty second Emperor, reign'd One Year.

Che-ti, 22d Emp. a promising Prince.

ALTHO' he was but eight Years old, when he succeeded to the Crown, yet he discover'd a Genius far above his Years, which gave the Nation mighty Hopes of him. However, he being so young, Lyang-ki, the Brother of the Empress, did not pay him the Respects due to him, but abusing his Sister's Authority, spoke and acted as if he had been Sovereign. Nor could he forbear shewing his Pride and Insolence at a public Assembly, where the Emperor himself was present; who offended at his Behavior, and looking at him with a threatning Countenance, said in a low Voice, yet loud enough to be heard, That is an arrogant Person.

Is poison'd by Lyang-ki;

These Words cost the Prince dear; for Lyang-ki finding that he had Reason one Day to fear this Emperor's Resentment for his ill Conduct, took care to get him poison'd; so that this young Prince reign'd but one Year, and his eldest Brother Whan-ti succeded him.

WHAN-TI, Twenty third Emperor, reign'd Twenty one Years.

Whan-ti, 23d Emp.

UNDER the Reign of this Emperor the Magistracy became Venal. He was a great Patron of the Sect of Lyau-kyun, and Eunuchs were his Chief Favorites, which made all the learned Men retire from his Palace; nor could the Emperor either by Invitation or rich Presents bring them back again: they preferring the Tranquillity of their Solitude to the Folly of a Court, where the whole Authority was in the Hands of Eunuchs.

Lyang-ki grows insolent,

However Lyang-ki, the Murderer of the late Emperor, was raised to the highest Employments of the Empire; and his Wife was honour'd with the Title of Heroine, besides a Yearly Revenue of five hundred thousand Taëls. These Smiles of Fortune made him excessive haughty, so that he thought he might do whatever he pleased. At the beginning of the Chinese Year, when all the Grandees pay their Duty to the Emperor, he had the Confidence to enter the Palace with his Sword by his Side, contrary to the Laws. Upon this, he was immediately disarm'd, and acknowledging his Crime, ask'd the Emperor's Pardon, which was granted him; but having made himself odious to every body, by his Insolence and Pride, he was shortly after, as it were, besieg'd by a Troop of Eunuchs, and finding he could not escape their Vengeance, he slew both his Wife and himself. His Relations and Friends were stript of all the important Places to which he had prefer'd them, and his Riches which were immense, confiscated.

and is reduc'd to kill himself.

Dreadful Famine.

In the twenty eighth Year of the Cycle there was such a dreadful Famine in several Parts of the Empire, that many of the Chinese were oblig'd to feed upon human Flesh. The Emperor dy'd the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, and in the thirty sixth Year of his Age, without Issue, notwithstanding he had a great many Concubines. Ling-ti, who was of the Family of Chang-ti, succeeded him.

LING-TI, Twenty fourth Emperor, reign'd Twenty two Years.

THIS Prince, among other bad Qualities, is chiefly blam'd for his exceeding Fondneſs for Eunuchs, to whom he gave more Power than his Predeceſſors had done; his Averſion to thoſe who were able to give him good Counſel; his inſatiable Avarice, and ſharp Satirical Humour. He took a Fancy to eſtabliſh a Fair in his Palace, for ſelling all ſorts of Curioſities, where his Pleaſure was to ſee his Concubines outbid, wrangle, and abuſe one another.

One of his ordinary Diverſions, which was no leſs fantaſtical, was to take the Air in his Gardens in a Chariot drawn by Aſſes; whence, in imitation of the Court, Aſſes came to be preferr'd every where to Horſes.

The only good Action for which this Emperor is extoll'd, was the Care that he took to have the wiſe Inſtructions of the ancient Emperors, contained in the five Claſſical Books, engraven on Marble Tables, and publickly expoſed at the Entrance of the Academy.

Gives exorbitant Power to Eunuchs.

The Power of the Eunuchs became ſo very great, that they cauſed a great Number of the Nobility, who had conſpired their Ruin, to be put to Death. This Neglect or Abaſement of the Imperial Authority naturally produced Revolts. In a little time ſeveral great Armies appear'd in the Field, who ſtil'd themſelves Yellow Caps, under the Command of three Brothers call'd Chang, of the Sect of Lyau-kyun, who plunder'd divers Provinces; but at laſt they were defeated one after another, and ſlain.

Rebellion of the Yellow Caps.

The Barbarians, (for ſo the Chineſe call all Strangers) endeavour'd ſeveral times to make Conqueſts in the Empire, but were always defeated by an able Chineſe General, named Twan-kyong; who, as the Report goes, for ten Years that the War laſted, never went to Bed.

The Weakneſs and Indolence, or rather Stupidity of this young Prince, occaſion'd perpetual Wars at home as well as abroad.

Murder'd by his General.

China was divided firſt into three, and afterwards into four Parts, and had as many Sovereigns. The Eaſtern Part firſt conſpir'd againſt Tong-cho, General of the Imperial Army, who murder'd the Emperor and his eldeſt Brother; and having burnt the Palace, and open'd the Sepulchres of the Emperors, where he found immenſe Riches, he removed his Court into the Province of Shen-ſi. But his Crimes did not long go unpuniſh'd, for the next Year he was murder'd, and his Body hung on a Fork in the publick Market Place, and his Treaſures confiſcated. In the mean time the Yellow Caps took Advantage of theſe Diſorders to increaſe the Number of Rebels; but they were gradually deſtroy'd by Tſau-ſau, who uſurp'd the ſovereign Authority: of which he was ſtript the thirty ſeventh Year of the Cycle, by his own Son, Tſau-poy, and baniſh'd to a Principality, which he gave him, where he dy'd fourteen Years after, generally deſpiſed.

Virtue alone deſerves our Attention, and Purſuit; I have had too little to ſerve you for an Example; but follow the Advice of* Ko-lyang, and you will find in him a ſecond Father. DYN. VI. HEU-HAN. Cyc. XLIII. Year of Chriſt 184.

This Prince dy'd in the ſixty third Year of his Age, and the fortieth of the Cycle, after he had nam'd his Son Hew-ti for his Succeſſor.

HEW-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Forty one Years.

WHILST the Prime Miniſter liv'd, Hew-ti trod in the Steps of his Father; he kept his Court at Ching-tû, the Metropolis of the Province of Se-chwen. There were then in the Northern Provinces three Sovereigns of the Family of Ghey, and in the Southern Provinces the Family of U kept their Court at Nan-king. The Family of Ghey, which was the moſt powerful of the three, laſted but forty ſix Years; it was deſtroy'd by one of its Generals, whoſe Son became the Founder of the following Dynaſty. The Family of U had four Kings in the Space of fifty nine Years. Hew-ti, 2d Emperor. China divided among the Princes of 3 Families.

Theſe different Principalities neceſſarily occaſion'd Wars; in one of which the Emperor loſt two famous Generals, call'd Chang-ſi and Quang-yu. This latter is number'd among their Idols, and honour'd as the Mars of China.

The famous Ko-lyang, who ſtill remain'd, had divers Encounters with the King of Ghey, but was often overcome. He was admired for his extraordinary Skill in making a Retreat in preſence of the Enemy; which always prov'd no leſs to his Glory and Honour than if he had gain'd the Victory. The King of Ghey aſpires to the Empire.

The King of Ghey, being now grown ſo powerful, that he thought himſelf able to conquer the Kings both of Han and U, who were leagued together. In order to put his Deſign in Execution, march'd with a formidable Army to the ſide of the great River Yang-tſe-kyang, which he intended to have croſs'd; but ſeeing the Waves very rough and boiſterous, Doubtleſs, ſay'd he, theſe are the Bounds which Heaven hath put to the Ambition of Mortals, and immediately turn'd back.

Song-chau, who was General to the King of Ghey, being puft up with his Victories, and obſerving the Credit he had obtained in the Army, rebell'd againſt his Maſter, whom he overcame, and thereupon reſolved to make his Way to the Throne. The Son of Hew-ti ſeeing things in a deſperate State, went to his Father; There is no Room to deliberate, ſays he, this Moment muſt decide your Fate, either to vanquiſh or die, with this Sword in your Hand, and Crown on your Head. But the Emperor wanting Courage refuſed to give his Enemy Battle; at which the young Prince was ſo griev'd, that retiring into the Hall of his deceaſed Anceſtors, he deſperately ſlew his Wife, and then himſelf. Cyc. XLIV. Year of Chriſt 244. Which is ſeized by his General Song chau.

In the fortieth Year of the Cycle, the Imperial Army was cut in pieces, and the Palace plunder'd. The cowardly Emperor went and deliver'd himſelf into the Hands of the Conqueror, who gave him a ſmall Principality; where he lived ſeven Years an obſcure and contemptible Life, and dy'd in the ſixty fifth Year of his Age. Cowardice of the Emperor.

The Seventh DYNASTY, call'd TSIN, which had Fifteen Emperors in the Space of One hundred and Fifty five Years. DYN. VII. TSIN.

SHI-TSU-VU-TI, Firſt Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

THIS Name was aſſum'd by the Son of the General Song-chau, Founder of this Dynaſty of the Tſin; which Denomination ſeems to be the ſame with that of the fourth, yet it is quite different, both as to the Character wherein it is written, and the Pronunciation. This new Emperor, who kept his Court in the Province of Ho-nan, was a magnanimous Prince, and of a quick Apprehenſion, and penetrating Judgment; his Integrity was ſo great, that he could not endure the leaſt Diſſimulation. Shi-tû-vû-ti, 1ſt Emperor.

His Reign was very much diſturb'd by the warlike Preparations of many petty Sovereigns, who aſpir'd to the Crown. But thoſe of the South were often overcome by thoſe of the North who, beſides being more inured to the Fatigues of the Camp, were aſſiſted by the Tartars, with whom they were in League. Wars among the petty Sovereigns.

DYN. VII. TSIN. Cyc. XLIV. Year of Chriſt 244.

The Emperor having in time ſubdued and pacify'd the Northern Provinces, march'd with his victorious Arms into the Southern Provinces; and having paſs'd the River Yang-tſe-kyang without Oppoſition, he enter'd the Kingdom of U, and beſieg'd the Metropolis. The King not daring to make any Reſiſtance, came out of the City, and ſurrender'd himſelf to the Emperor, who gave him a ſmall Principality, where he ended his Days.

Are all ſubdued by the Emperor.

In the ſeventeenth Year of his Reign, finding himſelf Maſter of the whole Empire, and that he had no more Enemies to fear, he reſolv'd to enjoy the Repoſe which his Victories had procur'd him. He was even ſo imprudent as to diſband his Army, and ſhutting himſelf up in his Palace, gave himſelf up to Idleneſs and Luxury. His ill Conduct revived the Ambition of the petty Sovereigns, whom the Terror of his Arms had before kept within the Bounds of their Duty. He dy'd in the fifty fifth Year of his Age, and the forty fifth of the Cycle, and left a numerous Poſterity, whereof Whey-ti, his eldeſt Son, ſucceeded him.

WHEY-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

Whey-ti, 2d Emperor.

THIS Prince had no Spirit or Genius, and was altogether unfit for the high Station he poſſeſs'd. However, the Beginning of his Reign was ſucceſsful, thro' the Ability of four of his chief Miniſters, in whom he put Confidence; but a jealous and paſſionate Wife ſoon threw the Court and Empire into Confuſion. This Woman, who had the Title of Second Queen, got the Empreſs remov'd from Court, poiſon'd her only Son, and procur'd all the Nobles who were of her Party to be put to Death.

Troubles raiſed by the 2d Queen.

Theſe barbarous Actions occaſion'd ſeveral Battles, and a great deal of Blood-ſhed; the Second Queen was ſlain in her turn, with all that were of her Party, and the Emperor himſelf obliged to fly in order to ſave his Life.

The Regulo's aſpire to the Empire.

The Regulo's took Advantage of all theſe Diſorders. The King of the Principality of Tſi took the Field with an Army, and being ſwell'd with ſome Succeſs which he had at firſt, doubted not to make his Way to the Crown; and perhaps had obtain'd it, had he not been ſlain in a Battle. Another Prince of the Family of Han, who reign'd in the Northern Provinces, and had taken Arms, met with the ſame Fate. At that time there ſprang up a new Sect, (which was only a Branch of that of Lau-kyun) call'd Vû-ghey-kyau, that is to ſay, The Doctrine of the Void, and of Nothing. Theſe Sectaries taught the way how to attain to a certain Degree of Tranquillity, which bound up all the Faculties of the Soul, and ſuſpended the Functions of Senſe, in which they made Perfection to conſiſt.

The third Year of the Cycle Whey-ti dy'd of Poiſon which was given him, in the forty eighth Year of his Age, leaving no Iſſue behind. The Grandees and Nobles choſe the twenty fifth Son of the Founder of this Dynaſty, for Emperor, call'd Whay-ti.

WHAY-TI, Third Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

Whay-ti, 3d Emperor.

THE Choice of this Emperor at firſt was generally approv'd, for he was endow'd with Qualities which promiſed a happy Reign; but the Ambition and Power of ſome of thoſe little Sovereigns, already mention'd, which increas'd daily thro' the Weakneſs of the Emperors, cauſed infinite Troubles in the Empire, for many Years, and rendred the Crown precarious.

Conquer'd and ſlain by one of the Regulo's.

One of theſe petty Kings, call'd Lyew-ywen, was ready to dethrone the Emperor, when Death interrupted the Courſe of his Victories. However, his Son Lyew-tſong, following the ſame Deſign with Succeſs, got Poſſeſſion of the Palace; which he plunder'd, ſlew the Emperor's Son, and after forcing the Emperor himſelf to wait on him at Table, in the Habit of a Slave, put him to Death, in the tenth Year of the Cycle, and the thirtieth Year of his Age. The Grandees choſe for his Succeſſor Min-ti, Grand-Son of the Founder of this Dynaſty.

MIN-TI, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Four Years.

Min ti, 4th Emperor.

THIS Prince had no better Fortune than his Predeceſſor. He had ſcarcely reign'd three Years, when Lyew-yau drove him from his Palace, which he plunder'd, and baniſh'd him, as it were, into a Principality, in the Province of Shan-ſi; where he had not liv'd a Year before he was ſlain by the King of Han. A Grand-Son of the Founder of this Dynaſty was choſen in his Room.

Conquer'd and ſlain.

YWEN-TI, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

Ywen-ti, 5th Emperor.

THIS Emperor is commended for his Gravity, Frugality, Moderation, and Eſteem of wiſe and learned Men. Of this laſt he gave a ſingular Proof to Vang-tau, his Prime Miniſter, who had been Ko-lau to three Emperors, by preſſing him to ſit down by him; but that Miniſter modeſtly refuſed this Honour; Prince, ſays he, how ſhould we ſee the Sun, which becomes viſible by being placed at a due Diſtance from us, ſhould he abaſe himſelf ſo far as to deſcend into theſe low Places which he enlightens?

This Prince remov'd his Court from the Weſt to the Eaſt, and fix'd it in the City of Nan-king, whence his Family has been nam'd the Eaſtern Family of Tſin. MING-TI, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Three Years.

THE Chineſe Hiſtory mentions nothing of this Prince, who after three Years Reign dy'd the twenty ſecond Year of the Cycle, in the twenty ſeventh Year of his Age, and was ſucceeded by his Son Ching-ti.

Ming-ti, 6th Emperor

CHING-TI, Seventh Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

THIS Prince being but five Years old when he aſcended the Throne, the Empreſs, his Mother, was intruſted with the Government. The Imperial Authority was too weak to curb the petty Sovereigns, whoſe Ambition was boundleſs; ſome of the more powerful aiming to deſtroy each other, only to clear the Way to the Throne. This young Prince was but twenty one Years old when he dy'd; his Brother Kang-ti ſucceeding him.

Kang-ti, 8th Emperor.

MO-TI, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

THE Empreſs was declared Guardian of this young Prince, who was but two Years old when he came to the Crown. As ſoon as he had paſs'd his Infancy, he diſcover'd ſhining Marks of Wiſdom and Virtue far above his Age; he made good uſe of the Advice of his Miniſters, and recover'd ſeveral Provinces.

Mo-ti, 9th Emperor.

Whan-ven, who commanded the Imperial Army, march'd into the North, to puniſh a revolted petty King of the Family of Han, whoſe Palace he plunder'd and burnt to the Ground.

However, the Puniſhment of this Prince did not appeaſe the Troubles; the petty Sovereigns ſtill continued the War with each other, in order to increaſe their Power, and obtain the Empire. Had the Emperor liv'd, he would without doubt have reduced them to Obedience, but he dy'd in the nineteenth Year of his Age, and fifty eighth of the Cycle. Ngai-ti, 10th Emp.

TI-YE, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Five Years.

THE Reign of this Prince was not much longer than that of his Predeceſſor, altho he lived much longer; for Whan-ven, his Prime Miniſter, after obtaining a great Victory in the North, over the King of Ywen, dethron'd the Emperor, and confin'd him in a Cittadel; where having lived an obſcure Life fifteen Years, he dy'd the forty third Year of his Age, and the Grandees choſe in his room Kyen-ven-ti, the laſt of the Children of Ywen-ti, fifth Emperor of this Dynaſty.

VU-TI aſcended the Throne the tenth Year of the Cycle. Fû-kyen, who was Emperor in the North, reſolving to attack the Emperor, and conquer his Provinces, his Miniſters endeavour'd to diſſuade him from ſuch a dangerous Enterprize; by obſerving to him that the Family of the Tſin had been placed on the Throne by the Direction of Heaven, and that as yet they had neither incurred its Wrath, nor done any thing to render them unworthy of its Protection.

Defeats the Emperor of the North.

Theſe Remonſtrances proving ineffectual, Fû-kyen, who rely'd on the Number and Bravery of his Soldiers, march'd Southward with a formidable Army; which Vû-ti being inform'd of, haſten'd with a ſmall but ſelect Body of his Troops, and without giving his Enemy time to bring all his Forces together, attack'd him in his Camp, with ſuch Courage and Reſolution, that he intirely defeated him. The Generals of Fo-kyen's Army being driven to Deſpair, ſeiz'd him in the Rout, and conducting him to a Temple, there ſtrangled him.

Suffers ſeveral Regulo's to revolt.

Notwithſtanding this great Succeſs of Vû-ti, ſo fatal to the Empire of the North, ſeveral of the ſmaller Sovereigns revolted; whom he might have eaſily ſubdued, had he made good Uſe of his Victory, and march'd with his Forces into the Northern Provinces; but he return'd to his Court, and gave himſelf up to all manner of Voluptuouſneſs and Senſualities. This Hero at laſt dy'd by the Hands of a Woman; for having by way of Raillery call'd the Second Queen an old Woman, who was but thirty Years of Age; this Princeſs being highly exaſperated with ſuch an ill-grounded Reproach, immediately revenged herſelf upon him, for the Emperor was found ſtifled in his Bed. Ngan-ti his Son ſucceeded him.

THE little Merit found in this Prince, his Indolence, and Want of Application, gave but ſmall Hopes of his reſtoring the Tranquillity of the Empire; and indeed we meet with nothing but Revolts and Wars among the Regulo's, during his Reign. A Grandſon of the King of Tay, the only remaining Branch of that Family, intirely defeated the King of Yen, with whom he was at War, and took his Principality from him; whereby he founded a Dominion, which was govern'd by thirteen Monarchs of his Family, in the Space of one hundred forty nine Years.

THIS Prince was eſteem'd on Account of his good Nature, Moderation, Juſtice, and great Integrity; he was blam'd only for having too great an Affection for the Bonzas, whoſe Protector he openly declar'd himſelf. He ordain'd that no Magiſtrates ſhould continue in the ſame Poſt above ſix Years: and after ſome other Regulations of this ſort, for the good of his People, he declar'd War againſt the Emperor of the North, whoſe Power daily increaſed, having already ſixteen Regulo's in intire Subjection to him. Ven-ti loſt the firſt Battle, but afterwards obtain'd many Victories, by the Conduct and Bravery of Tan-tau-tſi, his Prime Miniſter, who by this extraordinary Succeſs gain'd no little Credit and Authority; but that Credit render'd his Fidelity ſuſpected to the Emperor, who fearing too powerful a Subject, procur'd him to be put to Death, which was the Reward of his Services.

Bloody War with the Emperor of the North.

The News of this great General's Death being ſpread abroad, the Northern Men took Courage, and boldly entred the Southern Provinces, renewing the War with more Fury than ever. Ven-ti's Troops, no longer commanded by that able General, were defeated in ſeveral Battles; but in the twenty ſixth Year of his Reign there was ſuch a horrible Slaughter on both ſides, that the Fields were overflow'd with Chineſe Blood.

He preferr'd Syau-tau-ching to the higheſt Dignity of the Empire, a Man exceeding ambitious, and who afterwards murder'd two Emperors to make way to the Throne. Ming-ti dy'd the forty ninth Year of the Cycle, being only thirty four Years old, and was ſucceeded by Tſang-ngû-vang his eldeſt Son.

The Emperor turns Bonza or Pagan Monk.

For twenty ſix Years the Emperor govern'd with Succeſs, till the Fancy took him to leave the Court, and dwell in a Temple of the Bonzas, where he had his Head ſhaved, wore a coarſe Garment, and liv'd upon Herbs and Rice; and tho' the Grandees of the Empire brought him back againſt his Will, from the Place of his Retirement to his Palace, yet he obſtinately continued to live after the Manner of the Bonzas. According to their Doctrine of the Tranſmigation of Souls, he durſt not condemn any, even the greateſt Criminal, to Death; which open'd the Door to Licentiouſneſs, and occaſion'd infinite Murders and Robberies.

Kyen-wen, the Ko-lau of the Empire, griev'd that he was forc'd to ſerve an Uſurper, ſtarv'd himſelf to Death, which Practice is common enough among the Chineſe. When the Emperor heard of it, he cry'd out: Do not I hold my Crown of Heaven? Am I beholden for it to the Grandees of the Empire? What Reaſon than had this miſerable Man to make himſelf away?

Great Inſtance of Filial Piety.

There were great Encomiums made at this time on the filial Piety of a young Man fifteen Years of Age, call'd Kye-ſwen; whoſe Father being condemn'd to loſe his Head for ſeveral Offences committed by him, during his Magiſtracy; Kye-ſwen, as ſoon as he was inform'd thereof, went and threw himſelf at the Feet of the Prince, intreating him, with Tears, that he might be allow'd to ſuffer in his Father's Stead. The Prince after a ſtrict Examination, finding he was in Earneſt, and acted voluntarily, in Conſideration of ſuch remarkable Tenderneſs, pardon'd the Father, and rewarded the Son with a Title of Honour; which yet he conſtantly refuſed, becauſe it would continually put him in mind of his Father's Fault.

The Emperor, who reſided there, and was wholly beſotted with the idle Conceits of the Sect of Lau-kyun, being by this Revolt rouſed to Arms, went round the Walls of the City; but ſeeing all was loſt, he broke his Sword, and burnt his Library, which conſiſted of a hundred and forty thouſand Volumes, ſaying, "There was an End, both of the Sciences and the Military "Art." VEN-TI always lived privately, without concerning himſelf in Affairs, till the Moment he was made Emperor; but it ſoon appear'd that he had the proper Qualities of a great Prince, by the Affection he bore to his Subjects, and the Trouble he took to hear their Law-Suits himſelf, and bring them to a ſpeedy Iſſue. He order'd a Drum to beat within the Palace to diſtinguiſh the Hours of the Night, which Cuſtom is obſerv'd to this Day. Being ſenſible that his Son was a Perſon of no great Capacity, he reſolved to chooſe his Brother, the King of Ngan-ching, for his Succeſſor; but the Ko-lau and Nobles making a ſtrong Repreſentation againſt it, he alter'd his Intention.

TAY-TSONG, Second Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

THIS Prince, who began his Reign in the twenty fourth Year of the Cycle, is accounted by the Chineſe one of their greateſt Emperors; whom they praiſe eſpecially for his Wiſdom, and the favorable Reception all thoſe met with, who were capable of giving him prudent Counſels, or had Courage enough to tell him of his Faults. So great was his Temperance and Frugality, that he never ſuffer'd more than eight Diſhes of Meat to be ſerved up to his Table; and drove almoſt all the Concubines out of his Palace. In his Reign the Chriſtian Religion gained Footing in his Empire, as will be obſerv'd hereafter. He cauſed the beſt Books to be brought from all Parts; and became in ſome reſpect the Reſtorer of the Sciences, by the Care he took to re-eſtabliſh in his Palace an Academy for Literature, wherein were reckon'd eight thouſand Scholars, many of them Sons of foreign Princes; whom he provided with able Maſters, appointing eighteen of the moſt eminent, call'd She-pa-hyo-tſe, to ſuperintend their Studies. He founded likewiſe a Military Academy for Archery, where he often aſſiſted himſelf. This was not at all agreeable to the Miniſters, who repreſented to him the Indecency, as well as the Danger that might accrue to his Perſon, by frequenting this Academy; to which Tay-tſong anſwer'd, "I look upon myſelf in my "Empire as a Father in his Family, and I carry my Subjects in my Boſom, as if they were my "Children; What have I then to fear?".

Tay-tſong, 2d Emperor, eſtabliſhes Academies for Literature and Archery.

This Affection for his Subjects made him ſay, "That he wiſh'd his People to have Plenty of "the common Neceſſaries of Life;" adding, "That the Welfare of the Empire depends on "the People; an Emperor who fleeces his People to enrich himſelf, is like a Man who cuts "his own Fleſh in pieces, to ſupply his Stomach, which is fill'd, it is true, but in a ſhort time "his Body muſt periſh. How many Emperors have ow'd their Ruin to their Luxury! What "Expences were they at to ſupport it? and what heavy Taxes did the poor People groan under "to ſupply thoſe Expences? He forbad the Magiſtrates, under pain of Death, to receive Preſents; and that he might be ſatisfy'd whether his Orders were obey'd, he made a Trial upon a Mandarin, by ſuborning a Man to make him a Preſent, which the Mandarin receiving, the Emperor condemn'd him to Death. Upon this the Prime Miniſter addreſſing him, "Great Prince, ſaid he, your Sentence "is juſt, and the Mandarin deſerves to die; but are you who laid the Snare for him, to fall "into the Crime which he has committed, altogether innocent? and do you not partake of his Fault?" This Remonſtrance had its Effect, and the Emperor pardon'd the Offender.

In the Year following one of the great Mandarins of War, having in like manner received a ſilk Suit as a Preſent, the Emperor, who was inform'd of it, ſent him immediately a Quantity of Silks; upon which the Courtiers could not ſuppreſs their Reſentment, but cry'd out, "This "Mandarin deſerves the Puniſhment inflicted by the Law, and not a Reward." To which the Emperor anſwer'd, "The Confuſion wherewith he will be ſtruck, will give him a more ſen-"ſible Pain than the ſevereſt Puniſhment; for theſe Silks, which I ſend him, inſtead of redound-"ing to his Honour, will continually reproach him with his Fault." Whenever the Country was threaten'd with Scarcity, Drought, or immoderate Rains, after the Examples of the ancient Emperors, he publiſh'd an Edict, by which he order'd his Failings to be laid before him, that by reforming them he might appeaſe the Wrath of Heaven. He gave no Credit to Soothſayers; for one Day as the Storks were building their Neſts in his Preſence, they ſtood and clapped their Wings; whereat his Courtiers teſtify'd their Joy, as portending him ſome unexpected good Luck; upon which the Emperor ſmil'd, and ſaid, "Shwi tſay te hyen," which ſignifies "A happy "Preſage for me is to have wiſe Men about me," and immediately order'd the Neſt to be deſtroy'd.

Firſt Arrival of Chriſtians in China.

The Chineſe Annals report, that in the eighth Year of his Reign there came Ambaſſadors from foreign Nations, whoſe Air, Form, and Habit were altogether new to the Chineſe; and the Emperor himſelf rejoiced that in his time Men with fair Hair and blue Eyes arrived in the Empire. It is certain that theſe Strangers were thoſe, whoſe Names we read upon the Stone Monument, found in 1625, at Si-ngan-fû, in the Province of Shen-ſi; on which is the Figure of the Croſs, and an Abſtract of the Chriſtian Law, together with the Names of its Preachers, ingraven in Syriac Characters; and a Date, ſpecifying the eighth Year of the Reign of Tay-tſong. In the French King's Library is preſerved an old Arabic Manuſcript; wherein we read, that at this very time the Catholic Patriarch of the Indies ſent Preachers of the Goſpel into China, who were honourably received in the Imperial City, where they were introduced by Fan-hiun-ling, Ko-lau of the Empire.

About the ſame time the Emperor choſe out thirteen Perſons, the moſt eminent for their Merit and Integrity, to viſit all Parts of his Empire; giving them full Power to execute Juſtice, and to puniſh ſeverely the Governors of Cities and Vice-Roys of Provinces, whoſe Conduct was blameable. In the tenth Year of his Reign he was deeply affected for the Loſs of the Empreſs Chang-ſun, who was a Princeſs endow'd with great Prudence, and a Capacity not common among her Sex. It was obſerved, as a Circumſtance ſcarce to be parallell'd, that while ſhe lived, not one of the great Number of Officers, who ſerve, in the Palace, ſuffer'd any ſevere Puniſhment. The Emperor, tired with the frequent Admonitions of his Ko-lau, Ghey-ching, having forbad him his Preſence, the Empreſs, who was inform'd of it, immediately dreſs'd herſelf in her richeſt Apparel and went to her Huſband, to whom ſhe ſaid, " Prince, I have often heard that when an Instance.

The Year before his Death he gave his Son, whom he had declar'd his Heir, the following Advice, consisting of twelve Maxims, which were express'd in twenty four Characters. " Get " the Command over your Heart and all its Inclinations; promote none to Places and Dignities but Persons of Merit; invite wise Men to your Court; watch over the Conduct of Magistrates; drive Slanderers from your Presence; be an Enemy to Pomp; keep good Oeconomy; let your Rewards and Punishments be proportion'd to the Merit and Crimes of Persons; take a particular Care to make Agriculture, the Military Art, Laws and Sciences flourish; search among the ancient Emperors for the Models of your Government, for I do not deserve your Notice, having committed too many Mistakes in my Administration; have an Eye always to that which is most perfect, otherwise you will never attain to that just Medium, wherein Virtue consists; lastly, take Care not to be puffed up with the Splendor of your Rank, nor to enervate yourself by the Pleasures of a voluptuous Life, for if you do not, you will ruin both the Empire and yourself."

Fine Maxims of Government given to his Heir.

Tay-tsong dy'd in the forty sixth Year of the Cycle, and the fifty third of his Age; and the Year following his Son Kau-tsong was acknowledg'd Emperor.

KAU-TSONG, Third Emperor, reigned thirty-four Years.

Kau-tsong, 3d Emperor.

WHEN he had reigned five Years he fell passionately in Love with Vû-shi, the young Girl mentioned before, whom Tay-tsong had placed in the Rank of his Wives; and who was now retired to a Monastery of Bonzesses, whither the Emperor went himself to fetch her out, and conduct her to his Palace. A little after, under Pretence that he had no male Issue, he put away the Empress and one of the Queens, malgre the Remonstrances and the strongest Opposition of his Ministers. Vû-shi was then placed upon the Throne; but perceiving that the Emperor did not forget the divorced Princesses, she in a Rage caused their Hands and Feet to be cut off, and a few Days after their Heads. She had scarce committed these horrid Cruelties, when she fancied herself pursued Day and Night by the Ghosts of these Princesses, who were as so many Furies ready to fall upon her: And the Fright it put her in made her shift her Place continually. Nevertheless the Emperor grew more and more enamoured with this Wretch; and was even infatuated to such a Degree, that he put the Government of the Empire into her Hands, giving her the Name of Tyen-hew, i. e. The Queen of Heaven; a Title of Honour till then unheard of in China.

Her horrid Cruelty.

This Monster was no sooner invested with Sovereign Power, but the first Use she made of it was to poison her eldest Son; that so the Crown falling to her Brother's Children, her paternal Family might be settled on the Throne: However she did not obtain that Satisfaction.

In the sixth Year of the new Cycle, the Koreans returned to their Obedience, and did Homage in the accustomed manner. This Emperor favoured the Christian Religion, as appears by the Stone Monument mention'd before. Churches were built for the Worship of the true God, and the Faith was preached in the Provinces: One of the Missionaries, whose Name was O lo pwen, had a Title of Honour conferred upon him. Kau-tsong died at the Age of Fifty-six, and in the twentieth Year of the Cycle, when the cruel Vû-hew seized on the Throne.

In the fifteenth Year of her Reign, a Perſecution was raiſed againſt the Chriſtians, which laſted about fifteen Years. In the ſame Year the Ko-lau, Tyê, had the Courage to make vigorous Remonſtrances to her in Behalf of her Son, the rightful Heir, now baniſh'd fourteen Years. He urged as a Reaſon, that it would be a thing unprecedented to place in the Hall of Anceſtors a Name which did not belong to the Family, and which beſides Poſterity would never acknowledge. Hereupon the Prince was recall'd from Exile, and lived ſeven Years in the Eaſtern Palace till the Death of Vû-hew in the eighty firſt Year of her Age; after which he aſcended the Throne, in the forty firſt Year of the Cycle.

CHUNG-TSONG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Five Years.

Chung-tſong, 4th Emperor.

THIS Prince little deſerved the Crown, which he ow'd to his Birth, the Tenderneſs of his Father Kau-tſong, and the Courage of the Prime Miniſter. He gave himſelf up to Indolence and Debauchery; and that he might have nothing to think of but his Pleaſures, reſign'd his whole Authority into the Hands of the Empreſs Ghey, who had been the faithful Companion of his Exile. This Princeſs, by the Advice of San-ſe, Governor of the Palace, intended to place her Son Shang upon the Throne; but the Princes and petty Kings on all ſides took up Arms to oppoſe it.

Poiſoned.

Chung-tſong however dying of Poiſon in the fifty fifth Year of his Age, Shang was immediately proclaim'd Emperor. But his Uncle who poſſeſs'd a Principality, at the ſame time ſeiz'd the Palace, where the Empreſs was kill'd together with her Daughter; and young Shang ſaved his Life by ſurrendering himſelf to the Mercy of his Uncle Zhwi-tſong, the deceaſed Emperor's Brother, into whoſe Hands he deliver'd his Crown.

ZHWI-TSONG, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

Zhwi-tſong, or Jwi-tſong, 5th Emperor, an Uſurper.

THE Shortneſs of this Prince's Reign ranks him amongſt thoſe of whom we find nothing farther than that he took Poſſeſſion of the Empire in the forty ſeventh Year of the Cycle, and dy'd in the forty eighth, aged fifty five. Hivn-tſong, his third Son, was declar'd his Succeſſor.

HIVN-TSONG, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Forty four Years.

Hivn-tſong, or Hiven-tſong, 6th Emperor.

THE good Nature of this Prince, his Moderation, ſingular Temperance, and Zeal for the Publick Good, gave preſently great Hopes of the Happineſs of his Reign. He was the Reſtorer of his Family, then upon the Brink of Ruin; but he committed one almoſt irreparable Fault, in promoting an Eunuch, call'd Kau-lye-ſe, to be Maſter of the Palace: without doubt becauſe he did not foreſee the Misfortunes which the Power of the Eunuchs would one Day bring upon him and his Succeſſors.

The Chriſtian Religion began to recover and floriſh under this and the three ſucceeding Emperors.

Endeavours to ſuppreſs Luxury.

Hivn-tſong, looking on Luxury as the Bane of good Morals, declar'd open War againſt it, and publiſh'd an Edict forbidding to fiſh for Pearls. One Day he cauſed all his Gold and Silver Veſſels, and all his Cloaths embroider'd with Gold, to be burnt before the Palace Gate; in order to reſtrain by his own Example the Extravagance of his People, who ruin'd themſelves by ſuch coſtly Superfluities.

He one Day viſited the Houſe where Confuçius was born, and honour'd that great Man with the Title of the King of Learning. It could have been wiſh'd, that this Prince had ſhew'd more regard to the Counſels of Ywen-chau, his Prime Miniſter; who in a Memorial adviſed him, among other things, to confer no publick Employment upon the Eunuchs, to grant no Power to his Relations, to aboliſh the Idolatrous Sects of Fo and Tau, &c. but he gave no Ear to theſe wiſe Admonitions.

Honours Confuçius with the Title of King.

This Emperor was the firſt who honour'd with the Title of petty Kings or Sovereigns the Generals of his Armies, who had moſt diſtinguiſh'd themſelves by doing the greateſt Service to the State, tho' not of Imperial Blood. In a Progreſs he made over his Empire he divided it into fifteen Provinces.

The Diſciples of this Sectary, as well as the Bonzas, uſed to burn ſilk Stuffs and Ingots of Silver at Funerals; but this Cuſtom the Emperor alter'd by Advice of his Brother Van-yu, commanding that for the future none but Stuffs or Cloaths made

The Empire had enjoy'd a profound Peace almoſt thirty Years, when it was diſturb'd by freſh Inſurrections, and the Imperial Army entirely defeated, with the Loſs of ſeventy thouſand Men; while the Emperor himſelf knew nothing of the matter, becauſe all the Avennes to his Throne were kept ſhut by the Eunuchs. The Chief of the Rebels was a foreign Prince, named Ngan-lo-ſhan, whom the Emperor againſt the Advice of his Miniſters had raiſed to the higheſt Employments, and even entruſted with the Command of his Army. This Traitor, imbolden'd by Succeſs, and ſeeing himſelf Maſter of a great Part of the North, had the Inſolence to aſſume the Title of Emperor. Mean time the Palace itſelf was in a Combuſtion, for the Emperor divorced his Wife, put three of his Children to Death without any juſt Cauſe, and marry'd his Daughter-in-Law. As one Misfortune often draws on another, theſe Diſaſters encouraged a Company of Robbers to attack the Imperial Army, which having routed, with the Slaughter of forty thouſand Men, the Emperor was oblig'd to fly into the Province of Se-chwen.

TOWARDS the end of the thirty third Year of the Cycle, Hiun-tſong made his ſhameful Retreat, and So-tſong took Poſſeſſion of the Government, tho' his Father was ſtill living; being a warlike Prince, he with the help of his Ko-lau, Ko-tſû-i, deſtroy'd the Army of the Robbers and diſperſed them. The publick Tranquillity was no ſooner ſettled, but he brought back his Father from the Province of Se-chwen, and conducted him into the Palace with all the Honours due to his Rank; but he did not long enjoy the Repoſe which his Son had procur'd him, for he dy'd the thirty eighth Year of the Cycle, and the ſeventy eighth of his Age. In the mean time Ngan-lo-ſhan had plunder'd the Palace of Chang-ngan, and along with the Riches, carry'd into the Province of Ho-nan an hundred Elephants and Horſes; which had been taught to dance to the Sound of Inſtruments, and to preſent the Emperor a Cup with their Mouths.

Ngan-lo-ſhan wanted to have the ſame Diverſion, but as if theſe Beaſts had refuſed to acknowledge him Emperor, they could never be brought to do what he deſired, which ſo inraged him, that he ordered them to be kill'd on the Spot. The Treachery of this Wretch, who made uſe of his Maſter's Favours to deſtroy him, was not long unpuniſh'd, he being murder'd in Bed by his own Son. The Parricide was aſſaſſinated in his turn by Se-mong, General of the Army, who intending to make his youngeſt Son his Heir was likewiſe killed by his eldeſt Son. So-tſong dy'd in the Ninth Year of the Cycle, and left the Crown to his Son Tay-tſong.

TAY-TSONG, Eighth Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

THE beginning of this Reign was tolerably proſperous, thro' the Care of able Miniſters, in whom the Emperor confided; the Rebels were forced to return to their Obedience, and Peace was reſtored in the Empire. But it did not continue long, for five of the moſt powerful Kings ſhook off the Yoke; and refuſing to acknowledge the Emperor as their Maſter pretended to reign in an abſolute Independency.

A Mandarin, named Fû-hû-tſyen, finding himſelf at the Point of Death, order'd his Head to be ſhav'd, and his Corpſe to be interr'd after the Manner of the Bonzas, whoſe Protector he was; which Example, we ſhall ſee, was afterwards follow'd by many Grandees in the nineteenth Dynaſty.

In the eighth Year of this Reign, more than two hundred thouſand Tartars made an Irruption into the Empire, and forced the Emperor to fly; they plunder'd his Palace, and loaded with immenſe Treaſures retired into their own Country.

Irruption of the Tartars.

The Emperor return'd to his Palace with the Aſſiſtance of the famous General Ko-tſû-i, whoſe Elogy is to be ſeen upon the Stone Monument, which I have ſpoken of more than once. There his Liberality is applauded, and it is not to be doubted but that he employ'd both his Credit and Subſtance in erecting Temples to the true God; ſome even conjecture that he imbraced Chriſtianity. The ſame Monument relates, that on Chriſtmaſs Day the Emperor ſent rich Perfumes to the Church, and Fruits from his own Table to the Miniſters of the Goſpel.

TE-TSONG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

THE Empire found no great Support from this Prince, for he minded nothing but Trifles, was of a timorous Nature, extremely miſtruſtful, and ready to give ear to Flatterers. However he deſerves Applauſe for refuſing Preſents from Strangers, which was eſteem'd a happy Omen; "The beſt Augury I can have, ſays he, is to ſee Wiſe Men about me." He ſhew'd one Sign of Diſintereſtedneſs, which gain'd him great Encomiums; for a very conſiderable Sum of Money being preſented him, inſtead of receiving it he order'd it to be diſtributed among his Soldiers.

In the third Year of his Reign the famous Ko-tſiu-i, who had render'd ſuch important Service to the Empire, dy'd in the eighty fifth Year of his Age; he had been Prime Miniſter under four Emperors, and got ſuch mighty Reputation for his Probity, that it was generally allow'd there had not been his Equal for many Ages. Such Confidence was placed in this Miniſter, that it may with truth be affirm'd that the Fate of the reigning Family was in his Hands. Tho' he attained to the higheſt Honours, and had acquired immenſe Riches, yet he was reſpected by Envy itſelf, whoſe Strokes he never felt; and notwithſtanding the Splendor he lived in, yet ſtill his Liberality exceeded his Magnificence. He left eight Children, who all acquired laſting Glory in the different Magiſtracies to which their Merit raiſed them. China mourned three Years for this great Man, whom ſhe bewailed as her Father.

Great Power of the Eunuchs.

The Power of the Eunuchs became ſo formidable, and their Inſolence grew to ſuch a Pitch, that there was nothing to be heard of but Inſurrections; this oblig'd the Emperor to augment his Army by a great Number of freſh Troops, to maintain which he was conſtrained to double the Taxes,. There was even a Duty laid on Tea itſelf, which is the common Drink of the Chineſe. Theſe extraordinary Impoſitions exaſperated all Perſons, and the extreme Miſery of the People occaſion'd infinite Thefts and Robberies. By good Fortune the Imperial Arms were victorious every where, and the Rebels being deſtroy'd, Peace was re-eſtabliſh'd, and the People relieved. The Emperor on a time attributing the Wars and Calamities to his own Deſtiny, added, "That this had been in part foretold him by the Aſtrologers," on which Li-myé his Ko-lau reply'd, "Prince, leave this kind of Talk to the Ignorant, and Vulgar, ſuch Language does not "become either you or me. It is ourſelves who render our Deſtiny happy or unhappy, accord-"ing as we govern the State well or ill." Hyen-tſong, 11th Emp.

THIS Prince was endow'd with wonderful Penetration and Dexterity in diſintangling as well as diſpatching the moſt intricate Affairs; he had alſo a Firmneſs of Mind, in purſuing the thing he had once reſolved on, which no Conſideration could ſhake. He gave ſolid Proofs of his Affection for his People in a time of Famine, by opening his Treaſures and the publick Granaries in favour of the afflicted Provinces; at the ſame time ſending the great Lords of his Court to inquire into the Peoples Diſtreſs, and to relieve them in proportion to their Indigence.

Care to relieve his People in Diſtreſs.

In the thirty ſixth Year of the Cycle, he order'd a Finger-bone of the Idol Fo to be brought with great Solemnity from the Province of Shen-ſi. The Chief Tribunal of Rites ſtrongly oppoſed this ſottiſh Reſolution of the Emperor, boldly alledging that the execrable Reliques of this Idol [or Impoſtor] ought to be burnt. As they firmly perſiſted in their Determination, without regarding the Diſpleaſure of the Emperor, ſeveral of them were degraded; which is a Puniſhment pretty commonly inflicted on great Mandarins. He fell into another Piece of Folly, which coſt him his Life; for having ſent every where in Queſt of the pretended Liquor of Immortality, promiſed by the Sect of Tau, to which he was greatly devoted; it was at length brought him by the Eunuchs, who it is not doubted mix'd it with Poiſon; for this unhappy Prince, after he had taken it, dy'd ſuddenly, at the Age of forty three, and his Son Mo-tſong ſucceeded him.

IT was by the Eunuchs, who were now become Maſters, that King-tſong was elected to the Throne; and by the ſame uſurped Authority, they deprived him of the Government not long after, in order to confer it on the Empreſs-Mother. The childiſh Behaviour of this young Prince, and his Irregularities, were Reaſons to them for diſpoſſeſſing him, and leaving him nothing but the Title of Emperor, in the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, and eighteenth of his Age.

VEN-TSONG, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Fourteen Years.

THIS Prince, who had a great Affection for the wiſe and learned Men of his Empire, being impatient at the Power of the Eunuchs, in the ninth Year of his Reign took Meaſures ſecretly to deſtroy them; but perceiving the Snares that were laid for them, they fell on a ſudden with ſo much Fury on the Miniſters, and Guards of the Palace, that they ſlew above a thouſand of them, and many Families were entirely deſtroy'd. Theſe Misfortunes, in Conjunction with others ſtill greater, which the Emperor foreſaw, ſo overwhelmed him with Grief; that, tho' he often endeavoured to divert it or drown it in Wine yet, it prey'd upon his Spirits, to ſuch a Degree, that he waſted away inſenſibly, and at laſt died of a Conſumption, in the fifty ſeventh Year of the Cycle. The Eunuchs, who now took upon them to nominate the Emperors, never thought of the Son of the Deceaſed, but choſe his Brother Vu-tſong, who was the fifth Son of the twelfth Emperor of this Dynaſty.

VU-TSONG, the Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd ſix Years.

THE ſuperior Qualifications of this Prince juſtified the Preference he met with, being of a warlike Inclination, and dreading neither Danger nor Fatigue. He drove the Tartars out of the Province of Shen-ſi, where they had fortify'd themſelves; and cleared ſeveral other Provinces of the Robbers, who march'd in Troops, and made great Havock. His Judgment was ſo excellent, that he was never deceived in his Choice of Miniſters. He eſtabliſhed, or rather revived a Law, ſtill obſerved, which is a Check upon the Mandarins of the Imperial City, (upon whom depend the Mandarins of the Provinces) enjoyning, that every five, or at leaſt every ſeven Years, the Conduct of the Chief Officers of the Empire ſhould be ſtrictly enquired into; and theſe Mandarins are obliged to commit to Writing, a ſincere and particular Account of all their Miſcarriages, and intreat the Emperor's Pardon; and if in this humble Confeſſion, they offer either to excuſe, diſguiſe, or extenuate their Faults, they have then no Favour to expect, and are inevitably deprived of their Employments.

'TIS probable, that the little Genius which this Prince diſcovered in his Infancy, induced the Eunuchs to prefer him to all others; rightly judging that nothing eſtabliſhed their Authority ſo much as the Incapacity of the Emperor. However they were deceived; for Swen-tſong was no ſooner upon the Throne but he appeared another Man, and was eminent for all the Qualities which conſtitute a great Prince. His Wiſdom, Judgment, Moderation, Equity, Application and Love for the Welfare of his People, made them conſider him as another Tay-tſong, the ſecond Emperor of this Dynaſty, whoſe Memory was ſtill revered thro'out the Empire: But notwithſtanding all this Prince's Merit, he could not reduce the Power of the Eunuchs. Hû-tau, his Prime Miniſter, in a Memorial adviſed him to be inexorable to the Eunuchs who ſhould commit any Fault, and not to ſupply the Places of thoſe who died; that their Number leſſening by Degrees, it might be more eaſy to deſtroy them. (A) The Chriſtians from Ta-tſong, or Judea, who had been favoured by ſome of the former Emperors, were ſuppreſſed by this; who in the fifth Year of his Reign, or of Chriſt 845, ordered that their Bonzas, as they are called, or Prieſts, then reckoned three thouſand, ſhould return to a ſecular Life. ſioned a mortal Enmity between them and the Miniſter, ſo that the Troubles grew greater than ever.

The Chineſe Hiſtorians blame this Prince for inviting to his Court the Sectaries of Tau, in order to procure by their Means the pretended Drink which renders People immortal. On this Occaſion one of his Miniſters repreſented to him, that the beſt way to procure himſelf a long and happy Life, was to get the Maſtery over his own Heart, to ſubdue his Paſſions, and practiſe Virtue: "Moſt of the Emperors who preceded you, added he, would have arrived to extream "old Age, if they had followed the Counſel which I give you." He had no ſooner taken the Drink which the Sectaries gave him, but he ſaw himſelf devoured by Worms, that ſwarm'd in his Body; and a few Days after he died, at the Age of fifty Years, being ſucceeded by his Son I-tſong, who was elected by the Eunuchs.

THE Haughtineſs, Pride, Prodigality, Luxury and exceſſive Debaucheries of this Prince made him univerſally deteſted. In the fourteenth Year of his Reign he cauſed a Bone of the Idol Fo to be brought with Pomp into his Palace, and three Months after dy'd, at the Age of thirty one Years. THE Eunuchs, who were abſolute Maſters, ſettled this Prince upon the Throne, being but twelve Years old. He ſpent his Time wholly in Play and Muſic, in Riding and Shooting with the Bow; at the ſame time that there was nothing to be be ſeen on all Sides, eſpecially in the Northern Provinces, but Tumults and Revolts. The Taxes wherewith the People were over loaded, the Famine cauſed by the over-flowing of Rivers, and by the Locuſts which deſtroyed the Corn, encreaſed the Number of the Rebels. Whan-tſyau, a Native of the Province of Shan-tong, being at the Head of them, went and laid Siege to the Imperial City; and having driven his Sovereign from thence cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Emperor, and gave to his Family the Name of Tſi.

Driven from his Capital by Whan-tſyau.

A young Man call'd Li-ke-yong, who was but twenty eight Years of Age, and having but one Eye, was nick-named To-yen-long, commanded the Imperial Troops, and attack'd the Captain of the Rebels. At firſt he was repulſed, but rallying his Soldiers, he renew'd the Battle with ſuch Vigour, that he obtained a compleat Victory, and brought the Emperor back in Triumph to his Palace. For theſe Services he was rewarded with the Principality of Tſin, and his Son became the Founder of the fifteenth Dynaſty.

Brought back by Li-ke-yong.

The Emperor did not enjoy the Fruit of this Victory above three Months, for he dy'd in the forty fifth Year of the Cycle, at the Age of twenty ſeven, and the Eunuchs ſet the Imperial Crown on the Head of Chau-tſong, who was the ſixth Son of the laſt Emperor.

Chau-tſong, 19th Emp.

THIS Prince, who wanted neither Parts nor Courage, ſhew'd great Marks of Eſteem for Men of Learning, and for his Principal Miniſters; propoſing by their Aſſiſtance to retrieve in time the Affairs of the Empire, which the uſurp'd Authority of the Eunuchs, and the rebellious Diſpoſition of the People had thrown into great Diſorder. To effect this Change, he judg'd it neceſſary to begin with the Deſtruction of the Eunuchs; but while he was conſidering of the Means, they ſuſpecting his Deſign, came ſuddenly upon him with their Soldiers, and ſeizing his Perſon, confined him in a remote Apartment, under a ſecure Guard, leaving only a Hole in the Wall, for conveying him Food. But the Ko-lau, Tſu-yu, having diſcover'd the Place, ſent thither a number of reſolute Fellows, well armed, who ſlew the Guards, releaſed the Emperor, and brought him back to his Palace.

Impriſon'd by the Eunuchs,

Chû-ven, Captain of the Robbers, invited by the Ko-lau to come to the Emperor's Aſſiſtance againſt the Eunuchs, arriv'd juſt at the Time that this Prince publiſh'd an Edict for extirpating them all, excepting thirty of the youngeſt to be reſerved for the moſt ſervile Offices of the Palace; and executed this Commiſſion with ſuch Zeal, that many hundreds of Eunuchs were put to the Sword. Chû-ven, who hitherto had appear'd loyal, being ſoon after ſeized with a Spirit of Ambition, cauſed the Ko-lau, who had been ſo faithful to his Prince, to be ſlain; and obliged the Emperor to remove his Court from the Province of Shen-ſi to that of Ho-nan. Which he had no ſooner done, but the Traitor put him to Death, in the thirty eighth Year of his Age, and firſt of the Cycle; placing the Imperial Crown on the Head of Chau-ſwen-tſong, Son of the murdered Emperor, till he could take it himſelf with Safety.

THIS young Prince was ſcarce two Years upon the Throne, when ſeeing plainly that he ſhould be ſacrific'd, as well as his Father, to the Ambition of the perfidious Chû-ven, choſe voluntarily to reſign the Crown to him, to prevent his committing a freſh Crime, and to ſave his own Life. The Uſurper, who took the Name of Tay-tſû, gave him a Principality, which he poſſeſs'd no longer than three Years, being ſlain at the Age of ſeventeen; and with him ended the Family of Tang.

The five following Succeſſions are call'd by the Chineſe, Hew-û-tay, that is, the Five latter Dynaſties, being accounted Petty Races, as well as the five which precede that of the Tang. They reſemble them alſo in Wars, Revolts, and Parricides, which ſo often ſtained the Throne with Blood; but they differ from each other in the Number of Princes, and in the Time of their Duration. The five former reckon twenty four Emperors, in the Space of one hundred and ninety eight Years, whereas theſe latter continued not one Cycle, and reckon no more than thirteen Emperors. The warlike Nation of the Sye-tan, inhabiting the Country now call'd Lyau-tong, being exceedingly increaſed by many Colonies, that came from Korea, gave much Uneaſineſs to the following Emperors.

AS ſoon as this Prince, who was Sovereign of a petty State, heard of his Father's Death, he inſtantly march'd at the Head of his Army; and engaging that of his Brother, entirely defeated it, kill'd the Parricide, and aſcended the Throne the tenth Year of the Cycle.

not only delighted in seeing Plays, but would descend so low as to act himself, to divert his Queens and Grand-Daughters; and employ'd his time in so many other Amusements unworthy of Majesty, that he became the contempt of all his Subjects. He was moreover so sordidly covetous, that tho' his Coffers were full of Gold and Silver, yet he could not find in his Heart to open them for the Relief of his People.

Slain in a Sedition.

At length a Sedition arising among the Soldiers, he was wounded by an Arrow, of which he dy'd, the twenty second Year of the Cycle, and thirty fifth of his Age; but it is not known whether the Stroke was given by Design or Accidentally. Ming-tsong was elected Emperor by the Grandees.

Ming-tsong, 2d Emperor.

THE Father of the late Emperor had adopted Ming-tsong, tho' he was not born in the Empire. This Prince had acquired a general Esteem, and proved himself perfectly worthy of the Choice that had been made of him. He is chiefly praised for his Liberality, Moderation, Love of Peace, and a particular Affection for his Subjects. Tho' he was illiterate, he gave frequent Marks of his Esteem for Learned Men. The Art of Printing was invented in his Reign.

The Chinese Historians also praise his Piety and Modesty, affirming that every Night he burnt Perfumes in Honour of the Lord of Heaven, and implored his Assistance in these Words, "I "was born a Barbarian, and in a Country of Barbarians, yet in the midst of the Troubles that "afflicted this Empire, they have chosen me to govern it. I make but one Request, which is, "that the Heavenly Majesty would condescend to watch over my Conduct, and send me wise "and experienced Men, whose Counsel may aid me to govern this State without falling into "Mistakes." Indeed he had always in his Palace a great Number of able Men, by whose Counsel he made many excellent Regulations, and among others one excluding Eunuchs from all Public Employments. The Birth of that illustrious Person, who was afterwards the Founder of the nineteenth Dynasty; the Profound Peace the Nation enjoy'd, all the while he was on the Throne, and the Plenty which reign'd throughout the Empire, are attributed by the same Writers to the Piety of this Prince.

Fong-tau's Observrtion on Government.

Among the many great Men who were about this Prince, a Ko-lau, named Fong-tau, is highly praised for his extraordinary Understanding and Integrity; he used to say, "That a State is to "be govern'd with the same Care and Circumspection that is required in riding a Horse. I have "often, said he, travell'd in very rough and mountainous Countries, and never got any Hurt, "because I always took Care to keep a stiff Rein; whereas in the smoothest Plains, thinking the "same Care needless, and giving my Horse the Bridle, I have fallen, and been in Danger of "hurting myself. It is just the same with the Government of a State; when it is in the most flou-"rishing Condition, a Prince ought not to abate any thing of his usual Vigilance and Attention."

His Humility, and Compaſſion for the Poor.

In a time of Scarcety he order'd the publick Granaries to be open'd, and the Rice to be ſold at a very low Rate, which the People were to pay when they were able; but the Surveyors of the Proviſions repreſenting, that the Poor would never be in a Condition to pay it; " How, ſays the " Emperor, don't you know that they are my Children, and that I am their Father? Tay-tſu, 1ſt Emperor.

The Empire recovers itſelf.

NINE Emperors of this Dynaſty kept their Court for one hundred and ſixty Years in the Northern Provinces of China, the other nine reſided one hundred fifty two Years in the Southern Provinces.

Under this Dynaſty the Empire began to take Breath, after the many Commotions, Wars, and other Misfortunes, which afflicted it. Theſe continual Storms were ſucceeded by a long Calm; and the Bleſſing which uſually accompanies Peace had been more laſting, had all the Princes of this Family been as much addicted to Arms as Learning.

Tay-tſu was endow'd with all the Qualities which the Chineſe require in their Emperors; being a Prince of ſolid Judgment, attentive to the Affairs of State, wiſe, prudent, liberal, and tender of his People; modeſt, frugal, exceeding good-natur'd, and naturally inclin'd to Clemency; which appear'd from the moderate Puniſhments he inflicted on Criminals, as well as by his mild and affable Behaviour to the Vanquiſh'd. He order'd the four Gates of his Palace, which fronted the four Quarters of the World, to be left always open, being willing, he ſaid, " That his Houſe ſhould " be as his Heart, open to all his Subjects." By this Character of Goodneſs and Condeſcenſion he regained the Obedience of ten Petty Sovereigns, and eſtabliſh'd Peace, which ſeem'd by their continual continual Wars to have been baniſh'd for ever from their Dominions. Intending to root Luxury out of the Empire, he began by reforming himſelf and the Court; to which end he always appear'd in a plain and modeſt Habit, and forbad his Daughters to wear Pearls and precious Stones. DYN. XIX. SONG. Cyc. LVI. Year of Chriſt 964.

To honour the Memory of his Anceſtors, he gave the Title of Emperor to his Father, Grand-Father, and Great-Grand-Father's Father; and made his Mother (who was reckon'd a Pattern of Prudence and Modeſty) an Empreſs. When the Nobles came to congratulate her on the Advancement of her Son, ſhe did not ſhew the leaſt Sign of Joy; at which they being ſurprized, ſhe ſaid, "I have been told that the Art of ruling well is very difficult; if my Son governs his "Subjects with Wiſdom, I ſhall receive your Compliments with Pleaſure; if not, I ſhall con-"tentedly reſign theſe Honours to finiſh my Days in my former Condition." Noble Sentiments of the Empreſs-Mother.

A Year before her Death ſhe conjur'd the Emperor not to be ſway'd by Affection for his Children, in the Choice of an Heir, but rather to nominate his Brother; "for in ſhort, added ſhe, "remember, my Son, that you are beholden for the Throne you ſit on, much leſs to your own "Merit, than to the Infancy of the Prince of the preceding Family." Another Inſtance.

The Emperor, during a ſevere Winter, reflecting on the Hardſhip his Army, (which was oppoſing the Tartars of Lyau-tong in the Northern Provinces) was like to ſuffer from the Rigour of the Seaſon; pull'd off his Garment, lin'd with Furrs, and ſent it to the General, telling him, "That "he wiſh'd it was in his Power to do the like to each of his Soldiers." It is incredible what a vaſt effect this generous Act of the Emperor had upon the Courage and Ardour of his Troops. Generous Act of the Emperor.

This Prince ordained an Examination for the Military Men like that for the Literati, which thoſe who aſpire to Poſts in the Army are oblig'd to paſs; nor can they riſe to the Chief Employments till they have given Proofs of their Capacity, by their writing on the Art of War, as well as by their Skill in Horſemanſhip and Archery. He inſtitutes an Examination for the Soldiery.

Among the illuſtrious Men who flouriſh'd during his Reign, two are particularly diſtinguiſh'd, one in the Magiſtracy, the other in the Army; the firſt was call'd Chau-pû, the ſecond Kau-pin. Rewards the Chau-pû for his uncommon Reſolution.

Chau-pû, who was of the Emperor's Council, was continually preſenting ſome Petition or Memorial to put him in mind of his Duty, or other Matters relating to the publick Welfare. The Emperor being tir'd with ſo many Remonſtrances, one Day took his Petition and tore it before him; Chau-pû, without being concern'd, gather'd up the Pieces, and having on his Return home join'd them together in the beſt Manner he could, the very next Day appear'd before the Emperor in the moſt reſpectful Poſture, and preſented him the ſame Petition; who far from being angry with his Miniſter, admired his Conſtancy and Reſolution, and to reward ſuch uncommon Virtue made him Chief Ko-lau.

He gave on another Occaſion an extraordinary Proof of his Tenderneſs for his People; the Town of Nan-king being beſieged by Kau-pin, and reduced to the laſt Extremity, the Emperor, who foreſaw the Slaughter which would happen on the taking this Place, feign'd himſelf ſick; whereat the great Officers were alarm'd, and ſurrounding his Bed, every one was propoſing ſome Remedy: "The moſt effectual Remedy, reply'd the Emperor, and from which I expect a Cure, "depends only on you; aſſure me by your Oath, that you will not ſhed the Blood of the Ci-"tizens." They all ſwore accordingly, and the Emperor immediately appear'd to be well. The Generals took ſuch wiſe Precautions to reſtrain the Soldiers, that very few of the Inhabitants were ſlain; yet even this drew Tears from the Emperor: "Alas! ſaid he, what a dreadful thing is War, "which cannot be carry'd on without deſtroying innocent Perſons!" And as the City had ſuffer'd by Famine, during a long Siege, the inſtant it was taken he ſent one hundred thouſand Meaſures of Rice to be diſtributed among the People. Great Inſtance of Tenderneſs for his People.

To excite Emulation and a greater Inclination for Learning, he viſited the Birth Place of the celebrated Confuçius, and compoſed a Panegyric on him. He alſo conferr'd on one of his Deſcendants a Title of Honour, which raiſed him to a conſiderable Rank in the Empire. Tay-tſû dy'd the thirteenth Year of the Cycle, having nam'd for his Succeſſor his Brother Tay-tſong, purſuant to the Recommendation of his Mother on her Death-Bed. Viſits the Birth Place of Kong-fû-tſe.

TAY-TSONG, Second Emperor, reign'd Twenty one Years.

THIS Prince was endow'd with great Moderation, and was a famous Protector of Learned Men. Being learned himſelf, he employ'd part of the Day in Reading, and erected a very rich Library, which contain'd, as they affirm, eighty thouſand Volumes. Tay-tſong, 2d Emperor.

In an Expedition which he undertook, to reduce one of the petty Kingdoms, and make it a Province of the Empire, while he beſieg'd the principal City, there happen'd one Night a great Tumult in the Camp, which was commanded by Chau the Emperor's Brother; occaſion'd, as was reported the next Day, by a Deſign of the Soldiers to ſet that General on the Throne. The Emperor concealing his Reſentment, employ'd himſelf wholly to reduce the Town; but a few Days after it was taken, his Brother diſcourſing familiarly with him, intimated his Surprize that he had ſo long deferr'd to reward thoſe who had diſtinguiſh'd themſelves in the Siege. "I expected, an-ſwer'd the Emperor, that you would have rewarded them." Chau was ſo ſtung at this Anſwer, that he kill'd himſelf before Night; but when the Emperor heard of his Death, he fainted, and ſhed a Flood of Tears, often embraced his Corps, and cauſed the greateſt Honours to be render'd him at his Funeral. Modeſtly rebukes his Brother, who kills himſelf.

He paſſionately wiſh'd to recover the Cities which his Anceſtors had yielded to the Tartars of Lyau-tong; but Chang-tſi-hyen, the General of his Army, always diſſuaded him from that Undertaking, "Becauſe, ſaid he, it is more proper firſt to ſettle the Empire in Peace, and when that "is well eſtabliſh'd, we ſhall have more Leiſure and leſs Difficulty to reduce thoſe Barbarians." The Emperor being of a different Opinion, ſeveral Battles were fought, in which ſometimes the Chineſe and ſometimes the Tartars were victorious.

The General Chang-tſi-hyen made uſe of a remarkable Stratagem, to raiſe the Siege of a City: he detach'd three hundred Soldiers, carrying each a lighted Torch, with orders to approach as near as poſſible the Enemy's Camp; who being ſurpriſed at ſuch a Number of Lights, and imagining that the whole Chineſe Army was coming upon them, immediately fled, and falling into the Ambuſcades, which the General had placed in all the Paſſages, very few of them eſcaped Slaughter.

THE manner in which this Prince began his Reign prognoſticated a happy Government. Upon the Appearance of a Comet, which was deemed the Fore-runner of ſome Calamity, he publiſhed an Edict, enjoyning his Subjects to let him know his Faults, that he might amend them, in order to avert the Evils which threatened the Empire; and at the ſame time remitted ten Millions of the Taxes, and ſet thirteen thouſand Priſoners at Liberty. As he had an Heir born at this Juncture, he own'd his Obligation to the Lord of Heaven, whom he had long importun'd for that Bleſſing.

The Tartars of Lyau-tong having beſieged a City in the Province of Pe-che-li, the Emperor came upon them ſuddenly with his Army, which ſo terrified the Barbarians, that they inſtantly raiſed the Siege. He was adviſed to take Advantage of their Conſternation, to recover the Country which had been yielded to them; and is blam'd not only for neglecting to purſue his Victory, but alſo for making a Treaty, after their ſhameful Flight, as diſadvantageous as if he had been defeated himſelf: for he bought the Peace at the Price of an hundred thouſand Taël and two hundred thouſand Pieces of Silk, to be paid annually.

and then buys a Peace of them.

His Simple Credulity.

He is blamed alſo for his Credulity, whereby Magic, and many other Superſtitions gained Ground during his Reign. In the eleventh Year of the Cycle, being told that a choice Book had fallen from Heaven, near one of the Gates of the Imperial City, he immediately took it in his Head to go in Perſon, to receive this Celeſtial Gift. The Ko-lau's, to prevent his taking ſuch an imprudent Step, endeavouring to convince him, that it was only an Impoſture of ſome Flatterers and idle People, and that the Book ought to be burnt, he remain'd a while in Suſpenſe; but at laſt reſolved to follow his firſt Deſign, becauſe, as he ſaid, "a Spirit had appeared to him "in a Dream, about a Year before, and promiſed him this wonderful Book." He ſet out immediately on Foot, with ſeveral of his Courtiers, to receive this miraculous Book with the more profound Reſpect; and even built a Temple on the Place where it fell. Upon Examination it appeared full of Sorcery, and to contain all the Principles of the abominable Sect of Tau; concerning which an Interpreter, named Hû-ſin-ngan, obſerves, that from this fatal Time the Reſpect due to the Sovereign Lord of Heaven much decreaſed amongſt great Numbers of the Chineſe.

Van-tan's Penance.

Van-tan, one of the Ko-lau's of the Empire, being at the Point of Death, call'd his Children, and ſpake to them in this manner: "My Conſcience does not reproach me with having done "any thing againſt the Intereſt of the Emperor or the Good of the State; but there is one thing "for which I cannot forgive my ſelf, and that is my not having counſelled his Majeſty to burn "that pernicious Book which he received with ſo much Reſpect. JIN-TSONG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Forty one Years.

Jin-tſong. 4th Emp.

JIN-TSONG was but thirteen Years old when he was proclaimed Emperor. The Empreſs took the Government in her Hands during his Minority, and held it till her Death; which happened eleven Years after the Acceſſion of this Prince, who always paid her the ſame Reſpect as if ſhe had been his own Mother. As ſoon he began to govern by himſelf, his whole Em-

Employment was to preſerve Tranquillity in his Dominions, and to make his Subjects taſte the Sweets of it. This pacifick Diſpoſition revived the Courage and Ambition of the Tartars of Lyau-tong, who had renewed the War, if the Emperor had not bought a Peace on moſt ſhameful Terms.

The beſt thing he did, was baniſhing all the Images with their Worſhippers out of the Palace, and commanding that none ſhould offer him any Preſent which came from foreign Countries. In the twenty ſixth Year of his Reign the Empire was afflicted with a great Drought; but abundance of Rain ſucceeding cauſed a general Rejoycing, when all the great Officers being aſſembled on this Occaſion to congratulate the Emperor, " All the Time, ſaid this Prince, " that my People ſuffered by the Scarcity, I never failed to burn Incenſe, and lift up my Hands " to Heaven. Hearing the Noiſe of Thunder in the Night, I roſe haſtily out of Bed and went " into my Garden; and, as ſoon as I ſaw the Rain fall, proſtrated my ſelf on theEarth, to " return Thanks to the Lord of Heaven. The Favour I ask of you is to tell me, without Reſerve, " what you have obſerved amiſs in my Conduct. Perhaps I have only the empty Title of Empe- " ror, and am blind to my own Defects, being dazled by the Splendor of my Greatneſs. I am " ſenſible of what Importance it is for one to addreſs his Prayers to Heaven Morning and E- " vening, with a pure Heart".

His extreme Deſire of having a Son led him to put away the Empreſs, whereby he ſuffered ſomewhat in his Reputation; for tho' ſome approved this Conduct, the greater Number blamed it. But he was univerſally applauded for the Succour he ſent his Subjects, by the Counſel and Care of one of his Ko-lau's named Fû-pyê; which ſav'd the Lives of 500,000 People, who were ready to periſh with Hunger and Diſtreſs. About the ſame time he had another Vexation; Hyen-tſong, ſeventh King of the Lyau-tong Tartars, having ſent Embaſſadors to demand the Reſtitution of ten Cities in the Province of Pe-che-li, which had been re-taken by the Founder of the eighteenth Dynaſty; the Emperor, who loved Peace, diſpatched Kû-pyê to the Tartar Prince, and engaged to pay him yearly 200,000 Taels, and 300,000 Pieces of Silk, inſtead of thoſe Cities; and, what was moſt ſhameful of all, made Uſe of the Character Na in the Treaty, which ſignifies a Penſion by way of Tribute.

After he had divorced the Empreſs, he married the Grand-Daughter of Kau-pin, the famous Chineſe General ſpoken of before, but had no Heirs by this Princeſs: So that being near his End, he was obliged to name Ing-tſong the thirteenth Son of his Brother, for his Succeſſor; he died at the Age of fifty four, in the fortieth Year of the Cycle.

ING-TSONG, Fifth Emperor, reigned Four Years.

Ing-tſong, 5th Emp.

IN the firſt Year of his Reign he was ſo vexed at ſome Miſunderſtanding which happened between him and the Empreſs, who had a Share in the Government, that it threw him into a Fit of Sickneſs: But upon his Recovery, his Ko-lau, Han-ki, managed it ſo that he paid her a Viſit.

This wiſe Miniſter, having ſhew'd them the Misfortunes which ſuch a Diſſenſion might produce, exhorted the Emperor in particular to pay the Empreſs the Reſpects and Duty of a Son, tho' ſhe was not his Mother, and gave frequent Inſtances of a diſagreeable Temper. He repreſented to him, that Virtue was eaſily practiſed where Love and Complaiſance engage our Affections, but that it does not deſerve that Name till it has been tried, and ſtood the Shock of Oppoſition; that he ſhould have always before his Eyes the Example of Shun, that ancient Emperor, who had been revered for ſo many Ages, becauſe his Reſpect and Obedience could never be diminiſhed, either by the harſh Uſage of a barbarous Father, or a cruel Step-Mother. By the Care of this Miniſter ſo perfect a Reconciliation was wrought between the Emperor and Empreſs, that ſhortly after ſhe entirely reſigned her Part of the Government.

CHE-TSONG, Seventh Emperor, reign'd Fifteen Years.

Che-tſong, 7th Emp.

CHE-TSONG being but ten Years old when he aſcended the Throne, the Empreſs his Grandmother governed the State with great Prudence during the eight Years that ſhe lived. A few Moments before her Death ſhe ſent for the Ko-lau's, and ordered them to clear the Palace of that great Number of Miniſters, who were of no Uſe but to corrupt the Inclinations of the young Prince; but as ſhe ought to have done this herſelf when the Power was in her own Hands, her Orders were now too late. Lyu-kong-chu, being raiſed to the Dignity of Ko-lau, preſented a Memorial to the Emperor, which contained the ten following Inſtructions, expreſſed in twenty Characters. 1. Fear Heaven. 2. Love your Subjects. 3. Labour to be perfect. 4. Apply yourſelf to the Sciences. 5. Beſtow Employments on Perſons of Merit. 6. Be ready to hear Advice. 7. Leſſen the Taxes. 8. Mitigate the Severity of Puniſhments. 9. Shun Prodigality. 10. Deteſt Debauchery.

10 Inſtructions of his Ko-lau.

The Emperor having divorced his Wife, one of the Miniſters preſented a Petition containing Remonſtrances on that Occaſion; the Prince told him he had followed the Example of ſome of his Anceſtors: You had better (reply'd the Miniſter) imitate their Virtues than their Faults. The Emperor was ſo ſtung with this Reply, that he threw down the Petition, trampled upon it, and deprived him, who gave him that Counſel, of his Dignity.

Che-tſong was but twenty five years of Age when he died, in the ſeventeenth Year of the Cycle. He was ſucceeded by Whey-tſong, the eleventh Son of Shin-tſong, who was the ſixth Emperor of that Dynaſty.

WHEY-TSONG, Eighth Emperor, reign'd Twenty-five Years.

Whey-tſong, 8th Emperor

THIS Prince divided his Authority with the Empreſs his Grand-Mother, and was more addicted to the Luxury and Pleaſures of his Palace, than to the Buſineſs of the State; yet he loved Literature, and had made a conſiderable Progreſs in it.

In one thing he is inexcuſable; that tho' he could not be ignorant of the Troubles occaſioned in former Times by the Authority of the Eunuchs, yet he honoured them with his Favour and Protection, ſo far as to beſtow Sovereignties on ſome of them; a Honour never granted to any but Princes of the Imperial Family, or (which was ſeldom practiſed) to Great Men who had done ſignal Services to the Empire. His Reputation ſuffered ſtill more by his Folly, in adhering to the abominable Superſtitions of the Sect of Tau; for he carefully collected all the Books which contained their Doctrine, and was ſo infatuated, as to give the Title of Shang-ti, or Supreme Lord, to a famous Diſciple among them, named Chang-i, who lived under the Dynaſty of the Han; nay, he went farther, for he declar'd himſelf Head of this impious Sect.

Favours the Sect of Tau.

The Authors of this Time cannot forbear inveighing againſt his Conduct, and make no Difficulty to aſcribe all the ſucceeding Misfortunes, and even the Deſtruction of the Empire to a Blaſphemy ſo diſhonourable to the true Sovereign of Heaven.

The Emperor, contrary to the Advice of the King of Korea and moſt of his Miniſters, joined Forces with the Nyu-che or Eaſtern Tartars, whom he called in to deſtroy the Kingdom of Lyau-tong. The Nyu-che joyfully entered into this Confederacy, and ſeveral Battles were fought, in which the Army of Lyau-tong was always defeated, and reduced at laſt to ſuch Extremity, that thoſe who remained were obliged to quit their Country, and fly for Safety to the Mountains in the Weſt (A). dred and nine Years, under nine Princes. The Tartar grew so elated with this Conquest, that he determin'd to found an Empire, and give it the Name of Kin. (B) Soon after extending his Views of aggrandizing himself, he openly broke his Treaties with the Emperor of China, and invading the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shen-si, made himself Master of them, more by the Treachery of some Chinese Malecontents, than by Force of Arms. The Emperor, in Danger of losing the greater Part of his Dominions, made several advantageous Propofals to the Tartar, who invited Whey-tsong to come in Person, and settle the Limits of the two Empires; which he did, and new Articles of Peace were agreed on between them. But on the Emperor's Return to his Capital City, his Ministers made him change his Mind, telling him, that the Treaty could not subsist, and that the most cruel War was preferable to so shameful a Peace. The Tartar, who was inform'd of this Resolution, had immediately recourse to Arms, and taking several Towns, entred the Province of Shan-si in Triumph, where he invited the Emperor once more to come and settle their Limits. This unhappy Prince, who dreaded nothing so much as War, was weak enough to go a second time to his Enemy; who presently after his Arrival seized his Person, and having stript him of all the Marks of his Dignity kept him Prisoner. A faithful Minister, nam'd Li-so-shin, who accompany'd the Emperor, enraged at such Treachery, cry'd out with a deep Sigh, "Heaven cannot have two Suns, nor can I obey two Masters." The Endeavours of the Tartars to appease him only enraged him the more, and in the hight of his Fury he cut off his Lips and his Tongue, and then kill'd himself.

KIN-TSONG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd One Year.

KIN-TSONG began his Reign by executing the Orders of his Father, which enjoin'd him to put to Death six of his Ministers, who had basely betray'd him to the Tartars. In the mean time they pursued their Conquests, invading the Province of Ho-nan, and passing the Yellow River without Opposition; which made them wonder at the Indolence of the Chinese, who with a Handful of Men could have prevented it. Then they marched directly to the Imperial City, which they took and plunder'd, carrying away the Emperor and his Queen Prisoners; but the Principal Lords and several of the Ministers, preferring Death before so ignominious a Bondage, slew themselves. The Tartars being informed by the Empress Meng, that she had been divorced, and had no Hand in the Management of Affairs, they left that Princess behind; who preserved the Empire by her Wisdom and Conduct, in getting the Crown placed on the Head of Kau-tsong, Brother of the late Emperor, and ninth Son of Whey-tsong by his divorced Empress.

KAU-TSONG, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty six Years.

KAU-TSONG fix'd his Court first at Nan-king, but shortly after was oblig'd to remove it to Hang-chew, Capital of the Province of Che-kyang. Tho' he was of a peaceable Disposition, and a Lover of Learning, yet he gain'd some Victories, both over the Tartars, and certain Chiefs of the Rebels; who took Advantage of the present Troubles to enrich themselves by plundering the Provinces. Kong-ye, who commanded his Army, had several times repulsed the Tartars, but to no great Purpose, since none of the conquer'd Countries were recover'd from them.

Kau-tsong, 10th Emp.

This Prince is blamed for two things; first, for slighting his Ministers of greatest Experience and Integrity, and placing his whole Confidence in two or three Parasites, who had neither Honesty nor Honour. Secondly for being so much devoted to the Sect of the Bonzas, as to abandon the Government to his adopted Son, that he might have the more Time to spare for his superstitious Contemplations.

Fond of Parasites and the Bonzas.

Hi-tsong, the Tartar King, to gain the Love of his new Subjects, gave public Proofs of his Esteem for Learning and learned Men; he also visited the Hall of Confucius, and in imitation of the Chinese paid him regal Honours. The Courtiers being displeased that a Man, who was far from being Noble by Birth, should receive such Honours, discover'd their Surprize to the King, who reply'd: "If he does not merit those Honours by his Birth, he merits them for the "excellent Doctrine he has taught." He fell afterwards on the Town of Nan-king, from whence the Emperor was retired, and took it.

Hi-tsong, King of Kin, honours Kong-fu-tse, and takes the Imperial City.

The Fidelity of a Chinese General, named Yang-pang, is highly commended. Having been taken Prisoner by the Tartars, he was greatly importuned to side with them; but he not only refused the most advantageous Offers, but wrote with his Blood on his Robe, "That he had rather die, "and meet again the Spirit of the Imperial Family of Song, than live to serve Barbarians." Which resolute Behaviour cost him his Life, for he was kill'd that Instant.

Fidelity of a Chinese General.

(B) The Dominion founded by this Nation was the famous Empire of Katay; which Name came to us from the Mongl's or Mogols (1). It contain'd, as appears from this History, the Northern Provinces of China, with part of Tartary, particularly the Country of the Mancheuus, whose Progenitors, these Kin were. Kin signifies Gold; whence the Emperor of Katay, in the Histories of Jenghiz-khân, is called Altân-khân, or the Golden King.

However Yo-fi arrived time enough to fall upon their Rear-Guard, which ſuffer'd very much, and from that time they never durſt croſs the Kyang.

The Emperor by a ſhameful Peace makes himſelf the Subject and Tributary of the Kin.

A few Years after the Emperor made Peace with the Tartar King on very diſhonourable Conditions; for in ſigning this Treaty he made no Scruple to uſe the Word Chin, that is Subject, and Kong, which ſignifies Tributary. The Tartar, in Conſideration of theſe ſubmiſſive Terms, engaged to ſend the Emperor the Bodies of eight of his Relations, who had died within eight Years. When theſe Bodies arrived at the Imperial City, they were received with great Demonſtrations of Joy; the Priſon Doors were ſet open, and a general Pardon granted thro' the whole Empire. The Chineſe Authors, far from blaming this Action of the Emperor, highly praiſe it as a rare Example of Filial Piety.

The King of Kin breaks the Peace,

In the thirteenth Year of his Reign the Tartar King broke the Peace, and at the Head of a very formidable Army invaded the Southern Provinces, and took Yang-chew. Afterwards approaching the Yang-tſe-kyang, which is not far from that City, he order'd his Troops to paſs over near the Mouth of the River, where it is wideſt and moſt rapid; upon which the whole Army mutinied, and the King being kill'd in the beginning of the Tumult, they immediately retir'd towards the North, where ſeveral Diſturbances and Inſurrections began to appear.

The Eastern Tartars, in a great Consternation, immediately sued for Peace, and made very advdntageous Proposals; but the Emperor, incensed by their Breach of so many solemn Treaties, and depending more on the Integrity of the Western Tartars, rejected these Conditions with Scorn (e). Ning-tsong dy'd without Issue, the twenty first Year of the Cycle, and fifty seventh of his Age. Mean time the War was carry'd on vigorously against the Tartars; who, being attack'd on one side by the Chinese, and on the other by the Western Tartars, commanded by an able General nam'd Pe-yen, were defeated in several Battles. The City of Ho-nan was taken, where the King of the Eastern Tartars kept his Court; and tho' the Capital of the Province of Shan-tong held out a long time (the Besieged defending the Place so obstinately, that they were driven for want of other Victuals to feed on human Flesh) yet at lenth Ngai-ti, the Tartar Prince, despairing of Relief, hang'd himself: whose Death put an end to the Empire of the Eastern Tartars, which continued under nine Princes in the Space of one hundred and seventeen Years. TWAN-TSONG, Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

Twan-tſong, 17th Emp.

THE victorious March of the Tartar, who met with no Reſiſtance, obliged the Emperor to go on Board his Fleet, with the Lords of his Court, and one hundred and thirty thouſand Soldiers, which remain'd with him, deſigning to have retired to the Province of Fo-kyen; but being cloſely purſued by the Tartars, both by Sea and Land, he was oblig'd to fly to the Coaſt of Quang-tong, the moſt Southern Province of China, where he dy'd of a Diſeaſe, aged eleven Years. His younger Brother Ti-ping, the only Remains of the Family of Song, ſucceeded him.

TI-PING, Eighteenth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

Ti-ping, 18th Emperor.

THE Chineſe Fleet, being overtaken by that of the Tartars, could not avoid an Engagement, which was very bloody, and deciſive in Favour of the Tartars, who gain'd a compleat Victory. The Ko-lau, Lo-ſyew-ſe, to whoſe Care the Emperor had been intruſted, ſeeing his Ship ſurrounded by the Tartarian Veſſels, took the young Prince, who was but eight Years of Age, in his Arms, and threw himſelf into the Sea. The reſt of the Lords and Miniſters follow'd his Example. The Empreſs, quite diſtracted, with dreadful Shrieks threw herſelf alſo in. This terrible Cataſtrophe happen'd near an Iſland dependant on Quang-chew-fû, Capital of the Province of Quang-tong. Another General, who commanded a part of the Chineſe Fleet, having forced his Way thro' the Enemy, and eſcaped their Fury with ſome of his Veſſels, endeavour'd to make to Shore, but was driven off by a ſtrong Wind, which blew from the Land; and a violent Storm ariſing at the ſame time, he was ſunk at once with all his Followers. It is affirm'd that above one hundred thouſand Chineſe periſh'd in this Fight, either by the Sword or the Water, into which the greater part threw themſelves in Deſpair.

Sad Cataſtrophe of the Family of the Song.

Thus ended the Dynaſty of the Song, and with it the Dominion of the Chineſe; for Shi-tſû, before call'd Ho-pi-lyê, (the fourth Son of Tay-tſû, [or Jenghiz Khân] who founded the Empire of the Weſtern Tartars,) took Poſſeſſion of his Conqueſt, and was the Firſt Emperor of this new Dynaſty.

Shi-tſû, or Ho-pi-lyê, 1ſt Emperor.

THE Chineſe Nation, which for ſo many Ages had been govern'd by its Natural Princes, now firſt became ſubject to a Foreign Power; if indeed this Emperor ought to be call'd a Foreigner, who in his Manners was more of a Chineſe than a Tartar. At his coming to the Crown, he made no Alteration, either in the Miniſtry or in the Laws and Cuſtoms; he was ſo conformable to the Humour of his Subjects, and won them ſo much by his ſincere Conduct, by his Equity, by the Protection he gave to Men of Letters, and by his tender Affection

(H) P. Couplet reports this as ſpoken by the famous Pe-yen, the Tartar General above mention'd. (1)

(I) Shi-tſû, or Ho pi lyê, that is Koplay or Kublay Khân, was the fifth Mongol or Mogol Emperor, who reign'd in Katay, which included the Northern Provinces of China; but the firſt who made a Conqueſt of the whole. It is to be wiſh'd the Miſſionary, who made this Extract, had given us the Mongol Names of the Succeſſors of Koplay in China, to compare with thoſe of his Succeſſors in Tartary, as given us by the Oriental Authors.

DYN. XX. YUEN. Cyc. LXI. Year of Chriſt 1264.

He firſt eſtabliſh'd his Court at Tay-ywen-fû, Capital of the Province of Shan-ſi, and afterwards remov'd it to Pe-king (*). He cauſed it to be publiſh'd that all Perſons ſhould continue in the Employments and Dignities which they poſſeſs'd in the preceding Reign; but many refuſed that Bounty, and preferr'd a voluntary Death to an Honourable Servitude. Among the reſt was a Ko-lau, named Ven-tyen-ſyan, who had been taken Priſoner in the Sea-Fight; in vain was he told, that there were no Hopes of reſtoring the Family of Song, which was extinct; that a wiſe Man ought to comply with the Times, eſpecially when there was no Remedy; that the Emperor knew his Merit, and that he might be aſſured of his Eſteem and Confidence. "A faithful Mi-"niſter, reply'd he, is attach'd to his Prince as a Son to his Father; if his Father is ſick he em-"ploys all ſorts of Remedies to cure him; if the Strength of the Diſeaſe prevails over the Reme-"dies, yet he does not ceaſe to continue his Endeavours to give him Eaſe, becauſe he ought never "to ceaſe diſcharging the Duties of Filial Piety, and is withal ſenſible that Heaven is the So-"vereign Arbiter of Life and Death." This was all the Anſwer they could get from his invincible Obſtinacy.

Loyalty of a Ko-lau.

After his Death theſe two Sentences were found written by himſelf on his Girdle; the firſt is from Confuçius, "Let the Body periſh, provided Filial Piety is brought to Perfection." The other from Mençius, "The Loſs of Life is a Trifle, when in the ſupport of Juſtice." This Ko-lau dy'd, being forty ſeven Years of Age, greatly lamented.

Unfortunate Expedition againſt Japon

The Emperor, in the third Year of his Reign, form'd a Deſign againſt Japon, and ſent one hundred thouſand Men to invade it. But the Expedition prov'd very unfortunate, not above three or four Perſons returning home with the News; all the reſt were either ſhipwrack'd, or periſh'd in the neighbouring Iſlands.

The ſame Year he cauſed all the Books of the Sect of Tau to be burnt; and ordain'd that there ſhould be but one Kalendar for the whole Empire, which ſhould be made at Court, and publiſh'd every Year: forbidding all private Perſons under pain of Death to undertake any Work of this kind. Four Years after, his only Son, whom he had nam'd his Heir, dy'd, and tho' he left Children, yet the Emperor was inconſolable for his Loſs. Some Mohammedans having offer'd the Emperor a precious Stone of great Value, he forbid it to be bought, "Becauſe, ſaid he, the Money "that it would coſt, might be much more uſefully employ'd, in relieving the Neceſſities of the "Poor."

Death of the Emperor's only Son.

Being inform'd, that the Barks which brought to Court the Tribute of the Southern Provinces, or carry'd on the Trade of the Empire, were oblig'd to come by Sea, and often ſuffer'd Shipwrack; he cauſed the Great Canal to be made, which is at preſent one of the Wonders of China. It is three hundred Leagues in Length, and forms a great Road of Water; by which above nine thouſand Imperial Barks tranſport with Eaſe, and at a ſmall Expence, the Tribute of Grain, Stuffs, &c. which is annually paid to the Emperor.

The Great Canal made, 300 Leagues in Length.

Had this been the only Advantage this Prince procured for China, he would have been worthy of the high Praiſes which the Chineſe give him (K). He dy'd at the Age of eigthty, and in the thirty firſt Year of the Cycle, ſucceeded by his Grandſon Ching-tſong.

CHING-TSONG, Second Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

Ching-tſong, 2d Emperor.

THIS Prince is praiſed for his Clemency and Love to his Subjects. He mitigated the Severity of Puniſhments, and leſſen'd the Taxes with which ſeveral of the Petty Sovereigns began to burthen the People; but his ill State of Health, and almoſt continual Diſorders, hindred his applying himſelf as diligently as he inclined to the Affairs of Government.

He dy'd at the Age of forty two, in the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, and Vû-tſong his Nephew ſucceeded him.

VU-TSONG, Third Emperor, reign'd Four Years.

Vû-tſong, 3d Emperor, honours Kong-fû-tſe.

THE People thought the Reign of this Emperor too ſhort, being charm'd with the Affection he bore them, and the great Inclination he ſhew'd to make them happy. He was naturally liberal, but beſtow'd his Bounties only on thoſe who did ſome real Service to the State, on which Occaſions he rewarded them with a Generoſity truly Royal.

To give a Luſtre to Learning, and excite Emulation among the Literati, he gave to Confucius, who is look'd on as the Maſter of the Empire, the ſame Titles with which the Regulo's are

This Prince was but thirty one when he dy'd, in the forty eighth Year of the Cycle, and Jin-tſong, his Brother, by the ſame Venter, was his Succeſſor.

JIN-TSONG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd nine Years.

Jin-tſong, 4th Emperor.

THE People had no Reaſon to grieve for the Loſs of the late Emperor, ſince they found ſtill more excellent Qualities in his Succeſſor; who, beſides a lively and penetrating Genius, was indued with great Equity, Mildneſs and Moderation. The way to obtain his good Graces was to give him ſage Advice, eſpecially if it tended to the Eaſe and Happineſs of his Subjects. He puniſhed with Reluctance, but rewarded with Generoſity; in ſhort he applied himſelf wholly to govern his Dominions well.

Being inform'd that five Brethren were guilty of Crimes, for which they were condemn'd to die, "Let one at leaſt be pardoned, ſaid the Emperor, that their unfortunate Parents may have "ſomebody to feed and comfort them." In the time of a great Drought, when the Harveſt was in Danger of being deſtroyed for want of Rain, 'Tis I, cry'd he ſighing, 'tis I who bring this Calamity upon my People: and repeating often theſe Words, he offered Incenſe, and implor'd the Aſſiſtance of Heaven; and it was obſerv'd that next Day abundance of Rain fell, which revived the parch'd and languiſhing Fields.

This Prince lived but thirty Years, and had for his Succeſſor Tay-ting, eldeſt Son of King Hyen tſong.

Tay-ting, 6th Emperor. Cyc. LVII. Year of Chriſt 1324.

A Month after Tay-ting aſcended the Throne he condemned the Murderers of his Predeceſſor to the moſt tormenting Death; and extirpated their Families, by executing their Children and Grand-Children.

Publick Calamities.

In this Reign, as in the former, China was afflicted with various Calamities, as Earthquakes, falling of Mountains, overflowing of Rivers, Droughts, Conflagrations, and many other Misfortunes; on which Occaſion both Emperors gave Proofs of their Love for their Subjects, by the Care they took to ſuccour them.

Prieſts of Tibet forbidden to enter China.

Tay-ting ordered that the Entrance into his Dominions ſhould be denied to the Bonzas of Tibet, called Lamas; who uſed to come in Swarms to China, and wandering from Houſe to Houſe were very burdenſome to the People.

Great Self-denial in a Prince.

This Prince dying the fifth Year of the Circle, aged thirty ſix Years, the States aſſembled and elected his ſecond Son; but he refuſed to accept a Crown, which he ſaid belonged of Right to his eldeſt Brother Ming-tſong, who thereupon was ſent for out of Tartary where he then was, and proclaimed Emperor.

Ven-tſong, 8th Emperor.

THIS Prince ſeemed to deſerve the Crown by ſhewing ſo much Indifferency for it; and indeed the Care he took to chooſe good Miniſters, and his readineſs to follow their Counſels, are worthy of Praiſe. He is blamed only for one thing, and that is, for receiving the Great Lama, who is chief of the Bonza's of Tibet, into his Palace, with the moſt diſtinguiſhing Honours, and commanding his Courtiers to pay him the profoundeſt Reſpect.

Honours the Great Lama.

The Great Lords were ſeen to ſalute this Bonza on their Knees, and preſent him Wine in this humble Poſture; whilſt he did not offer in the leaſt to ſtir from his Seat, nor ſhew any Token of Civility. Whereupon one of the principal Courtiers being extremely piqu'd at this Haughtineſs, " Honeſt Man (ſays he) I know that you are the Diſciple of Fo, and Maſter of " the Bonzas; but perhaps you are ignorant that I am a Diſciple of Confuçius, and one of the chief " among the Literati in the Empire; it's fit you ſhould be acquainted with it, therefore let us " lay aſide all Ceremony". And at the ſame time ſtanding up he offered him the Cup, when the great Lama riſing from his Seat, took it with a Smile and drank it.

Whoſe Pride is mortified by a Mandarine.

Ven-tſong died the ninth Year of the Cycle, aged twenty nine Years; and Ning-tſong, who was the Son of the ſeventh Emperor ſucceeded him. But as he lived only two Months, he is not reckoned among the Emperors: His eldeſt Brother Shun-ti was fetch'd from the Province of Quang-ſi, and placed on the Throne, being thirteen Years old.

SHUN-TI, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Thirty five Years.

Shun-ti, 9th Emperor.

SHUN-TTI was the laſt of this Tartar Dynaſty who govern'd China. Theſe Princes, enervated by the Pleaſures of ſo fine and fruitful a Climate, by degrees degenerated from the Courage and Bravery of their Anceſtors; while the Chineſe whom they ſubdued, growing a warlike People, deprived them of the Fruits of their Conqueſt, and drove them for ever out of the Empire.

His Indolence and Effeminacy.

Shun-ti, tho' a Prince of great Parts, drew on himſelf this Diſgrace by his effeminate Indolence and love of Pleaſure, which made him wholly neglect the Affairs of the State; leaving the Government to his Ko-lau, Pe-yew-ha-ma, who was become abſolute Maſter, and had all Favours at his Diſpoſal.

is addicted to the Lamas.

To compleat his Misfortunes he ſent for the Lama's of Tartary, who introduced Idolatry and Magic; and as they ſtudy'd only to indulge his vicious Inclinations, they ſettled in the Palace a Company of young Female Dancers, who intirely enervated the little Courage that remained in him.

Dynaſty of Ywen, or of the Mongols, extinguiſhed by Hong-vû.

In the twenty third Year of the Cycle, a Chineſe named Chû; who had been a Servant in a Monaſtery of Bonzas, taking Part with a numerous Company of Revolters, became their Leader, and made a ſurprizing Advantage of the preſent Juncture of Affairs; for after ſeizing by degrees ſeveral Cities, he made himſelf Maſter of ſome Provinces, and in a celebrated Battle defeated the Emperor's Troops ſent to oppoſe his victorious March. Theſe great Succeſſes ſoon encreas'd his Army, and the Chineſe flocking to him from all Parts, Chû having croſs'd the Yellow River, and finding no Reſiſtance, eaſily got Poſſeſſion of all the Cities in his way; when at length meeting the Imperial Army, he immediately fought and cut it to Pieces. The Emperor, who had nothing to do but to fly, retired towards the North, where he died two Years after; and with him ended the Tartar Family of Ywen, which was ſucceedeed by the Dynaſty of the Ming, founded by Chû, who was called before Hong-vû, and afterwards took the Name of Tay-tſû.

He made several Laws to preserve the national Tranquillity, by which he ordain'd,

I. That those who possessed Sovereignites should not extend their Power beyond their respective Territories, nor meddle with publick Affairs.

II. That the Eunuchs should not enjoy any Employments civil or military.

III. That Women should never be suffered to become Bonzesses, nor Men to put themselves into a Monastery in order to commence Bonzas before the Age of forty Years.

IV. That the ancient and modern Laws should be reduced into a Body of three hundred Volumes. It was a whole Age before this Work appeared.

V. That the twenty seven Months of Mourning for the Death of Parents should be reduced to twenty seven Days.

Receives Ambassadors from several Countries.

His Court was soon crouded with Ambassadors from all Parts, who came to congratulate him on his Accession to the Crown. Among other Presents made him, one was a Lyon, which was the first that the Chinese had ever seen; Korea, Japan, the Island of Formosa, the Kingdom of Siam, and the Southern Isles distinguished themselves by celebrated Embassies.

The Joy which reigned at the Court of this Prince was very much allay'd by the Death of the Emperor's Wife, named Ma; who ascended the Throne with him, and whom he highly esteemed, openly declaring that he ow'd the Crown to her wise Counsels. His Grief for the Loss of her was so great, that he could never think of creating another Empress.

Cyc. LXIII. Year of Christ 1384.

As it was one of his chief Cares to encourage Learning, he granted extraordinary Privileges to the Imperial College, and us'd to be present himself at the Examinations for attaining the Degree of Doctor. However he would not suffer Confucius to be honoured like a King, as some of his Predecessors had done, but only in quality of Syen-tsé, that is, Master of the Empire.

Degrades Kong fu-tsé. Some of his Sayings.

Among the various Sayings reported of this Prince, there are two which were very familiar to him: "When there are any Commotions and Disturbances in the Empire, said he, never "act precipitately." And again, "If every thing is quiet, beware of treating your People "with too much Severity, and of insisting upon Niceties." He used to say also, "That as "Heaven and Earth produce all things necessary for the Support of Men, so a wise Emperor "should only study how to provide for the Want of his People; and tho' with this View he "should lessen the Taxes, and moderate publick Expences, yet he ought always to fear his "Subjects might want Necessaries".

Mourns in a time of Drought. Fine Lesson to his eldest Son.

In a time of great Drought he put on Mourning, and going up a high Mountain, staid there three Days, to implore the Clemency of Heaven; and the abundance of Rain which ensued, was deemed the Effect of his Prayers.

When he visited the Provinces of the Empire, accompanied by his eldest Son, one Day he stopp'd his Chariot in the midst of the Fields, and turning to him, said, "I took you with me, that you "might be an Eye-Witness of the Sweat and Labour of the poor Husbandmen; and that the "Compassion which so toilsome a Condition must excite in your Heart, might hinder you from "overloading them with Taxes." The unexpected Death of this Son, which happen'd soon after, overwhelm'd the Emperor with Grief; he mourn'd for three Years, contrary to the Custom, [rather to his own Law] and named his Grandson Heir to the Throne.

Great Instance of filial Piety and conjugal Fidelity.

A young Man named Swi, travelling with his Father and his Wife, fell unfortunately into the Hands of Robbers; who going to murder the good old Man, his Son stept between, and beseeched them with Tears to kill him instead of his Father. As they offer'd Violence to his Wife, Can you be guilty, says she, of such an infamous Action while my Husband is living? Whereupon they took and threw the young Man into a great Fire that was hard by; but the Wife cast herself instantly into the Flames, and closely embracing her Husband they were both burnt to Ashes. To preserve the Memory of their Piety and Fidelity, the Emperor caused a fine Monument to be erected in their Honour; but at the same time he severely punished another young Man, who had sacrificed his Son to an Idol, in hopes of recovering the Health of his dying Mother.

This Prince dyed the fifteenth Year of the Cycle, aged seventy one, and his Grandson Kyen-ven-ti, who was but thirteen Years old, succeeded him.

KYEN-VEN-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Four Years.

Kyen-ven-ti, 2d Emperor.

THIS Prince, tho' so young, began his Reign with an Action of Clemency, for which he had the Blessing of his Subjects, by remitting the third Part of the Imposts; and gave other Marks of his good Nature, and Compassion for the Unfortunate, which promised one of the most happy Reigns. But it was disturbed from the Beginning by the ambitious Pretensions of his Uncles, who were the late Emperor's Sons, and could not bear to see a Child preferr'd to so many Princes of riper Years, and capable of governing by themselves. They attributed their Father's Choice to the secret Management of the Ko-lau's, whose Intrigues they had partly discovered.

Opposed by his Uncle Yong-lo.

Yong-lo, King of Pe-king, (the fourth Son of Tay-tsu,) appeared the most incensed, and took up Arms

Arms to punish the Authors of this Injustice, as he called it. The Court having sent a great Army to oppose his Designs, a Battle ensued, which was long and bloody, and produced Offers of Peace; but Yong-lo would hearken to no Accommodation, unless the Emperor's Ministers were first delivered to him. Which being refused, he continued his March to the Imperial City, the Gates of which being open'd to him by a Traytor, named Li-king-long, a great Slaughter was made in the Town, and the Imperial Palace reduced to Ashes. The Body of the young Emperor, half consumed by the Flames, being brought before the Conqueror, he could not refrain from Tears at the Sight, and gave Orders for his Obsequies suitable to his Dignity. But the Conqueror's Fury fell chiefly on the Ministers, Numbers of whom were put to cruel Deaths; many prevented the Torments to which they were doomed by killing themselves, while others shaved their Heads, and escaped his Vengeance in the Habit of Bonzas.

CHING-TSU, or YONG-LO, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

THIS Prince was endued with a great Soul and uncommon Wisdom; but he made himself dreaded at first by the cruel Examples he gave of his Severity. He restored his Brothers to their Dignities, and continued them in Possession of their Revenues; rewarding with the same Liberality all those who had assisted him to ascend the Throne, except the Traitor Li-king-long.

Ching-tsu, or Yong-lo, 3d Emperor.

This Miscreant committed a fresh Crime, and being condemned to die, insolently reproach'd Ching-tsu with Ingratitude to the Man to whom he owed his Crown: "Would you be now "reigning, says he, if I had not opened you the Gates of the City? Traitor, reply'd the Empe- "ror, I owe the Crown to my own good Fortune, and not to your Treachery: Would not "you have opened the Gates to any other Person who had appeared with the same Forces"?

Answer to a Traitor.

A great Number of young Men having been consecrated Bonzas before the Age of forty, against the Law made by his Father, he obliged them all to quit their Monasteries; and burn'd all the Books of Chemistry which treated of the pretended Art to become immortal.

The seventh Year of his Reign he removed his Court to Pe-king from Nan-king, where he left his Son and Heir with several Tribunals and Mandarins, like those established at Pe-king. One Day some precious Stones, which were found in a Mine discovered in the Province of Shan-si, having been presented to him, he gave immediate Orders to shut the Mine: Because he would not, he said, fatigue his People with a fruitless Toil, in regard those Stones, however valuable they might be thought, could neither feed nor cloath his People in a time of Scarcity. He caused five Bells of Brass to be cast, each of which weighed 120,000 Pounds.

Removes his Court to Pe-king.

Causes five huge Bells to be cast,

The thirtieth Year of the Cycle he appointed forty two Doctors of the Court, called Han-lin, to explain more fully the ancient Classical Books, and therein confine themselves to the Opinions of the two Authors, named Ching-tse and Chu-tse; who had interpreted them in their own Way about three hundred Years before, under the Dynasty of the Song. These Doctors composed another Work, intitled, Sing-li-ta-tswen, which signifies Natural Philosophy; wherein, seeming not to deviate from the ancient Doctrine, they endeavour to reconcile it with the Fictions of an empty System, which intirely overthrow it.

and the ancient Books to be explained anew.

As this Work was printed by the Emperor's Authority, and the Authors held a considerable Rank in the State; as there are also some who are fond of every thing that has the Air of Novelty, it is not surprising that some of the Literati have embraced a Doctrine, whose Principles are as inconsistent with Reason as dangerous to Morality.

Yong-lo, or Ching-tsu, dy'd in the forty first Year of the Cycle, at the Age of sixty three, and was succeeded by his Son Jin-tsong.

JIN-TSONG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd a few Months.

AT his coming to the Crown he gave a signal Instance of his great Affection for his Subjects; for the Province of Shan-tong being afflicted with a general Famine he resolved to send thither the Ko-lau, Yang-tse-kye. But the Ko-lau representing that it would be proper to consult the Tribunals about the Means of relieving such numbers of People, "Let me not have so many "Consultations, reply'd the Emperor; when my People are distress'd, we must fly to their Succour "with as much Speed and Readiness, as if it was to extinguish a Fire, or stop a sudden Inun- "dation." Some others remonstrating, That a Distinction ought to be made between those who stood more or less in need of Assistance: "With all my Heart, reply'd the Prince, but let them be "very careful not to be too nice in their Scrutiny, nor be afraid of exceeding my Intentions by "being too liberal."

Jin-tsong, 4th Emperor, quick in relieving his distressed Subjects.

He gave much Credit to Astrology; having spent a whole Night observing the Stars, and perceiving some Change in the Heavens, he sent for two of his Ko-lau's, to whom he said: "My "Life is at an End, You have been Witnesses of all I have suffer'd from my Enemies during "the DYN. XIX. MING. Cyc. LXIII. Year of Christ 1384.

" the twenty Years I have reſided in the Eaſtern Palace; you have ſupported me by your Fi-" delity and Union, take therefore this Token of my Friendſhip." Speaking theſe Words, he gave each of them a Seal, on which were ingraven theſe two Characters, Chong-ching, which ſignifies Faithful and upright Miniſter; they received this Mark of Diſtinction, with Tears in their Eyes, and ever after ſealed their Diſpatches with this Seal. From that time the Emperor languiſh'd continually, and a Courier was diſpatch'd in haſte to his Son Swen-tſong, who kept his Court at Nan-king, with an Account of it; but he had not the Comfort to hear the laſt Words of his Father, who dy'd before his Arrival. This Prince dy'd at the Age of forty eight, in the forty ſecond Year of the Cycle. This Year is reckon'd to the Reign of his Son, contrary to the Cuſtom of China, which includes that of the Emperor's Death in the Years of his Reign.

SWEN-TSONG, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Ten Years.

Swen-tſong, 5th Emperor, Defeats the Tartars who invade the Empire.

SWEN-TSONG publiſh'd an Edict in the beginning of his Reign, forbidding to confer the Degree of Licentiate on any of the Literati, who had not attained the Age of twenty five Years. Soon after, his Uncle revolted, and being taken Priſoner in an Engagement, he condemn'd him to perpetual Impriſonment. The Tartars were alſo puniſh'd for invading the Empire; for Swen-tſong at the Head of his Army gave them Battle, and intirely defeated them. The King of Cochin-china, who had been nominated by the Emperor, being ſlain three Years after by a Company of Rebels, they immediately ſent Embaſſadors to beg Pardon, and to implore the Emperor's Clemency. The Emperor was inclinable enough to puniſh this Treaſon; but ſince it would have oblig'd him to ſend an Army into a diſtant Country, which could not be done without great Inconveniency to his Subjects, he alter'd his Reſolution, and even ſent back the Ambaſſadors with Titles of Honour.

The Palace burnt.

About this time the Palace took Fire, which continued ſeveral Days; whereby a prodigious Quantity of Copper, Gold and Pewter being melted together, form'd a Maſs of mixt Metal, of which a great Number of Veſſels were made, that are ſtill much eſteem'd in China, and bear a very great Price. (A)

Swen-tſong dy'd the fifty ſecond Year of the Cycle, at the Age of thirty eight, and was ſucceeded by his eldeſt Son Ing-tſong.

ING-TSONG, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Fourteen Years.

Ing-tſong, 6th Emperor.

BEING only nine Years old, he was put under the Guardianſhip of the Empreſs and the principal Eunuchs. He began his Reign with rebuilding the nine Gates of the Imperial City; and in the third Year he publiſh'd an Edict, forbidding any Honours to be paid to Confucius in the Idol Temples.

Cyc. LXIV. Year of Chriſt 1444. Defeated and taken Priſoner by the Tartars.

In the mean time the Tartars, taking Advantage of the Emperor's Youth, made continual Irruptions into the Provinces of China which lay neareſt their Country, and committed all ſorts of Rapine; againſt whom the young Emperor in the ſixth Year of the Cycle, and fourteenth of his Reign, march'd beyond the Great Wall, at the Head of a numerous Army. But his Troops being weaken'd by want of Proviſions, and unable to ſtand the Shock of the Enemy were intirely defeated; the Emperor himſelf being taken Priſoner, and carry'd into the remoteſt Part of Tartary. This News putting the Court in a Conſternation, they placed his Son, an Infant of two Years old, on the Throne, under the Guardianſhip of King-ti (the eldeſt Brother of the Captive Emperor) who ſoon uſurp'd the Imperial Title and Authority.

Mean while the Empreſs ſending a great Quantity of Gold, Silver, and Silks for the Emperor's Ranſom, the Tartar King received the Preſents, and conducted his Priſoner to the Borders of China, as if he intended to releaſe him; but there reflecting that the Randſom was too ſmall for ſo great a Prince, he in a few Days carry'd him back into Tartary.

KING-TI, Seventh Emperor, reign'd Seven Years, in his Brother's ſtead.

King-ti, 7th Emperor. Ing-tſong is releaſed and renounces the Empire.

THE ſeventh Year of the Cycle, King-ti took Poſſeſſion of his Brother's Throne; nevertheleſs, a new Agreement being made for the Releaſe of the captive Prince, ſome of the Grandees were ſent to receive him. But the Tartar thought they were not of a Rank conſiderable enough to accompany ſo mighty an Emperor, and that all the Chief Men of the Empire ought to have come out to meet him with the greateſt Pomp. He was conducted by a numerous Retinue to the Frontiers of China, near the Mountain Tang-kya-lin; from which Place he wrote to acquaint the Court that he renounc'd the Empire, intending to paſs the reſt of his Days in an eaſy Solitude, and that therefore no Preparation ſhould be made for his Reception; moreover, to avoid all Ceremony he entred the City by a private Gate. The two Brothers met, and and after they had tenderly embraced each other with Tears in their Eyes, King-ti, follow'd by all his Courtiers, conducted his Brother to the South Palace, which he had chosen for his Retirement. DYN. XXI. MING.

King-ti therefore continuing to govern, intended also to declare his Son Heir to the Empire, and had fix'd the Birth-Day of the young Prince for that Ceremony. Mean time, conversing one Day with his Ko-lau, he said, "The Birth-Day of the Prince, my Heir, happens the second "Day of the seventh Moon;" Give me Leave to tell you, (reply'd the Ko-lau) that it is the "first Day of the eleventh Moon." Intimating thereby the Birth Day of Ing-tsong, who was the lawful Emperor. These Words silenced King-ti, and there was no more Talk of declaring his Son Heir, who lived but a Year; and King-ti himself being seized with a mortal Distemper, Ing-tsong was brought out of the Southern Palace, and re-ascended the Throne a Year before the Death of King-ti. Cyc. LXIV. Year of Christ 1444.

ING-TSONG, Eighth Emperor, re-ascended the Throne, and reign'd Eight Years.

AS soon as King-ti was dead, the Emperor was petition'd to stigmatize his Memory, and to erase his Name from all public Acts, as a Punishment for having usurp'd the Crown; but he rejected this Proposal, being content with ordering his Funeral to be perform'd with the Honours due only to a Prince of the Blood, and the Emperor's Brother. Ing-tsong, 8th Empeeor.

Ing-tsong dy'd at the Age of thirty one, the twenty first Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his eldest Son Hyen-tsong.

HYEN-TSONG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

HYEN-TSONG, who was the Son of the second Queen, ow'd the Crown to the Empress's being barren. All that is related of him is that he was greatly attach'd to the Sect of the Bonzas; that the twenty third Year of the Cycle he defeated an Army of Rebels in the Province of Hû-quang; that he cut in Pieces the Army of the Tartars, who from time to time came and plunder'd the Provinces; and that the next Year the King of Korea having proposed a more short and easy Way of paying his Homage, than by an Embassy, he would never consent to it. Hyen-tsong, 9th Emperor, addicted to the Bonzas.

He dy'd at the Age of forty one Years, the forty fourth of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his eldest Son, Hyau-tsong, who was before call'd Hong-chi.

HYAU-TSONG, or HONG-CHI, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Eighteen Years.

IN the fifth Year of his Reign Hyau-tsong declar'd the Prince, whom he had chosen Heir to the Crown, with great Solemnity. He is blam'd for his Attachment to the ridiculous Superstitions of the Bonzas, his Infatuation for Chemistry, and for the Love of Flattery. The fifty second Year of the Cycle, the most considerable among the Bonzas, having been the Ring-Leader of a Rebellion, was taken Prisoner in an Engagement, brought to Court, and beheaded, notwithstanding his Function. Hyau-tsong, or Hong-chi, 10th Emp. Chief of the Bonzas, beheaded.

China was afflicted in his Reign with many Calamities; the Famine was so great in the Western Provinces, that Fathers were known to eat their own Children. The Plague, which is an Evil scarce heard of in China, laid waste the Eastern part of the Southern Provinces; and there happen'd such terrible Earthquakes, that several thousands of People were buried alive. China afflicted with Famine, and the Plague.

The first Year of this Cycle was remarkable for the Grief caused by the Death of the Empress, for the Irruptions of the Tartars, and the great Booty they carry'd away. The next Year was still more remarkable for the Death of the Emperor himself, who was succeeded by his Son Vû-tsong. Cyc. LXV. Year of Christ 1504.

VU-TSONG, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Sixteen Years.

SEVERAL new Calamities render'd the beginning of this Reign unhappy, and gave Occasion to the Ko-lau, named Tau, to present a Memorial to the Emperor: in which he advised him to apply himself seriously to the Affairs of State; to repress the Sallies of his Passion; to moderate his Fondness for Hunting; to banish Flatterers from his Court, as well as the debauch'd young People, who prevail'd too much there, and to supply their Places with Men of Wisdom and Zeal for the Public Welfare. This he urged as the Means of appeasing the Anger of Heaven for the present, and deserving its Protection for the future. Vû-tsong, 11th Emperor, is admonish'd by his Ko-lau.

DYN. XXI. MING. Cyc. LXV. Year of Chriſt 1504.

The ſixth Year of the Cycle, the Tartars renew'd their Ravages; and the next Year a Petty Sovereign of the Blood Royal, having revolted, was taken Priſoner in a Battle, and puniſh'd with Death.

Rebellion of the Lyew-tſe.

Mean time the Famine, which laid waſte the Provinces of Shan-tong and Ho-nan, join'd to the heavy Taxes, had reduc'd the People to ſuch Miſery, that they took up Arms in Deſpair; and forming ſeveral Bodies, advanc'd to the Territories of Pe-king. They were call'd Lyew-tſe, becauſe they ſuddenly overſpread the Provinces, like an impetuous Torrent, deſtroying all before them. Several Forces were ſent againſt them, which only put a ſtop to their Attempts, and ſtifled their Rebellion for a Time, for it appear'd again upon the firſt favourable Opportunity.

Inſtance of Courage and Fidelity, in a Ko-lau.

The fifteenth Year of the Cycle Vû-tſong having form'd a Deſign of marching againſt the Tartars incognito, in Quality of Generaliſſimo; his Miniſters earneſtly repreſented to him, that ſuch a Diſguiſe could not but greatly endanger his Perſon, and occaſion Revolts. Theſe Remonſtrances ſo enrag'd him, that he drew his Sword to ſtrike thoſe who oppoſed his Reſolution; at the ſame Inſtant, one of his Ko-lau's offer'd his Head to receive the Stroke, which reſolute Behaviour appeaſed the Prince's Fury, and made him change his Deſign.

Emperor prepares to retire Southward.

The next Yearas, he was preparing to retire into the Southern Provinces, that is, either Kyang-nan, or Che-kyang, his Ko-lau's preſented freſh Memorials; wherein they obſerved, that as the Tartars would certainly look upon this Journey as a ſhameful Flight, they would grow more haughty and inſolent, and that his Abſence would expoſe the Northern Provinces to their Irruptions. Theſe prudent Counſels only incenſed him the more; and to puniſh their Raſhneſs, he left them expoſed to the Weather five whole Days, on their Knees, before the Gate of his Palace, and impriſoned ſome of them. But a ſudden Inundation at this time, which he took for a bad Omen, having appeaſed him, he ſent home his Miniſters, and laid aſide all Thoughts of going into the Provinces of the South. This Prince finding himſelf very ill the eighteenth Year of the Cycle, ſent for the Grandees of his Court; and in their Preſence appointed the Empreſs Guardian of his ſecond Son, who was thirteen Years old, and whom he had nominated his Succeſſor. He dy'd at the Age of thirty one Years.

Diſſuaded in vain by his Ko-laus, is diverted by an Omen.

SHI-TSONG, or KYA-TSING, Twelfth Emperor, reign'd Forty five Years.

Shi-tſong, or Kya-tſing, 12th Emp.

THE Conduct of this Prince at firſt ſeem'd to promiſe a wiſe Government, but the End was not ſuitable to ſuch hopeful Beginnings. He examin'd himſelf the Petitions which were preſented to him; and in a time of Scarcity was willing to be told of the Failings he was ſubject to, and gave large Sums out of the Imperial Treaſury for Relief of his People. He repair'd the Great Wall, which ſeparates China from Tartary; and renew'd the Law, made by the Founder of this Dynaſty, that only the Title of Syen-tſe, or Maſter of the Empire, ſhould be given to Confuçius. Two young Maids, who perceived that their Father's Indigence inclin'd him to ſell them for Proſtitutes, having, to eſcape that Diſgrace, drown'd themſelves, Shi-tſong erected a fine Monument to their Memory, with this Inſcription: The two illuſtrious Virgins.

Repairs the Great Wall.

Honours Chaſtity.

This Prince is blam'd for his Paſſion for Poetry; for his Credulity in believing the Superſtitions of the Bonzas; and for the diligent Search which he cauſed to be made thro' the Empire for the Liquor of Immortality, promiſed by the Sect of Tau.

Seeks for the Liquor of Immortality.

Preſſed to extirpate the Sect of Fo and Lau-kyun.

The eighteenth Year of his Reign he had thoughts of reſigning the Crown to his Son, but was diſſuaded by the Grandees of the Court; who in ſeveral Memorials preſs'd him, but in vain, to extirpate the Sect of Fo and Lau-kyun.

Tartars invade the Empire and are repulſed.

The forty ſeventh Year of the Cycle the Tartars drew near Pe-king with an Army of ſixty thouſand Men; but it was intirely cut to pieces by the Chineſe, and above two hundred Officers taken Priſoners. The next Year the Tartar King ſent an Ambaſſador to the Court, to aſk the Emperor Pardon, with Leave for his Subjects to come into his Dominions to ſell Horſes. The Emperor readily conſented; but finding afterwards that this Permiſſion was the Ground of continual Quarrels between the Mandarins and the Merchants, and often occaſion'd Revolts, he abſolutely prohibited this Trade. (*)

Japaneſe invade China ſeveral times, but are repulſed.

The fiftieth Year of the Cycle ſome Pirates, commanded by one Whang-che, infeſted the Coaſt of China with a Fleet of a Hundred Barks and Chineſe Veſſels of Burden. And in the fifty ſecond Year the Japaneſe, who before uſed to bring Preſents as Vaſſals of the Empire, began to ſhake off the Yoke, waged open War with the Chineſe, and made a Deſcent, to the Number of four thouſand, upon the Coaſt of the Province of Che-kyang. But they were received ſo very roughly, that eighteen hundred of them were kill'd, and the reſt, flying to their Ships, periſh'd in the Sea. The next Year returning ten thouſand ſtrong, Kau-ling, a Chineſe Captain, at the Head only of nine hundred Men, gave them a notable Repulſe; by which, Time being gained for the Army to come to his Aſſiſtance, the Japaneſe were ſurrounded, and not a Man eſcaped to carry home the News of their Defeat. Theſe Loſſes did not abate the Eagerneſs of the Japaneſe, who ſome Years after made a Deſcent with freſh Forces on the Coaſt of Fo-kyen, but with ſmall Succeſs; for the Chineſe Commander, nam'd Tſyé, fell upon them unexpectedly, and made a great Slaughter.

At the ſame time, Lycou-kun, General of the Chineſe Army, marching beyond the Great Wall; the Tartars, upon the Report of his Arrival in their Territories, fled, and hid themſelves in their Foreſts: ſo that there were but twenty eight Tartars kill'd in this Expedition, and the whole Booty was only one hundred and ſeventy Camels.

The third Year of this Cycle, a Memorial was preſented to the Emperor, in which he was counſell'd to be more watchful over his Conduct, and the Public Affairs. It repreſented that for above twenty Years paſt the Laws had inſenſibly loſt their Authority, and that the Empire was going to Ruin; that he ſeldom converſed with the Prince his Heir; that his moſt faithful and honeſt Vaſſals were either deſpiſed or ill-uſed without Cauſe, and on the ſlighteſt Suſpicions; that he ſpent his Time in Pleaſure and Idleneſs, amidſt a Company of Concubines, deſpiſing the Empreſs, his lawful Spouſe; that he gave the Command of his Army to Men who were unſkill'd in the Art of War, and fonder of Gold and Silver than of Honour and Glory; that the Treaſury was daily exhauſted by his ridiculous Expences, either in building Palaces, or making Gardens, or in defraying the Charges of the extravagant Ceremonies of the Bonzas, and ſeeking after the Liquor of Immortality, which thoſe Impoſtors pretended came down from Heaven: as if, ſince the happy Times of the Emperors Yau and Shun, any Perſon whatever had been exempted from the fatal Neceſſity of dying. The Emperor, on reading this Memorial, unable to reſtrain his Rage, threw it on the Ground; but ſoon took it up again, and diſcover'd Signs of a ſincere Repentance. However, he had not time to reap the Benefit of it, for a few Days after he fell ſick; and had no ſooner drank the pretended Liquor of Immortality, but he expir'd, at the Age of fifty eight, and was ſucceeded by his Son, nam'd Mo-tſong.

A bold Memorial preſented the Emperor, who dies after drinking the Liquor of Immortality.

MO-TSONG, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

MO-TSONG began his Reign with Acts of Clemency, releaſing thoſe whom his Father had impriſon'd upon ſlight Grounds; and conferring Titles of Honour on others, who had been put to Death, by way of Conſolation to their Families. For the reſt, he could never bear the Advice of his Miniſters; and ſome of them having taken this Liberty, were degraded to an inferior Rank.

Mo-tſong, 13th Emperor.

As the Laws of China forbid that any Perſon ſhould poſſeſs an Employment in the Magiſtracy of his native Province, the Emperor qualify'd this Law; and at the requeſt of a Ko-lau permitted the inferior Mandarins, ſuch as the Officers who have Inſpection over Literature, and over thoſe who collect the Taxes, to enjoy theſe Employments in their native Country.

Law in Favour of inferior Mandarins.

The ninth Year of the Cycle this Prince falling ſick, declar'd his Son, who was but ten Years old, Heir to the Crown; putting him under the Tuition of the Empreſs, and of Chang-kyu-ching, a Ko-lau. This Prince was named Van-lye, but from his Acceſſion to the Throne he was call'd Shin-tſong.

SHIN-TSONG, or VAN-LYE, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Forty eight Years.

THO' Shin-tſong was but ten Years old, there appeared in all his Actions a Prudence, much above his Years. He paid ſo much Reſpect to his Tutor and Maſter Chang-kyu-ching, that every time he came to give him a Leſſon, if it was in the Summer, he order'd a Servant to fan him, and in the Winter he cauſed a double Carpet to be ſpread upon the Floor; he alſo viſited him when he was ſick, and gave him Broths and Medicines with his own Hands. This Ko-lau had a Son, who, in the Examination for the Doctor's Degree, had obtained the firſt Rank of the ſecond Order, and the Emperor his Maſter raiſed him to the ſecond Rank of the firſt Order. This excellent Diſpoſition was ſupported by a great Stock of Uprightneſs and of Juſtice; he had withal a lively and penetrating Genius, and a ſtrong Inclination to make himſelf Maſter of the Chineſe Sciences. He ordain'd that for the future the Emperor ſhould defray the Expences of the Licentiates, in their Journey from any of the fifteen Provinces to the Imperial City, when they came to paſs their Examinations for the Degree of Doctor, at which he aſſiſted himſelf. Every Day, at four in the Morning, he examined and anſwer'd the Petitions preſented the Day before; and order'd a Book to be printed every three Months, for the Conveniency of the Publick, containing the Names, Rank, Degree, and Country of every Mandarin in the Empire: which Cuſtom ſtill continues.

Shin-tſong, or Van-lye, 14th Emp.

His great Character.

Application to Buſineſs.

The eleventh Year of the Cycle, the Tartars, who had made an Irruption into Lyau-tong, were entirely routed. The Emperor, at his Mother's requeſt, who had a great Affection for Images, intended to grant a general Amneſty, but was diſſuaded from it by his Ko-lau; who repreſented, that the Hope of eſcaping Puniſhment would open the Door to all manner of Crimes, and that he ought to imitate the Lord of Heaven, who ſooner or later never fails to puniſh wicked Villains.

Tartars invading Lyau-tong are repulſed.

The Emperor was marry'd the ſixteenth Year of the Cycle, and immediately after created his Wife Empreſs.† The nineteenth Year there was ſo great a Dearth in the Province of Shan-ſi, that numberleſs People dy'd of Hunger; ſo that ſixty great Pits were dug in ſeveral Places, each of which held a thouſand Bodies, and on this account were call'd Van jin keng. Tartars defeated.

This ſame Year was remarkable for two great Events; one was the Defeat of the Tartars, of whom ten thouſand were ſlain by the Chineſe General Li-chin; the other was the Loſs which the Emperor had in the Death of Chang-kyu-ching, his Ko-lau and Maſter; whom he honour'd after his Death with the Title of Ven-chong, that is, A Man remarkable for Knowledge and Fidelity, and his Corps was carry'd in a pompous manner to his Sepulchre in the Province of Hû-quang. But theſe Honours laſted not long, for two Years were ſcarce at an end, when his Enemies having laid heavy Accuſations to his Charge, he and his Poſterity were depriv'd of their Titles, and his Eſtate was confiſcated; while his Son thro' Grief or Fear of Puniſhment kill'd himſelf.

His Ko-lau firſt honoured then diſgraced after his Death.

Tartars ſwarm into China.

The twentieth Year the Rivers were frozen, which facilitated the Irruptions of the Tartars into the Empire, who came in Swarms, but were cut to pieces by the Chineſe Troops. ‖ The twenty ſecond Year was fatal to the Empire, on account of a terrible Famine, when the Emperor gave ſtronger Proofs than ever of his Affection for his Subjects; he often implored the Aſſiſtance of Heaven, remitted a great Part of the Taxes, and ſent Mandarins into all the Provinces, to examine the Conduct of the Governors, and relieve the Miſeries of the People. The twenty ninth Year of the Cycle a Comet appear'd towards the Eaſt; upon which Occaſion a Ko-lau, named Fong-ngen, preſented a Petition to the Emperor, ſetting forth that the Figure of this Meteor warned him to rid his Palace of certain Miniſters, who took Bribes, and preſerved their Employments by the baſeſt Flattery. The Emperor being incenſed at his Admonitions, order'd him to be impriſoned, and condemned him to Death; but his Son coming to offer his own Life to ſave his Father's, Shin-tſong relented, and changed the Sentence to that of Baniſhment.

Terrible Famine in Honan.

The thirtieth Year of the Cycle the Inhabitants of the Province of Ho-nan were reduced to ſuch Extremity by Famine, that they fed on Human Fleſh; upon which the Emperor immediately order'd Supplies to be ſent them out of the Imperial Treaſury. The ſame Year the Japaneſe enter'd the Kingdom of Korea, deſtroying all before them with Fire and Sword, wherever they came, and took ſeveral Cities. The King was forced to fly, till he had received the Succours from China, which he had demanded by his Ambaſſadors; but the Succours arriving very ſeaſonably, there enſued an obſtinate and bloody Battle, wherein the Japaneſe were intirely routed. After their Defeat they implor'd the Emperor's Clemency in a ſolemn Embaſſy; by which, having firſt begg'd Pardon for their Fault, they pray'd him to honour their Chief with a Title that might authoriſe his Claim: Accordingly the next Year Shin-tſong granted him the Title of Je-pwen-vang (A), which ſignifies King of JAPAN, forbidding him to ſend any more Ambaſſadors to China.

Japaneſe invade Korea with ill Succeſs.

The thirty third Year the Emperor, contrary to the Advice of his Miniſters, ordered the Gold and Silver Mines in the Provinces of Ho-nan, Shan-ſi, and Shen-ſi to be open'd; but ſix Years after he cauſed them to be cloſed again. (*)

Nyu-che, or Eaſtern Tartars, begin to grow powerful again.

Mean time the Nyu-che, or Eaſtern Tartars, began to grow formidable; they were divided into ſeven Claſſes, or different Dynaſties, which, after they had been long at War together, were united under one Prince, who erected a Kingdom. As to the Tan-yu, or the Weſtern Tartars, they lived peaceably within their own Territories, having given over to diſturb the Chineſe, as they had formerly done by their frequent and unexpected Irruptions. (†)

Ravage Lyau-tong and Pe-che-li.

The fifty third year the Tartars, whoſe Forces being united under one Chief were more capable of undertaking ſomething conſiderable, no longer thought of making tranſient Irruptions into the Empire, but reſolved to ſeize the Cities which were moſt for their Conveniency; being incenſed againſt the Chineſe, becauſe the Mandarins abuſed their Merchants trading into Lyau-tong, and had ſeized their King by Treachery and cut off his Head. Accordingly the Son of this Prince, named Tyen-ming, entring Lyau-tong with a ſtrong Army, took the City of Kay-ywen; but at the ſame time wrote his Complaints to the Emperor, offering to reſtore the City and lay down his Arms, if his Majeſty would give him a proper Satisfaction for ſuch a cruel Injury. The Mandarins concern'd, to whom the Emperor communicated the Letter, ſlighted it, not deigning ſo much as to return an Anſwer; which Contempt ſo inraged the Tartar, that he vowed to ſacrifice 200,000 Chineſe to his Father's Spirit. In Effect, at the Head of 50,000 Men he took the City of Lydu-yang, entred the Province of Pe-che-li in Triumph, and was even preparing to attack the Imperial City. But he was repulſed by the Chineſe Forces, and obliged to retire into Lyau-tong, where he haughtily aſſumed the Title of Emperor of China.

The fifty fifth Year of the Cycle, the Tartar King, under Pretence of a ſolemn Embaſſy, made his Troops file off towards the Empire. The Artifice being diſcovered, the Chineſe Army marched to oppoſe them; Upon which the Tartars fled, and by that Feint drawing the Chineſe on, they ſurrounded and made a great Slaughter of them, the General himſelf being found among the

The Armies engaged, and Victory remain'd a long time doubtful, but declar'd at laſt for the Tartars, who advanc'd towards the Capital. Which cauſed ſuch a Conſternation that the Emperor would have abandon'd the City, and retired to the Southern Provinces, had not his Council repreſented to him that ſuch a Retreat would diſhonour him, and animate the Tartars, while it would ſink the Spirit of his Subjects, and cauſe Troubles through the whole Empire.

DYN. XXI MING. Cyc. LXVI Year of Chriſt 1564.

Shin-tſong dy'd during theſe Tranſactions, aged fifty eight Years, and was ſucceeded by his Son, nam'd Quang-tſong, who was before call'd Tay-chang.

QUANG-TSONG, or TAY-CHANG, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd but one Month.

THIS Prince dy'd a Month after his Acceſſion to the Throne, aged thirty eight Years. His Death is attributed to the Neglect and Ignorance of his Phyſician; but before he dy'd he declared his eldeſt Son Hi-tſong, who was before nam'd Tyen-ki, Heir to his Crown.

Quang-tſong, or Tay-chang, 15th Emp.

HI-TSONG, or TYEN-KI, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

THE natural Timidity of Hi-tſong, and his placing too great Confidence in the Eunuchs of the Palace, who were twelve thouſand in Number, made every body fear at firſt that he would not oppoſe the Tartars vigorouſly enough; nevertheleſs he took Courage, and reſolved to give them an effectual Check. He augmented his Army with a great number of new Troops, which he drew from all the Provinces; he ſent magnificent Preſents to the King of Korea, and demanded a greater Number of Auxiliaries, than had been ſent to the Emperor his Grandfather: At the ſame time there arrived a Chineſe Amazon; which Name we may give to a Woman who marched at the Head of ſeveral thouſand Men, drawn from a little State her Son poſſeſs'd in the Mountains of the Province of Se-chwen. The Emperor alſo fitted out a Fleet, and with all theſe Preparations put himſelf in a Condition to humble the Pride of the Tartars. Upon this Occaſion two Chriſtian Mandarins of his Court, adviſed him to ſend to Ma-kau for Portugueze Engineers, to ſerve the Artillery, to which the Chineſe were but little uſed. But before they arrived, the Tartars were driven out of the Province of Lyau-tong; and the Capital was the more eaſily recover'd from them, as the Inhabitants of the City and the neighbouring Country deteſted the Cruelty of their King Tyen-ming, who was then engaged in another War in Tartary. But as ſoon as he had finiſh'd his Expedition he re-enter'd Lyau-tong, and renew'd the Siege of the Capital; during which the Chineſe loſt thirty thouſand Men, and the Tartars twenty thouſand; but at length they carry'd the City, by means of a Traitor. As ſoon as the King was Maſter of the Palace, he publiſh'd an Edict, by which all the Chineſe were commanded under pain of Death to ſhave their Heads after the Tartar Faſhion; but ſeveral thouſands chooſe rather to loſe their Heads than their Hair. Mau-ven-long, one of the moſt able Chineſe Generals, being ſent with freſh Troops againſt the Tartars, ſo ſtrongly fortify'd the Citadel of Shang-hay, that he made it impregnable; and by this means ſhut up the Entrance into China from Tartary.

Hi-tſong, or Tyen-ki, 16th Emperor.

Makes great Preparations againſt the Tartars, who are driven out of Lyau-tong.

But return and conquer it.

The ſame Year, which was the ſecond of the Reign of Hi-tſong, the City of Ma-kau, which the Emperor had given to the Portugueze, for their important Service in clearing the Chineſe Sea of Pirates, was beſieged by the Dutch, both by Land and Sea; but the Portugueze forced them after a great Loſs of Men to a precipitate Flight.

Ma-kau beſieged by the Dutch.

Cyc. LXVII. Year of Chriſt 1624.

The firſt Year of the Cycle was unfortunate to the Empire, on account of the freſh Troubles raiſed by a great number of ſeditious People, and Robbers, call'd Lyew-tſe, before-mention'd, who over-ran and plunder'd four Provinces, their Number increaſing daily. (*)

The fourth Year the Emperor dy'd at the Age of thirty two, and was ſucceeded by his Brother, Whay-tſong, before call'd Tſong-ching, the fifth Son of Quang-tſong.

Tyen-ming, King of the Tartars, who had ſignalized himſelf by his Fierceneſs, dy'd the ſame Year. He was ſucceeded by his Son Tyen-tſong, who was quite the reverſe of his Father, being a Prince of great Mildneſs, Clemency and Goodneſs.

(*) [The ſecond Year was remarkable for the Stone Monument which was dug out of the Earth, near the Capital of the Province of Shen-ſi; containing an Abridgment of the Chriſtian Law, and the Names of 70 Preachers of the Goſpel, engraven in Syriac Characters. [See an Abſtract of this Monument, Vol. II. p. 2. and 3.]

DYN. XIX. MING. Cy. LXVII. Year of Chriſt 1624.

WHAYTSONG, or TSONG-CHING, Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

Whay-tſong, 17 Emp.

THE Chineſe Power ended with the Reign of Whay-tſong, to give place to that of the Tartars, who ſtill govern this vaſt Empire with an abſolute Authority. Whay-tſong was a great Lover of the Sciences, and wrote the Chineſe Characters very neatly; But tho' he had ſome favourable Sentiments of Chriſtianity, which he protected on ſeveral Occaſions, yet he continued extremely bigotted to the Bonzas. He repreſs'd the Luxury which began to be introduced, eſpecially in Apparel; he was mild, chaſte and temperate, ſlow in his Reſolutions, and diſtruſtful in his Temper, even towards his moſt faithful Miniſters. He forbid the Mandarins to have any Correſpondence with the Eunuchs: The latter having introduced Soldiers into the Palace, the Emperor gave them leave for a Month to viſit their native Country and Friends, and furniſhed them with Money for their Journey, but afterwards forbid their Return. As he had often counſelled his Brother to get rid of the Chief of the Eunuchs named Ghey-tſong, who domineered in the Palace with a very formidable Pride and Inſolence, as ſoon as Whay-tſong, aſcended the Throne, this Villain by Poiſon prevented the Puniſhment due to his Crimes: his Body was torn to Pieces by the Populace, his Riches which were immenſe confiſcated, and the Temples, which his Flatterers had erected to his Honour, burnt and demoliſhed.

Is bigotted to the Bonzas.

The chief Eunuch poiſons himſelf.

The Imperial Troops being employ'd on the Side of Tartary, the Seditious multiplied in the Provinces; the Suppreſſion of whom requiring the greateſt Expedition, the Emperor reſolved to make Peace with the Tartars. To this end he ſent a freſh Army into their Country, under the Command of an Eunuch, named Ywen, who had full Power to negotiate a Treaty: But the Villain ſuffering himſelf to be brib'd, made a Peace upon the moſt ſhameful Terms; which the Emperor refuſing to ratify, the Traitor took the following Meaſures to force him thereto.

The Lyew-tſe increaſe.

Treachery of the Eunuch Ywen diſcover'd,

Mau-ven-long, who commanded the Chineſe Army, being a Perſon of the ſtricteſt Fidelity, Ywen invited him to a Feaſt, where he poiſoned him. After this he adviſed the Tartars to march directly to Pe-king, by a different Road from that which he took with his Army. This they did without Oppoſition, and beſieged the Imperial City: Hereupon, Orders being inſtantly diſpatch'd to Ywen, to come with his Forces to its Relief, he ſet out directly, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting that his Treaſon was diſcovered; but as ſoon as he was got into the Town he was put to the Torture, and after being convicted of Perfidy was ſtrangled. The Tartar was no ſooner inform'd of his Death, but he raiſed the Siege, and return'd to Lyau-tong loaded with rich Spoils †.

and puniſhed.

At the ſame time, by conſent of the Empreſs, ſeveral of the principal Court-Ladies were inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion, and received Baptiſm.

Tſong-tê King of the Manchews.

The twelfth Year of the Cycle died Tyen-tſong, the Tartar King, who was ſucceeded by his Son Tſong-tê, Father to the Founder of the following Dynaſty. This Tſong-tê was a very affable, good natur'd Prince; and as he had been ſecretly educated from his Infancy among the Chineſe, he had acquir'd their Genius and Manners, as well as their Language and Sciences. This gain'd him the Friendſhip and Eſteem of the Chineſe Generals and Mandarins, who fell off inſenſibly from the Emperor; whoſe ill Succeſs having quite altered his Temper, he grew thoughtful, uneaſy, melancholy, and cruel. This, and all the following Years of his Reign, was a continued Series of Robberies, Murders, and inteſtine Wars. The Numbers of the Seditious and Malecontents were ſo vaſt, that they formed eight Armies, under eight different Commanders, who were afterwards reduced to two named Li and Chang. Theſe, that they might not annoy each other, agreed to divide the Provinces between them: Chang took the Weſtern Provinces of Se-chwen and Hû-quang for his Share; and Li marching Northwards ſeiz'd on great Part of the Province of Shen-ſi, and then entring Ho-nan, beleaguer'd the Capital Kay-fong, but was forced to raiſe the Siege with Loſs. Six Months after, he inveſted that City a ſecond Time, where he met ſuch obſtinate Reſiſtance, (the Beſieged chooſing rather to feed on human Fleſh than ſurrender) that the Imperial Army having time to come to its Relief, the Chineſe General thought he ſhould infallibly have deſtroyed all the Rebels, by breaking down the Dikes of the Yellow River; but they eſcaped to the Mountains, while the City, which was much lower than the River, was quite laid under Water; an Inconvenience which the General had not foreſeen, whereby 300,000 of the Inhabitants periſhed. Nevertheleſs Li made himſelf Maſter of the Provinces of Ho-nan and Shen-ſi, where he put to Death all the Mandarins, and exacted great Sums from thoſe who had poſſeſſed Employments; treating none favourably but the Populace, whom he freed from all manner of Taxes. This Conduct even drew to his Party great Numbers out of the Imperial Army, whence he found himſelf ſo powerful that he no longer ſcrupled to aſſume the Title of Emperor. He afterwards advanced to the Imperial City, where there was a Garriſon of ſeventy thouſand Men, but where he was ſure to meet with no Reſiſtance. He knew the Diviſions that were between the Mandarins and the Eunuchs; beſides a great Number of his Soldiers had got into the City in Diſguiſe, and gain'd a conſiderable Party, who were to open the Gates to him. In effect, three Days after his Arrival the Gates were open'd, and he entred in Triumph umph, at the Head of 300,000 Men. The Emperor was at this time ſhut up in the Palace, wholly taken up with the ridiculous Superſtitions of the Bonzas, and quite ignorant of what was doing without: But as he could not be long ſo, when he found he was betray'd, he intended to have gone out of the Palace with ſix hundred of his Guards, who forſook him. Being thus deprived of all Hopes of eſcaping, and preferring Death to the Diſgrace of falling alive into the Hands of Rebels, he retired into his Garden; and after he had written theſe Words on the Border of his Veſt, My Subjects have baſely deſerted me, do with me what you pleaſe, but ſpare my People, he kill'd his Daughter with the Stroke of a Sabre, and then hung himſelf upon a Tree, being thirty-ſix Years of Age. The chief Ko-lau, the Queens, and the moſt faithful Eunuchs, followed his Example and killed themſelves.

DYN. XXI. MING. Cyc LXVIII. Year of Chriſt 1624. The Emperor in Deſpair hangs himſelf.

The Body of the Emperor was ſearch'd for a long time, and being at laſt found, was brought before the Tyrant, ſeated on a Throne, who treated it with Indignity; and afterwards cauſed two of the Emperor's Children, and all his Miniſters to be beheaded, but his eldeſt Son eſcap'd by Flight.

Cruelty of the Tyrant Li.

Every body ſubmitted to the Power of the Uſurper, except Prince U-ſan ghey, who commanded the Chineſe Army in Lyau-tong. Againſt him the Tyrant ſet out with his Army, and having beſieged the Place where he was Governor, to force him to ſurrender, ſhew'd him his Father, loaded with Chains; declaring he ſhould be inſtantly ſlain if he refuſed to ſubmit. This great Man beholding his Father from the Top of the Wall, fell on his Knees, and burſting into Tears, begg'd to be forgiven if he ſacrificed his Filial Tenderneſs to his Duty to his Prince and Country. The generous Father applauded the Reſolution of his Son, and ſubmitted to his Fate.

U-ſan ghey the Chineſe General oppoſes him.

His great Loyalty.

U-ſan-ghey, to revenge at once the Death of his Prince, and of his Father, ſtruck up a Peace with the Eaſtern, or Manchew Tartars, and invited them to his Aſſiſtance againſt the Rebels. Tſong-tê, their King, without Delay advanced with an Army of eighty thouſand Men, which joining that of the Chineſe General, the Uſurper raiſed the Siege, and haſten'd to Pe-king. But not thinking himſelf ſafe there, he plunder'd the Palace, and ſet it on Fire; and then fled with his Troops into the Province of Shen-ſi, enrich'd with the Spoils of the Empire, and loaded with the Curſes of the People.

Calls in the Tartars under Tſong-tê againſt the Rebels.

Li flies.

Tſong-tê dy'd almoſt as ſoon as he had ſet Foot in China; but before his Death he decclar'd his Son Shun-chi Emperor, who was but ſix Years old, and committed the Care of him and the Empire to his Brother Ama van.

Death of Tſong-tê.

The young Prince was ſtrait conducted to Pe-king, and receiv'd with the Acclamations of the People, who look'd upon him as their Deliverer; and nothing was heard on all ſides but joyful Shouts of Long live the Emperor! May he live ten thouſand Years! VAN-SWI! VAN-SWI! a Chineſe Expreſſion, which ſignifies, May he live many Years. This Revolution happen'd the twenty firſt Year of the Cycle, which anſwers to the Year of Chriſt 1644.

His Son Shun-chi proclaim'd Emperor.

The Twenty ſecond DYNASTY, named TSING, now reigning, which to the preſent Time reckons three Emperors. DYN. XXII. TSING.

SHUN-CHI, Firſt Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

IT is not certainly known what became of the Uſurper, who was purſued for ſome time by the Tartars. Some think he was kill'd in an Engagement by U-ſan-ghey, who found too late his Error in having recourſe to the Tartars(A), to get rid of the Tyrant, and would ſometimes ſay, That he had ſent for Lyons to drive away Dogs. Nevertheleſs, he received from Shun-chi the Dignity of King, and Title of Ping-ſi, which ſignifies Pacifier of the Weſt; and the City Si-ngan-fû the Capital of Shen-ſi, which had been ravaged with Fire and Sword, was aſſign'd him for his Reſidence.

Shun-chi, 1ſt Emperor.

U-ſan-ghey made a King.

Shun-chi thus ſeeing himſelf Maſter of the Northern Provinces turn'd his Arms to ſubdue the Southern. Hong-quang, a Grandſon of Shin-tſong, or Van-lye, the thirteenth Emperor of the preceding Dynaſty, had been proclaim'd at Nan-king; but being taken Priſoner, he was brought to Pe-king, where he was ſtrangled. The Tartars afterwards enter'd the Province of Che-kyang, and beſieg'd the Capital. Lo-vang, who was King of this Place, and had refuſed the Title of Emperor, aſcended the Wall, and on his Knees beſeech'd the Tartars to ſpare his Subjects, offering, if they muſt needs have ſome Victim, to ſacrifice his own Life to ſave theirs; and at the ſame time went out of the City, ſubmitting himſelf to the Mercy of the Conqueror.

The Manchew Tartars reduce all by Degrees to their Obedience.

(A) The Nation here call'd Tartars and Eaſtern Tartars, are Manchew's, the Deſcendants of the Kin, (a Name they ſtill retain) who formerly poſſeſs'd the Northern Provinces, commonly call'd the Empire of Katay, (See p. 210, 211, &c ſeqq.) and now are Maſters of all China.

DYN. XXII. MING. Cyc. LXVII. Year of Chriſt 1624.

Long-vû, another Grandſon of Shin-tſong, or Van-lye, was proclaim'd in the Province of Fo-kyen, but all the Cities open'd their Gates at the Approach of the Conqueror; nor could this Prince eſcape Death, being forced to ſtrengthen the Conqueſt with his Blood.

Riſe of Cin-chi-long.

There was at this time a remarkable Perſon, named Chin-chi-long (*), who had a great Share in theſe Tranſactions. He was at firſt a Servant to the Portugueze at Ma-kau, among whom he was inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion, and received at his Baptiſm the Name of Nicholas: afterwards from a petty Trader he grew to be the richeſt Merchant in all China, by the Commerce he carry'd on with the Spaniards and Dutch; and became at length the Commander of a very numerous Fleet. He at firſt acknowledged Long-vû for Emperor, and after his Death the Tartar Prince. Shun-chi offer'd him the Dignity of King, and gave him an Invitation to a ſolemn Feaſt, which he accepted of, in hopes of obtaining the greateſt Dignities at Court, whither he was conducted with Honour: leaving the Command of the Fleet to his Son Ching-ching-kong, whoſe Zeal and Fidelity to his Natural Princes could never be ſhaken, either by the Intreaties of his Father, or the Promiſes of the new Emperor.

The Chineſe elect a new Emperor,

The Army of the Tartars advancing into the Province of Quang-tong met with no reſiſtance; but the Courſe of their Victories was interrupted in that of Quang-ſi, where Thomas Kyu, Vice-Roy of this Province, and Luke Chin, Generaliſſimo of the Chineſe Forces, both Chriſtians, oppoſed the Progreſs of the Tartars, and after an obſtinate Battle intirely routed, and put them to flight. The Conquerors immediately elected a Prince of the Imperial Family, named Yong-lye, who was King of the Capital of the Province of Quey-chew, and, after being proclaimed Emperor, removed his Court to Shau-king. A Chriſtian Eunuch, nam'd Pan Achilles (A), who was very zealous for the Faith, was his chief Counſellor; by whoſe means Father Andrew Koffler inſtructed the Emperor's Mother, his Wife, and eldeſt Son, in the Truths of Chriſtianity, and baptized them. It was expected that this Emperor would one Day be the Conſtantine of China (B); which Name was given him when he received the Sacrament of Spiritual Regeneration. For theſe illuſtrious Converts, with the Conſent of the Emperor, ſent Father Michael Boym to Rome, to pay a Filial Obedience to the Holy See in their Names.

and attack the Tartars both by Sea and Land with great Succeſs.

The Report which was ſpread thro' all the Provinces of a great Victory gain'd over the Tartars; and of the Election of the new Emperor, rouzed the Courage of the Chineſe. A Commander who had got together an Army in the Province of Fo-kyen, and Ching-ching-kong, who ſcour'd the Seas with a numerous Fleet, retook ſeveral Cities; the one within the Country, and the other upon the Sea-Coaſts; at the ſame time the Vice-Roy, of the Province of Kyang-ſi ſhook off the Yoke, and defeated the Tartars in ſeveral Engagements. In the Northern Parts two Chiefs, one nam'd Ho, the other Kyang, had raiſed each a conſiderable Army. The firſt took ſeveral Cities in Shen-ſi, and the ſecond entering the ſame Province with an hundred and forty thouſand Horſe, and a ſtill greater number of Foot, they defeated the Tartars in two Battles, and put them in ſuch Dread, that they durſt not appear any more in the Field.

The Tartars recover all again.

Chang-hyen-chong, Head of the Revolters in the Weſt.

Nevertheleſs, in the Space of three or four Years, the Tartars, partly by Craft and Policy, and partly by Rewards and Promiſes, join'd to the Quarrels between the two Chineſe Leaders, at length conquered them, and recover'd all the Cities they had loſt. In the Weſt another Chief of the Revolters, named Chang-hyen-chong, who ſeem'd to be a Demon in Human Shape, made Havock wherever he came; and after having exerciſed all manner of Cruelties in the Provinces of Ho-nan, Kyang-nan, and Kyang-ſi, he turned his whole Fury againſt the Province of Se-chwen.

His monſtrous Cruelty

He was good natured and affable to none but his Soldiers, with whom he made merry, and eat familiarly; but to others he was exceeding barbarous. He put to Death the King of Ching-tû-fû, the Capital City, who was a Prince of the preceding Dynaſty; and if any Man committed even the moſt trifling Fault, he cauſed all the People that lived in the ſame Street to be kill'd. Five thouſand Eunuchs were ſlain by his Orders, becauſe one of them had refuſed to give him the Title of Emperor. Having call'd ten thouſand Literati to an Examination, as ſoon as they were aſſembled in the Hall appointed for their Compoſitions, he cauſed them all to be murder'd, on Pretence that by their Sophiſtry and Arguments they ſtirr'd up the People to rebel. Being about to depart from Ching-tû-fû, to go into the Province of Shen-ſi, he cauſed all the Inhabitants to be brought out in Chains, and maſſacred in the Fields (†). He alſo order'd his Soldiers to kill their Wives, becauſe they were only Incumbrances in time of War; and he ſet them an Example by cutting the Throats of three hundred of his own, reſerving only twenty to wait on the three Queens. In ſhort he did not leave the Province of Se-chwen, till he had burnt the Capital and ſeveral other Cities.

* See before p. 91.

(A) The Reader is not to imagine that Thomas Kyu, Luke Chin, Pan Achilles, and ſuch like curious Names, are to be met with in the Chineſe Annals; but that they have been inſerted by the Miſſionaries to do Honour to their Spiritual Converſions.

(B) How comes it the Emperor has not his Chriſtian Name join'd to his Chineſe Name as well as others?

(†) It was on this Occaſion, that ſeveral Children were baptized by PP. Broglio and Magalhaens. [P. Couplet relates what is more to the Purpoſe; That this Monſter having ſacrificed to the Devil, (a very Chriſtian Expreſſion) twenty thouſand Bonzas, on account of one of that Order (who had formerly raiſed a great Perſecution againſt the Chriſtian Converts) he boaſted of it before thoſe Fathers, ſaying: "Theſe Men would have "taken away your Lives, but the Lord of Heaven ſent me to "puniſh them." He ſeems, by taking his Commiſſion for his Villainies and Murders from God, to have been originally a Jew: for there are Jews in China, as well as in other Countries. P. Couplet adds, "That he often praiſed the Law of "Chriſt, promiſing, when he came to the Empire, to build a "magnificent Temple to God (1). Then entring Shen-ſi, as he was preparing to engage the Tartars, who were not far off, he was told that five Warriors were ſeen upon the Hills; upon which he went immediately to view them, without putting on either his Helmet or Cuiraſs, but was ſcarce got in ſight of them, before he was ſhot thro' the Heart with an Arrow. His Army diſperſing after his Death, the People received the Tartars as their Deliverers, and joyfully ſubmitted to their Government. DYN. XXII. TSING. Cyc. LXVII. Year of Chriſt 1624.

By this Time eleven Provinces being reduced under the Dominion of the Tartar Monarch, there remained only five in the South in the Poſſeſſion of the Chineſe Emperor; to ſubdue which three different Armies were ſent by the Court. Accordingly Siege was laid, to the Capital of Quang-tong, which laſted a whole Year, with great Loſſes on both ſides; but at length it was taken, and the Soldiers were allow'd to plunder it for ten Days. They march'd afterwards to Shau-king where Yong-lye kept his Court; but this Prince not having Forces ſufficient to reſiſt the Conqueror, retired firſt to the Province of Quang-ſi, and afterwards into that of Yun-nan. The Chineſe Emperor flies to Yun-nan.

The next Year, which was the twenty eighth of the Cycle, dy'd A ma van, Uncle and Guardian to Shun-chi. His Death was the more regretted, as he had gain'd the Eſteem of the Chineſe by his great Qualities and ſweet Diſpoſition; in ſhort, it is properly he who fix'd the Tartar Family now reigning on the Throne. His Brother, who had a ſmall Sovereignty, claim'd a right of ſucceeding in the Guardianſhip of the young Emperor; but all the Grandees oppoſed it, becauſe being now fourteen Years old, and marry'd to a Daughter of the Prince of the Weſtern Tartars, they thought him capable of governing alone: they went ſo far as to hang up the Enſigns of their reſpective Dignities at the Gates of their Palaces, ſaying, That they would receive them from the Hands of Shun-chi only. It was then agreed that this Prince ſhould aſſume the Government, which he did in a manner that ſoon gain'd him the Hearts of the People; inſtead of ſhutting himſelf up in his Palace, as the Chineſe Emperors uſed to do, Shun-chi began his Reign by ſhewing himſelf in public, and giving free Acceſs to his Perſon. He made no Alteration either in the Laws or Government of China, not even ſuffering the Chineſe to learn the Tartarian Language, without a particular Licence. He preſerved the ſix Supreme Tribunals, but would admit them no where, except at Pe-king, ſo that thoſe of Nan-king were ſuppreſſed; he alſo order'd that there ſhould be a Tartar Preſident beſides the Chineſe. A ma van the Guardian dies, and Shun-chi aſſumes the Government. He makes no Change in the Laws.

He continued to beſtow the Government of Cities and Provinces only on the Literati; and, as the Safety or Ruin of the Empire depends on the Choice of proper Perſons to fill ſuch important Poſts, having been inform'd that ſome Literati had bought the Suffrages of their Examiners, he condemn'd thirty ſix of the latter to be beheaded, and order'd the Literati to undergo a freſh Examination; pardoning thoſe whoſe Qualifications intitled them to their Degrees, but baniſh'd the reſt with their Families into Tartary, which is at preſent the common Place of Exile for Offenders; and the Deſign in peopling theſe vaſt Deſerts is, that the Children who are born here might more eaſily contract the Diſpoſition and Manners of the Tartars. puniſhes Corruption.

This Prince had a ſingular Affection for P. Adam Schaal, and always call'd him Ma-ſa, which is a Term of Reſpect that ſignifies, My Father; he made him Preſident of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, that he might reform the Chineſe Aſtronomy; and expell'd the Mohammedans, who had been in Poſſeſſion of it for three Centuries. He alſo permitted him to preſent his Petitions into his own Hands, without their paſſing thro' the Tribunals, according to Cuſtom; which remarkable Favour contributed much to the Advancement of Religion, and ſoon after two fine Churches were built at Pe-king by the Authority and Protection of the Emperor. Sets P Schaal over the Mathematical Tribunal.

The thirty third Year of the Cycle the firſt Embaſſy from the Czar of Ruſſia (A) arriv'd at Pe-king, but it was not favourably received, becauſe the Ambaſſador refuſed to ſubmit to the Chineſe Ceremonies; nor was that which came from the Dutch more ſucceſsful. Embaſſies from Ruſſia and Holland.

The thirty ſixth Year of the Cycle Ching-ching-kong, who till then contented himſelf with making Incurſions, and plundering the Coaſt of China, came and laid Siege to Nan-king with three thouſand Ships. A Chineſe, who was a young Man, being Vice-Roy of the City and Province, a Council of War was held, and the Tartar Chief declar'd, "That conſidering "the multitude of Inhabitants, the City could not be defended, unleſs they were all deſtroy'd." This Propoſal was received with Horror by the Vice-Roy, "You muſt begin this Butchery with "me, (ſaid he) if it be really ſo that the City cannot otherwiſe be preſerved." This Anſwer ſtopt the Tartar's Mouth, and ſaved the Lives of the Citizens. Ching-ching-kong beſieges Nan-king. Noble Spirit of the Vice-Roy.

On the twentieth Day of the Siege there was a great rejoicing in the Beſiegers Camp, on Account of the Birth-Day of their General, and the Feſtival held three whole Days, which were ſpent in feaſting and all manner of Diverſions; when the Beſieged took this Opportunity to ſally out at Midnight with great Silence, and finding their Enemies overcome with Sleep and Wine, attack'd them and deſtroy'd near three thouſand, forcing the reſt to fly in haſte to their Ships, and abandon their Camp, Baggage, and Proviſions to the Conqueror. The Siege raiſed.

Ching-ching-kong ſeeking to repair this Loſs as ſoon as poſſible, ſail'd to engage the Tartar Fleet, and coming up with it, after an obſtinate Fight, ſunk, and took ſeveral of their Ships; and having put the reſt to Flight, cut off the Noſes and Ears of his Priſoners, which amounted to four thouſand, and then ſet them on Shore. As the Tartar Soldiers could not bear the Sight of this diſmal Spectacle, and their hideous Countenances were a conſtant Mark of their Defeat, they were all put to Death by the Emperor's Order; as being culpable either for not conquering, or for not dying glorioufly in Defence of their Country. Cruel Action of Ching-ching-kong.

After this Victory, Ching-ching-kong begun to think of a Place of Retreat, and pitch'd upon the Iſland of Formoſa, which was poſſeſs'd by the Dutch; he beſieg'd it both by Sea and Land, and after four Months Reſiſtance, the Beſieged were oblig'd to ſurrender for want of Proviſions. Here he eſtabliſh'd his new Dominion, but did not enjoy it long, for the following Year he dy'd, and left it to his Son. There now only remain'd Yong-lye, who, tho' driven out of China, and fled for Refuge to the Kingdom of Pegu, which borders on the Province of Yun-nan, ſtill kept the Title of Emperor, and conſequently might be able to give ſome Diſturbance; therefore the Court ſent ſome Troops with threatning Letters to the King of Pegu, which enjoin'd him to deliver up the fugitive Prince. Accordingly he was immediately ſurrender'd with his whole Family to the Tartars, who carry'd him to the Capital, where he was ſtrangled; the two Queens, his Mother and Conſort, were ſent to Pe-king, and had each a ſeparate Palace, where they were honourably treated, and always perſevered in the Faith which they had embraced.

Shun-chi's Paſſion for the Wife of a Tartar Lord.

The ſame Year, being the thirty eighth of the Cycle, proved fatal to the Emperor, occaſioned by his violent Love for the Wife of a young Tartar Lord, whom he had ſeen with the Empreſs. This Lady having informed her Husband of the Prince's Solicitations, he gave her Inſtructions how to behave, which ſhe diſcloſed to her Lover, either thro' Simplicity or Deſign. Shun-chi, who was entirely governed by his Paſſion, ſent for this Lord, and under Pretence of ſome Neglect in the Buſineſs of his Poſt, gave him a Box on the Ear; which Affront the Tartar took ſo much to Heart, that he died of Grief the third Day after.

is inconſolable for her Loſs.

The Emperor immediately marrying the Widow, made her Queen, and had a Son by her, whoſe Birth was celebrated with great Magnificence; but this Child dyed in three Months, and his Mother followed him ſoon after to the Grave. The Emperor was inconſolable for this Loſs, (w) and ſignified by his Will, that thirty Men ſhould kill themſelves [voluntarily] to appeaſe her Manes; which Ceremony the Chineſe look upon with Horror, and was aboliſhed by the Care of his Succeſſor.

Grows fond of the Superſtitions of the Bonzas.

He ordered the Grandees of the Court and Miniſters of the Empire to go in Mourning for a Month, and the People for three Days, as if ſhe had been Empreſs. After the Body was burnt on a Funeral Pile, he gathered up the Aſhes himſelf, and with Tears in his Eyes incloſed them in a Silver Urn. He then devoted himſelf wholly to the Bonzas, and the Worſhip of their Images, which before he had treated with Contempt; in ſhort, in a few Days this unhappy Prince was reduced to the laſt Extremity, and his Life deſpaired of. P. Adam (x) had often made him ſtrong Remonſtrances upon his Conduct, which the Prince look'd upon as the Effect of his Love, but were unavailing; however ſeeing him in this melancholy Condition, he reſolved to make a laſt Effort. The Prince receiv'd him kindly, heard what he had to ſay, forbidding him to kneel, made him drink Tea, and diſmiſſed him.

His Death.

After the Jeſuit was gone, he ordered four Lords of the Court to draw near, and in their Preſence reproached himſelf for his Neglects in the Government of his Dominions; for his Ingratitude to thoſe who had ſerved him faithfully; for deſpiſing the Counſel of his Mother; for his Avarice, and idle Expences in vain Curioſities; for his Affection to the Eunuchs; his inordinate Paſſion for the deceaſed Queen, and the Affliction he had occaſion'd to his People. After this he declared them Guardians of his youngeſt Son Kang-hi, who was but eight Years old. Then calling for the Imperial Mantle, he put it on, and ſhrinking himſelf up in the Bed, ſaid, Now I leave you: and expired the ſame Inſtant, about Midnight, aged twenty four Years.

Bonzas driven from the Palace.

The next Morning all the Bonzas were driven out of the Palace, and the Body of the Emperor was incloſed in a magnificent Coffin: The Day after Kang-hi aſcended the Throne, and received the Homage of all the Grandees of the Empire.

HAVING in the Courſe of this Work, ſpoken at large of the great Qualities and Merit of this Emperor, whoſe Name is reſpected throughout the Eaſt, and juſtly regarded by all Europe; nothing remains in this Place but to relate the principal Events of his Reign in Chronological Order. The Empire was pretty free from Diſturbances under the Adminiſtration of the four Guardians; the firſt Uſe they made of their Authority was in beheading the Chief of the Eunuchs, who had been the Author of many Misfortunes, and driving from the Palace four thouſand others, retaining only a thouſand to be employed in the meaneſt Offices. Afterward an Edict was publiſhed, commanding all thoſe who inhabited the Coaſt of the ſix Provinces, on pain of Death, to leave their Dwellings, and to ſettle themſelves three Leagues from the Sea. In purſuance of which they demoliſhed all their Cities, Forts, and Maritime Towns; and all Commerce by Sea was abſolutely prohibited.

By this Means, indeed, the Power of a formidable Enemy (y) who had made himſelf Maſter of the Sea, was weakned, but then an infinite Number of Families, who lived by Fiſhing, were reduced to Want. A great many Idol Temples and Churches were alſo deſtroyed; and the City of

In the Year forty Yang-quang-ſyen, one of the Literati, preſented a Petition to the Regents, full of the moſt horrid Calumnies againſt [our] Religion and the Miſſionaries; of whom P. Adam being look'd upon as the Chief, he and three of his Companions were loaded with nine Chains, and dragg'd before ſeveral Tribunals, where they underwent very long and mortifying Interrogatories. Their Books of Devotion, their Beads, their Medals, &c. were look'd upon as ſecret Marks, by which the Conſpirators might know one another, and theſe Symbols of Chriſtian Piety were ordered to be burnt: However it was forbidden to perſecute the Chriſtians, or to profane their Churches and their Images. The following Year P. Adam was condemned to be ſtrangled; but this Sentence was afterwards revoked, and they condemned him to be cut while living into ten thouſand Pieces, which is the Puniſhment for the moſt atrocious Crimes. This Sentence was carried to the Princes of the Blood, and to the Regents, to be confirm'd by them; but as often as they attempted to read it, a dreadful Earthquake diſperſed the Aſſembly. The Conſternation was ſo great, that they granted a general Pardon, and all the Priſoners were releaſed except P. Adam; who was not ſet at Liberty till a Month afterwards, when the Royal Palace was conſumed by the Flames. All the Miſſionaries except four retained at Court, were baniſhed to Kan-ton, among whom were three Dominican Fryars, one Franciſcan, and twenty one Jeſuits.

The 15th of Auguſt, in the ſame Year, Adam Schaal died at the Age of ſeventy years, forty ſeven of which he ſpent in the Labours of an Apoſtolical Life. The Emperor afterwards declared him innocent, and honoured him with an Elogium, and ſeveral Titles [which he formerly enjoy'd.]

Emperor aſſumes the Government.

The forty third Year of the Cycle happened the Death of So-ni, the Chief of the four Regents; when the young Emperor, taking the Government into his own Hands, ſoon raiſed Hopes of that glorious Reputation which he acquired in the Sequel of a Reign, the moſt flouriſhing that ever was.

Chief of the Regents put to Death.

Sû-ka-ma, who had the greateſt Credit of the four Regents, and who was the more dangerous as he was a more ſecret Enemy of Chriſtianity, had twenty Articles of Accuſation brought againſt him. His Effects were confiſcated, he was loaded with Irons, and condemned to the moſt torturing Death; but the Emperor mitigated the Rigour of his Sentence, and he was only ſtrangled; ſeven of his Children or Grand-children were beheaded, and his third Son was cut into many Pieces. In the forty fifth Year of the Cycle, an Ambaſſador from the King of Portugal came to Court, who was received with Honour, and contributed not a little to eſtabliſh his Nation in the Poſſeſſion of the City of Ma-kau.

P. Verbieſt reforms the Chineſe Kalendar.

The Year following P. Ferdinand Verbieſt was ordered by the Emperor to examine, and ſet down in Writing, all the Faults of the Chineſe Kalendar made by Yang-quang-ſyen; who had ſucceeded in P. Adam [Schaal's] Place, and had ſet the Grandees, the Bonzas and Mohammedans, againſt the Chriſtian Religion. The Faults being very many and enormous, Yang-quang-ſien was deprived of his Office, degraded of his Honours, and even condemned to Death: However, the Emperor was content to baniſh him into his own Country, but before he could reach it he died of a peſtilential Ulcer. Made Preſident of the Mathematical Court.

Pere Verbieſt was then made Preſident of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, being in great Eſteem with the Emperor, to whom he taught thoſe Sciences for five Months. He took this Opportunity to preſent a Petition to that Monarch, wherein he detected the Calumnies that had been raiſed againſt the Chriſtian Law, and the Injuſtice which had been done, under Colour of his Authority, to the Preachers thereof. Seven Days were ſpent in examining this Petition, in a general Aſſembly of the Mandarins, after which it was declared, That the Chriſtian Law taught nothing that was evil, or tending to Sedition; and the baniſhed Miſſionaries were recalled by an Imperial Decree, forbidding them however to build any more Churches, and the Chineſe to embrace their Religion.

U-ſan-ghey takes up Arms againſt the Tartars.

In the fiftieth Year of the Cycle, U-ſan-ghey, who had introduced the Tartars into the Empire to deſtroy the Rebels, began to think of delivering his Country from their Yoke. The Emperor invited him to Court; but his Anſwer to the Deputies was, "That he would not go thither, unleſs in the Company of eighty thouſand Men", and preſently after made known his Deſign.

He had already made himſelf Maſter of the Provinces of Yun-nan, Se-chwen, Quey-chew, and part of Hû-quang; and, which is a Mark of the Imperial Authority, had ſent the Chineſe Kalendar to the Princes his Neighbours, and among the reſt to the King of Tong-king. But they all refuſed to receive it, and ſent it back to the Emperor, who cauſed the eldeſt Son of U-ſan-ghey, then at Court, to be beheaded. Soon after the Kings of Fo-kyen and Quang-tong revolted, and were joined by the Prince of Formoſa; ſo that the Tartars would have had no Chance for it, if all theſe Princes had acted in concert, in behalf of the common Liberty; but they were divided by Jealouſies. The Prince of Formoſa thinking himſelf not treated with due Honour by the King of Fo-kyen, declared War againſt him, defeated him in ſeveral Battles, and forced him to ſubmit to the Tartars. The King of Quang-tong, for a like Reaſon of Diſcontent, broke the Treaty which he had made with However U-ſan-ghey dy'd in the fifty ſixth Year of the Cycle, being very aged, and his youngeſt Son Hong-wha was proclaim'd Emperor.

Hong-wha proclaim'd Emperor.

The ſecond of September, in the ſame Year, a dreadful Earthquake happen'd at Pe-king, whereby a great many Palaces and Temples, with the Towers and Walls of the City, were overthrown, which bury'd upwards of four hundred Perſons under the Ruins. More than thirty thouſand periſh'd in the neighbouring City of Tong-chew, and as the Shocks were perceived from time to time for three Months, the Emperor, the Princes, and the Nobility quitted their Palaces, and dwelt in Tents; on this Occaſion the Emperor was exceeding liberal in relieving his Subjects.

Dreadful Earthquake.

Palace burnt.

In the laſt Month of the ſame Year the Imperial Palace was all in Flames, and in a few Hours was reduced to Aſhes; it is ſaid that the Loſs amounted to 2,850,000 Taëls.

Four Days after this Fire the Emperor ſet out to take the Diverſion of Hunting at his Pleaſure-Houſe; and perceiving at a Diſtance the magnificent Monument which his Father had erected for the laſt Chineſe Emperor, he went to it, and having proſtrated himſelf to the Ground, and burnt Perfumes: "You know, O great Emperor, (ſaid he, ſhedding Tears) that it was not "we, but your rebellious Subjects, who were the Cauſe of your Death."

The Kings of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen put to Death.

Altho' the King of the Province of Quang-tong had ſubmitted to the Tartars, yet his Conduct was not the leſs ſuſpected at Court; becauſe he had an enterpriſing Spirit, and was very powerful by the Trade, which, notwithſtanding the Emperor's Prohibition, he continued to carry on by Sea with the Spaniards and Dutch. The fifty ſeventh Year of the Cycle he received Orders to march againſt the Rebels of the Province of Quang-ſi with his Army; which being divided into ſeveral Bodies, as Occaſion required, he was artfully prevailed on to return to his Palace: where a few Days after two Lords of the Court arrived, who, on the ninth of October, early in the Morning, preſented him with a ſilken Halter, and the Emperor's Order to ſtrangle himſelf. One hundred and twelve of his Accomplices, among whom were three of his Brothers, were beheaded; and his great Riches divided amongſt his other Brothers, whereof one was the Emperor's Son-in-Law.(*) The Year following the King of Fo-kyen, who in the Time of his Revolt had mal-treated the Mandarins, who were faithful to the Emperor, was put to Death, and his Body caſt to the Dogs; his Brothers too, tho' innocent, were beheaded.

Hong-wha kills himſelf.

Mean time the Tartars having taken the Capital of Yun-nan, Hong-wha, who had been declared Emperor, prevented the Puniſhment deſign'd for him, by killing himſelf. The Bones of his Father U-ſan-ghey were dug up, and carry'd to Pe-king; where ſome of them were expoſed with Marks of Infamy on Stakes, in ſeveral Places, the reſt reduced to Aſhes, and ſcatter'd in the Wind. †

All China reduced by the Mantchews.

The fifty ninth Year, the Emperor, having happily ſubdued the fifteen Provinces of China, and eſtabliſh'd Peace throughout the Empire, determined to viſit his own Country, and the Tombs of his Anceſtors; accordingly he ſet out for Eaſtern Tartary, the third of March, accompany'd by the Prince his Heir, his three Queens, the great Lords and principal Mandarins, with an Army of about ſeventy thouſand Men: He likewiſe ordered Pere Verbieſt to attend him, and to be always near his Perſon during the Journey. In the ſixtieth Year, which was the laſt of the Cycle, he made a ſecond Progreſs into Weſtern Tartary, with a greater Retinue, and a more numerous Army. He continued to make theſe Journeys every Year into that Country (‡), where he ſpent ſeveral Months in the Exerciſe of Hunting. The fifth Year the PP. Gerbillon and Pereyra had Orders from the Emperor, to accompany the Chineſe Plenipotentiaries into Tartary, who went to ſettle with thoſe of Ruſſia the Limits of the two Empires.

Great Character of the Emperor.

China enjoy'd a profound Peace, which was owing to the Wiſdom and ſuperior Abilities of the Emperor. The indefatigable Application of this Prince to all the Affairs of State; his Equity and Penetration in the Choice of proper Perſons to fill the principal Places of Truſt; his Frugality and Averſion to Luxury with reſpect to his own Perſon, joined to his Profuſeneſs and Magnificence with reference to the Public; his Tenderneſs for his People, and Forwardneſs to relieve them; his Steadineſs in maintaining the Laws in their full Vigour; his continual Watchfulneſs over the Conduct of his Vice-Roys and Governors; and the abſolute Dominion which he had over himſelf; all theſe put together kept up a perfect Subordination among the Members of this vaſt Empire, without which there commonly is nothing but Trouble and Confuſion.

He ſtudies the Sciences.

Tho' this Prince was ſo much taken up with Affairs of Government, yet he found Leiſure to apply himſelf to the Sciences, for which he had a particular Taſte and Genius. He was not contented with the Chineſe Literature, in which he was very well verſed; but was deſirous of being

The Peres Gerbillon, Bouvet, and Thomas, for ſeveral Years compoſed their Lectures in the Tartarian Language, and explained them to him twice a Day, either at Pe-king, or his Pleaſure-Houſe. It was his Will alſo that Pere Gerbillon ſhould attend on him in all his Journey into Tartary.

DYN. XXII. TSING. Cy. LXVIII. Year of Chriſt 1684.

As the Chriſtian Religion was only tolerated in China, it was not ſecure againſt Perſecution in the Provinces. In that of Che-kyang there aroſe a very cruel one; whereupon the Jeſuits preſented a Petition to the Emperor, and after great Oppoſition from the Tribunals, they at length, by the Protection of the Prince So-ſan, a Relation of the Emperor, obtained a Decree which ſpoke in Commendation of it, and permitted its free Exerciſe throughout the Empire. This Decree, was obtained in the ninth Year of the Cycle, of Chriſt 1692, and in the thirty-firſt of the Reign of Kang-hi, who confirmed it the twenty ſecond of March, and cauſed it to be publiſhed ſoon after in all the Provinces.

Perſecution in Che-kyang.

Popery tolerated in China.

The twenty-ſixth Year of the Cycle was remarkable for a very uncommon Event; the Emperor's ſecond Son, who was appointed his Heir, and almoſt his Equal in Dignity, was all of a ſudden depoſed, and loaded with Irons, his Children and principal Officers being involved in his Diſgrace. Likewiſe an Aſtrologer, who had predicted, that if this Prince was not Emperor in ſuch a Year he never would, was condemn'd to be cut in a thouſand Pieces. The public Gazettes were filled with Invectives againſt the Prince, whoſe Actions were canvas'd from his very Infancy.

Emperor depoſes his Heir.

Soon after it appeared that he was innocent, and that his eldeſt Brother, to render his Loyalty ſuſpected, had recourſe to Magick, and divers Deluſions, by the Aſſiſtance of certain Lama's, who were skill'd in Sorcery. Theſe Lama's were put to Death, the eldeſt Son condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment, and the Prince his Brother re-eſtabliſhed in the Quality of Heir. Publick Rejoicings were made on this Occaſion, and a Comedy was acted for ſome time, taken from a Paſſage in ancient Hiſtory, that alluded to this Event. But this Reſtoration was not laſting, for afterwards he was deprived of the Title and Privileges of his Rank, for real Conſpiracies againſt his Father.

Who is reſtored to his Dignity, and deprived of it again.

The thirty-ſeventh (A) Year of the Cycle, 1717, a Tſong-ping, or Mandarin of War, whoſe Name was Chin-mau, preſented a Petition to the Emperor, full of Invectives and Calumnies againſt the Chriſtian Religion, and the Preachers thereof; under the ſpecious Pretence of Watchfulneſs over the publick Tranquillity, which, he ſaid, was ready to be diſturbed at Home by the Miſſionaries and their Diſciples, and from Abroad by the Europeans, who trade to China. They were aſtoniſhed when they found that this Petition was ſent to the Tribunals to be examined, and that the Emperor confirmed their Sentence, which revived two Decrees: one of the eighth Year of Kang-hi, which prohibits the building of Churches and embracing the Chriſtian Religion; the other of the forty fifth Year, obliging every European to receive an Imperial Patent, wherein ſhall be mentioned his Country, the Religious Order he is of, the Time he has been in China, and the Promiſe to be made by him never to return to Europe any more.

A Decree to prevent the Growth of Popery.

Father Parennin, with two other Miſſionaries, went and threw themſelves at the Emperor's Feet; but he could get no other Anſwer, than that none were prohibited to preach their Law, but thoſe who had not received the Patents.

The Year following the Emperor's Mother dy'd, on the eleventh of January, and the whole Empire went into deep Mourning for upwards of forty Days. The Mandarins, and even the Sons of the Emperor, went to ſleep in the Palace without putting off their Cloaths: All the Mandarins on Horſeback, with white Garments and a ſmall Train, went for three Days together to perform the uſual Ceremonies before the Tablet of the deceaſed Empreſs. The Tribunals were ſhut up during the Mourning, and red Silk was prohibited, ſo that none wore either it or any other Ornament in their Caps. The ſame Year the Emperor was attacked with a Diſtemper, which gave a general Alarm; eſpecially becauſe his Deſign was to ſet aſide his own Children, and chooſe for his Succeſſor a Prince of the Dynaſty of the Ywen, of whom there ſtill remained more than a thouſand. On this Occaſion one of the chief Mandarins cauſed his Son to preſent a Memorial, wherein he reſpectfully ſhewed, of how great Importance it was to the Repoſe of the Empire to appoint his ſecond Son the inheriting Prince. The Emperor, incenſed at this Remonſtrance, pardon'd him who preſented it, becauſe it was done in Obedience to his Father; but gave Orders that the Father ſhould be put to death. This Example of Severity ſtopt the Mouths of all the Grandees, who durſt not ſpeak of a Succeſſor any more.

Great Mourning for the Emperor's Mother.

He deſigns to chooſe a Succeſſor out of another Family.

The fortieth Year of the Cycle, 1720, the Court received the agreeable News of a compleat Victory gain'd by the Chineſe Troops over Tſe-vang Raptan, King of the Eluths, who poſſeſſed the Country of the Lama's, and ravaged it for four Years together; by which Means Tibet fell into the Hands of the victorious Army. Though this Conqueſt was far enough from the Confines of China, yet it was of great Conſequence, becauſe the Emperor had the finiſhing of this War much at Heart, and all the Grandees congratulated him upon it.

Tibet, conquered.

The ſeventh of June the ſame Year, an Earthquake happened at Pe-king at nine in the Morning, which laſted two Minutes. The Shock began again the next Day at half an Hour after ſeven in the Evening, and continued about ſix Minutes, nothing being heard in the City but confuſed Cries and Shrieks; at length it ceaſed for the preſent, tho' ten Shocks more were felt in the Night, but not ſo violent as the former. At break of Day the Calamity did not appear ſo great great as was apprehended, there being but a thouſand Perſons cruſh'd to death in Pe-king. For as the Streets are generally broad, they could place themſelves out of the Reach of the falling Houſes; for twenty Days after ſome ſlight Shocks were perceived from time to time.

The twenty ſecond of November, a Ruſſian Ambaſſador made his public Entry into Pe-king, with much Pomp and Magnificence; having almoſt a hundred Perſons in his Retinue, moſt of them richly dreſs'd after the European Faſhion. The Gentlemen, who rode on each Side the Ambaſſador, had drawn Swords in their Hands, which was a Sight both new and extraordinary.

Ambaſſador from Ruſſia, Legate from the Pope.

my Lord Mezzabarba, the new Legate from his Holineſs, who came from Lisbon in a Portugueſe Ship, arrived at Pe-king, and was received by the Emperor with Diſtinction. After ſeveral Audiences he took his Leave, in order to return to Europe, to give the Pope an Account of what the Emperor had ſaid to him, promiſing to return to China as ſoon as poſſible. He was conducted to Kan-ton, where he ſtayed but four or five Days, and from thence to Ma-kau, with all the Honour due to his Perſon and Dignity.

Rebellion in Formoſa.

The Year following, the Iſland of Formoſa in a few Months threw off the Emperor's Yoke, but was ſoon obliged to return to its Obedience. The Chineſe Inhabitants, aſſiſted by thoſe of Fokyen and Kew-mi, had killed all the Mandarins, except one who eſcaped, and put all the Imperial Troops to the Sword. When the News was ſpread at Pe-king, the Revolt was imputed to the Dutch, (who had certainly no Hand in it) doubtleſs on Account of that Averſion which the Chineſe have to all Strangers, and with deſign to render the Europeans odious. But there were great Rejoycings ſoon after, when they came to know, that the Imperial Troops, lately ſent thither, having entred the Capital, had cut in Pieces one Party of the Rebels, excepting their Chief, who fled into the Mountains, and that the reſt were intirely diſperſed.

The forty ſecond Year of the Cycle, 1722 (A), in December, the Emperor, diverting himſelf with hunting the Tyger in his Park of Hay-tſe, was ſeized with a Chilneſs, and immediately gave Orders to thoſe that were with him to return to his Pleaſure-Houſe. This ſudden Return ſurpriſed his whole Attendance, who ſoon were acquainted with the Cauſe, his Blood being coagulated, ſo that no Remedy could do him any Service. Perceiving himſelf near his End, he aſſembled all the Grandees, and declared his fourth Son his Succeſſor. He expired the twentieth of December, about eight in the Evening, aged ſixty nine Years, and the ſame Night his Body was conveyed to Pe-king.

death of Kang-hi;

YONG-CHING, Third Emperor, now reigning.

THE Day after the Death of Kang-hi, the new Emperor aſcended the Throne, about five in the Morning, in the forty fifth Year of his Age, aſſuming the Name of Yong-Ching, which ſignifies laſting Peace (B); and was acknowledged by all the Princes, the Grandees, and the Mandarins belonging to the Tribunals. As ſoon as he came to the Crown he ſhew'd ſome Diſſatisfaction againſt ſome of his Brothers, eſpecially the ninth, condemning him to refund large Sums, which he pretended were unlawfully acquir'd in his Father's Reign, and baniſhed him into Tartary, where he died ſoon after his Arrival of the Flux, as the Gazettes gave out. He afterwards recalled to Pe-king, his fourteenth Brother, who commanded the Chineſe Army; his eighth and tenth fell likewiſe under his Diſpleaſure; nor had any of them his entire Confidence, except the thirteenth, to whom he communicated all the Affairs of State. At the ſame Time he impriſoned or baniſhed ſeveral Princes and Lords; many of whom protected the Miſſionaries, and, by ſo doing, favoured Chriſtianity. Whether this Prince hath not the ſame Taſte for the Sciences as his Father, or that he ſeeks Occaſion to diſmiſs the Miſſionaries, they have as yet received but few Marks of his Benevolence, contenting himſelf with letting them live in quiet. One Italian Jeſuit only, an excellent Painter, is employed in the Palace. If he has given a new Title of Honour to Father Kegler, Preſident of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, it was not from any favourable Inclinations to our Religion; but only with a View that he might appear with Decency in his Preſence, eſpecially on certain Days of Ceremony. In his Application to Affairs of State he is indefatigable and aſſiduous, ſteady and reſolute; always ready to receive Memorials, and to anſwer them. He governs intirely by himſelf, inſomuch that there never was a Monarch more abſolute, or more to be dreaded.

Yong-Ching, 3d Emperor;

diſpleaſed with ſome of his Brothers.

Diſaffects the Miſſionaries.

He was prejudic'd againſt the Europeans from the firſt Year of his Reign, by means of ſeveral Petitions preſented to him by the Literati, remonſtrating; That theſe Foreigners had deceived the late Emperor, who had loſt much Reputation, in condeſcending to let them ſettle in the Provinces; that they had built Churches where ever they came, and that their Law made a very ſwift Progreſs; that the Chineſe Chriſtians acknowledged no other Doctors, and that in troubleſome Times they followed none but their Directions, &c.

The Mandarins petition againſt them.

Theſe bad Impreſſions were ſtrengthened by a public Petition addreſſed to the Emperor by the Tſong-tu of Fo-kyen; wherein, after ſpecifying what important Reaſons there were for prohibiting Chriſtianity throughout his Dominions, he beſought him, both for the Repoſe of the Empire, and

(B) P. du Halde tells us elſewhere what more properly comes in here: that Kang-hi, a few Hours before his Death, named this Prince his Succeſſor, who took the Name of Yong-ching, which ſignifies firm Peace, or indiſſoluble Concord. That he is witty and ſpeaks well, but ſometimes too faſt, and without giving Time for any Reply; which ſome think he affects, to prevent hearing any Reaſons that might induce him to change his Reſolutions when they are once fixt.

and the Good of the People, to order the Strangers to be ſent out of the Provinces, either to Court or to Ma-kau, and that their Temples might be put to other Uſes. DYN. XXII. TSING. Cyc. LXVIII. Year of Chriſt 1684.

This Petition was referr'd to the Tribunal of Rites to determine what was to be done: whoſe Sentence was, to keep at Court the Europeans that are already there; to bring thither thoſe from the Provinces that might be uſeful; to ſend the reſt to Ma-kau; to convert their Temples to public uſes; and ſtrictly to prohibit their Religion. This Sentence of the Tribunal was confirm'd by the Emperor, to which he only added; That the Vice-Roys of the Provinces ſhould allow them a Mandarin to conduct them to the Places appointed, and protect them from any Inſults. The Miſſionaries beſtirr'd themſelves heartily by means of their Friends, and eſpecially the Emperor's thirteenth Brother, but to no Purpoſe; all the Favour they could obtain was, to be convey'd to Kan-ton inſtead of Ma-kau, nor were they allow'd to ſtay there, but on Condition they gave no Cauſe of Complaint. The Miſſionaries baniſh'd and their Religion prohibited.

By Virtue of this ſolemn Edict, which was publiſh'd throughout the Empire, the Miſſionaries were driven from their Churches, and tolerated no where but at Pe-king, and Kan-ton. Upwards of three hundred Churches were either demoliſh'd or converted to profane Uſes; and more than three hundred thouſand Chriſtians, depriv'd of their Paſtors, ſaw themſelves deliver'd up to the Rage of Infidels. There was then, and ſtill is, every Method employ'd that a prudent Zeal can inſpire, to re-animate, as often as poſſible, the Faith of thoſe ſeveral Communities, and keep them ſtedfaſt in it. Their Churches demoliſhed.

This Edict was ſcarcely publiſh'd, when the Emperor let fall the whole weight of his Anger and Indignation upon an illuſtrious and numerous Family which had embraced the Faith. The Head of this Family is a Prince of the Blood, deſcended from the eldeſt Brother of the Founder of the preſent Dynaſty; whom, without any regard to his Dignity, his old Age, or his important Services to the State, he baniſh'd into Tartary, together with his Children; being no leſs than eleven Princes, beſides ſixteen Princeſſes, who were marry'd to Mongol Princes, or Mandarins of Pe-king. All theſe Princes and Princeſſes, who had each a numerous Family, were degraded from their Rank, and allow'd no other Abode than a deſart Place in Tartary, where they were cloſely confin'd, and guarded by Soldiers. This venerable old Man was ſeen ſetting out for the Place of his Exile, with his Children and Grand-Children, to the Number of thirty ſeven, without reckoning the Wives and Daughters, who were near as many; and about three hundred Domeſticks of both Sexes, the greater Part of whom were baptized. All theſe Diſgraces not being able to ſhake their Conſtancy, the Princes were brought back to Pe-king in Waggons, loaded all the Way with nine Chains; there undergoing ſeveral Interrogatories, they were promiſed to be reſtored to their former Dignities if they would renounce their Faith, but were threatned with more dreadful Tortures if they refuſed. Theſe Methods proving ineffectual, they were condemn'd to die by the Tribunals; But the Emperor changed this Puniſhment into perpetual Confinement. Accordingly ſome were ſhut up in cloſe Priſons, where three dy'd merely thro' Hardſhips; the reſt were diſperſed in the Provinces, to end their Days in obſcure Dungeons, under a Load of Irons. The Ambaſſadors of Portugal and Ruſſia, who were then at the Court of Pe-king, were Admirers of the Conſtancy and Intrepidity of theſe Illuſtrious Confeſſors of Jeſus Chriſt. Some Converts of the Royal Family ſeverely treated.

How little ſoever this Prince appear'd to favour our Religion, which yet he could not but eſteem, we cannot avoid praiſing his unweary'd Application to Buſineſs; For he employ'd his Thoughts Night and Day to eſtabliſh a wiſe Form of Government, and procure the Happineſs of his Subjects. The way to gain his Favour is to preſent him ſome Scheme tending to benefit the Public, and comfort the People, upon which he immediately reſolves, and puts it in Execution, without ſparing any Expence. He hath made ſeveral fine Regulations to honour Merit, and reward Virtue, to raiſe an Emulation among Huſbandmen, and to relieve his Subjects in Years of Sterility. Theſe excellent Qualities have in a very ſhort time gain'd him the Reſpect and Love of all his Subjects. Great Character of the Emperor.

The fiftieth Year of the Cycle, 1730 (c), the Emperor's thirteenth Brother, who ſhar'd with him the Burthen of Affairs, dy'd the nineteenth of June, of a languiſhing Diſtemper, being worn away meerly by his exceſſive Application. The Emperor was ſo inconſolable for his Loſs, that it even prejudiced his Health. He cauſed extraordinary Honours to be paid to this Prince, which he was pleaſed to account for to the Public by frequent Declarations; wherein he intimated, how deſirous he was that all the World ſhould ſhare in his Grief, and aſſiſt at his Funeral, without Diſtinction of Rank, giving leave both to Great and Small to honour the Deceaſed in their own way, either by Preſents or Encomiums. He added nevertheleſs, that he would conſtrain no body, and that thoſe who did not think this Prince deſerved ſuch Honours were at Liberty not to pay them; yet at the ſame time he appointed Officers to take Notice of all thoſe who perform'd this Duty, and to give him an account of them daily. His Body was expoſed in the great Ting, where none were admitted but the Princes of the Blood. Before the firſt Gate of the Palace there is a great Court, in the middle of which a Hall was erected, made of Matts, with a Throne in it, for the Deceaſed was not only a Regulo of the firſt Order, but had alſo the Title of Yuê-vang or King; and before this Throne ſtood a ſmall Table, upon which were only two Candleſticks and a Perfuming-Pan. The Entrance into the Hall was by a Folding-Door, which was opened as often as the Officers of the Tribunal came in their turns to pay their Reverence, a ſet Number entring at a time. At firſt they ſtood upright behind the Tables, placed on the ſide of the Hall; then kneeling down, they made ſix ſeveral Proſtrations, giving a deep Groan all together, and ſo ſilently withdrew; being ſucceeded by others, who perform'd the ſame Ceremonies Extraordinary Honours paid to one of his deceaſed Brothers.

Ceremonies. Some time after the Body was carry'd to a Palace built on purpose, above half a League from the City, where those Rites were repeated; and here the Mandarins of the City, with the whole Body of Merchants, and the meaner sort of People went to pay him the last Honours.

One hundred Days after this he was carry'd to another Place, prepared in the same manner, where he lay the same space of Time. In short, there were five several Stations, of an hundred Days each, where the same Ceremonies were observ'd; and then he was convey'd to the Place of his Sepulchre, which the Emperor had caused to be prepar'd, being four Leagues in Circumference. The Mandarins of the Provinces either came to perform this Rite themselves, or deputed their Sons in their stead; afterwards they caused Monuments to be raised in their respective Districts, which contain the greatest Elogiums on the illustrious Deceased. The Emperor had his Name placed in the Hall of Emperors; a very extraordinary Distinction, and which is never conferr'd on private Persons, but when they have render'd the most important Services to the State.

Emperor's 3d Brother imprison'd.

Soon after the Emperor caused his third Brother to be arrested, and closely imprison'd; but it is not known what occasion'd his Disgrace, which has even reach'd his Family, who are intirely out of Favour, and degraded from their Rank and Dignities.

Dreadful Earthquake.

On the thirteenth of November, the Year following, being 1731, the City of Pe-king was almost overturn'd by an Earthquake, the most extraordinary that ever afflicted China. The first Shocks, which happen'd a little before eleven in the Morning, were so very sudden and violent, that they were not perceived but by the dreadful Noise made by the falling of the Houses and Buildings. One would have imagin'd that they had been blown up in the Air by a general Mine, and that the Earth had open'd under Foot; for in less than a Minute upwards of a hundred thousand Inhabitants were bury'd in the Ruins, and a still greater number in the Country, where whole Towns were intirely destroy'd.

Its singular Course.

What is singular in this Earthquake is, that it was not equal throughout the Line of its Course; for in some Places it made great Devastations, and seem'd to skip over others, where the Shocks were but slightly felt. Nothing could resist two Shocks so sudden and contrary to each other; and where the resisting Matter was most solid, there the Effects were most violent. This was follow'd by twenty three other smaller Shocks in less than twenty four Hours.

The Emperor was then at his fine Pleasure-House two Leagues from Pe-king, which was instantly reduc'd to such a miserable Condition, that to repair it will require an immense Sum of Money. He was taking the Air in a Bark upon a Canal, which runs thro' his Gardens, when immediately falling prostrate, he lifted his Hands and Eyes towards Heaven. Afterwards he publish'd an Edict, wherein he accused himself, attributing this Evil to the Wrath of Heaven for his Offences, and to his want of Care in governing the Empire.

Emperor's Liberality.

This Prince appear'd very sensible of the Affliction of his People, and commanded several Officers to make a List of the demolish'd Houses, and to enquire what Damage each Family had sustain'd, advancing several considerable Sums towards their Relief. The Missionaries at Peking partook of his Liberality; for he admitted them to Audience, where he receiv'd them kindly, and gave them a thousand Taëls towards repairing their Churches.

The Missionaries expelled to Macau.

The fifty second Year of the Cycle, 1732 (A), the Missionaries, who were ten Years before driven from the Provinces, and banish'd to Kan-ton, were now forced from Kan-ton to Ma-kau, (a little City belonging to the Portugueze, but where notwithstanding the Chinese are Masters) being allow'd but three Days to prepare for their Journey, and to carry away their Goods. The only Reason given for such hard Usage was, that they had disobey'd the Emperor's Order, in preaching the Christian Law.

The twentieth of August they embark'd to the number of thirty, under the Convoy of four Galleys and two Mandarins. When they came to Ma-kau, the Mandarins caused their Domestics, and the Christians, who had follow'd the Missionaries, to land also, and sent them back, loaded with Irons to Kan-ton; where, after being dragg'd in an ignominious Manner before several Tribunals, some were cast into Prison, others receiv'd the Bastonado, and others were condemn'd to carry the Kan-ghe for a Month or two. They all confess'd openly the Name of Christ, and gave public Testimony to the Truth and Holiness of their Religion. (B) and their Followers punish'd.

These are the most remarkable Transactions hitherto under this Emperor, who is now in the twelfth Year of his Reign, and governs his vast Dominions with an absolute Authority; so that here I must finish the Fasti [or Annals] of this great Monarchy.

(A) The Year 1732 was the 49th of the Cycle.

(B) Since this was written Yong-ching dy'd in 1736, and the Missionaries are in hopes of being restored; but methinks without any real Grounds. For since they acknowledge they found numbers of Jews and Mohammedans in China, on their first Arrival, but no Christians, notwithstanding their being so numerous, as they pretend, in former Ages, and that several Emperors themselves embraced the Faith, how can they hope for better Success now? And indeed it seems almost impossible that the Romish Religion should ever gain firm footing in that Country; considering how very averse the Mandarins in general (with the rest of the Followers of Confucius) are to it, as looking on it to be the counterpart of the Religion of the Bonza's or Lama's: who, by their Arts to delude and fleece the People; by their pretended Revelations and Miracles; by their recommending a Monastic Life to both Sexes; and especially by their praying to Saints, and use of Images in Religion, have been odious to them in all Ages, as appears from the foregoing Annals.

OF THE

Antiquity and Extent

OF THE

CHINESE MONARCHY.

CHINA has this Advantage over all other Nations, that for more than four thouſand Years it has been almoſt conſtantly governed by its own Princes; and has continued the ſame, with regard to the Attire, Morals, Laws, Cuſtoms and Manners of the Inhabitants, without deviating in the leaſt from the wiſe Inſtitutions of its ancient Legiſlators. Antiquity of the Chineſe Nation.

As the Inhabitants find within themſelves every thing that is neceſſary for the Conveniences and Pleaſures of Life; ſo judging their native Soil ſufficient to ſupply all their Wants, they have ever affected to carry on no Commerce with the reſt of Mankind. This Ignorance of diſtant Countries led them into the ridiculous Perſwaſion that they were Maſters of the whole World; that they inhabited the greater Part of it; and that all without the Bounds of China were Barbarians: Which Averſion to foreign Trade, joined to the Solidity of the People, has not a little contributed to the conſtant Uniformity found in their Manners. Unchangeable in their Manners and Cuſtoms.

Concerning the Origin of this Empire, there are two Opinions among the learned Chineſe; for they do not give into the Chimerical Notions of the Vulgar, who, on the Credit of ſome fabulous Authors, place it in imaginary Ages before the Creation. Their beſt Hiſtorians diſtinguiſh their Chronology into the Fabulous, the Doubtful, and the Certain; and being unwilling to admit any thing that is not grounded on Truth, reject the Ages preceding Whang-ti, as uncertain, or not to be reduced to a true Chronological Order; and the Times before Fo-hi, as fabulous. Opinions about the Origin of the Empire.

Theſe Authors therefore conſider (A) Fo-hi as the Founder of their Monarchy, who about two hundred Years after the Deluge, according to the Septuagint, reigned firſt towards the Confines of Shen-ſi, and in the Province of Ho-nan, ſituate almoſt in the Heart of the Empire; after which he cleared all that Tract of Land extending from thence to the Eaſtern Ocean. Fo-hi the Founder of the Monarchy.

This is the Opinion of almoſt all the Literati: and indeed it is ſo well ſupported by a conſtant Tradition, and the Authority of their moſt ancient Hiſtories, which could not have been altered by Strangers, that it's generally look'd upon as inconteſtable. According to theſe Yaù was the fifth Emperor, tho' there are other Chineſe Authors, who carry their Monarchy no higher than his Reign: But ſhould any one preſume to place its Commencement lower, he would not only be laughed at, but ſeverely chaſtiſed, if not put to Death; and ſhould the Miſſionaries betray the leaſt Suſpicion of that Kind, it would be ſufficient Ground to baniſh them out of the Empire.

(A) Among the Chimeras of the Learned, may be placed the Notion ſome of late have entertained, that Fo-hi is the ſame with Noah; which Conjecture is grounded on ſome feint, or rather forced Reſemblance between certain Circumſtances in the Hiſtory of each, ſet forth at large in a Modern Performance. See Univerſ. Hiſt. Vol. I. p. 116. in the Note.

China Inhabited for certain 2155 Years before Chriſt.

It is certain however, that China was inhabited above 2155 Years before the Birth of Chriſt, which is demonſtrable from an Eclipſe of the Sun that Year; as may be ſeen in the Aſtronomical Obſervations, extracted from the Chineſe Hiſtory and other Books in that Language, and publiſhed in the Year 1729. (B)

The moſt ancient Empires of the Aſſyrians, Medes, Perſians and Greeks, have been long ſince deſtroyed; whereas that of China, like its great Rivers, which always flow with the ſame Majeſty, has loſt nothing in ſo many Ages, either of its Beauty or Splendor: For as often as this Monarchy has been diſturbed by Civil Wars, the weak or bad Conduct of its Emperors, or by a foreign Yoke, the Evil has been but of ſhort Continuance; the Wiſdom of the fundamental Laws, joined to the happy Diſpoſitions of the People, always affording the Means to recover itſelf.

Govern'd by Monarchs above 4000 Years.

Thus for four thouſand Years and more, this Imperial Throne has been poſſeſſed, without any Interruption, by twenty two Families; in which they reckon two hundred and thirty-four Emperors, who reigned ſucceſſively till the Invaſion of the Tartar King, who about eighty-five Years ſince ſeized the Crown, and has given China three Emperors of his Family, namely, Shunchi, who reigned ſeventeen Years; Kang-hi, who reigned ſixty Years; and Yong-ching, who aſcended the Throne in 1722. [but is ſince dead.]

Eaſy Conqueſt by the Manchew's, to what owing.

This Conqueſt was made with the moſt ſurprizing Facility, thro' the Miſ-underſtandings of the Chineſe, and the various Factions which divided both the Court and the Empire. The greater Part of the Imperial Army was employ'd at that time near the Great Wall, in oppoſing one of the Kings of the Eaſtern Tartars, called Manchew's: who to revenge the Injuſtice done his Subjects in trading with the Chineſe Merchants, and the little Regard ſhewn by the Court to his Complaints, had entred into Lyau-tong, at the Head of a formidable Army, and begun a War, which laſted many Years; in the Courſe of which ſeveral Battles were fought, Cities beſieged, and Irruptions made into the Empire, with various Succeſs on both Sides.

Great Succeſs of Li-kong, a Rebel.

Mean time the Emperor Tſong-ching, lived very eaſy in his Capital, tho' he had but little Reaſon to be ſo. For the unjuſt Puniſhment, to which he had condemned one of his moſt conſiderable Miniſters, his exceſſive Severity, and extreme Covetouſneſs, which would not permit him to leſſen the Taxes, even in a time of the greateſt Scarcity, having provoked the People to revolt, in the Capital as well as in the Provinces; a Chineſe of the Province of Se-chwen, called Li-kong-tſe, who was a bold enterprizing Man, put himſelf at the Head of a great Number of Rebels; and his Army increaſing daily with the Malecontents, in a ſhort time he made himſelf Maſter of ſeveral conſiderable Towns, and even whole Provinces. He gained the Affections of the People, by eaſing them of the heavy Taxes, and by turning out the Magiſtrates, placing in their ſtead others, in whom he could confide, charging them to uſe his Subjects with Mildneſs; but on the other hand, he gave up every City which made the leaſt Reſiſtance, to be plunder'd by his Soldiers. In ſhort, after he had inriched himſelf with the Spoils of the delightful Province of Ho-nan, he went into that of Shen-ſi, where he was declared Emperor, under the Name of Tyen-ſhun, which ſignifies, He that obeys Heaven; in order to perſuade the People, that he was the Inſtrument appointed by Heaven to deliver them from the Tyranny and Oppreſſion of the Miniſters.

He is declared Emperor.

When the Rebel found himſelf near Pe-king, where the Diviſions among the Grandees favour'd the Attempts of his Spies to get Intelligence, he reſolved without farther Delay to take that Capital. Moſt of its Troops were then on the Frontiers of Tartary, and ſeveral Chiefs of thoſe which remain'd, being gain'd over, were ready to join with the Tyrant: who beſides had ſent a great Number of his beſt Soldiers into the City, diſguiſed like Merchants, with Money to hire Shops and carry on a Trade; that being thus diſperſed into every Part of it they might awe the Inhabitants and favour his Deſign, whenever he ſhould appear before the Walls.

Takes Pe-king.

The Succeſs anſwered his Expectations: for his Army was no ſooner in ſight of the City, before Sun-riſe, than one of the Gates was opened to him; and the few faithful Soldiers that reſiſted him being quickly overpower'd, he march'd thro' the City, like a Conqueror, directly to the Palace, the firſt Wall of which was forced before the Emperor heard any thing of the Matter. This unhappy Prince, thus forſaken and betray'd by his Courtiers, finding it not in his Power to eſcape the Fury of his Enemy; and fearing to fall into the Hands of a Rebel more than Death itſelf, retired in Deſpair into one of his Gardens with his Daughter, and having firſt killed her at one Stroke with a Sabre, he hanged himſelf on a Tree.

All ſubmit but the General U-ſan-ghey.

After this Cataſtrophe all ſubmitted to the Tyrant, who, to eſtabliſh himſelf on the Throne, put to Death ſeveral of the great Mandarins, and exacted large Sums of Money from others. None refuſed to acknowledge him for Emperor, except U-ſan-ghey, who commanded the Forces that were on the Frontiers of Tartary; to reduce whom he ſet out with his Army, taking along with him the Father of that General, called U, who then lived at Pe-king, and was venerable for his Age as well as Dignities.

U-ſan-ghey having retired into one of the Cities of Lyau-tong, the new Emperor beſieged it, and ordering U to be brought out in Chains, threaten'd to cut his Throat before the General's Face, if he did not ſubmit to him forthwith.

(B) We are obliged for the Extracts here meant to P. Gaubil, who tranſmitted them with many other very curious Matters relating to the Chineſe Aſtronomy and Hiſtory, which were publiſhed by P. Etienne Souciet, under the Title of Obſervations Mathematiques, Geographiques, Chronologiques & Phyſiques, &c.

U-ſan-ghey

U-ſan-ghey, after being agitated for a while between the Love of his Country and Filial Tenderneſs, at length ſacrificed his Father to his Virtue; the old Man himſelf, extolling the Loyalty of his Son, met his Fate with an heroic Courage. This cruel Action provoked the General ſo much the more to ſeek Revenge; but as it was difficult for him long to reſiſt the Efforts of the Uſurper, he thought that by piquing the Generoſity of the Tartar King, he might not only obtain Peace from him, but likewiſe his Aſſiſtance, with all his Forces. Tſong-tê, (which was the Name of this King) incited by a ſecret Ambition, more than the Riches offer'd by the Chineſe General, liked the Propoſition ſo well, that the very ſame Day he appear'd at the Head of eighty thouſand Men. The Uſurper being inform'd of the Union of the Chineſe and Tartarian Armies, durſt not encounter two ſuch great Commanders, but retir'd in haſte to Pe-king; and having loaded ſeveral Wagons with the choiceſt Goods of the Palace, he ſet it on Fire, and fled into the Province of Shen-ſi, where he took ſuch Care to hide himſelf, that the Place of his Retreat could never be found; Altho' he made great Speed, yet part of the Plunder fell into the Hands of the Tartarian Cavalry, who purſued him; However, Tſong-tê, who might eaſily have routed his Army, choſe rather to repair to Pe-king, where he was joyfully received, both by the Grandees and the People. All looked on him as their Deliverer, and were manag'd ſo dexterouſly that they intreated him to take into his Hands the Government of the Empire, which was the thing he aim'd at. But he did not long enjoy his Conqueſt, for he dy'd quickly after, having only time to name Shun-chi, his Son, for his Succeſſor, who was but ſix Years Old; leaving the Care of his Education and the Government to one of his Brothers call'd A ma vang.

U-ſan-ghey calls in the Manchews.

Li-kong flies, and is heard of no more.

King of the Manchews proclaimed Emperor and dies.

This Prince by his Courage and Policy reduced moſt of the Provinces, which were averſe to the Tartar Yoke; and tho' he might have kept the Empire to himſelf, yet he ſurrender'd the Government to his Nephew, as ſoon as he had attain'd the proper Age. The young Emperor ſhew'd himſelf at once ſo able in the Art of Reigning, that he ſoon gain'd the Hearts of his Subjects; and as nothing eſcap'd his Vigilance and Penetration, he found Means to unite the Chineſe and Tartars ſo firmly, that they ſeem'd to be but one Nation. During his Reign he maintain'd the Grandeur of the Empire with ſuch a Superiority of Genius, as made him admired by his Subjects when living, and regretted when dead. Being at the Point of Death, which happen'd in the twenty fourth Year of his Age, he call'd his four chief Miniſters; and having expreſs'd his Concern for not having been able to reward thoſe who had faithfully ſerv'd his Father, he declared, that Kang-hi, who was then but eight Years old, was of all his Children fitteſt to ſucceed him, and recommended his Education to their Care.

Moſt of China reduced under his Son Shun-chi.

The Day after the Death of the Emperor Shun-chi, his Body being put in a Coffin, Kang-hi was proclaim'd Emperor; when aſcending the Throne, all the Princes, Lords, Prime Officers of the Army and the Crown, with the Mandarins of the ſeveral Tribunals, proſtrated themſelves at his Feet three times, ſtriking the Ground with their Fore-Heads every Time they kneel'd, and made the nine Cuſtomary Reverences.

Kong-hi ſucceeds.

Nothing could equal the Magnificence of the Great Court, where this Ceremony was perform'd. All the Mandarins were ranged on both ſides, dreſs'd in Silk, flower'd with Gold, in the form of Roſes; there were fifty who carry'd great Umbrellas of Gold-Brocade and Silk, with their Staves gilt, and were divided in two Rows, twenty five on each ſide of the Throne. On the ſide of them were fifty other Officers with large Fans of Silk embroider'd with Gold; and near theſe were twenty eight large Standards, imbroider'd with golden Stars, great Dragons, and the Figure of the Moon in its Change, its Full and Wane, with all its various Phaſes and Appearances: In order to repreſent its twenty eight Manſions in the Heavens, and its different Conjunctions and Oppoſitions with the Sun, as they appear in the Interſections of the Circles, which the Aſtronomers call Nodes, or the Dragon's Head and Tail. A hundred Standards follow'd theſe; and the reſt of the Mandarins carry'd Maces, Axes, Hammers, and other Inſtruments of War or Ceremony, with Heads of ſtrange Monſters and other Animals.

Aſcends the Throne with great Magnificence

The Sovereign Power was never ſo abſolute as under this Monarch; who during his whole Reign, which was one of the longeſt to be met with, was not only held in Veneration throughout Aſia, but his great Merit and Renown paſſing the Ocean, procured him the Admiration and Eſteem of all Europe. It was he, who, uniting the two Tartaries with China into one Empire, brought under his Power a vaſt Extent of Country, which is no where interrupted by the Territories belonging to any foreign Prince. As none but the Weſtern Tartars were able to give him Diſturbance, he partly by Policy, and partly by Force, oblig'd them to remove three hundred Miles beyond the Great Wall, where he gave them Lands and Paſtures, ſettling his own Subjects in their Room. In ſhort, he divided this immenſe Country into ſeveral Provinces, which were tributary and ſubject to him; and kept them ſtill more in Awe by means of the Lama's, who have an abſolute Sway over the Minds of the Tartars, being ador'd by them like ſo many Divinities.

Unites the two Tartaries with China.

His Policy.

He made uſe of another Piece of Policy: for whereas his Predeceſſors ſhut themſelves up in their Palaces, and were never ſeen by the People; he on the contrary went out of his three times a Year, either to travel or perform Hunting-Matches, which reſembled ſo many military Expeditions.

Appears among his Subjects.

As ſoon as he had eſtabliſh'd a ſolid Peace in his Dominions, he re-call'd the greater part of the Forces that were diſpers'd thro' the Provinces; and to prevent their being ſoften'd by Eaſe and Luxury, march'd them from time to time into Tartary, arm'd with Bows, Arrows, and Cimeters: there to wage War with Stags, Boars, Bears, Tygers, and other wild Beaſts, making his Soldiers perform long and fatiguing Journeys. This great Army was divided into Companies, and march'd in Order of Battle, at the Sound of Drums and Trumpets. It had its Van, Rear, main Body, right right and left Wings, commanded by ſo many Princes and great Lords; and was follow'd by Waggons, Horſes, Camels, and Mules, loaded with Proviſions, and Ammunition. It was oblig'd to encamp every Night, there being neither Cities, Towns, nor Villages in the Weſtern Tartary, whoſe Inhabitants dwell in Tents, diſperſed over the Country; where they feed their Oxen, Horſes, and Camels, removing from Place to Place for the Conveniency of Paſture. They know nothing of ſowing Corn or cultivating Land, but live on Milk, Cheeſe, and what they can take in Hunting.

While the Emperor thus kept his Troops in Action, and the Tartars in Obedience, he did not leſſen his Application to State-Affairs, but held his Councils regularly with his Miniſters under a Tent, as if it had been a Palace, and gave them his Orders. He was inform'd of every thing, and govern'd the Empire wholly, by himſelf, as the Soul that gave Motion to all the Members of ſo great a Body, not intruſting the Adminiſtration either to his Ko-lau's, or to the great Lords of the Court; as for the Eunuchs of the Palace, who had ſo much Power in the preceding Reigns, they had not the leaſt Authority. Another piece of his Policy was, to appoint one half of the Officers of the Tribunals Chineſe, and the other half Tartars, who being ſo many Spies on each other, might prevent any Attempts to the Prejudice of either Nation; beſides, it obliged the Tartars to apply themſelves early to Literature, in order to qualify themſelves for Employments, according to the ancient Cuſtom of the Empire.

Mixes the Tartars with the Chineſe in the Tribunals

Ever ſince the Peace, which this Prince concluded with the Ruſſians at Nip chû, for ſettling the Limits, the true Extent of this great Empire has been known; being in length from the moſt Southern Point of [the Iſland of] Hay-nan, to the Extremity of that Part of Tartary, ſubject to the Emperor, upwards of nine hundred common Leagues of France. Beſides there are many Kingdoms, as Korea, Tong-king, Kochin-china, Siam, &c. which are tributary to the Emperor, who ſometimes appoints, and muſt always confirm their Kings. But theſe Countries differ from China, as well in their reſpective Forms of Government, as in the Fertility of their Soil; the Number, Beauty, and Largeneſs of their Cities; the Religion, Genius, Manners, and Politeneſs of their Inhabitants: ſo that the Chineſe have very little Eſteem for them, calling them Barbarians, and induſtriouſly avoiding all Alliance with them.

Extent of the Empire.

The fifteen Provinces, into which China is divided, are not equally peopled; for from Peking to Nan-chang, which is the Capital of Kyang-ſi, the People are not ſo numerous as in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, Quang-tong, Fo-kyen, and ſome others, where the great Roads as well as Cities are ſo crouded, that it is troubleſome to travel; whence the Miſſionaries, who have ſeen only thoſe fine and populous Provinces, have exaggerated the Number of Inhabitants, which however far exceeds that of all Europe put together. Altho' Pe-king ſtands on more Ground than Paris, I don't believe it contains above three Millions of Souls; which Computation is the more certain, as every Head of a Family is oblig'd to give the Magiſtrates an account of the Number of Perſons that compoſe it, with the Age and Sex of each.

Multitude of its Inhabitants.

Several things contribute to make this Country ſo prodigiouſly populous, as the Chineſe being allow'd many Wives; their Sobriety and ſtrong Conſtitution; their Contempt for other Nations, which prevents their ſettling or even travelling abroad; the Goodneſs of the Climate which has been hitherto free from the Plague; and eſpecially the almoſt perpetual Peace which they enjoy.

Great Number of Cities, Towns, Fortreſſes, &c.

There are in each Province, beſides the Capital (which is very large and fit to be the Seat of the Empire) a great Number of Cities of the firſt, ſecond, and third Order; moſt of which are built on the Banks of navigable Rivers, with large Suburbs on each ſide. Add to theſe a multitude of Forts, Caſtles, Villages, and Towns; ſome of which latter, eſpecially thoſe call'd Ching, vye with Cities in Magnitude, Number of Inhabitants, and Trade: tho' they are only call'd Towns, becauſe they have neither Walls, nor Magiſtrates of their own, being govern'd by thoſe of the neighbouring Cities; thus King-te-ching, where the fineſt Porcelain is made, depends on a City in the Diſtrict of Zhau-chew, and Fo-ſhan on Kan-ton, which is but four Leagues Diſtant, &c.

Moſt of the Cities of China, (but not all as ſome have affirmed) are alike, being Oblong Squares, whoſe Walls are built on a Line at right Angles, and facing the four Cardinal Points as near as may be. In like manner, whatever way the Streets are diſpoſed, the Houſes ought always to front the South, in order to avoid the ſharpneſs of the Northwind, which does not agree with the Chineſe; and for this Reaſon the Door is commonly made ſlanting in one of the ſides of the Court.

Form of the Cities.

The Walls of the Cities, which are generally very broad and high, are either of Brick or ſquare Stone, ſurrounded by a wide Ditch, and fenc'd behind with a Rampart of Earth, as well as fortify'd with ſquare Towers at certain Diſtances.

Their Walls.

Every Gate is double, and opens with two Leaves; and between the Gates is a Place of Arms for exerciſing the Soldiers. When one enters the firſt Gate, the ſecond is not to be ſeen, becauſe not oppoſite. Above the Gates are fine Towers, which ſerve for Arſenals and Guard-Houſes for Soldiers; and without the Gates are frequently large Suburbs, almoſt as populous as the City.

Their Gates.

In the moſt frequented parts of each City, there is one or more Towers, which make a moſt beautiful Appearance, on account of their Architecture and Hight; ſome conſiſting of nine, but none of leſs than ſeven Stories. The principal Streets are generally ſtreight, but often narrow, except thoſe of the Imperial City, which are very wide, as well as long; and perhaps the moſt convenient in the World, eſpecially for Horſes and Waggons. All the Houſes, excepting the Towers and ſome particular Buildings overtoping the reſt, are very low; and ſo hid by the Walls of the City

Their Towers.

City, that were it not for a great number of ſquare Towers that appear, one would take it at a diſtance for a vaſt Park. There are waſte Places in ſome of the Cities, becauſe not re-built ſince they were ruin'd by the Tartars, who lately conquer'd China. But what is very remarkable, near the great Cities, eſpecially in the Southern Provinces, there are ſeen a kind of floating Cities; conſiſting of a prodigious multitude of Barks on both ſides of the River, which are inhabited by numbers of Families, who have no other Dwellings: ſo that the Water is almoſt as populous as the Land.

Chineſe divided into two Claſſes.

There are properly but two Orders in the Empire, one of the Nobility, and the other of the People. The firſt comprehends the Princes of the Blood; the Dukes, Earls, Mandarins of Learning and Arms; thoſe that have been Mandarins formerly, but are not ſo at preſent; and the Literati, who by their Studies having obtain'd the firſt Degrees of Literature, are aſpiring to the Magiſtracy and Dignities of the Empire. The ſecond comprehends the Huſbandmen, Merchants, and Tradeſmen. I ſhall treat of each of theſe in their Order, according to the Plan I have laid down.

Of the Authority of the Emperor, and Seals of the Empire; his common Expences, his Palace, his Equipage, and the Order of his March when he goes abroad.

Authority and Majeſty of the Emperor.

THERE is no Monarchy whoſe Government is more deſpotic than that of China. The Emperor is veſted with abſolute Authority, and to appearance is a kind of Divinity; The Reſpect which is paid him amounting to a ſort of Adoration. His Words are like ſo many Oracles, and the leaſt of his Commands as implicitly obey'd as if they came down from Heaven. None are ſuffer'd to ſpeak to him but on their Knees, not even his eldeſt Brother; or to appear before him with Ceremony in any other Poſture, unleſs he gives Orders to the contrary. Only the Lords who accompany him, are permitted to ſtand before him, and to bend one Knee when they ſpeak to him.

Deſcend to his Officers.

The ſame Honours are paid the Emperor's Officers, when repreſenting his Perſon, and giving his Orders, either as Envoys, or Mandarins of the Preſence. Little ſhort of this is the Reſpect due to Governors, when they adminiſter Juſtice, who with regard to the People may be ſaid to be Emperors, and Subjects with regard to their Superiors: which admirable Subordination contributes more than any thing elſe to the Repoſe of the Empire, where it is never conſider'd who the Perſon is, but whom he repreſents.

Profound Veneration paid him.

The Mandarins, the Grandees of the Court, and the Princes of the Blood, proſtrate themſelves not only in the Preſence of the Emperor, but often even before his Chair, his Throne, and every thing that is for his Uſe; kneeling down ſometimes at the ſight of his Habit or his Girdle. Not that they are either blind to his Faults, or approve of them; on the contrary, they blame them in their Hearts, and condemn him, when they ſee him abandon'd to Avarice, Anger, or any ſuch ſhameful Paſſion. Yet they think they ought to give theſe public Marks of Veneration for their Emperor, in order to maintain Subordination ſo eſſential to every good Government; and to inſpire the People, by their Examples, with the Submiſſion, and Obedience due to his Authority. In conſequence of this Maxim they give him the moſt lofty Titles, calling him Tyen-tſe, the Son of Heaven; Whang-ti, Auguſt and ſovereign Emperor; Shing-whang, Holy Emperor; Shau-ting, Palace Royal; Van-ſwi, Ten thouſand Years. Theſe Names, and many more of the ſame Nature, ſhew not only their great Reſpect for his Perſon, but the Vows they make for his Preſervation.

Lofty Titles given him.

No Subject, be his Rank or Quality ever ſo great, dares ride on Horſeback, or paſs in a Chair before the Gate of his Palace; but as ſoon as he approaches it, he muſt alight, and not mount again till he comes to the Place appointed for that Purpoſe. On certain ſtated Days of the Week, or Month, all the Grandees are oblig'd to appear in Habits of Ceremony, in one of the Courts of the Palace, to pay their Homage; where, if he does not appear perſonally, they muſt proſtrate themſelves before his Throne. If he falls dangerouſly ſick, it cauſes a general Alarm, the Mandarins of all Orders aſſemble in a vaſt Court of the Palace; and without regarding the Inclemencies of the Air, or the Rigor of the Seaſon, paſs both Nights and Days on their Knees, to teſtify their Grief, and intreat Heaven to reſtore his Health. For if the Emperor ſuffers, all the Empire ſuffers in his Perſon, his Loſs being the only Misfortune which his Subjects ought to dread.

His Throne adored in his Abſence.

Marks of Reſpect.

In the middle of the Courts of the Palace, there is a Path paved with large Stones, for the Emperor to walk on when he goes out; and thoſe that paſs along it muſt run faſt, which is a mark of Reſpect obſerv'd in paſſing before a Perſon of Quality: but they have a particular way of Running, which is eſteem'd as graceful among the Chineſe, as the making a handſome Bow in Europe. The firſt Miſſionaries were oblig'd to learn this Ceremony before they ſaluted the late Emperor upon their Arrival at Pe-king: After they had paſs'd thro' eight great Courts, they arriv'd at his Apartment, which was a Kong; for ſo they call the great Halls or Parlours, ſtanding by themſelves, built upon Slabs of white Marble, where the Emperor lives.

This Kong conſiſted of a Hall, in which there was a Throne, and a Chamber, where he was ſitting on a Kan or Eſtrade, raiſed three Foot, which took up the whole length of the Room. The Kan was cover'd with a plain white Felt, affecting perhaps this Simplicity as being in Mourning for his Grand-Mother. His Habit was only of Black Sattin, lin'd with Sable-Fur, ſuch as moſt of the conſiderable Officers wear; he ſat croſs legg'd after the Tartarian Faſhion, and they made the Imperial Salute, as perform'd by thoſe who have Audience of this Prince.

The Imperial Salute. As ſoon as the Perſon is enter'd the Door of the Hall, he muſt run in a graceful manner till he comes to the Bottom of the Chamber fronting the Emperor; where he muſt ſtand a little while with both Arms ſtretch'd downwards, and after bending his Knees, bow to the Ground three times, then riſe up again: and repeat this laſt Ceremony the ſecond and third time, till he is commanded to advance, and kneel at the Emperor's Feet.

The Imperial Colour and Arms. Yellow is the Emperor's Colour, and is forbidden every body elſe. His Veſt is cover'd with Dragons, which is his Coat of Arms; none elſe daring to wear them with five Claws, on pain of Puniſhment. He dates his Letters, Decrees, and all his publick Acts with the Years of his Reign, and the Day of the Moon; as for Inſtance, The ſixteenth Year of my Reign, and the ſixth of the fourth Moon.

The Sentiments of the profoundeſt Veneration for their Emperors, which the Chineſe are brought up in from their Cradles, are corroborated by that abſolute and boundleſs Power veſted in him by the Laws. He only has the Diſpoſal of the Lives and Fortunes of his Subjects; nor can the Vice-Roy, the Tribunals, nor any ſovereign Court of Judicature, puniſh a Criminal with Death, till the Sentence be firſt confirm'd by the Emperor.

The Condition of the Princes of the Blood. The Princes of the Blood-Royal, however dignify'd by their Birth, have neither Power nor Credit in the State. They have the Title of Regulo, and are allow'd a Palace, and a Court with Officers and a Revenue conformable to their Rank; but they have not the leaſt Authority over the People, who yet pay them the greateſt Reſpect. Formerly, when they were diſperſed in the Provinces, the Officers of the Crown remitted them their Revenue every three Months; that by ſpending it as faſt as it came to hand, they might be diſabled from laying up any part of it for ſeditious or rebellious Purpoſes, and they were even forbidden on pain of Death to remove from the Place appointed for their Reſidence: but ſince the Tartars have been Maſter of China, the Emperor judg'd it more proper that all the Princes ſhould live at Court under his Eye. They have alſo Houſes, Lands, and Rents, beſides what the Emperor allows them for their Expences; and improve their Money by the Induſtry of their Domeſtics, ſo that ſome of them are very rich.

Emperor diſpoſes of all Employments. The Emperor alone diſpoſes of all Offices in the State. He names the Vice-Roys and Governors, raiſing and degrading them according to their Capacities and Merits, (for, generally ſpeaking, no Place in the Empire is venal;) even the Princes of the Blood have no Right to their Title, without his expreſs Permiſſion, which they could not obtain if they were irregular in their Conduct,

Can chooſe a Succeſſor, or negligent in their Duty. He chuſes for his Heir ſuch of his Sons as he judges fitteſt to ſucceed him; and if he thinks there is none of his Family capable of governing well, he pitches on one of his Subjects whom he deems moſt worthy. In the earlieſt times there have been Inſtances of Princes, who are ſtill revered by the Chineſe for having preferr'd the Welfare of the State to the and depoſe him at Pleaſure. Glory and Splendor of their own Family; but for ſeveral Ages paſt, the Emperors have nominated their Succeſſors out of the Princes of their own Blood. However, it is neceſſary that the Perſon elected ſhould have real Merit, and proper Qualifications, for otherwiſe the Emperor would loſe his Reputation, and infallibly occaſion great Diſorders. On the other hand if he prefers to the eldeſt one who has more Merit, then his Name becomes immortal; but if, after being declar'd his Succeſſor with the uſual Solemnities, he is wanting in his Duty, or commits any great Miſdemeanor, it is in the Emperor's Power to diſinherit him, and name another in his Place.

The late Emperor Kang-hi, making uſe of this Right, depoſed in a very ſingular Manner his only Son by his lawful Wife, on ſuſpecting his Fidelity. It was ſurpriſing to ſee him, who but a little before was almoſt equal to the Emperor, loaded with Irons. His Children and principal Officers were involv'd in the ſame Fate; and the public Gazettes were immediately fill'd with Manifeſto's, wherein the Emperor inform'd his Subjects of his Reaſons. No Sentence of any Tribunal whatever is of force till ratify'd by the Emperor: but thoſe that proceed immediately from himſelf are perpetual and irrevocable; the Vice-Roys and Tribunals of the Provinces being oblig'd to have them regiſtred, and publiſh'd immediately in all Places of their Juriſdiction. His Power extends over the Dead as well as Living, beſtowing Titles of Honour on the Deceaſed; for, to recompenſe the Perſonal Merit, either of the Deceaſed or their Deſcendants, he confers Titles of Honour on them, which extend to their whole Families.

Fundamental Principle of the Chineſe Government But abſolute as his Power is, it is reſtrain'd by the ſame Law that enforces it. It is a Principle as old as the Monarchy itſelf, That the State is a large Family; and that a Prince ought to have the ſame Regard for his Subjects, that a Father has for his Children, whom he ought to govern with an equal Goodneſs and Affection. This Notion is engrafted in the Minds of the Chineſe, who judge of the Merit and Talents of the Prince, ſolely by the Paternal Affection which he ſhews to his Subjects; and the Care he

A Check to the Emperor's Power. takes to make them ſenſible of it by procuring their Happineſs. So that he ought to be, according to their way of expreſſing it, The Father and Mother of his People; nor ought he to make himſelf fear'd by them, but in proportion as he gains their Love by his Goodneſs and Virtue. It is in this manner they draw the Character of their great Emperors, and their Books are full of this Maxim.

It is the general Notion of the Chineſe, that an Emperor is oblig'd to attend to the minuteſt matters which concern his People; that he is not elevated to ſo high a Station to divert himſelf; but that he ſhould place his Diverſions in diſcharging the Duties of the Emperor, and prove by his Application, Vigilance, and Tenderneſs for his Subjects, that he is The Father and Mother of his People. When his Conduct is not agreeable to this Idea, he falls into the utmoſt Contempt; "Why "(ſay the Chineſe) has Tyen placed him on the Throne? Is it not that he may be as a Father "and a Mother to us?" He is conſidered as a Father of the People.

A Chineſe Emperor is continually ſtudying how to preſerve this Reputation. Whenever any Province is afflicted with Calamities, he ſhuts himſelf up in his Palace, faſts, denies himſelf of all Pleaſures, and publiſhes Decrees to exempt it from the uſual Taxes, and procure it ſufficient Relief. In thoſe Decrees he affects alſo to ſet forth how deeply he is touch'd with the Miſeries of his People, ſaying, "That he carries them in his Heart; that he bewails their Misfortune "Night and Day; and that all his Thoughts are employ'd to render them happy:" making uſe of many ſuch Expreſſions, to convince his Subjects how tenderly he loves them. The Emperor Yong-ching went ſo far as to order, that whenever any part of the Empire was threatened with a Calamity, he ſhould be inform'd of it inſtantly by a Courier; that as he believed himſelf accountable for every Misfortune that befel the State, he might by his Conduct appeaſe the Anger of Tyen. The Laws are a farther Check on the Sovereign Authority, in that they allow the Mandarins, whenever the Emperor commits any Faults in his Adminiſtration tending to overthrow good Order in the Government, to repreſent them to him in the moſt humble and reſpectful manner by way of Petition: and ſhould he either diſregard ſuch Remonſtrances, or puniſh the Mandarin, who had the Courage and Zeal to make them, he would intirely loſe the Hearts of the People; while the Mandarin would have the higheſt Applauſes, and his Name become immortal. There have been ſeveral of theſe Martyrs for the Public in China, who, when the Prince deviated from a wiſe Adminiſtration, ſpoke their Minds, without fearing either Puniſhment or Death itſelf. Endeavours to preſerve that Character. The Quân or Mandarins allow'd to tell him his Faults

Beſides, the Tranquillity of the Empire depends intirely upon the Prince's Care to ſee the Laws put in Execution. For ſuch is the Genius of the Chineſe, that were not the Emperor and his Council ſteady and attentive to the Conduct of the Vice-Roys and the Mandarins, who are at a diſtance from the Court, they would become ſo many petty Tyrants in the Provinces, and baniſh Juſtice from the Tribunals. This would raiſe ſuch a Spirit in that numerous People, that finding themſelves ill uſed and oppreſs'd in any Province, they would begin to aſſemble, and ſoon break out into a General Revolt. The Diſcontent would quickly ſpread from one Province to another, and thus the whole Empire would preſently be in a Flame. For it is the Character of this Nation, that if the firſt Sparks of Rebellion be not immediately quench'd, they in a ſhort time produce the moſt dangerous Revolutions, whereof China furniſhes ſeveral Examples: which have taught the Emperors, that nothing but an indefatigable Application, and their treading in the Steps of their wiſe Anceſtors, can ſecure their Authority.

One of the moſt conſiderable Marks of the Imperial Authority is, The Seals; which are employ'd to authoriſe the Public Acts, and all the Deciſions of the Tribunals. The Emperor's Seal is about eight Inches ſquare, and of a very fine Jaſper, a Stone highly eſteem'd in China; nor is any other Perſon whatever allow'd to uſe it in a Seal. It is call'd, Yu-ſhe, and taken out of the In-yu-ſhan, that is, The Mountain of the Agate Seal, concerning which the Chineſe relate ſeveral Fables. Among the reſt they tell us, that formerly the Fong-whang having appear'd on this Mountain, reſted on a rough Stone; which being broken by a ſkilful Lapidary he found therein this famous Stone, whereof the Seal of the Empire is made. The Fong-whang is the Phœnix of the Chineſe, who account it a Bird of Proſperity, and the Fore-runner of the Golden Age; but indeed it exiſts only in their Books and Chimerical Paintings. The Imperial Seals.

The Honorary Seals given to the Princes are of Gold; thoſe of the Vice-Roys and great Mandarins, or Magiſtrates of the firſt Rank, are of Silver; and thoſe of the inferior Mandarins, or Magiſtrates, are only of Braſs or Lead, being larger or ſmaller according to the Dignity of the Magiſtrate. When it is worn out, they are to acquaint the Tribunal, which ſends them another, obliging them to return the old one. Since the Tartars have ſettled in China, the Characters inſcribed on theſe Seals are both Chineſe and Tartarian, as the Tribunals are compoſed of both Nations. When the Emperor ſends Viſitors into the Provinces, to examine the Conduct of the Governors, Magiſtrates, and private Perſons, he gives each of them the Seal of their Office. Seals of Princes and the Quân.

One of theſe Viſitors, having acted for ſome time in the Province appointed him, of a ſudden diſappear'd; and when any came to apply to him for Juſtice, his Domeſtics put them off, telling them their Maſter was ſo dangerouſly ill, that he could neither hear their Complaints, nor receive their Petitions. A Mandarin, who was one of his Friends, ſuſpecting it to be only a feign'd Sickneſs, and fearing ſuch a piece of Negligence would hurt him at Court, went to ſee him. After being put off ſeveral times by the Servants, he at length got Admittance into his Chamber, and aſk'd his Reaſon for concealing himſelf in that manner. Viſitors or Cenſors of the Empire.

The Viſitor ſtill pretended to be indiſpoſed: but the Mandarin preſs'd him ſo home, proteſting to ſerve him, if Occaſion were, at the hazard of his Life; that the Magiſtrate diſcloſing his Diſtreſs, "They have ſtolen, ſaid he, the Seals given me by the Emperor, ſo that not being able "to ſeal the Diſpatches, I have thought fit to diſappear". The Mandarin, who ſaw that the leaſt Story of one.

leaſt ill Conſequence that could attend his Friend was the loſs of his Employment, his own Fortune, and that of his Family, asked him if he had any Enemies. "Alas! anſwered the Viſitor "ſighing, Hence ariſes my Confuſion and Deſpair. The chief Magiſtrate of the City has de- "clared himſelf againſt me on all Occaſions which concern the Functions of my Office. He "will certainly inform the Court, as ſoon as he comes to know I have loſt the Seals, and then "I am undone. Take my Advice, (reply'd the Mandarin, who was an ingenious Man,) remove "every thing you have of Value into the moſt ſecret Part of your Palace, and at Night ſet the "Apartment on Fire, and alarm the Neighbourhood. As ſoon as that Officer comes to give Or- "ders according to his Duty, do you publickly deliver into his Hands the little Coffer where "the Seals were kept; telling him, that as you have nothing ſo precious as that Depoſitum of the "Emperor's, you give it into his Cuſtody, till you have Occaſion for it; and if he, my Lord, added "the Mandarin, maliciouſly cauſed the Seals to be ſtolen, he will replace them in the Coffer; "or you may accuſe him with having loſt them". The Matter ſucceeded as the Mandarin had foreſeen, and the Seals were reſtored to the Viſitor.

The Seals which the Magiſtrates receive from the Emperor, are on the Days of Ceremonies, (or when they go to viſit thoſe to whom they would ſhow Reſpect) carry'd before their Chair in a golden Box, by two Men, upon a kind of a Litter; and being come to the Place appointed, they are laid on a Side-Table, cover'd with a Carpet.

Emperor's Revenue.

The Emperor of China is render'd no leſs formidable on account of his great Revenue, than the Extent of his Empire. But it is not eaſy to ſay exactly what the firſt amounts to, becauſe the Annual Tribute is paid partly in Money and partly in Commodities: and is collected from all kinds of Lands, even the Mountains; from Salts, Silks, Calico, Linen, and divers other Goods; from the Ports, Sea-Coaſts, Cuſtom-Houſes and Barks; from the Foreſts, Royal Gardens, Confiſcations, &c.

Number of People,

The Tribute paid by every Perſon in this populous Empire between the Years of twenty and ſixty, amounts to immenſe Sums; they ſay that formerly upward of 58,000,000 Inhabitants paid this Tax. In the Poll made at the Beginning of the Reign of Kang-hi, there were found 11,052,872 Families; and 59,788,364 Men able to bear Arms: and yet neither the Princes nor Officers of the Court; nor the Mandarins, nor the Soldiers who have ſerved and been diſcharged; nor the Literati, the Licentiates, the Doctors, the Bonzas, nor young Perſons under twenty years of Age; nor the great Multitudes living either on the Sea, or on Rivers, in Barks, are comprehended in this Number.

and Bonzas paying Tribute.

The Number of Bonzas is a great deal above 1,000,000; of which there are 2,000 unmarried at Pe-king, beſides 350,000 more in their Temples eſtabliſhed in different Places by the Emperor's Patents. The [Literary] Batchelors alone are about 90,000. 'Tis true, the Civil Wars, and Settlement of the Tartars, deſtroy'd an innumerable Quantity of People; but they have increaſed extremely ſince, by means of the profound Peace.

Imperial Barks, and amount of the Tribute.

There are, beſides, 10,000 Barks maintained by the Emperor, for bringing to Court the Tribute in Commodities; he receiving annually 40,155,490 Sacks of Rice, Wheat and Millet, each Sack weighing a hundred and twenty Pounds; 1,315,937 Loaves of Salt, weighing fifty Pound each; 210,470 Sacks of Beans, and 22,598,597 Bundles of Straw for his Horſes; in wrought Silks and Stuffs 191,530 Pound weight, each Pound of twenty Ounces; 409,896 Pound of unwrought Silk; 396,480 Pieces of Calico; 560,280 Pieces of Linen Cloth: beſides vaſt Quantities of Velvet, Sattin, Damask, and other Silks; Varniſh, Oxen, Sheep, Hogs, Geeſe, Ducks, Wild-Fowl, Fiſh, Pot-Herbs, Fruits, Spices; and many ſorts of Wine, which are annually brought into the Imperial Palace. The whole Revenues of the Emperor amounting in French Money to near 200,000,000 of Tael; each being an Ounce of Silver, whoſe intrinſick Value is a hundred French Sols.

The Emperor may lay new Taxes on the People, if the Occaſions of the State ſhould require it; but the ſettled Tributes being ſufficient to defray all his Expences, he very ſeldom uſes this Power. There is ſcarcely a Year but he excepts ſome Province or other from paying the Tribute, if it happens to be afflicted with Famine, or any other Calamity.

Order in levying,

As the Lands are ſurvey'd, and the Number of Families, as well as what is due to the Emperor, is known; 'tis eaſy to compute what each City ought to pay yearly. The Tax Gatherers of the reſpective Cities never ſeize the Goods of thoſe who are ſlow in paying, or ſeek to avoid it by continual Delays, for that would ruin Families; and therefore from the middle of the Spring, when they begin to plow, to the time of Harveſt, the Mandarins are not ſuffered to moleſt the Peaſants. The Courſe they take to oblige them to pay, is by the Baſtonado and Impriſonment; or elſe by billetting on them the old Men maintain'd in each Town on the Emperor's Charity, who remain in their Houſes till they have conſumed as much as their Arrears amount to.

and tranſmitting the Tribute.

Theſe Officers are accountable for what they receive to the Pû-ching-tſé, or Treaſurer General of the Province, who is next to the Viceroy; to whom at certain times they are obliged to remit the Money they collect. They ſend it on Mules, each carrying two thouſand Taëls, in two wooden Veſſels, like long Barrels, which are ſecured with Iron Cramps. The Pû-ching-tſé accounts to the Hû-pû, which is the ſecond ſupreme Tribunal of Pe-king, having the Super-intendency of the Finances; and the Hû-pû accounts to the Emperor. Nothing is better order'd than the manner of impoſing and collecting the Tributes, allowing for ſome little Frauds in the Under-Officers.

How it is employ'd.

China is remarkable in that its Emperor is as a great Head of a Family, who provides for all the Neceſſities of his Officers. This Cuſtom, which has continued invariable among the Chineſe, is is not unlike what was practiſed formerly in the Court of the Kings of France; where Bread, Wine, Meats, Candles, and the like were diſtributed. From which Diſtributions, called Livraiſons, or Deliveries, came the Term Livery, applied to the Domeſtics, who were of the ſame Livery or Diſtribution, that is, belonged to the ſame Maſter.

In Penſions; Payment of the Forces. Defraying the Expences of the Quân.

Great Part of the Imperial Commodities are conſumed in the Provinces, in Penſions, in maintaining the Poor, eſpecially old People and Invalids, who are very numerous; in the Salary of the Mandarins, Payment of the Forces, publick Buildings, &c. and the Overplus is carried to Pe-king, to defray the Expences of the Palace and the Metropolis: where the Emperor maintains 160,000 regular Troops, excluſive of their Pay, which they receive in Money, beſides near five thouſand Mandarins; among whom there is diſtributed, every Day, a certain Quantity of Fleſh, Fiſh, Salt Herbs, &c. and once a Month they have Rice, Beans, Wood, Coals and Straw; all which are delivered them very plentifully. The ſame Cuſtom is obſerved with regard to thoſe who are called to Court, or ſent from thence into the Provinces; they are ſerved, and all their Charges defrayed on the Road, being furniſhed with Barks, Horſes, Carriages and Inns, which are kept at the Emperor's Expence.

When a Mandarin is diſpatch'd by the Court, they give him a Kang-ho, that is, an Order of the Court, made out by the Ping-Pû, or Tribunal of the Militia, and ſealed with its Seals; by which the Officers of the Poſts and Cities are obliged to furniſh without Delay, whatever the Kang-ho directs, and as a Proof of having executed it, apply their Seals to it. They provide Men to draw the Barks, and carry the Baggage, which is weighed by the Poſt-maſter General's Order, who allows as many Men as are neceſſary to carry it, at the Rate of fifty Chineſe Pounds Weight each Man.

Emperor's Forces. Expences of Ambaſſadors defray'd.

The Number of Soldiers maintain'd by the Emperor along the Great Wall, and in the Cities and fortify'd Places, amounted formerly to 770,000; which Number has been increaſed, but not diminiſhed, for they never reduce their Forces. They are to ſerve for Guards to the Grand Mandarins, Governors, Officers and Magiſtrates: they even attend them on their Journeys, and in the Night keep Watch about their Barks or Inns, being relieved at every Place the Mandarin halts at. The Emperor likewiſe keeps near 565,000 Horſes to remount the Cavalry, and for the Uſe of Poſts and Couriers to carry his Orders, and thoſe of the Tribunals into the Provinces. He alſo defrays the Expences of all Foreign Ambaſſadors, from the Day they enter till the Day they leave his Dominions; furniſhing them with Horſes, Barks, and all neceſſary Carriages, as well as Proviſions for the Journey: and when they arrive at Court lodges them in a Palace, where as a Token of Friendſhip he ſends them every other Day Diſhes from his own Table; and when he has a Mind to ſhew particular Marks of his Affection, he adds ſome extraordinary Meſſes. I do not mention this Monarch's Expences with regard either to public Buildings, in the Cities and Country, or the Repairs of his Palace.

Supplemental Deſcription of the Palace. First Court. Second Court. Third Court.

Although the Deſcription of the Palace in the Beginning of this Volume [p. 67.] may ſeem ſufficient to give the Reader an Idea of it; yet I ſhall here add ſeveral other Particulars, in the Words of one of the Miſſionaries, who had the Honour to be admitted into the Emperor's Preſence, and to ſalute him in his own Apartment. "It conſiſts, ſays he, of an aſtoniſhing Collection of Buildings, and a long Row of Courts, Galleries and Gardens, which altogether make a magnificent Appearance. As the Southern Gate is never opened but for the Emperor, we came in by that facing the Eaſt, which leads into a vaſt Court to the South of the Palace. This Court is ſquare, being two hundred Geometrical Paces from North to South; it is paved with large Bricks, and the Walks laid with broad flat Stones. At each Angle is a large oblong Building, with a double Roof, whoſe Ground-Story has three Entrances, like the Gates of Cities. Before we enter'd the next Court, we came to a Canal, moſt dry, running parallel to the Walls of it from Eaſt to Weſt. We paſſed over this Canal by one of the ſix white Marble Bridges, built towards the Middle, facing ſo many Arches or open Gates, each ſupporting a large Building that has a Platform or Tower, with a double Roof, whoſe Thickneſs is upwards of twenty Geometrical Paces. At each End of the Bridge leading to the middle Gate are two great round Pillars of white Marble, upon a large Pedeſtal, ſurrounded with a Baluſtrade of the ſame. The Baſe is adorn'd with two great Lions, each between ſeven or eight Foot high, and ſeeming as if they had been cut out of one Block. Paſſing Northward thro' the Gate into this ſecond Court (which is in Length about a hundred Geometrical Paces, and fifty in Breadth) we found at the Entrance two other white marble Columns, adorn'd with Dragons in Relievo, with two ſmall Wings below a Chapiter, which is flat and very broad.

From thence we entred a third Court, twice the Length of the ſecond, and a little wider, with five Gates, and Buildings over them like the former. Theſe Gates are very thick, and covered with Plates of Iron, faſten'd on with rows of Braſs Nails, whoſe Heads are bigger than a Man's Fiſt. all the Buildings of the Palace are placed on Baſes as high as a Man, of a reddiſh grey Marble, very ill poliſhed, and adorn'd with Mouldings.

All theſe Courts are ſurrounded with very low Buildings, covered with yellow Tiles. At the Bottom of this third Court, there is a long Building flank'd with two Pavilions, whoſe Wings are terminated by two other Pavilions, which are like the firſt: being double roofed and ſurrounded with Galleries as well as the Wings, and the lower Part of the Building; which ſtands on a Platform of Bricks with its Parapet, and little Embraſures, being near thirty five Foot high. The Baſe of the Platform, for ſix Foot above the Ground, is of Marble. The Paſſage is by three Gates like the former, with this Difference, that the Nails and Iron Work are gilded. There were ſeveral Guards at this Gate, among whom was a Ko-lau, or [one of the Prime] Miniſters of State, who having been accuſed of taking a Bribe, was condemn'd as one of a Company of Soldiers to guard this Poſt: But notwithſtanding his Diſgrace, all who paſſed ſaluted him by bending the Knee; ſtill regarding him on account of the high Station he once poſſeſſed.

Fourth Court. After we had paſſed thro' theſe three Courts, which have nothing remarkable excepting their Extent, we entered into a fourth. Near fourſcore Geometrical Paces ſquare, and exceedingly agreeable. It is ſurrounded with Galleries, interrupted at proper Diſtances with little open Halls, ſomewhat high, having Steps before them, with their Flights of white Mable, which go quite round. Thro' this Court runs a little Canal, lin'd with white Marble, whoſe Sides are adorn'd with Baliſters of the ſame Faſhion: It has over it four or five ſingle arched Bridges of white Marble, adorn'd with Mouldings and Baſſo Relievo's. At the Bottom of this Court there is a large and magnificent Hall, with three fine Stair-Caſes, whoſe Flights are adorn'd with Baliſters of the ſame Kind.

Fifth Court. The fifth Court, which follows, is nearly of the ſame Form and Size; but makes a finer Appearance, as having a large ſquare Perron, three Stories high, each adorn'd with Baliſters of white Marble. This Perron takes up near half the Length of the Court, and two thirds of its Breadth: It is about eighteen Foot high, built upon a Baſe of Siam Marble, which is coarſer, and upwards of ſix Foot high. It has three Stair-Caſes, whereof the middle one is moſt conſiderable, having near the Foot of it two great Braſs Lions; and on the Top of the Perron are eight Vaſes of the ſame Metal, about ſeven Foot high. This Perron is before a large and magnificent Hall, where the Emperor receives the Memorials and Petitions daily preſented him by the Mandarins of the ſovereign Tribunals, who firſt perform the accuſtom'd Proſtrations at the great Stairs.

Sixth, ſeventh and eighth Court. Afterward we paſſed thro' two other ſuch Courts, with Perrons of the ſame Form as well as Size, and encompaſſed with the like Buildings, furniſhed with Stair-Caſes and Baliſters round them. We were conducted through a Door on the Right-hand of the laſt Court into another, about two hundred Paces long; being a kind of Hippodrome, [or Place for Horſe Racing] at the End of which on the Left-hand, we entred a great open Hall, where we found Guards, and waited ſome time for the Mandarin, appointed to conduct us into the Apartment of the Emperor.

Ninth Court. Him we followed thro' a ninth Court, ſomething leſs than the former, but equally ſumptuous. At the End of it appeared a large Building, of an oblong Figure, with a double Roof, cover'd with yellow varniſh'd Tiles, like the preceding. This is the Palace where the Emperor's Apartment is; to which there led a Cauſey, raiſed about five or ſix Foot high, incloſed with Baliſters of white Marble, and pav'd with the ſame. None but the Emperor may paſs this way, or thro' the middle of the other Courts.

The Palace. This Palace, which ſhines with Carvings, Varniſh, Gilding and Painting, ſtands upon a kind of a Platform, pav'd with large ſquare Pieces of a beautiful green Marble, poliſh'd like Glaſs, and laid ſo cloſe together, that one can ſcarcely diſcern the Joinings. At the Entrance of the great Hall, there is a Door, which opens into a large ſquare Room paved with Marble; where the Emperor was ſitting on an Eſtrade, after the Tartar Faſhion. The Beams of this Room were ſupported by wooden Columns varniſh'd with red; and fixed in ſuch a manner in the Wall that they were even with its Surface. We perform'd the uſual Ceremonies, that is, we ranged ourſelves in a Line facing the Emperor, and fell on our Knees three times, bowing every time to the Ground. In receiving theſe Marks of our Reſpect himſelf, he did us a great Favour; for when the Mandarins of the ſix Sovereign Courts come every fifth Day, on the firſt Day of the Year, and on the Emperor's Birth Day, to perform theſe Ceremonies, he is ſcarce ever preſent; and is ſometimes at a good Diſtance from the Palace when they pay him their Homages. After we had performed this Duty we approached his Perſon, kneeling on one Side, and in a Line: He aſked us our Names, Ages and Country, and entertain'd us with a Sweetneſs and Affability which would be ſurprizing in any Prince, but was much more ſo in the Emperor of China. It muſt be confeſs'd, that this Series of Courts all on a Level and ranged in a Line; this Collection of Buildings, tho confuſed and ununiform; interſperſed with Pavilions, Galleries, Collonades, Baliſters, Stair-Caſes of Marble, and a multitude of varniſh'd Roofs, cover'd with yellow Tiles, ſo bright and beautiful, that when the Sun ſhines on them, they look as if they were gilt with Gold: I ſay it muſt be confeſs'd that all this preſents ſomething ſo inexpreſſibly magnificent to the Eye, as to diſcover it to be the Palace of a great Emperor.

If to theſe we add, the Courts that have been made on the Wings for Offices, and Stables; the Palaces of the Princes of the Blood, with thoſe of the Empreſs, and of the Women; the Gardens, Ponds, Lakes and Woods, in which are kept all ſorts of Animals, the Whole will appear ſurprizing. What we have deſcribed is only the inner Palace ſeparated by a great Wall from the outer, which itſelf is incloſed with a very high and thick Wall, about two Leagues in Compaſs, and reſembles a little City; the different Officers of the Court, and a great Number of Tradeſmen of all ſorts who are in the Service of the Emperor, lodging in it.

Pleaſure-Houſe of the ancient Emperors. Near Pe-king lies the Pleaſure-Houſe of the ancient Emperors, no leſs than ten common French Leagues in Circumference; but it differs vaſtly from the Royal Palaces in Europe, having neither Marble nor Water-Works, nor Stone Walls about it. It is furniſhed with four Rivulets of excellent lent Water, whoſe Banks are planted with Trees; and is compoſed of three Buildings very large and neat, with ſeveral Fiſh-ponds, Paſtures for Roebucks, wild Mules, and other fallow Beaſts; Sheep-folds, Kitchen-gardens, green Walks, Orchards, and ſome Pieces of Ground under Corn; with all that renders a Country Life agreeable. Hither the Emperors formerly retired from Buſineſs, to relieve the Cares of Government, and taſte the Sweets of a private Life. They ſeldom went out of their Palaces, imagining that the leſs they appeared in Publick the greater Reſpect would be paid them; but the Tartars, who now poſſeſs the Throne, affect greater Popularity, without departing too far from the Cuſtoms of the Chineſe.

Emperor's State when he goes out of his Palace.

When the Emperor goes out of the Palace, he is always attended by a great Number of Lords of his Court; every thing glitters in his Train, the Arms, the Harneſs of the Horſes, the Streamers, the Umbrella's, the Fans, and all the other Enſigns of the Imperial Dignity.

The Princes and the Lords go foremoſt on Horſeback, follow'd by the Ko-lau's or Prime Miniſters, and the Great Mandarins; they advance cloſe to the Houſes on both Sides, leaving the middle of the Streets clear. After them march twenty four Standards of yellow Silk, which is the Emperor's Livery, embroider'd with golden Dragons, which is his Coat of Arms. Theſe are followed by twenty-four Umbrella's of the ſame Colour, and as many Fans, which are very curious and rich. The Life-Guards are cloathed in Yellow, each wearing a kind of Head-Piece, and in their Hands a ſort of Javalin or half Pike gilt; on the Top of which is the Figure of the Sun or of a Creſcent, or the Head of ſome Animal. Twelve Footmen dreſs'd in the ſame Colour, carry on their Shoulders the Emperor's Chair, which is very magnificient. At divers Places on the Road there are a great Number of theſe Footmen to relieve one another. A Band of Muſick, of Trumpets, and other ſorts of Inſtruments, accompanies the Emperor, playing all the while. Laſt of all, a great Number of Pages and Footmen cloſe the Proceſſion: But now that the Emperors appear oftner abroad, they are attended with a leſs Retinue. When Kang-hi viſited the Southern Provinces, he went by Water, going on board a new Bark built on purpoſe; accompanied with his Children, the great Lords, and an infinite Number of truſty Officers: beſides, there were ſuch a Number of Troops on the Road that he ſeemed to march in the midſt of an Army. He made but ſhort Stages, ſtopping from Time to Time to examine Things himſelf, and to be informed exactly of whatever occur'd; but in his Return to Pe-king, his Bark proceeded Day and Night.

When he went into Tartary, to take the Diverſion of Hunting, he then actually march'd at the Head of an Army, as if he was going to conquer an Empire: But having deſcribed elſewhere the Magnificence of the Habits, Tents, and Equipages, belonging to the Train of this Prince, and of all the Grandees who attended him on theſe Occaſions; I ſhall ſpeak at preſent only of the Pomp in which he uſed to go, when he offer'd ſolemn Sacrifices in the Temple of Tyen. The Account whereof (taken from P. Magalhaens) is the more certain, becauſe theſe ſorts of Ceremonies are always regulated and invariably obſerv'd.

His Proceſſion to the Temple of Tyen.

This Proceſſion began with twenty four Drums, rang'd in two Files; and twenty-four Trumpets, (made of U-tong-ſhu, a Wood greatly eſteem'd by the Chineſe) more than three Foot long, and about eight Inches in Diameter at the Mouth: they are in the Shape of Bells, adorn'd with Circles of Gold, and ſuit very well with the Drums.

Next to theſe were twenty four Men in the ſame Livery; arm'd with Staves ſeven or eight Foot long, varniſh'd with red, and adorn'd with gilded Foliages. Then a hundred Soldiers carrying Halberts, the Iron Part of which ends in a Creſcent. A hundred Mace-Bearers, whoſe Arms were japan'd with red Varniſh, mixed with Flowers, and gilded at the End. Four hundred great Lanthorns finely adorn'd. Four hundred Flambeaux made of a Wood, which burns for a long Time, and yields a great Light. Two hundred Spears, ſome ſet off with Locks of Silk of various Colours; others with the Tails of Panthers, Foxes, and other Animals. Twenty four Banners, on which were painted the Signs of the Zodiac, which the Chineſe divide into twenty four Parts. fifty ſix other Banners, exhibiting the fifty ſix Conſtellations, to which the Chineſe reduce all the Stars. Two hundred Fans (ſupported by long gilded Sticks) painted with diverſe Figures of Dragons, Birds and other Animals. Twenty four Umbrellas richly adorn'd; and a Bouſet carry'd by Officers of the Kitchen, and furniſh'd with gold Utenſils, ſuch as Baſons, Ewers, &c.

After theſe had march'd in good Order, the Emperor follow'd on Horſeback pompouſly dreſs'd, with a grave majeſtic Air; on each Side of him was carry'd a rich Umbrella, large enough to ſhade both him and his Horſe. He was ſurrounded with ten white led Horſes (whoſe Saddles and Bridles were enrich'd with Gold and precious Stones. A hundred Spear Men, and the Pages of the Bed Chamber.

After which appear'd in the ſame Order, all the Princes of the Blood, the Regulo's, the Chief Mandarins, and the Lords of his Court in their Habits of Ceremony. Five hundred young Gentlemen belonging to the Palace richly clad. A thouſand Footmen in red Gowns embroider'd with Flowers, and Stars of Gold and Silver. Then thirty ſix Men carry'd an open Chair, follow'd by another that was cloſe and much larger, ſupported by a hundred and twenty Chair-Men; laſtly, came four large Chariots, two drawn by Elephants, and the other two by Horſes, cover'd with embroider'd Houſings; each Chair and Chariot had a Company of a hundred and fifty Men following it for its Guard.

This Proceſſion was cloſed by two thouſand Literary, and as many Military Mandarins, in magnificent Habits of Ceremony. Such is the Grandeur and Power of the Monarch, who governs verns ſo vaſt an Empire. In him alone every thing centers, being the Soul that gives Motion to that vaſt Body, and keeps all its Members in the moſt perfect ſubordination, as will appear in the Sequel.

Of the Form of Government in China: the different Tribunals; the Mandarins, the Honours that are paid them, their Power and their Offices.

Principle of the Chineſe Government

THE Political Government of China entirely turns on the reciprocal Duty of Parents and Children. The Emperor is called the Father of the Empire; the Vice-Roy is the Father of the Province under his Command; as the Mandarin is of the City which he governs. This ſingle Principle is the Foundation of that great Reſpect and ready Obedience which the Chineſe pay to the Officers who aſſiſt the Emperor to ſuſtain the Weight of Government.

'Tis very ſurprizing, to ſee a Nation ſo vaſtly numerous, ſo naturally reſtleſs, ſo exceſſively ſelfiſh, and ſo eager in its Purſuit of Riches, govern'd and kept within the Bounds of its Duty by a ſmall Number of Mandarins, at the Head of every Province. So true it is, that the bare Shadow of Imperial Authority, which appears in their Perſons, can do every thing with this People.

Nine Orders of the Quân

From the very Commencement of the Monarchy, the Mandarins have been divided into nine different Orders, in ſo perfect a Subordination to each other, that nothing can be compar'd to the Reſpect, and Submiſſion, which the Mandarins of an inferior Order bear to thoſe who are of a Superior.

First Order. the Ko-lau.

The firſt Order of Mandarins is that of the Ko-lau's or Miniſters of State, the Chief Preſidents of the Supreme Courts, and other principal Officers of the Army. This is the higheſt Degree that the Literati can arrive at; unleſs in Return for very important Services done the Nation, the Emperor ſhould think proper to confer more honourable Titles on them; ſuch as thoſe equivalent to Earls, Dukes, &c. The Number of the Ko-lau's is not fix'd, but depends on the Will of the Prince, who chooſes them at Pleaſure, out of the other Tribunals; however they are ſeldom more than five or ſix, and one of them is commonly more diſtinguiſh'd than the reſt, and ſtiled Shew-Syang; he is Preſident of the Council, and in greateſt Confidence with the Emperor. The Tribunal of theſe Ko-lau's is kept in the Palace on the Left-hand (which is accounted moſt honourable) of the Imperial Hall; where the Emperor gives his public Audience, and receives the Veneration and Homage of the Mandarins. As there are in the Palace ſeveral magnificent Halls pompouſly adorn'd, each of the Ko-lau's is aſſign'd one; in which he examines what ever comes under his Cognizance, and has the Name of the Hall added, as a Title of Honour to his own: for Inſtance, ſuch a Ko-lau, Supreme Hall of the Middle.

Second Order

The Tribunal which is call'd Nwi-ywen, that is the Inner Court, becauſe it is within the Palace, is compoſed of three Orders of Mandarins. The firſt are properly the Miniſters of State, whoſe Buſineſs is to inſpect almoſt all the Petitions of the ſupreme Tribunals, whether relating to War or Peace, Civil or Criminal Matters: after which Examination, they remit them to be repreſented to the Emperor, unleſs they have any Objection thereto, wherewith they acqnaint his Majeſty; who receives or rejects their Advice, as he thinks proper, reſerving ſometimes ſolely to himſelf the Cognizance of Affairs and the Examination of the Memorials that are preſented to him.

The Mandarins who compoſe the Second Order of this Tribunal are, as it were, Aſſiſtants to the former; and out of their Number are appointed the Vice-Roys of Provinces, and the Preſidents of other Tribunals. They bear the Title Ta-hyo-ſe, that is Literati or Magiſtrates of approved Capacity; and are taken out of the Second or third Order of Mandarins.

Third Order

The Mandarins of the third Order, who are called Chong-ſhu-ko, that is The School of Mandarins, are the Emperor's Secretaries, whoſe Office is to ſee all Matters, deliberated upon in the Tribunal, reduced to writing; theſe are taken out of the Fourth, Fifth, or Sixth Order of Mandarins.

Privy Council, and Council of State.

Theſe three Orders of Officers compoſe the Emperor's Privy-Council; and at this Tribunal the principal part of the great Affairs are examin'd and determin'd, unleſs the Emperor aſſembles the Great Council for that Purpoſe. This Great Council is compoſed of all the Miniſters of State, the chief Preſidents, and Aſſiſtants of the ſix ſupreme Courts, and three other conſiderable Tribunals. For, beſides this Council within the Palace, there are in Pe-king ſix ſovereign Courts, call'd Lew-pú, whoſe Power and Authority extend over all the Provinces of the Empire: each of them has always had a Preſident, who is commonly a Mandarin of the firſt Order, and two Aſſiſtants of the ſecond Order; without reckoning the forty four ſubordinate Tribunals, who have every one a Preſident and at leaſt twelve Counſellors.

After

After this Manner the Tribunals were compoſed under the Chineſe Emperors; but ſince the Tartars became Maſters of China, they have doubled the Officers, both of the Superior and Inferior Courts, placing therein as many Tartars as Chineſe. This was a Maſter-Piece of Policy in the Conqueror, who thus brought the Tartars into the Adminiſtration, without diſcontenting the Chineſe; who would have had Cauſe to complain, if they had been excluded from the public Employments. The ſix Supreme Courts at Pe-king.

The Buſineſs of the Chief of their Supreme Courts, call'd Li-pû, that is, the Tribunal of the Mandarins, is to furniſh all the Provinces with Officers; to watch over their Conduct; to examine their good and bad Qualities; and to give an account thereof to the Emperor: that ſome may be raiſed to the higheſt Offices, as the Reward of their Virtue and Merit; and others degraded, for behaving unworthy of the Station they were raiſed to. Theſe are, properly ſpeaking, the Inquiſitors of the State. First Court, or Li-pû.

This Court has four Tribunals under it; the firſt is charged with chooſing, thoſe who, by their Learning and other Qualities, deſerve to poſſeſs the great Offices of the Empire. The ſecond examines the Conduct of the Mandarins. The third is to ſeal all Judical Acts, to aſſign to the Mandarins of different Dignities and Offices their reſpective Seals, and to examine if the Seals of the Diſpatches, that are ſent to Court, be true or counterfeit. The fourth is to examine the Merit of the Grandees of the Empire, that is, the Princes of the Blood, the Regulos, thoſe who are honour'd with Titles, like our Dukes, Marquiſſes, and Counts, and in general all Perſons of Rank and Diſtinction. Its ſubordinate Tribunals.

The ſecond Supreme Court, call'd Hû-pû, that is, High Treaſurer of the King, hath the Superintendance of the Finances, with the Care of the private Eſtates, Treaſures, Expences, and Revenues of the Emperor. It makes out Orders for Salaries and Penſions, appoints the Delivery of Rice, Silks, and Money, which are diſtributed to the great Lords, and all the Mandarins of the Empire. It keeps an exact Catalogue of all Families; of all the Duties that ought to be paid; of the Cuſtom-Houſes and public Magazines. To go thro' this prodigious Throng of Buſineſs, it has fourteen ſubordinate Tribunals for the Affairs of the fourteen Provinces, whereof the Empire is compoſed; for the Province of Pe-che-li, being the Province of the Court, and conſequently ſuperior to the reſt, enjoys in many Caſes the Prerogatives of the Court and Houſhold of the Emperor. The Province of Kyang-nan, whereof Nan-king is the Capital, had heretofore the ſame Privileges, on account of its being the Emperor's Reſidence; but the Tartars have reduc'd it into a common Province, and changed the Name of Nan-king into that of Kyang-nin. Second Court, or Hû-pû. Its Tribunals.

The third Supreme Court is call'd Li-pû, or The Tribunal of Rights; Pû ſignifying Tribunal, and Li, Right; ſo that, tho' the Name ſeems to be the ſame with that of the firſt Court already ſpoken of, yet there is a great Difference between them, which is determin'd by the Pronunciation. It belongs to this Court, to ſee that Rites and Ceremonies be duly obſerv'd, and look after the Improvement of Arts and Sciences; it has alſo the Care of the Imperial Muſic, and examines thoſe who are Candidates for Degrees, and permits them to come to be examined: it is conſulted, concerning Titles of Honours, and other Marks of Diſtinction, wherewith the Emperor would gratify thoſe that deſerve them. Beſides, it has the Charge of the Temples and Sacrifices offer'd by the Emperor; alſo of the Feaſts given by the Prince to Subjects, or Strangers. It receives, entertains, and diſmiſſes Ambaſſadors; it has the Direction of the Liberal Arts, and of the three Laws or Religions that are tolerated in the Empire, viz. of the Literati, the Tau-tſe, and the Diſciples of Fo. In ſhort, it is a kind of Eccleſiaſtical Tribunal, before whom the Miſſionaries have been obliged to appear in Times of Perſecution. Third Court, or Li-pû.

This Court is aſſiſted by four ſubordinate Tribunals: the Buſineſs of the firſt is to deliberate on the moſt important Affairs, as when Patents are to be made out for the greateſt Offices of the Empire; ſuch are thoſe of the Tſong-tû, or Vice-Roys. The ſecond has the Charge of the Sacrifices which the Emperor offers; of the Temples; of the Mathematics; and of the Religions approved or tolerated. The third is to receive thoſe who are ſent to the Court. The fourth has the Direction of the Emperor's Table, and the Feaſts which he gives either to the Grandees or Ambaſſadors. Its Tribunals.

The fourth Supreme Court is call'd Ping-pû, the Tribunal of Arms. The Soldiery of the whole Empire is under its Care, and the Officers of War, as well general as particular, have their Dependance on it. It examines them in their Exerciſe, keeps the Fortreſſes in Repair, ſupplies the Arſenals and the Magazines with Weapons offenſive and defenſive, Ammunition and Proviſions; it cauſes all ſorts of Arms to be made, and in ſhort has the Management of every thing in general, which concerns the Defence and Safety of the Empire. Fourth Court, or Ping-pû.

It has four Inferior Tribunals to aſſiſt it; the firſt diſpoſes of all Military Employments, and ſees that the Troops are well diſciplined. The ſecond diſtributes the Officers and Soldiers into their reſpective Stations, for maintaining the public Tranquility, and take Care to clear the Cities and Highways of Thieves and Robbers. The third has the Superintendance of the Horſes of the Empire, the Poſts, Stages, Imperial Inns, and Barks, appointed to carry Victuals and other Proviſions for the Soldiers. The Fourth orders the making of all ſorts of Arms, and ſtowing them in the Arſenals. Its Tribunals.

They have given the Name of Hing-pû to the fifth Supreme Court, which is like the Tournelle, or Criminal Chamber belonging to the Parliaments of France, where thoſe, guilty of any Crime, are examined; under it are fourteen ſubordinate Tribunals, according to the Number of the Provinces. Fifth Court, or Hing-pû. Its Tribunals.

Sixth Court, or Kong-pû.

The sixth and last Supreme Court, call'd Kong-pû, or The Tribunal of public Works, is employ'd in keeping in Repair the Palaces as well of the Emperor as of the Tribunals, the Princes of the Blood, and Vice-Roys; the Imperial Sepulchres, Temples, &c. It superintends the Towers, Triumphal Arches, Bridges, Cauſeways, Dykes, Rivers, [Canals] Lakes, and all the Works neceſſary to render them navigable; the Streets, Highways, Barks, and all Veſſels requiſite for Navigation.

Its Tribunals.

This Court has likewiſe four Subordinate Tribunals; the firſt prepares the Plans and Deſigns for the public Works. The ſecond has the Direction of all the Work-Shops of the [Imperial] Joyners, Maſons, Carpenters, &c. in the ſeveral Cities of the Empire. The third is employ'd in repairing the Canals, Bridges, Cauſeys, Roads, &c. and making the Rivers navigable. The fourth takes Care of the Royal Houſes, Gardens, and Orchards; cauſes the latter to be improv'd, and receives the Profit ariſing from them.

Each of theſe Inferior Tribunals hath a Palace, with proper Halls, and is compoſed of two Preſidents and twenty four Counſellors, one half Tartars, the other Chineſe; beſides a great number of Clerks, Regiſters, Tipſtaffs, Meſſengers, Provoſts, Sergeants, and other Under-Officers, which I paſs over.

The Power of the Courts how limited and reſtrain'd.

As there might be room to fear, that Bodies of Men, inveſted with ſo much Power, would by Degrees weaken the Imperial Authority, the Laws have provided againſt this Inconvenience two Ways; firſt, none of theſe Tribunals is veſted with an abſolute Power of judging in Matters that are brought before them, but requires the Aſſiſtance of another, and often of all the reſt, to put its Decrees in Execution. For Inſtance, the Army is ſubject to the fourth Supreme Tribunal, but the Payment of it belongs to the ſecond, while the Barks, Waggons, Tents, Arms, &c. are under the Management of the ſixth: ſo that no military Operation can be carry'd on, without the Concurrence of theſe different Tribunals, and this is the Caſe with regard to all Affairs of Importance that concern the State.

Public Inſpectors or Cenſors.

Secondly, nothing can be better contriv'd to curb the Power of the Magiſtrates, belonging to the Supreme Tribunals, than the Precaution that is taken to appoint an Officer, whoſe Buſineſs is to aſſiſt at all their Aſſemblies, and to reviſe all their Acts which are communicated to him. He can decide nothing himſelf, but is only an Inſpector to take notice of every thing that paſſes in each, and give an account thereof to the Court; being obliged by his Office to give private Information to the Emperor of the Faults of the Mandarins, not only in the Adminiſtration of public Affairs, but in their private Conduct. Nothing eſcapes their Vigilance, nor do they ſpare even the Emperor himſelf when he is blameable; and that they may neither be corrupted by Hopes, nor intimidated by Threats, they are kept conſtantly in their Employment, unleſs advanc'd to a more conſiderable Poſt.

Their Intrepidity.

This ſort of Inſpectors or public Cenſors, call'd Ko-tau, are extremely dreaded, and there are aſtoniſhing Inſtances of their Courage and Conſtancy; they have ventur'd to accuſe Princes, great Lords, and Tartar Vice-Roys, tho' under the Protection of the Emperor: nay they commonly, either thro' Obſtinacy or Vanity, chooſe to fall into Diſgrace with the Prince, and even ſuffer Death, rather than deſiſt from their Purſuits, when they believe them to be conſiſtent with Equity and the Rules of a wiſe Government.

Regard paid to their Informations,

One of theſe Cenſors having, in the Reign of the late Kang-hi, accuſed and convicted four Kolau's, and as many great Officers, of receiving Bribes to put People into Poſts; they were immediately diſplaced, and reduced to the Condition of Warders, who are petty Officers among the Commonalty. So that one may well ſay of the Officers of this Court, what a Perſian Courtier ſaid of his own Prince, "They are in the Hands of the King my Maſter, like Counters, "which have no Value but what he puts upon them."

much dreaded.

When the Emperor, according to Cuſtom, refers the Petitions of theſe Cenſors to the Tribunals, to deliberate upon them, the Mandarins ſeldom contradict them, for fear of being accuſed themſelves; this, it is true, gives them great Power in the Empire, but then it is a means of keeping every one to his good Behaviour, and in the Subordination neceſſary to maintain the Imperial Authority. Whatever Defference the Mandarins pay to the leaſt Intimations, as well as Orders of the Emperor, they do not fail on proper Occaſions to diſcover a great deal of Reſolution. When the Emperor interrogates the Tribunals, and they anſwer according to the Laws, they are not liable to either Blame or Reproach; whereas, if they anſwer contrary thereto, the Cenſors of the Empire have a right to accuſe, and the Emperor to puniſh them.

Tribunal for the Affairs of the Princes.

There is at Pe-king another Tribunal eſtabliſh'd, ſolely to inſpect the Affairs relating to the Princes; which they are not willing ſhould be confounded with thoſe of the common People. The Preſidents and Officers of this Tribunal are Princes; but the inferior Officers are choſen from among the common Mandarins, who draw up the Acts of their Proceedings, and all other neceſſary Writings. Alſo in the Regiſters of this Tribunal, all the Children of the Imperial Family, as ſoon as they are born, are inroll'd; the Titles and Dignities they are honour'd with inſcrib'd; and in this Court they are tried and puniſh'd when culpable. The Regulo's, beſides their lawful Wives, have commonly three more, on whom the Emperor beſtows Titles, and whoſe Names are regiſtred in this Tribunal. Their Children take Place next to thoſe that are legitimate; and are more reſpected than thoſe born of meer Concubines, of whom the Princes may have as many as they pleaſe.

I ſhall give no farther account of the ſeveral Tribunals eſtabliſh'd in the Imperial City, having been ſo particular in that of the ſix principal, to which the reſt are ſubordinate; but I cannot omit

one

one of a ſingular kind, which will ſerve to inform us in how great Eſteem Men of Learning are in China.

Every three Years all the Kyu-jin, or Licentiates in the Empire, reſort to Pe-king, to obtain their Doctor's Degree; where they are ſtrictly examin'd for thirteen Days together, and not above three hundred can be admitted. Out of theſe new Doctors, thoſe who have given Proofs of their Capacity and Skill, are choſen to compoſe the Tribunal, whereof I am ſpeaking; which is call'd Han-lin-ywen, and is a kind of Academy, whoſe Members are Men of the greateſt Genius and Learning in the Empire. Tribunal of the Han-lin.

Theſe Doctors direct the Education of the Heir to the Crown, and are to teach him Virtue, the Sciences and Rules of Civility, and the great Art of governing well. It is their Buſineſs to write the Hiſtory of the Empire in general, and to record all the conſiderable Events, worthy to be tranſmitted to Poſterity. Their Profeſſion is to ſtudy continually, and to compoſe uſeful Books. They are properly the Literati of the Emperor, who diſcourſes with them about Matters relating to the Sciences; and often chooſes the Ko-lau's and Preſidents of the Supreme Tribunals out of their Body, they being at once both eſteem'd and dreaded.

The Emperor likewiſe nominates and veſts with Authority the Mandarins in the Provinces, who are govern'd by two General Officers, on whom they depend; one is call'd Fû-ywen, the ſame with the Vice-Roy, or Governor of a Province in Europe; the other, whoſe Juriſdiction is much more extenſive, ſince he has two, and ſometimes three Provinces ſubject to him, is call'd Tſong-tû. Both theſe are at the Head of a Supreme Tribunal in the Province, wherein all Affairs of Moment, Civil or Criminal, are determin'd; to them the Emperor immediately iſſues his Orders, and they take Care to tranſmit them off hand to all the Cities in their Diſtrict. Officers and Tribunals of the Provinces.

However great the Authority of the Tſong-tû may be, it does not in the leaſt diminiſh that of the particular Vice-Roys; but every thing is regulated in ſuch a manner, that they never have any Conteſt about Juriſdiction. The Supreme Tribunal of every Province hath ſeveral other ſubordinate Tribunals under it; and a certain number of inferior Mandarins, who aſſiſt the Vice-Roy in diſpatching Affairs.

In all the Capital Cities of the Provinces two Tribunals are eſtabliſh'd, one for Civil, and the other for Criminal Affairs. The firſt call'd Pû-ching-tſe, has a Preſident who is like the Treaſurer General of a Province in Europe; and two Aſſiſtants, who are all Mandarins of the ſecond Order. The Criminal Tribunal, nam'd Ngan-cha-tſe, has a Preſident of the third Order, and inſtead of Aſſiſtants, it has two Claſſes of Mandarins, call'd Tau-li. Tribunals of Cities.

Theſe Mandarins are Viſitors of the different Diſtricts, into which every Province is divided, and have their reſpective Tribunals; their Buſineſs is to give an account of what paſſes to the Emperor, eſpecially when there is no Viſitor in the Province ſent expreſly from the Court. Some of them, call'd I-chwen-tau, have the Care of the Poſts, as alſo of the Imperial Inns and Barks within their Diſtrict; others named Ping-pi-tau, have the Inſpection of the Army; the Tun-tyen-tau overſee the repairing of the High Roads; the Ho-tau take Care of the Rivers; and thoſe call'd Hay-tau, viſit the Sea Coaſts. They have all a Power to puniſh Criminals, and are as the Subſtitutes of the ſix Supreme Tribunals of the Court.

The Cities being of three different Ranks, have alſo their own Governors, and ſeveral [other] Magiſtrates. The [chief] Mandarin of Cities of the firſt Rank, is call'd Chi-fû, and is of the fourth Order, but his three Aſſiſtants are Mandarins of the ſixth and ſeventh Order; he has beſides a number of inferior Mandarins under him, in Proportion to the Extent of his Juriſdiction and number of Cities within it. Government of Cities.

The Mandarin of Cities of the ſecond Rank, is nam'd Chi-chew, and is of the ſecond Degree of the fifth Order; his two Aſſiſtants are of the ſecond Degree of the ſixth and ſeventh Order.

In ſhort, all the reſt of the Cities of the Empire have each a Tribunal, whoſe Preſident is call'd Chi-hyen. He is a Mandarin of the ſeventh Order, and has two Aſſiſtants, one of the eighth, and the other of the ninth Order.

Beſides the Tribunals, common to all the Provinces, there are others peculiar to certain Places, or which have particular Functions. Such are for Inſtance (1) the Mandarins of the Salt, whoſe Buſineſs is to diſtribute it thro' the Provinces by truſty Perſons, and to hinder private Traders from ſelling it in Prejudice to the Revenue; the Preſident of this Tribunal is call'd Yen-ſa-tau. (2) The Mandarin-General of the Tribute of Rice, named Lyang-tau. (3) Another Mandarin-General, call'd Hyo-tau, who preſides at the Examination of the Students of the Province, and thoſe who appear to take the Degrees of Literature; beſides ſeveral others too tedious to mention, who have particular Offices. Other Tribunals.

The number of Literary Mandarins, diſperſed thro' the Empire, amount to more than thirteen thouſand ſix hundred; four times a Year is printed an exact Catalogue of them, wherein their Name, Titles, Country, and the Times when they took their Degree, are mention'd. I ſhall ſpeak elſewhere of the Military Mandarins, or Officers of War. Number of the Quân.

The Governors of Cities, who are inferior Mandarins, do not commonly determine matters of Importance themſelves, but are oblig'd to make their Report to the Superior Mandarins; that is, to the Pû-ching-tſe and Fû-ywen, who have none above them, except the Tribunals of Pe-king. As for the Tſong-tû, who is above a Vice-Roy, and has the Government of two or three Provinces, he is ſubject to the ſame Tribunals; but his Office is ſo conſiderable, that there is no advancing him without making him a Miniſter of State, or Preſident of one of the Supreme Courts.

The

Badges of the Quân.

The Mandarins are extremely jealous of the Badges of their Dignity, which diſtinguiſh them not only from the common People, but alſo from other Literati, and all thoſe of an inferior Rank among themſelves. This Badge conſiſts of a Piece of ſquare Stuff, which they wear upon their Breaſts, richly work'd, and carrying in the Middle the Devices peculiar to their reſpective Employments. The Literary Mandarins have, ſome a Dragon with four Claws, others an Eagle, or a Sun, and ſo of the reſt: In like manner, thoſe of the Military Claſs bear Leopards, Tygers, Lions, &c. They likewiſe affect a Diſtinction in their Girdles: In former Times before the Chineſe took the Tartarian Habit, they were divided into ſmall Squares, and faſten'd before with great Claſps, made of the Horns of Buffaloes and Rhinoceroſes, of Ivory, Tortoiſe-ſhell, Eagle Wood, Silver, Gold, and Jewels; the Materials differing according to the different Employment of the Perſons. None but a Ko-lau might wear one of Jewels, which was given him by the Emperor, when he put him in Poſſeſſion of his Office; but at preſent a ſilk Girdle is all that is worn.

Power of the ſeveral Quân.

There is an abſolute mutual Dependance among the ſeveral Powers that govern the Empire. The moſt inconſiderable Mandarin has full Authority within the Extent of his Diſtrict; but he depends on other Mandarins, who tho' more powerful, yet are ſubject to the General Officers of every Province; as theſe latter are to the Tribunals of the Imperial City; and the Preſidents of the Supreme Courts, who are dreaded by all other Mandarins, tremble themſelves before the Emperor, in whom reſides the Sovereign Power.

Manner of diſtributing Offices among them by Lot.

The Employments are divided among the Mandarin Officers, in the following Manner. Any Perſon who has gain'd two of the three Degrees of Literature, is capable of enjoying Public Offices. the Names of theſe three ſorts of the Learned, that is, Si-ew-tſi or Batchellors, Kyu-jin or Licentiates, and Tſing-tſe or Doctors, are written on the Regiſters of the firſt ſupreme Tribunals, call'd Li-pû; which diſtributes the vacant Offices, according to the Rank and Merit of the Literati, who when duly qualify'd repair to Court for that Purpoſe; but they do not uſually raiſe even Tſing-tſe, or Doctors, to be more than Governors of Cities of the ſecond or third Rank. As ſoon as any of theſe Employments fall, ſuppoſe four, they immediately acquaint the Emperor with it; and then calling the four Literati, who are firſt upon the Liſt, write the Names of the four Governments on four Tickets, which are put into a Box, placed ſo high as juſt to be within Reach of the Candidates, who draw by turns according to their Rank, each poſſeſſing the City which falls to his Lot.

Beſides the common Examinations, they paſs thro' another; in order to diſcover what ſort of Government they are fit for: and it is ſaid, that when a Perſon has Friends or Money to beſtow, the Chineſe do not want Ways to cauſe the beſt Governments to fall to thoſe they deſign to favour.

The Eaſe with which a ſingle Quân governs Multitudes.

'Tis ſurprizing with how much Eaſe a ſingle Mandarin, for Inſtance, a Chi-fû, governs Multitudes of People; he does no more than publiſh his Orders on a ſmall Piece of Paper, ſealed with his Seal, and fix'd up at the Corners of Streets, and he is inſtantly obey'd. This ready Obedience is grounded on that profound Veneration and unlimitted Submiſſion with reſpect to Parents, in which the Chineſe are brought up from their Infancy. It proceeds alſo partly from the Reverence the Mandarin acquires by his Conduct towards a People, who are accuſtom'd to look upon him as the Emperor himſelf, whoſe Perſon he repreſents. They never ſpeak to him but on their Knees when he is diſtributing Juſtice in his Tribunal; and he never appears in Public without a great Attendance, in a very majeſtick Manner; he is pompouſly dreſs'd, his Countenance grave and ſevere, being carried by four Men in a gilded Chair, open if in Summer, but cover'd with Silk in Winter; preceded by all the Officers of his Tribunal, whoſe Caps and Garb are of a very extraordinary Faſhion.

The Pomp in which they appear abroad.

Theſe Officers march in Order on each Side the Street, ſome carrying before him an Umbrella of Silk, ſome ſtriking from time to time on a Copper Baſon, and giving Notice to the People, with a loud Voice, to ſhew Reſpect as he paſſes along. Some carry great Whips, others long Staves or Iron-Chains, the Din of all which Inſtruments makes the People tremble; for they are naturally timerous, and know that in Caſes of Diſobedience they cannot eſcape Correction. So that as ſoon as he is in Sight, all who are in the Street, ſhew their Reſpect; not by ſaluting him him in any manner whatſoever, for that would be a Familiarity deſerving Puniſhment; but by withdrawing out of the Way, ſtanding upright with the Feet cloſe together, and their Arms hanging down; in which Poſture as the moſt reſpectful, they continue till the Mandarin has paſſed by.

That of a Tſong-tû, or Vice-Roy.

If the Chi-fû, who is a Mandarin of the fifth Order, marches with ſo much Pomp, what muſt be the Magnificence of the Tſong-tû, or a Vice-Roy, when he goes abroad? He is always accompany'd with a hundred Men at leaſt, and this long Train, which has nothing embarraſing, becauſe every one knows his Poſt, ſometimes takes up a whole Street. In the middle of this Proceſſion he appears, clad in his Habit of Ceremony, and ſitting in a very large Chair, handſomly gilt, carry'd on the Shoulders of eight Men. Firſt, two Kettle Drums beating upon Copper Baſons, gives Notice of the March. Next follow eight Perſons bearing Colours, (with japan'd Staves) whereon are written in large Characters, the Vice-Roy's Titles. Then fourteen other Enſigns, exhibiting the Symbols peculiar to his Office, ſuch as the Dragon, Tyger, Phœnix, flying Tortoiſe, and other winged Animals. Six Officers carrying a Board in the Shape of a large Shovel, ſuſpended at a pretty good Height; whereon are written, in large golden Characters, the particular Qualifications of the Mandarin. Two others bearing, the firſt, a large triple Umbrella of yellow Silk; the ſecond a Caſe, wherein the Umbrella is kept. Two Archers on Horſeback, at the Head of the chief Guards. The Guards arm'd with ſtrait Scythes, adorn'd with Locks of Silk in four Rows; two other Files of arm'd Men, ſome of them carrying Maces, either with long Handles, or in the Form of a Hand or Serpent of Iron; others arm'd with large Hammers and long Hatchets like a Creſcent. Another Company of Guards, ſome arm'd with ſharp Battle-Axes, others with ſtrait Scythes like the former. Soldiers carrying three pointed Halberts, Arrows or Axes. Two Porters, with a kind of handſome Coffer, containing the Seals of his Office. Two other Kettle Drummers, who give Notice of the Mandarin's Approach. Two Officers with Plumes of Geeſe Feathers in their Hats, and arm'd with Canes, to keep the Crowd in Awe. After them come two Mace-bearers, with gilt Maces in the Shape of Dragons, and a great number of Officers of Juſtice; ſome holding Whips or flat Staves, to give the Baſtonado, others arm'd with Chains, Whips, and Cutlaces, or carrying Silk Scarfs. Laſtly, two Standard-bearers, and the Captain, who commands the Company. This is the Equipage that precedes the Vice-Roy, who is carry'd in his Chair, ſurrounded with Pages and Footmen, having near his Perſon an Officer, who carries a large Fan, ſhap'd like a Skreen. He is follow'd by ſeveral Guards, ſome armed with Maces, in form of Polyhedrons, and others with long handled Sabres. After which come ſeveral Enſigns and Cornets, with a great number of Domeſtics on Horſeback, every one carrying ſomething for the Uſe of the Mandarin; as the ſecond Cap, incloſed in a Caſe, if the Weather ſhould oblige him to change the one he wears, &c.

When he is abroad in the night time, they do not carry Flambeaux as in Europe, but ſeveral very handſome large Lanthorns, on which are written in Capital Letters the Titles and Quality of the Mandarin, with the Order of his Mandarinat; thereby to inſpire every one with the Reverence due to him, as alſo that thoſe who are walking may ſtop, and others who are ſitting may riſe in a reſpectful manner.

Duty of Governors of Cities of the firſt and ſecond Rank.

It is the Duty of the Governor of every Hyen or Chew to adminiſter Juſtice; to receive the Tribute due from each Family to the Emperor; to viſit perſonally the Bodies of thoſe who have either been kill'd in ſome Scuffle, or thro' Deſpair have laid violent Hands on themſelves. Twice in a Month he is oblig'd to give Audience to all the Heads of the Wards in his Diſtrict, and to inform himſelf exactly of every thing that paſſes. It is likewiſe his Buſineſs to give Paſſports to Barks and other Veſſels, to hear Complaints and Accuſations, which muſt be almoſt continual, in a Country ſo populous. All Law-Suits come before his Tribunal, and he puniſhes the Perſon he judges to be in the Wrong, with a ſevere Baſtonado. In a Word, he condemns Criminals to Death, but his Sentence, or indeed that of any ſuperior Mandarin, cannot be executed till it be ratify'd by the Emperor. Cauſes of ſmall Importance are determined firſt by the three inferior Mandarins, who are like the private Deputies of our Judges of the Preſidial Courts [in France].

The greateſt Merit of the Quân is the Love of the People.

However formidable the Authority of theſe Mandarins may be, they could not maintain themſelves in their Offices, if they did not gain the Reputation of being the Fathers of the People, and of having nothing in view, but their Happineſs; ſo that a good Mandarin ought to place all his Glory in rendering the People happy. A Magiſtrate of this Character has made it his Buſineſs to ſend for Perſons ſkill'd in breeding Silk Worms and making Silk, that he might teach thoſe Arts in his Diſtrict; and thus by enriching his City, he has acquired the greateſt Applauſe.

There have been others, who in the Time of a Storm were not contented to forbid Perſons to croſs the River, but have come themſelves to the Bank, and ſtaid there all Day; to prevent, by his Preſence, any from being ſo raſh thro' Deſire of Gain as to expoſe himſelf to the Danger of periſhing miſerably. A Mandarin who did not ſhew the like Affection, or was too ſevere to the People under him, could not avoid being noted down in the Informations ſent by the Vice-Roys every three Years to the Court, and this would be ſufficient to deprive him of his Office. If a Priſoner dies in his Confinement, a great number of Atteſtations muſt be produced, to prove, that the Mandarin was not ſuborn'd to compaſs his Death; that he viſited him, ſent him a Phyſician, and furniſh'd him with proper Remedies, &c. for an account muſt be tranſmitted to the Emperor of all thoſe who die in Priſon, and of the manner of their Death, and according to the Advice which he receives, he often orders an extraordinary Proceſs.

Great Value ſet on the Life of the Subject.

There are certain Occaſions whereon the Mandarins affect chiefly to ſhew their Tenderneſs for their People; for inſtance, when they are apprehenſive of a bad Harveſt, occaſion'd either by Drought, too much Rain, or any other Accident, ſuch as the ſwarming of Graſs-Hoppers, which ſometimes over-run certain Provinces; for then the Mandarin, either thro' Affection, Intereſt, or Diſſimulation, omits nothing that may render him popular. Tho' the greater Part of them are Men of Letters, and deteſt the Idols of Fo and the Tau, yet they fail not to make ſolemn Viſits to their Temples, and that on Foot, contrary to their Cuſtom, to implore Rain or fair Weather. When Calamities of this Nature happen, the Mandarin cauſes his Orders for a general Faſt to be fix'd up in all public Places, forbidding Butchers and Cooks to ſell Meat under heavy Penalties; which, tho' they cannot do it openly in their Shops, they do privately by means of a little Money, given under hand to the People of the Tribunal, appointed to ſee that the Orders are obſerved.

The Quân viſit the Idol Temples to pray for Rain

The Mandarin goes to the Idol Temples on Foot, negligently dreſs'd, ſometimes even with Straw Shoes on, accompany'd with inferior Mandarins, and follow'd by the principal Perſons of the City. Being arrived, he lights upon the Altar two or three ſmall perfume-Sticks, after which they all ſit; and to paſs away the Time, drink Tea, ſmoak, and chat an Hour or two together, and then retire.

An Idol beaten to pieces for not ſending Rain.

This is all the Formality they obſerve on ſuch Occaſions, wherein the Reader may perceive they treat the Idol with very little Ceremony; and if they are oblig'd to pray too long before the Favour is granted, they ſometimes bring him to Reaſon with a good Cudgel, but this is rare. It is ſaid that at Kyang-chew, in the Province of Shen-ſi, an Image was beaten to pieces by Order of the Officers, for very obſtinately refuſing to ſend Rain in Time of a great Drought. It may be preſum'd that during this Execution, there were delicate Hymns ſung in his Praiſe; and when Rain fell, they made another Image, which was no difficult matter, (for they are generally of Earth, or a ſort of Plaiſter,) and led it in Triumph into the City; where they offer'd Sacrifices to it, and in a Word reſtored it to its Saintſhip again.

Another Idol ill treated on a like account.

The Vice-Roy of a Province proceeded in the ſame Manner with another Idol, which not vouchſafing to anſwer his reiterated Prayers, he could not reſtrain his Choler; but ſent an inferior Mandarin to tell him, that if there was not Rain by ſuch a Day, he would drive him out of the City, and level his Temple with the Ground. It is likely the Image did not underſtand that Language, or was not afraid of his Menaces; for on the Day limitted there fell no Rain. Upon which the Vice-Roy, to be as good as his Word, forbad the People to carry any Offering to the Image, and ordered the Temple to be ſhut up, and the Gates ſeal'd, which was immediately done; but the Rain falling a few Days after, the Vice-Roys Anger was appeaſed, and the Image permitted to be worſhipp'd as before.

In theſe kinds of public Calamities, the Mandarin addreſſes himſelf chiefly to the Guardian-Genius of the City, according to ancient Cuſtom, imploring his Aſſiſtance uſually in the following Form; viz.

Form of addreſſing the Guardian Genius of a City.

" Guardian Genius! Notwithſtanding I am the Paſtor and Governor of this City, you, tho' " inviſible, are much more ſo. This Quality of Paſtor obliges me to procure the People what- " ever is advantageous for them, and to remove from them every thing that is hurtful. But it is " from you, properly, that they receive their Happineſs; it is you who preſerve them from the " Misfortunes they are threaten'd with: and tho' you are inviſible to our Eyes, yet whenever you " pleaſe to accept our Offerings, and hear our Vows, you are in ſome Senſe no longer ſo. But " if you are pray'd to in vain, the Heart can have no Share in the Honours paid you; you " indeed will continue to be what you are, but you will be little known: in the ſame manner as " I, who am commiſſion'd to protect and defend the People, would make them doubt of my " Quality if I did not act anſwerable to it. In public Calamities we ought to lay before you the " Ills which we cannot remedy, and implore your Aid. Behold then the great Affliction the " People are in! from the ſixth to the eighth Month no Rain hath fallen, nor any Grain been yet " reap'd, if all be deſtroy'd, how can the Earth be ſown hereafter? It is my Duty to repreſent " this to you. I have appointed ſeveral Faſt-Days: the Butchers are forbidden to open their " Shops; the uſe of Meat, Fiſh, and even Wine, is prohibited; every one applies himſelf " ſincerely to purify his Heart, examine his Conſcience, and repent: but our Virtue and Merits " are not ſufficient to move Tyen. As for you, O Spirit! the inviſible Governor of this City, " you have Acceſs to him; you can requeſt Favours of him for us Mortals, and beſeech him " to put an end to our Afflictions. Such a Favour obtain'd by your Interceſſion, will anſwer " the utmoſt Deſires of the People. I ſhall ſee then accompliſh'd what my Office obliges me " earneſtly to wiſh for; and you will be more and more ador'd in the City, when it appears to " the Inhabitants, that you do not preſide over it in vain."

Duty of the Governors to adminiſter Juſtice;

As the Mandarin is appointed ſolely to ſupport and protect the People, he ought always to be ready to hear their Complaints, not only at the ſtated Hours of Audience, but at all other Hours of the Day. If the Affair be urgent, then they go to his Palace, and beat loud upon a kind of Kettle-Drum, which is ſometimes on one ſide of the Hall of Juſtice, but commonly without Doors, that the People may come at it both Night and Day. At this Signal, the Mandarin, tho' ever ſo much employ'd, is oblig'd to leave every thing immediately, to grant the Audience demanded; but whoever gives the Alarm, unleſs he has ſuffer'd ſome extraordinary Wrong that requires ſpeedy Redreſs, is ſure to receive the Baſtonado for his Pains.

to preach as Prieſts under the Emperor.

One of his principal Functions is to inſtruct his People as he is in the Emperor's ſtead; who according to the Chineſe is not only a Monarch to govern, and a Prieſt to ſacrifice, but is alſo a Maſter to teach. Hence it is that from time to time he aſſembles all the Grandees of the Court and chief Mandarins of the Tribunals, to give them Inſtructions, always taking his Text out of the Canonical Books.

Their Times of aſſembling the People.

In like manner, on the firſt and fifteenth Day of every Month the Mandarins aſſemble, and give their People a long Diſcourſe, wherein every Governor acts the Part of a Father, who inſtructs his Family. There is a Law of the Empire for this Practice, and the Emperor himſelf has appointed the Subjects to be handled in their Sermons; which are comprehended in ſixteen Imperial Ordinances as follows; viz.

Subjects for Texts.

The Firſt. That they very carefully practiſe the Duties preſcribed by filial Piety, and the Deference that the younger Brother ought to pay the elder; whereby they will learn how to ſet a Value on the eſſential Obligations, which Nature lays on all Mankind.

The Second. That they always preſerve a reſpectful Remembrance for the Anceſtors of their Family; which will be conſtantly attended with Unity, Peace, and Concord.

That

That there be Union in all the Villages; by this means they will be Strangers to Quarrels and Law-Suits. The Third.

Let them have a great Eſteem for the Profeſſion of Huſbandmen, and thoſe who cultivate Mulberry-Trees, wherewith the Silk-Worms are nouriſh'd; they will then never want Grain to feed on, nor Garments to cover them. The Fourth.

That they accuſtom themſelves to a prudent Oeconomy by Frugality, Temperance and Modeſty; and this will be the means of avoiding many idle Expences. The Fifth.

That great Care be taken to encourage public Schools; to the end young Students may be taught good Morals. The Sixth.

That every one apply himſelf to his proper Buſineſs; which will be an infallible means to keep the Heart and Mind at Eaſe. The Seventh.

That they ſtifle Sects and Errors in their Birth; in order to preſerve the true and ſolid Doctrine in its Purity. The Eighth.

That they inculcate to the People the Penal Laws eſtabliſh'd by the ſupreme Authority; for Fear will keep rude and untractable Minds in their Duty. The Ninth.

That they inſtruct Perſons thoroughly in the Laws of Civility and decent Behaviour; thus the good Cuſtoms, which Decorum has eſtabliſh'd, will always be punctually practiſed. The Tenth.

That they apply all their Endeavours to give Children, and younger Brothers, a good Education; which will prevent their giving themſelves up to Vice and diſorderly Paſſions. The Eleventh

That they abſtain from all ſlanderous Accuſations; thus Innocence and Integrity will have nothing to fear. The Twelfth.

That they take Care not to conceal the Guilty, whoſe Crimes oblige them to lead a wandering and vagabond Life; by this Means they will avoid being involved in their Miſfortunes. The Thirteenth.

That they be punctual in paying the Contributions eſtabliſh'd by the Prince; whereby they will prevent the Inquiries and Vexations of the Tax-Gatherers. The Fourteenth.

That they act in Concert with the Heads of the Wards in every City; which will prevent Thefts, and the Eſcape of thoſe who are Guilty. The Fifteenth.

That they repreſs the Sallies of Anger, which will ſecure them againſt all Danger. The Sixteenth.

Theſe are the Ordinances which ſerve the Mandarins for a Text to their Sermons. The following Diſcourſe of one of them upon the third Head, will ſhew their Manner of inſtructing the People.

A Sermon preached by a Quân.

" The Emperor orders you to preſerve Union in the Villages, that Quarrels and Law-
" Suits may be baniſh'd from thence; liſten attentively to the Explanation that I ſhall make
" of this Ordinance.

" When you dwell in the ſame Place (whether Relations or not, imports little) you paſs for " an Inhabitant of that Place or Town; you there live with Kinsfolks or Acquaintances, with " Perſons advanced in Age, and with your School-Fellows; you cannot go abroad without
" ſeeing one another Morning and Evening, and at all times you will meet. It is this Aſſem-
" blage of Families united in the ſame Place, that I call a Village: in this Village there are rich " and Poor; ſome are your Superiors, ſome your Inferiors, and other are your Equals.

" Firſt of all therefore let this be a Maxim with you, that your Credit ought never to be
" employ'd to make yourſelf dreaded; and that you are never to be allow d to make uſe of Craft
" or to lay Snares for your Neighbours. To ſpeak of the latter with Contempt; to be oſtenta-
" tious of your own good Qualities; and to ſeek to enrich yourſelf at the Expence of others, are " things that you ought abſolutely to avoid.

" One of the Ancients has wiſely remark'd, that in a Place where there are old Men as well
" as young, the latter ought to reſpect the former, without examining whether they are rich or " poor, learned or ignorant, they ought to regard nothing but their Age. If being in eaſy Cir-
" cumſtances you deſpiſe the Poor; if being in Indigence you look upon the Rich with an Eye
" of Envy; this will cauſe perpetual Diviſions. What! ſays the proud rich Man, will you not " give Place to me? and behold I am ready to cruſh you in pieces. In effect, if you have " Lands or Houſes he will endeavour to deprive you of them, and by Violence encroach upon " your Property; neither your Wives nor Daughters will be ſecure from ſuch a Creditor: as you " are inſolvent he will force them from you, under the ſpecious Pretence of equitable Compen-
" ſation. Sometimes when he is in an angry Mood, he will let looſe his Horſes and Oxen into " your Fields, which will ſpoil your Lands newly ſown; ſometimes in the Heat of Wine he " will give himſelf up to the greateſt Exceſſes. Honeſt Men will not be able to avoid his
" Inſults. The Patience of his Neighbours being quite tir'd out, they will exclaim againſt him,
" and apply to the Gentlemen of the Quirk, to ſue him in form. Theſe miſchievous crafty
" Vermin will aggravate every thing in order to involve them over Head and Ears in Law. They " will magnify a ſmall Pond to a raging Sea, whoſe foaming Waves ſwell to the very Clouds;
" and the mereſt Trifle will become a moſt ſerious Matter: mean time the Accuſation will be " carry'd into all the Tribunals; and the Expence of the Proſecution will be attended with
" Conſequences that will be felt ever after.

" Are you on a Journey? if you chance to meet a Man of your own Village, as ſoon as " you know him by his Tongue, nothing can be comparable to the ſecret Pleaſure which " you

" which you feel; you lodge together, you love one another as if you were own Brothers: how " then comes it to paſs, that when you live in the ſame Place, inſtead of preſerving Peace and " good Order, you excite Quarrels and ſow Diviſions?

" Never ſpeak Evil of others, and then they will let you be eaſy, never fall out with any " Body. Give way of your own Accord to others; let your Patience be Proof againſt Contra- " diction, and you need never to fear being abuſed or inſulted.

" When a Difference ariſes between two Perſons, if charitable People draw near to reconcile " them; when the Fire of Diſcord is kindled in a Family, if the Neighbours run to quench " it; if when a Man is in a violent Paſſion, another takes him aſide, and mildly endeavours to " pacify his Anger: the great Fire that ſeemed to menace Heaven, will diſappear in a Mo- " ment; and that important Affair, which was going to be carried before the Tribunals of the " Great, will be brought to an End with as much Eaſe as an Icicle is melted, or a Tile taken " from the Roof of an Houſe. But if an Incendiary interpoſes, like a great Stone which, fal- " ling with Violence, breaks to Pieces every thing in its Way, he will engage you by his perni- " cious Counſels and Practices, which will lead you to the Brink of Ruin. But ſince I am ſpeak- " ing of the fatal Conſequences that attend Quarrels and Law-Suits, hearken attentively to what " I have farther to ſay on this Head.

" When once the Affair comes before a Mandarin, either you or the adverſe Party muſt be " vanquiſh'd. If you have the worſt on't, and are not willing to ſubmit, you will ſeek every " where for Support and Protection; you will endeavour to obtain the good Graces of the " Mandarin's Favourites, and they muſt be well paid for their Services. You will be deſirous " alſo of gaining over to your Side the People belonging to the Court, and how many Feaſts " will that oblige you to give them? have you wherewithal to defray ſuch Expences?

" But if you fall into the Hands of an evil Judge, who, to ruin you, borrows the Colours and " Appearances of Uprightneſs and Equity; in vain have you made Intereſt with thoſe who " have Acceſs to him, and are much in his Eſteem; in vain the Officers of the Court, thoſe " venal Wretches, thoſe Blood-Suckers of the People, will declare themſelves in your Favour. " After all the Expences laid out, on one Side by you to oppoſe your Enemy, and by your " Enemy on the other to avoid your Fury, you will both be forced at length into an Accommo- " dation. But if you refuſe to agree; if after being caſt in a ſubordinate Tribunal, you will ap- " peal to a ſuperior Court; you will ſee Petitions every Day running thro' all the Tribunals: " the Law-Suit will be ſpun out for ſeveral Years, by the Tricks of roguiſh Practitioners. " The Witneſſes will ſuffer by it; a great Number of Perſons will be involved in your Affair: " ſome will be thrown into Priſon, others puniſh'd by the Hand of Juſtice. In ſhort, before " Sentence be pronounced, an infinite Number of Families will be reduced to ſhameful Beggary. " You may conclude from what I have ſaid, that had you Mountains of Copper, and Mines of " Gold, they would hardly defray ſuch Expences; and tho' you had a Body of Iron you would " ſcarcely be able to hold out againſt the Fatigues you muſt undergo.

" The Emperor, whoſe Compaſſion to his People is unbounded, prohibits Law-Suits; and " having your Peace and Unanimity at Heart, is ſo good as to give you Inſtructions himſelf, " to prevent the Broils which may ariſe among you.

" To that end reverence old Age, honour Virtue, reſpect the Rich, and pity the Poor. " Don't you concern yourſelf to rectify what you find out of Order. If you ſuſpect any " Body has a Deſign to diſparage you, never ſeek to revenge yourſelf; if you have Libertines " among you, exhort them with Civility and Mildneſs to change their Life. On the Work Days due " to the Public, ſhew your Unanimity, by your mutual Readineſs to aſſiſt one another. The " next Piece of Advice, which does not leſs concern you is, that if you are rich, you ſhould " not pride yourſelf in keeping plentiful Tables, or in wearing coſtly Apparel; if you have " Authority and Credit, never employ them to oppreſs the Weak and Defenceleſs. What I re- " quire of you is, that you be humble in your Proſperity, as well as active and vigilant in your " Duty. 'Tis my Wiſh alſo, that being quite free from Ambition, you may be content with " a little; and that you would diſtinguiſh yourſelves by Mildneſs, by Moderation, and above all " by Frugality,

" Beware of thoſe Years which happen from time to time, when Epidemic Diſtempers, " joined to a Scarcity of Corn, make all Places deſolate: Your Duty then is to have Compaſ- " ſion on your Fellow-Citizens, and aſſiſt them with whatever you can ſpare.

" This Point, as it promotes your Intereſt, claims your Attention; for by this Means your " Huſbandmen will be faithful, your Fields will not be abandon'd, your Neighbours will be " careful of your Preſervation, and your Intereſt will be that of the Publick: On the other " hand, Heaven, by Ways to you unknown, will protect and ſhower down Bleſſings upon " you.

" As for Tradeſmen and all Mechanics, tho' by the immutable Laws of a ſuperior Being, " they are born to Poverty and in a low Condition; their Happineſs conſiſts in living according " to their Circumſtances, in not being uneaſy at their own Poverty, nor envying others in the " Poſſeſſion of their Wealth. This Rule of Morality will be to them a Source of Peace and " Conſolation. A good Man will aſſuredly proſper; for true Virtue can never remain long in " Obſcurity. You are now acquainted with the Intentions of the Emperor, whereto it behoves " you to conform; which if you do (as I make no doubt but you will) the greateſt Advantages " will accrue from your Obedience: for you will content the Paternal Heart of his Majeſty;

" Diſcord

" Diſcord will be no more ſeen among you; you will ſave the Mandarins the Trouble of multi" plying Arreſts and Puniſhments; and you will promote the Tranquillity and Peace of the " Emperor. When you ſhall return Home apply your ſelves, each of you, ſeriouſly to the " Practice of ſo uſeful a Doctrine".

In this manner every Mandarin gives the People twice a Month a Lecture of Morality; and it is ſo eſſential a Part of his Office, that there are ſome ſorts of Crimes for which, if committed within his Diſtrict, he muſt be accountable. The Quân accountable for the Crimes of the People.

When a Theft or a Murder happens in a City, he is obliged to diſcover the Thief or Murderer, or elſe he will loſe his Employment. If a Crime be committed, as for Inſtance, if a Son ſhould be ſo unnatural as to kill his Father, the Court is no ſooner inform'd of it than all the Mandarins of that Diſtrict are deprived of their Offices. " The Fault is theirs, ſay they, nor " could this Misfortune have happened had they been careful to promote good Morals: For the ſame Reaſon, where the Children have been guilty of extraordinary Crimes, they put their Parents to Death along with them.

As nothing is comparable to the excellent Order eſtabliſhed for the Government of the Empire, ſo no State would be more happy, did all the Mandarins, inſtead of gratifying their Paſſions, conform themſelves ſtrictly to the Laws of their Country: But among ſo great a Number there are always ſome, who, placing their Happineſs in the Pleaſures and Enjoyments of this Life, do not often ſcruple to ſacrifice the moſt ſacred Laws of Reaſon and Juſtice to their private Intereſts. Not free from Corruption.

There are no Tricks or Artifices which ſome of the inferior Officers do not make Uſe of to deceive the ſuperior Mandarins; among the latter there are ſome who endeavour to impoſe upon the ſupreme Tribunals of the Court, and even to deceive the Emperor himſelf. They are ſo dexterous at cloaking their Deſign, under the moſt humble and flattering Expreſſions; and in the Memorials, which they preſent, affect ſuch an Air of Diſ-intereſtedneſs, that it is often a very hard Matter for the Prince not to miſtake Falſehood for Truth.

Beſides, as their Salaries are not always ſufficient to ſupport their Pomp and Luxury, they make no Difficulty to commit Injuſtice, provided they can do it ſecretly; and even Miniſters of State, and chief Preſidents of the ſupreme Courts, have been known to extort Money underhand from the Vice-Roys of Provinces; and theſe again, are forced to recruit themſelves by ſqueezing the ſubordinate Officers, who do not fail to exact from the People wherewithal to defray the Expence.

The Laws, however, have provided againſt this Diſorder by ſeveral Precautions, which keep the Mandarins within Bounds, and ſhelter the People from Extortions. The Emperor [Yong-ching] now reigning, has apply'd a ſtill more effectual Remedy; for he has augmented their Salaries, and declared he will receive no Preſents himſelf: forbidding them to receive more than their Due, under the Penalty of the Law, which ordains, that a Mandarin, who ſhall receive or unjuſtly exact fourſcore Ounces of Silver, ſhall be puniſhed with Death. Means uſed to prevent it.

Beſides this, Firſt, it is difficult to prevent Commotions among the People when they groan under Oppreſſion; and the leaſt Interruption which happens in a Province is imputed to the Vice-Roy, who is almoſt ſure to loſe his Employment, if it be not immediately ſuppreſſed. He is conſidered in the Eye of the Law, as the Head of a great Family, whereof, if the Peace be diſturbed, it muſt be his Fault. 'Tis his Buſineſs to govern the ſubordinate Officers, and hinder them from oppreſſing the People. When the Yoke is eaſy, they are ſo far from ſhaking it off, that they bear it chearfully. (1.) The Quân accountable for all Inſurrections.

Secondly, The Law preſcribes, that no Perſon ſhall be made a Mandarin of the People, either in the City he belongs to, or even in the Provinces where his Family dwells. And commonly he does not poſſeſs the ſame Office many Years, in the ſame Place, before he is advanced; whence it happens, that he contracts no ſuch particular Intimacies with the People of the Country, as may occaſion his being partial: and as almoſt all the other Mandarins, who govern in the ſame Province, are unknown to him, he hath ſeldom any Reaſon to favour them. (2.) None to be preferred in his native Country.

If an Employment be given him in a Province joining to that where he came from, it muſt be in a City at leaſt fifty Leagues from it; the Reaſon is, becauſe a Mandarin ought to think of nothing but the publick Good. If he poſſeſſed a Place in his own Country, his Neighbours and Friends would not fail to ſolicit him, whereby he might either be biaſſed in his Decrees to do Injuſtice to others in their Favour, or carry'd, by a Spirit of Revenge, to ruin or oppreſs thoſe from whom he, or ſome of his Family, had formerly received Injury. Reaſons for this wiſe Regulation.

They are ſo nice in this Reſpect, that they will not permit a Son, a Brother, or a Nephew, &c. to be a ſubordinate Mandarin, where his Brother, Uncle, &c. is the Superior. For Inſtance, Suppoſe ſuch a one is Mandarin of a City of the third Rank, and the Emperor deſigns to ſend his eldeſt Brother to be Vice-Roy of the ſame Province; on this Occaſion, the younger is obliged to give Notice of that Circumſtance to the Court, which removes him to a Mandarinat of the ſame Degree in another Province.

The Reaſon of this Regulation is, becauſe either the elder Brother being the Superior Officer, might favour the younger by conniving at his Faults; or the younger, preſuming on the Dignity and Protection of his Brother, be more partial and remiſs in the execution of his Office. On the other hand, it would be very hard for one Brother to be obliged to draw up an Accuſation againſt another.

To avoid such Inconveniencies, Relations are not permitted to possess Employments which have the least Dependance upon each other. What has been said with regard to a Father, an elder Brother, or an Uncle being a superior Mandarin, ought likewise to be understood of a Son, a Brother, or a Nephew, in the same Station, with Respect to a Father, elder Brother, or Uncle, being their Inferiors; and in a word, of all Persons whatever who are nearly related.

Thirdly, Every three Years there is a general Review of all the Mandarins of the Empire, who are examined with Regard to their good or bad Qualifications for Government. Every superior Mandarin examines the Conduct of the inferior, from the time the last Informations were made, or ever since they have been in Office; and give Notes to each of them, containing Praises or Reprimands. For Instance, the chief Mandarin of a City of the third Rank, who has under him three or four petty Mandarins, gives them Notes, and sends them to the Mandarin of a City of the second Rank, on whom he depends; this latter, who has likewise under him several Mandarins governing Cities of the third Rank, examines these Notes, and either agrees thereto, or adds others, according to his Knowledge.

Notes or Certificates given them.

When the Mandarin of the City of the second Order, has received the Notes from all the Mandarins of the Cities of the third Order, he gives them his Note; and then sends the Catalogue of all the Mandarins in his District, to the Mandarins-General of the Province, who reside at the Capital. This Catalogue passes from them to the Vice-Roy; who after he has examined it in private, and then with the four Mandarins-General, sends it to Court with his own Notes; that the chief Tribunal may have an exact Knowledge of all the Mandarins of the Empire, in order to reward or punish them according to their Deserts.

They reward a Mandarin by raising him some Degrees higher, or giving him a better Place: and they punish him by removing him a few Degrees lower, or turning him out of his Post.

For two Months that this Examination lasts, the Vice-Roy sees no Body, admits no Visits, nor receives any Letters from those who are in his Government. He takes these Measures that he may appear to be a Man of Integrity, and to regard nothing but Merit.

Form of the Notes.

As to the Form of these Notes under the Name of Mandarins, and Title of their Mandarinat, they write: He is a Man greedy of Money; he is too severe in his Punishments; he treats the People harshly: Or else, He is too much advanced in Years. He is no longer able to perform the Duties of his Office. This Man is proud, fantastical, capricious, of an uneven Temper. That Person is rash, passionate, has no command of himself. Such a one is weak in his manner of Governing, does not know how to make himself obey'd; or else, He is slow, he is not expeditious in dispatching Business. He is not well acquainted with the Laws and Customs, &c.

Favourable Notes run in this manner: He is a Man of Integrity, who does not oppress the People, who is attentive to all the Duties of his Office. Or else, He is a Man of Experience. He is steady without Harshness, and gains the Love of the People; He has the Art of governing, &c.

The Quân rewarded or punished according thereto.

When the Catalogue of Notes arrive at Pe-king, the supreme Tribunal to which it is address'd, examine them; and having set down such Reward or Punishment as it appoints for each Mandarin of the Province, send them back to the Vice-Roy. They deprive those of their Employments whose Certificates are defective as to the smallest Point of Government: and raise those who are commended, to superior Mandarinats. For Instance, one who has been Mandarin of a City of a third Rank, and has given Proof of his Capacity, is advanced to the Government of a City of the second Rank, for which he seems to have the necessary Talents.

They are contented with raising or turning down others a few Degrees; in which Case the Mandarins are obliged to put at the Head of their Orders, the Number of Degrees that they have been advanced or degraded. For Instance, The Mandarins of this City, raised three Degrees, Kya-san-kye: or else, Kyang-san-kye, turned down three Degrees, do give Notice and ordain, &c. By this Means the People are apprized of the Reward or Punishment that the Mandarin deserved. When he has been raised ten Degrees, he has room to hope that he will be advanced to a superior Mandarinat: On the contrary, if he has been depressed ten Degrees, he is in Danger of losing his Employment.

(4) The sending Inspectors into the Provinces.

Fourthly; As the General Officers might be corrupted with Bribes, by the Governors of Cities, and so connive at the Injustice of the Mandarins who oppress the People; the Emperor from time to time sends Inspectors secretly into the Provinces, who passing from City to City, slip into the Tribunals, while the Mandarin gives Audience; and also by their Enquiry among the Mechanics and common People, dexterously inform themselves in what Manner he behaves in the Administration of his Office. And if by these secret Informations, they discover any thing irregular in his Conduct, they presently unveil the Ensigns of their Dignity, and declare themselves the Emperor's Envoys.

As the Inspector's Authority is absolute, he that Moment prosecutes the faulty Mandarins, and punishes them with all the Rigor of the Laws; but if the Injustice be not very flagrant, he sends his Information to Court, that they may determine what is to be done.

Method of their Proceedings.

A few Years ago, the Emperor appointed Commissioners of this kind for the Province of Quang-tong, to enquire into an Affair which concern'd the Vice-Roy and the Comptroller General of Salt, who had sent Accusations to Pe-king against each other. The People of the Province, who suffered by the dearness of Salt, the Price of which was considerably augmented, took the Vice-Roy's Part, and most of the Mandarins General spoke in favour of the latter.

The

The Emperor being very desirous of knowing who was in the Fault, sent the Tsong-tû of the Provinces of Che-kyang and Fo-kyen; and the Tsong-tû of Kyang-nan and Kyang-si, in Quality of his Commissioners to Kan-ton. At their Arrival they refused the usual Honours paid at their Reception; and to remove all Suspicion, that they might be gained to either Side by Presents, they had even no Communication with the Mandarins, but when they cited them one after another to take their Informations. For which Reason, without receiving or making any Visit, they went directly to the Palace prepared for them, and shut themselves up, till such time as having cited the Vice-Roy and Comptroller General they had begun the Process, by repeated Interrogatories put to those two great Mandarins, who appeared several Times like common Criminals before their Judges.

The Vice-Roy, during the whole Time of the Trial, was obliged to leave his Palace every Morning, and repair to a Place near the Hall of Audience, and there to wait till Night; in which he was treated yet more favourably than the Comptroller-General, who was obliged all the Time to absent himself from his Tribunal, and to be continually at the Door of the Audience-Chamber.

All the Shops in the City were shut up, and the People by their Deputies, sent in their Accusations against the Comptroller, which were received by the Commissioners, as well as those of the Mandarins. The Informations being ended, the Commissioners sent them to Pe-king, by a particular Express; after which they received Visits from all the Mandarins, except the Comptroller-General.

(5) The Emperor visiting the Provinces in Person.

Fifthly, Tho' the Inspectors of Provinces are always chosen from among the Officers of considerable Posts, and known Integrity; yet, as they may sometimes abuse their Power, and be tempted to enrich themselves by taking Bribes from the Guilty, to wink at their Injustice; to keep them upon their Guard, the Emperor, when they least think of it, makes a Progress into certain Provinces, that he may hear in Person the just Complaints of the People against their Governors. These Visits, wherein the Prince affects to render himself popular, make the Mandarins tremble, let their Conduct be ever so little liable to blame. The late Emperor Kang-hi in one of his Journeys into the Southern Provinces, made in 1689, passed thro' the Cities of Sû-chew, Yang-chew, and Nan-king. He was on Horseback, follow'd by his Guards, and about three thousand Gentlemen, in which manner he made his Entry into the last. The Citizens came to receive him with Standards, silk Ensigns, Canopies, Umbrellas, and other Ornaments without Number. At the Distance of every twenty Paces they had erected in the Streets Triumphal Arches cover'd with the finest Stuffs, and adorn'd with Festons, Ribbands, and Tufts of Silk, under which he pass'd. The Streets were lin'd with an infinite Number of People, who shew'd the greatest Marks of Veneration, and observ'd so profound a Silence, that there was not heard the least Noise. He lay in his Bark the Night he arrived at Yang-chew, and the next Day made his Entry on Horseback into the City; where finding the Streets cover'd with Carpets, he ask'd the Inhabitants, if that had been done by the Mandarin's Order: and finding they did it of their own accord, to give a public Testimony of their Veneration for his Majesty, he express'd his Satisfaction. The Streets were so full of Men and Children, who throng'd among the Horsemen, that the Emperor stopt every Moment, seeming to be highly delighted with it. The Inhabitants of Sû-chew, having laid Carpets upon the Pavement of the Streets, the Emperor alighted, at the Entrance of the City, and commanded the Horses to stop, that they might not spoil so many fine pieces of Silk, which belonged to the People: he went therefore on Foot to the Palace prepar'd for him, and honour'd the City with his Presence for two Days.

Kang-hi's Progress in 1689.

In these kinds of Journeys the Emperor declares himself the Protector and Father of the People, by executing speedy and severe Justice upon the Mandarins, when the Complaints against them are just. P. le Comte relates an Example of this, by which the late Emperor Kang-hi render'd himself equally formidable to the Mandarins, and amiable to the People.

His speedy Justice on a Tartarian Quan.

" This great Prince being separated at some Distance from his Attendants, (says that Jesuit) " and perceiving an old Man who wept bitterly, ask'd the Cause of his Tears. My Lord, " reply'd the Man, who did not know him, I had but one Child, in whom I placed all " my Joy as well as the Care of my Family; and a Tartarian Mandarin has taken him " from me, so that I am at present deprived of all Succour: for how can I, who am " a poor weak Man, oblige the Governor to do me Justice? This is not so difficult as you " think it, (reply'd the Emperor) get up behind me, and guide me to the House of this " Ravisher. The good Man obey'd without Ceremony, and in two Hours time they arriv'd " at the Mandarin's Palace, who did not expect such an extraordinary Visit.

" Mean time the Guards and a great Company of Lords, after long rambling about, " arriv'd at the Mandarin's; and without knowing what was the matter, some surrounded " the House, while others enter'd with the Emperor: who having convicted the Mandarin of " the Violence he was accused of, condemned him to lose his Head on the Spot. After " this turning towards the afflicted Father, " To make you full Amends, said he to him with " a serious Air, I give you the Employment of the guilty Person, who is put to Death. Take " Care to behave yourself in it with more Moderation than he did; and let his Crime and " Punishment be a Warning to you, that in your turn you be not made an Example of."

Lastly, Nothing can be more instructive, as well as proper, to keep the Mandarins in Order, and prevent their committing Faults, than the Gazette, which is printed every Day at Pe-king, and dispers'd from thence into all the Provinces. There is nothing inserted in it, but what what relates to the Government; and as that of China is abſolutely Monarchical, and all Affairs however inconſiderable are referr'd to the Emperor; it contains nothing but what may be of great Uſe to direct the Mandarins in the Execution of their Offices, and inſtruct the Literati as well as the Commonalty. For Inſtance, you find there the Names of the Mandarins who have been deprived of their Employments, and for what Reaſons; one, becauſe he was negligent in gathering the Emperor's Tribute, or had imbezzel'd it; another for being either too indulgent or ſevere in his Puniſhments; this for his Oppreſſions, and that for want of Talents to govern well. If any Mandarin has been advanc'd to a conſiderable Place, or remov'd to a worſe; or if he has been depriv'd, for ſome Fault, of the Annual Penſion he receiv'd of the Emperor, it is immediately put into the Gazette.

Nature of the Articles contain'd in it.

It contains an Account of all Criminal Matters, which are puniſh'd with Death; likewiſe the Names of the Officers who fill the Places of the Mandarins that are remov'd; all the Calamities that happen in a Province, and the Relief given by the Mandarins of the reſpective Cities by the Emperor's Order; an Extract of the Expences diſburſed for the Subſiſtance of the Soldiers, the Neceſſities of the People, the Public Works, and the Benefaction of the Prince; the Remonſtrances made by the Supreme Tribunal to the Emperor, concerning his own Conduct or his Deciſions; therein is mention'd alſo the Day when the Emperor plough'd the Earth, in order by his Example to excite Emulation in the People, and inſpire their Governours with a Love of Labour and Application to Agriculture; the Time he has fix'd for aſſembling the Grandees of the Court, and all the Chief Mandarins of the Tribunals at Pe-king, to be inſtructed by him in their Duty. There you meet with the Laws, and new Cuſtoms that have been eſtabliſh'd; as alſo the Praiſes or Reprimands given by the Emperor to a Mandarin; for Inſtance, Such a Mandarin has no good Reputation; if he does not mend, I will puniſh him.

In ſhort, the Chineſe Gazette is ſo contrived, that it is of great Uſe to inſtruct the Mandarins how to govern the People; for which Reaſon they read it carefully, and as it gives an account of all the public Tranſactions in this vaſt Empire, moſt of them write down Remarks upon the Paſſages in it, that may help to direct their Conduct.

To add any thing to it criminal.

Nothing is printed in the Gazette but what has been preſented the Emperor, or comes from him; thoſe who have the Care of it not daring to add a tittle, not even their own Reflections, upon pain of Corporal Puniſhments.

In 1726, a Writer belonging to a Tribunal, and another employ'd in the Poſt-Office, were condemned to die, for having inſerted certain Falſhoods in the Gazette; the Reaſon, upon which the Tribunal of Criminal Affairs founded their Judgment, was, that what they had done ſhew'd a Failure of Reſpect towards his Majeſty, which is by the Laws declar'd Capital.

The Quân reſtrain'd from Pleaſure.

To conclude, the Laws prohibit the Mandarins moſt of the common Pleaſures of Life. They are but ſeldom permitted to treat their Friends, and give them a Play; they would riſk their Fortune if they took the Liberty to game or walk abroad, to make private Viſits, or frequent public Aſſemblies; being debarr'd all Diverſions but what they can take in the moſt private Apartments of their own Palace.

Of the Military Government and Forces of the Empire; the Forts and Soldiers, their Arms and Artillery.

AS there were formerly in France Knights belonging to the Army, and Knights belonging to the Laws, there are likewiſe in China Literary Doctors, and Military Doctors. Having already ſpoken of the firſt, upon whom the Government depends, we proceed now to the latter, who are appointed to preſerve Tranquillity in the Empire, to keep their Neighbours in Awe, and to ſtifle or prevent Rebellions.

Degrees among the Military Quân.

The Military Mandarins, or Officers of the Army, muſt paſs ſeveral Examinations, as well as the Literary Mandarins, and give Proof of their Strength, Dexterity, and Experience in the Art of War. Accordingly there are three Degrees among them, which they are to take, viz. thoſe of Batchelor, Licentiate, and Doctor of Arms. The Batchelors are examined in the Capital of every Province, in order to be Licentiates, in the Manner explain'd elſewhere.

5 Tribunals or Claſſes.

There are at Pe-king five Tribunals of Military Mandarins, call'd U-fû, that is, The five Claſſes, or Troops of Mandarins of War.

The firſt Claſs is that of the Mandarins of the Rear-Guard, call'd Heou-fû. The ſecond conſiſts of the Mandarins of the left Wing, which is nam'd Tſo-fû. The third is of the Mandarins of the right Wing, call'd Yeou-fû. The fourth of the Mandarins of the Van-Guard of the main Body, named Chong-fû. The fifth of the Mandarins of the Van-Guard, call'd Tſien-fû.

Theſe five Claſſes have at their Head a Chief [or Preſident] and two Aſſiſtants, which are of the firſt Order of Mandarinss. They commonly chooſe for theſe Poſts great Lords of the Empire, and

theſe

theſe are they who command the Officers and all the Soldiers. Theſe five depend on a Supreme Tribunal of War, call'd Yong-ching-ſû, whoſe Preſident is one of the greateſt Lords of the Empire, and has Authority over the five Tribunals, and all the Officers and Soldiers of the Court; but to prevent the Abuſe of ſo extenſive a Power, which renders him Maſter of ſo many Troops, they give him a Literary Mandarin for an Aſſiſtant, with the Title of Superintendant of the Army, and two Inſpectors nam'd by the Emperor, who have their Share in all Affairs. Moreover, when the Execution of any Military Project is in Agitation, they depend abſolutely on the fourth of the ſix Supreme Courts, call'd Ping-pû, already ſpoken of, which has the whole Militia of the Empire under its Juriſdiction.

Supreme Tribunal of Yong-ching-ſû or Zhong-ching-ſu.

Tho' there are great Lords, who, holding in the Empire the Rank of Princes, Dukes, and Earls, are above all the Orders of Mandarins, by their Dignity, Merit, and Services; yet there is not one of them but thinks himſelf honour'd by the Title he derives from his Mandarinat, and the Quality of Chief of the five Tribunals of Military Mandarins. None can be more ambitious to command than the Chineſe, placing all their Glory and Happineſs in having Authority in the State.

The Rank and Buſineſs of the principal Military Mandarin is much the ſame with that of a General in Europe. He has under him in ſome Places four Mandarins, and in others only two, whoſe Employment is not unlike that of our Lieutenant-Generals, who have likewiſe four ſubordinate Mandarins, anſwering to Colonels; theſe again have under them others, who may be conſidered as Captains, and have likewiſe their ſubaltern Officers reſembling our Lieutenants and Enſigns.

Degrees of Military Quân.

Each of theſe Mandarins has a Train ſuitable to his Dignity; and when he appears in Public, he is always attended by a Company of Officers belonging to his Tribunal. All of them together command a great number of Troops, partly Horſe, and partly Foot.

Theſe Officers exerciſe their Soldiers regularly: the Exerciſe conſiſting in a kind of tumultuous and diſorderly Marches, which they perform when they attend the Mandarins; or elſe in forming Squadrons, in filing off in Order, in encountering each other, or in rallying at the Sound of Horns and Trumpets; in a Word, they draw the Bow, and handle the Sabre with a great deal of Skill. They alſo from time to time review their Troops, examining carefully their Horſes, Muſkets, Sabres, Arrows, Cuiraſſes, and Helmets. If there be the leaſt Ruſt on their Arms, they are puniſh'd on the Spot for their Negligence; with thirty or forty Blows of a Battoon, if they are Chineſe; or ſo many Laſhes of a Whip, if they are Tartars. At other times they are at Liberty to follow what Trade they pleaſe, unleſs they are on ſome Duty which gives them full Employ; as when, for Inſtance, they are placed to guard a City-Gate, or to take Care of the high Roads.

Diſcipline of the Troops.

As the Military Buſineſs does not take up much of their Time in a Country which has been ſo many Years at Peace; far from being oblig'd to inliſt Men by Force, or Money, as is practiſed in Europe, the Profeſſion of a Soldier is commonly look'd upon as a Fortune, which they endeavour to procure by means of their Friends, or by Preſents to the Mandarins; the Service being generally in the Country where they dwell, and have their Family.

Profeſſion of a Soldier coveted in China.

The three Northern Provinces furniſh abundance of Soldiers, who every three Months receive their Pay; being five Sous of fine Silver, and a Meaſure of Rice a day, which is ſufficient to maintain one Man. Some have double Pay, and Horſemen have five Sous more, with two Meaſures of ſmall Beans to feed their Horſes, which alſo are provided by the Emperor.

The Pay.

They reckon more than eighteen thouſand Mandarins of War, and above ſeven hundred thouſand Soldiers diſtributed among the Forts, Cities, and Fortifications, belonging to the ſeveral Provinces, and along the Great Wall. Theſe Troops being well cloathed, and well arm'd, make a very fine Appearance in their March, or on a Review; but they are not comparable to the Soldiers of Europe, either for Courage or Diſcipline, being eaſily put into Diſorder and routed.

Number of Military Quân and Forces.

Beſides, that the Chineſe are naturally effeminate, and the Tartars are almoſt degenerated to Chineſe, the profound Peace they have enjoy'd, gives them no Opportunity to become Warlike. Add to this the Eſteem that they have for Learning preferable to every thing elſe; the Dependance which the Soldiers have on the Literati; and the Education that is given to Youth, (who ſee nothing but Books and Characters, who are inſtructed with a grave and ſerious Air, and hear nothing ſpoken of but Law and Politics,) are ſo many Obſtructions to their being Warriors. Theſe Troops are ſcarce ever employ'd, eſpecially ſince Tartary has ſubmitted, for any thing elſe, but to prevent Revolts, or to quaſh Commotions on their firſt Appearance in a City or Province. Twenty four Tartar Officers have at Court the Dignity of Captain-Generals, and there are likewiſe many Colonels. Beſides theſe Officers, who were eſtabliſh'd by the Tartars, there are alſo Officers of the Ping-pû, or Tribunal of War; who ſuperintend the Chineſe Troops throughout the Empire, and have always Couriers ready to carry neceſſary Orders into the Provinces, which is perform'd with great Secrecy. Their chief Employment is to purge the high Ways of Robbers, whom they follow and obſerve ſo carefully, that they ſeldom eſcape. On theſe Occaſions, Orders are ſent to the City, and, if there be a Neceſſity for it, the Forces of ſeveral Cities, neareſt to the Place infeſted by the Robbers, are employ'd. In War-time ſeveral Battallions are detach'd from every Province to form an Army.

Chineſe no good Soldiers, and why.

Number of Generals.

Before the Union of the Tartars and Chineſe, a prodigious Number of Troops were rang'd along the Great Wall, in order to guard it, and cover the Empire againſt the Attempts of ſuch formidable Enemies; but at preſent only the moſt important Places are garriſon'd.

China fortify'd by Nature.

Nature has taken care to fortify China in all other Places, where it might be liable to be attacked. The Sea, which waſhes ſix Provinces, is ſo ſhallow near the Shore that no large Veſſel can approach it, without being broken to Pieces; and Storms are ſo frequent that no Fleet can ride there in ſafety: On the Weſt there are inacceſſible Mountains, which are no leſs a Defence on that ſide, than the Sea and the Great Wall on the other two.

Great Wall, when and how built.

Two Hundred and Fifteen Years before Chriſt, this prodigious Work was built, by order of the Firſt Emperor of the Family of Tſin, for ſecuring three great Provinces againſt the Irruptions of the Tartars. To execute this grand Deſign he drew every third Man, capable of working, out of each Province; and in laying the Foundation of it on the Sea-Coaſt, he ordered ſeveral Ships loaden with Iron and huge Stones to be ſunk: whereon the Wall was raiſed with ſo much Art, that the Workmen were not to leave the leaſt Chink between the Stones on Forfeiture of their Lives; hence the Work is almoſt as intire at preſent, as when it was firſt built. It is about 500 Leagues in Length, and broad enough for ſix Horſemen to ride abreaſt upon it. [See p. 20.]

This Wall is admirable on two accounts; Firſt, That in its Courſe from Eaſt to Weſt it runs in ſeveral Places with a gradual Aſcent, over very high Mountains; and is fortify'd with large Towers, no more than two Bow-ſhots a ſunder, that no part of it may be left undefended. It is hard to conceive how this enormous Bulwark could be raiſed, of the Height it is, in dry and barren Places; conſidering the Bricks, Mortar, and all the neceſſary Materials for the Work muſt have been brought with incredible Labour from a great Diſtance.

The ſecond is, That this Wall does not run in a ſtrait Line, but, as may be ſeen in the Map, turns and winds in ſeveral Places, according to the Diſpoſition of the Mountains, in ſuch a manner, that the North Part of China may be ſaid to be encompaſſed with three Walls inſtead of one.

Chineſe Fortifications.

The Cities of War have no Advantage of other fortified Cities but in their Situation, which renders them difficult of Acceſs. The whole Art of Fortification among the Chineſe conſiſts in an excellent Rampart, Brick-Walls, Towers, and a large Ditch full of Water; and, to ſay the Truth, this is ſufficient Security againſt all Efforts of Enemies, who are as ignorant of the offenſive as the defenſive part of War.

Fortreſſes ſeveral kinds.

The Forts, fortified Places, and Cittadels, are very numerous, and diſtinguiſh'd in ſeven different Orders, named by the Chineſe, Quang, Ghey, So, Chin, Pau, Pû and Chay. There are about ſix hundred of the firſt Order, five hundred and upward of the ſecond, three hundred and eleven of the third, three hundred of the fourth, one hundred and fifty of the fifth, and three hundred of the laſt: which make above two thouſand fortified Places, without reckoning the Towers, Caſtles, and Redoubts of the famous Wall, which have every one its particular Name and Garriſon.

Places of Refuge.

Among the latter, there are Places of Refuge in the middle of the Fields, whither the Huſbandmen and Peaſants retire with their Flocks and Moveables, in caſe of Commotions, which rarely happen, or of the ſudden Incurſion of Robbers, where they are ſecure from all Inſults. There are others built on the Tops of Rocks and craggy Mountains, inacceſſible but by Ladders or Steps cut into the Rock. Theſe Places are not encompaſs'd with Walls, their Strength conſiſting ſolely in their impregnable Situation, or in deep and broad Ditches capable of ſtopping the Rebels in their March. They reckon, beſides theſe, more than three thouſand Towers, or Caſtles called Tay; wherein are conſtantly kept Centinels and other Soldiers on Duty, who, when they diſcover any Diſturbance, make a Signal: in the Day, by a Flag on the Top of the Tower, and in the Night, by a lighted Torch, to alarm the Neighbouring Garriſons; for there is not a Province, City, nor walled Town in the Empire, but what has Soldiers for its Defence.

Artillery and Gunpowder.

Artillery is but a modern Invention among the Chineſe, and tho' that of Gunpowder is very ancient, they have ſeldom made uſe of it but for Fireworks, wherein they excel. There are however three or four Bombards ſhort and thick at the Gates of Nan-king, ancient enough to prove that they have had ſome Knowledge of Cannon, tho' they ſeem'd to be ignorant of their Uſe; for they ſerve for nothing but to be ſhewn as Curioſities. They had alſo a few Patarreroes on Board their Veſſels, but had not ſkill enough to make uſe of them.

European Cannon admired.

In the Year 1621, the City of Ma-kau having preſented the Emperor with three Cannon, and Men to manage them, the firſt Trial of them was made before the Mandarins; who were greatly ſurprized at the Novelty, but more when they ſaw that one of the Pieces in recoiling kill'd a Portugueſe, and three Chineſe, who did not get out of the way time enough. Theſe Guns being employ'd againſt the Tartars, who came in ſwarms towards the Great Wall, they were ſo terrify'd at the Havock made by them, that they fled, and durſt never approach it any more.

P. Schaal ordered by the Emperor to caſt ſome.

In the Year 1636, when the Perſecution was raiſed againſt the Miſſionaries, who had not dar'd to appear for ten Years, the Tartars having made a new Irruption into the Empire, the military Mandarins conſulted about Meaſures for putting a ſtop to their Inroads, and talked of fortifying the Towns, and furniſhing them with Artillery. On this occaſion, remembering they had often heard Dr. Paul Syu ſay, that the Miſſionaries underſtood the Art of founding Cannon, they immediately beſought the Emperor to command P. Adam Schaal, Preſident of the Tribunal of the Mathematicks, to caſt ſome. His Majeſty was deſirous to know before hand if this Father had ever actually founded any, or knew how to do it. But the Mandarins taking upon themſelves to make the Enquiry, without letting him perceive their Deſign, intreated the Emperor to haſten the Order, which they were not to make uſe of unleſs a proper Occaſion offered. Having obtained what they deſired, they made the Father a Viſit, under pretence of propoſing ſome Difficulty in Aſtronomy, and putting him Queſtions concerning ſeveral parts of the Mathematics: among the reſt aſked him, as it were by chance, if he underſtood the method of caſting Cannon; and the Father replying that he underſtood its Principles, they immediately preſented him the Emperor's Orders. The Miſſionary excuſed himſelf, by alledging that the Practice was quite different from the Theory; but obey he muſt, and inſtruct the Workmen. Accordingly they aſſigned him a proper Place near the Palace, that he might be aſſiſted by the Eunuchs of the Court. Afterwards the ſeveral Pieces of Work relating to Optics, Statics, Architecture and Fortification, and ſeveral Inſtruments of Wood and Copper, made by P. Ferdinand Verbieſt, for the Obſervatory at Peking, perſwaded the Mandarins that he muſt be equally ſkilled in founding Cannon; which they wanted in order to defend the Empire againſt its Enemies, and eſpecially certain Robbers who infeſted the Coaſts and Frontiers of China, from whence it was difficult to chaſe them.

For this reaſon they preſented a Memorial to the Emperor, beſeeching him to order P. Verbieſt to inſtruct Workmen in the manner of founding and making of Cannon, for the Preſervation of the State. The Jeſuit having read in the Regiſter of the Church of Pe-king, that a great number of Miſſionaries have been brought into the Empire by the ſame means, under the laſt Family of the Chineſe Emperors; and believing that ſuch a piece of Service done for the Emperor would induce him to favour the Romiſh Religion, he caſt 130 Pieces of Cannon with wonderful Succeſs. P. Verbieſt caſts 130 Cannon.

Some time after, the Council of the Chief Mandarins of War, having preſented a Memorial to the Emperor, whereby they required 320 Pieces of Cannon, of different Bores, after the European Faſhion, for the defence of the fortified Places; his Majeſty granted their Requeſt, and order'd that Nan-whay-jin (for ſo the Chineſe called P. Verbieſt) ſhould overſee the Work, which was to be perform'd accordingly to the Patterns, to be painted and preſented him in a Memorial. Accordingly the 11th of February 1681, P. Verbieſt having preſented the Patterns, they were approved of; and an Order was ſent to the Tribunal, which has the Inſpection of the Publick Buildings and Works, to furniſh all things neceſſary for the Purpoſe without Delay. Caſts 320 more.

It took up above a Year to make theſe Cannon, in which time the Father met with many Obſtructions from the Eunuchs of the Palace, who, impatient to ſee a Stranger ſo much in favour with the Emperor, us'd their utmoſt endeavours to defeat the Undertaking; they complained every Moment of the Slowneſs of the Workmen, while they cauſed the Metal to be ſtolen away by the Under-Officers of the Court. As ſoon as one of the largeſt Guns was caſt, before it could be poliſhed on the inſide, they forced an Iron Bullet into the Mouth of it, thinking thereby to render it uſeleſs; but Verbieſt having charged it thro' the Touchhole, it was fired out with ſuch a terrible Noiſe, that the Emperor hearing it in the Palace wou'd needs ſee it repeated. When all the Cannon were finiſhed, they were taken to the foot of the Mountains, half a Day's Journey Weſt from Peking, whither ſeveral Mandarins went to ſee them tried; whereof report being made to the Emperor, he went himſelf, with ſeveral Governors of Weſtern Tartary, who were then at Peking, and the principal Officers of his Army, beſides his whole Court, to ſee the Experiment. Accordingly they were loaded in his Preſence, and diſcharged ſeveral times againſt ſuch Places as he directed. They are a Year in making.

Obſerving that the Balls hit the Places they were levell'd at by the Jeſuit with his Inſtruments, he was ſo greatly pleaſed that he made a ſolemn Feaſt for the Tartarian Governor, and principal Officers of the Army, in the middle of the Fields under Tents; drinking out of his Golden Cup, to the Health of his Father-in-Law, of his Officers, and even of thoſe who had ſo exactly directed the Cannon. At length ſending for P. Verbieſt, who by his Orders was lodged near his own Tent, he ſaid to him, The Cannon you cauſed to be made for me the laſt Year were very ſerviceable againſt the Rebels, in the Provinces of Shen-ſi, Hû-quang and Kyang-ſi, and I am well ſatisfied with your Services; then taking off his Veſt furred with Martin-ſkins of great value, and alſo his Gown that was under it, he gave them to him as a Teſtimony of his Friendſhip. Who honours Verbieſt.

They continued ſeveral Days to make Proof of the Guns, in which time they diſcharged twenty three thouſand Bullets, to the great Satisfaction of the Mandarins, whoſe Officers aſſiſted at the ſame time. P. Verbieſt compoſed a Treatiſe on the founding of Cannon, and their Uſe, which he preſented the Emperor; with forty four Tables of Figures neceſſary for underſtanding the Art, and of the Inſtruments proper to level the Cannon for ſhooting at any Mark.

A few Months afterwards, the Tribunal for enquiring into the Deſerts of Perſons who have done ſervice to the State, preſented a Memorial to the Emperor, wherein they beſought him to have regard to the Service P. Verbieſt had done, by caſting ſo many Pieces of Artillery. His Majeſty granted their Petition, and beſtow'd on him a Title of Honour, like that confer'd on the Vice-Roys, when they have deſerved well in their Government by their prudent Conduct. To prevent the Superſtition of the Chineſe, who ſacrifice to the Spirit of the Air, Mountains and Rivers, according to the various natural Events, and the different Works they begin or finiſh, P. Verbieſt fixed a Day to bleſs the Cannon in a ſolemn Manner. For this purpoſe he erected an Altar in the Foundary, on which he placed a Crucifix, and then in his Surplice and Stole, adored the true God, making nine Proſtrations, and beating his Forehead againſt the Ground; and as it is the Cuſtom in China to give Names to ſuch kinds of Works, the Father gave to every Piece of Cannon the Names of a he or ſhe Saint of the Romiſh Church, tracing the Characters that were to be engraven on the Breech of the Gun. The Jeſuit bleſſes the Cannon.

Some Perſons, with a deſign to render the Jeſuits odious, publiſhed Libels in Spain and Italy againſt P. Verbieſt; affirming, that it was unworthy of a Prieſt and a Regular to furniſh the Infidels with Arms, and that he had incurred the Excommunications of the Popes who have forbidden it.

The

The Father prudently reply'd, That the Intention of the Church in this Prohibition, was to hinder the Infidels from making uſe of thoſe Arms againſt the Chriſtians; that nothing like this could happen in China, ſince neither the Chineſe nor Tartars could make war againſt the Chriſtians: That, on the contrary, by this means the Romiſh Religion was eſtabliſhed in China; ſince the Emperor, in recompence of ſuch a Service, gave the Miſſionaries leave to preach throughout his Dominions.

But P. Verbieſt is cleared from theſe Invectives by the honourable Brief ſent him by Pope Innocent XIth; who therein praiſes him for having ſo wiſely employed the profane Sciences for the Converſion of the Chineſe, and exhorts him to continue, by his Zeal and Knowledge, to promote his Religion, promiſing him all the Aſſiſtance of the Holy See, and his Pontifical Authority.

Of the Polity of the Chineſe, as well in the Cities for maintaining good Order, as in the great Roads for the Safety and Conveniency of Travellers; of the Cuſtom-Houſes, Ports, &c.

IN ſuch a vaſt Dominion as China, ſo prodigiouſly populous, and ſo full of Cities, there would be nothing but Confuſion and Diſorder, if the Regulations were not ſo exactly obſerved as to prevent the leaſt Diſturbances; the Repoſe which it enjoys being the Effect of the Wiſdom of its Laws.

Cities divided into Wards.

Every City is divided into Wards, each of which has a Head, who keeps an Eye over a certain Number of Houſes, being reſponſible for whatever paſſes within his Precinct; ſo that ſhould any Tumult happen, and he neglect immediately to inform the Mandarin about it, he would be very ſeverely puniſh'd.

Maſters of Families are equally reſponſible for the Conduct of their Children and Servants; he who has all the Authority being deem'd culpable, when his Inferiors, who owe him Obedience and Reſpect, have committed any Crime. The very Neighbours themſelves are obliged to lend mutual Aſſiſtance when any Misfortune happens, for Inſtance, a Robbery in the Night; and in ſuch Caſes one Houſe anſwers for the next.

Guards at the Gates.

There is always a good Guard at the Gates of every City, who examine all Paſſengers; and if they ſee any thing ſuſpicious about a Man, if his Phyſiognomy, Air, or Accent, diſcover him to be a Stranger, he is immediately ſtopp'd, and Notice given to the Mandarin.

One of their principal Maxims, and which they believe contributes moſt to good Government, is, not to ſuffer Foreigners to ſettle in the Empire; for beſides their hereditary Pride, and Contempt of other Nations, whom they look upon as barbarous, they are perſuaded, that a Mixture of People would introduce a Diverſity of Manners and Cuſtoms, which would gradually produce perſonal Quarrels, Parties and Rebellions, fatal to the Tranquility of the Empire.

None abroad after Night-fall.

As ſoon as Night falls, the Gates of the City, as alſo the Barricades at the End of every Street are carefully ſhut; and at proper Diſtances there are Centries, to ſtop thoſe who are abroad. In ſome Places there are Horſemen continually patrolling upon the Ramparts; The Night, ſay they, is for Repoſe, and the Day for Work. This Law is ſo well obſerved, that no People of Credit will be ſeen at Night in the Streets; and if any one happens to be found, he is look'd upon as a Scoundrel or Robber, on the Lurch to do Miſchief by favour of the Darkneſs, and therefore he is ſtopp'd: So that it is very dangerous to be abroad at unſeaſonable Hours; it being difficult, however innocent, to eſcape the Severity of the Magiſtrates.

Watches of the Night.

There are in every City large Bells, or a Drum of a very extraordinary Size, with which they diſtinguiſh the Watches of the Night. Every Watch laſts two Hours. The firſt begins about Eight in the Evening, during which they ſtrike from time to time one Stroke, either on the Bell or on the Drum; in like manner, they ſtrike two Strokes throughout the ſecond Watch, three in the third, and ſo on; inſomuch that at any Time of the Night, one may know within a Trifle what it is o' Clock. The Sound of their Bells is not very harmonious, becauſe the Hammer which they ſtrike with is not of Metal, but of Wood.

The Gate of Arms is only for the Uſe of Soldiers, who ſeldom are in their military Accoutrements but when on Duty, as in time of War, when they keep Guards; when they paſs in Review, or when they attend the Mandarins; at other times they apply themſelves to Trade, or follow their own private Profeſſions.

If there happens to be a Quarrel among the Populace, and from abuſive Language they come to Blows, they are extremely careful not to ſhed Blood; for which Reaſon if they chance to have any Stick or Iron Weapons in their Hands, they lay it aſide, and fall a Boxing.

They commonly end their Quarrels by complaining to a Mandarin, who ſitting in his Chair of State, and ſurrounded with his Officers, very calmly hears both Parties plead their own Cauſe; after which he cauſes the culpable, and ſometimes both Parties, to be baſtonadoed in his Preſence.

There

There are common Proſtitutes in China as well as elſewhere; but as they generally cauſe Diſturbances, they are not permitted to live within the Walls of the City, or have private Houſes to themſelves; but ſeveral of them lodge together, and often under the Government of a Man, who is reſponſible for any Diſorder. After all, theſe looſe Women are but barely tolerated, being look'd upon as infamous; and ſome Governors of Cities will not permit them to live within their Diſtricts. Common Women how regulated.

In ſhort, the Education they give to Youth, contributes much to the Repoſe which the Cities enjoy; for as Offices and Dignities are obtained according to the Progreſs made in the Sciences, young Perſons are kept continually to their Studies, being wholly debarr'd from Play, and all Diverſions likely to promote Idleneſs: by which cloſe Application to cultivate their Minds, and exerciſe their Memories, they are accuſtomed to moderate their unruly Paſſions, and free from a great Part of thoſe Vices that neceſſarily attend Idleneſs and Sloth.

Nor is the Government leſs careful to render the great Roads ſafe, handſome and commodious, than to preſerve Peace in the Cities. The numerous Canals, ſo uſeful for the tranſporting of Merchandizes into ſeveral Provinces, are border'd with Quays of hewn Stone; and in low, marſhy, and watery Places, very long Cauſeways have been raiſed for the Conveniency of Travellers. The great Roads.

Great Care is taken to keep the Roads even, and often to have them well pav'd, eſpecially in the Southern Provinces, where they uſe neither Horſes nor Waggons. The Roads are commonly very broad, and as in many Places the Soil is light, it dries almoſt as ſoon as the Rain ceaſes. They have made Ways over the higheſt Mountains, by cutting thro' Rocks, levelling the Tops of Hills, and filling up the Valleys. kept in Order;

In ſome Provinces the high Roads are like ſo many great Walks, having very tall Trees, and ſometimes Walls on each Side, eight Foot high, to prevent Travellers from riding over the Fields; with Openings into the Croſs-ways leading to different Villages. like Garden-Walks.

In the great Roads there are at proper Diſtances reſting Places, very neat and conveniently fenced, as well againſt the Winter Cold as the Summer Heats. Moſt of the Mandarins on their Return to their own Country, after being diſmiſs'd from their Employments, endeavour to recommend themſelves by Works of this Kind. with reſting Places.

There are alſo Temples and Pagods, which afford a Retreat in the Day time, but it is with great Difficulty that any Perſon is permitted to ſtay there all Night, except the Mandarins, who have that Privilege. The Bonzas wait on them with great Affection, receiving them with the Sound of Muſical Inſtruments, and lodging them in their own Apartments: They alſo take Care of their Baggage, their Servants and Porters.

This ſort of Gentlemen make very free with their Gods; for they put their Temples to all manner of Uſes, not thinking ſuch Familiarity inconſiſtent with the Reverence due to them.

There are ſome charitable Perſons, who hire Men to diſtribute Tea to poor Travellers in the Summer, and in the Winter a kind of Water with Ginger infuſed in it; requiring no other Return, but that they would not forget the Name of their Benefactors.

Inns are numerous enough on the Roads; but nothing can be more wretched or ill contrived, excepting thoſe on the great Roads, which are very large and handſome; but Travellers muſt carry their Beds along with them, or elſe be forced to lie on a plain Mat. The Chineſe, eſpecially the meaner ſort, never uſe Blankets, being content to wrap themſelves, ſometimes quite naked, in a Cover-lid lined with Linnen; ſo that their Beds are eaſily carry'd. The Entertainment is ſuitable to the Lodging, for you will have very good Luck if you meet with any Fiſh or the leaſt Bit of Meat. In ſeveral Places, however, Pheaſants are cheaper than other wild Fowls; for ſometimes four may be bought for ten Sols. 'Tis true ſome of theſe Inns afford better Accommodations than others, but the beſt of them are very mean; conſiſting for the general of four Mud Walls without any Plaiſtering. All the Rafters in the Roof appear, and 'tis well if you do not ſee thro' it in many Places; beſides the Rooms which are ſeldom paved are full of Holes. In ſome Provinces theſe Inns are built only of Earth and Reeds, but in the Cities they are of Bricks, and pretty convenient. In the Northern Parts one meets with what they call Kan's; being great Brick Eſtrades, the whole Breadth of the Room, with a Stove underneath, and a Mat made of Reeds on the Top, whereon you may lay your Bed if you have one. Wretched Inns on the Roads.

They have taken Care to publiſh an Itinerary, which contains all the Roads, with the Diſtances of Places both by Land and Water, from Pe-king to the Borders of the Empire (F). The Mandarins make uſe of this Book when they ſet out from the Court, to take Poſſeſſion of their Employments in the Provinces. At the End of every Stage there is a Houſe called Kong-quan, appointed to receive the Mandarins, and all thoſe who travel by the Emperor's Order, who defrays their Expences. Book of the the Roads.

The Day before a Mandarin ſets out on his Journey, a Courier is ſent forwards, who carries a Tablet, wherein is written the Name and Employment of that Officer; on Sight of which the Lodgings are immediately prepared for him according to his Dignity; and he is furniſh'd with all Neceſſaries, ſuch as Proviſions, Porters, Horſes, and Chairs, or Barks if he goes by Water. The Couriers, who publiſh the Approach of the Mandarin, always find Horſes ready; and that they may not be disappointed, one or two Li, before their Arrival, they strike very hard several times upon a Bason, to give Notice that the Horse may be immediately saddled if it be not already done.

(F) Had the Miſſionaries ſent a Tranſlation of theſe Itineraries, it would have been very acceptable to the Curious; thereby we might have improved the Maps with the Roads, and in ſome Meaſure have ſupplied the Want of the Journals of their own Travels over the Provinces, when they made the Maps.

The Kong-quan.

These Houses appointed for Lodging of the Mandarins, are not so handsome as might be expected; for which Reason, when one reads of such things in the Relations of foreign Countries, he ought to make some Allowance: not that the Authors are given to magnify, but they often borrow the Descriptions from the Natives, to whom very mean Things seem magnificent. Besides, they are obliged to make Use of Terms, which convey very lofty Ideas to Europeans: When it is said, for Instance, that the Kong-quan are prepared for the Reception of the Mandarins, and those who are entertained at the Emperor's Expence, one would imagine them from hence to be noble Structures. When farther we read that an Officer is sent before hand with Orders to get every thing ready against the Mandarin arrives. It is natural to believe that they were in a Hurry to spread Carpets, and adorn the Apartments with handsome Moveables; but the Chinese Frugality, and the great Number of Messengers, who are dispatch'd from Court, free them from this Trouble: the Furniture to be prepared consisting of a few Felts and Mats, two or three Chairs, a Table, and a wooden Bedstead cover'd with a Mat, when there is never a Kan. If he be a Mandarin of considerable Rank, and the Kong-quan not suitable to his Dignity, he is lodged in one of the best Houses of the City, where an Apartment is borrowed for him.

Their Furniture.

Kong quân of Kan-ton described.

The Kong-quan are sometimes large and sometimes small, and there are some handsome and commodious enough. By that of Kan-ton which is one of the common sort, one may judge of the rest: It is of a moderate Size, consisting of two Courts, and two principal Buildings; one of which, at the Bottom of the first Court, is a Ting, or large open Hall, for receiving Visits. The other, standing at the end of the second Court, is divided into three Parts; that in the middle serving for a Salon, or Anti-Chamber, to the two great Rooms that are on the Sides, with each a Closet behind. This Disposition is observed in most of the Houses belonging to Persons of any Distinction. The Hall and Anti-Chamber are each adorn'd with two great Lanthorns of transparent Silk painted, hung up in the manner of a Branch; also the Gate towards the Street, and those of the Courts are each enlightened with two large Paper-Lanthorns, adorn'd with large Characters.

Watch Towers and Centries on the Roads.

On the great Roads, at proper Distances, there are a sort of Towers, with Centry Boxes upon them for Centinels, and Flag-staffs to make Signals in Case of Alarms. These Towers are made of Turf, or temper'd Earth; they are square, about twelve Foot high, with Battlements, and are built slanting. In some Provinces there are large Bells of cast Iron on the Top of them; but most of those which are not upon the Road to Pe-king, have neither Centry Boxes nor Battlements. According to the Laws, these Towers ought to be found on all frequented Roads, at the Distance of every five Li [or half League] one small and another large alternately; with Soldiers continually upon Duty to observe what passes, and prevent any Disturbance. These Soldiers have their Guard-Houses, and place themselves in a Rank, when any considerable Officer passes by. They are very regular, especially in Pe-che-li, which is the Province of the Court, and there is always a Centry in the Box.

In some other Provinces these Towers falling to Ruin, Orders are given from time to time to repair and keep Guard in them; especially when they are apprehensive of Robbers, or any Disturbance. In which Case the Number of Soldiers not being sufficient, they oblige the Villages to lend Assistance in their Turns. The Mandarins make a List, and the Inhabitants agree among themselves in dividing the Duty.

Robbers rare in China.

If this Law was observed strictly, there would be no Robbers in China; for at every half League there would be a Guard to stop suspicious Persons; not only in the Roads leading to the Capitals, but also in those from one City to another; so that as the Cities are very numerous, and all the Country is crossed with great Roads, these Towers occur almost every Moment. For this Reason Highway-Men are very rare in China; indeed they are sometimes found in the Provinces neighbouring to Pe-king; but they seldom murder those they rob, and when they have done their Business, they make off very dexterously. In other Provinces there are very few Robbers. These Towers are also of Use to determine the Distance from one Place to another, much in the same manner as the Roman Stones.

Chairs or Sedans for travelling.

When the Roads are too rough to travel on Horseback, they make Use of Chairs, which the Chinese call Quan-kyau, that is to say, Mandarin-Chairs; because the Chairs used by the Mandarins are of much the same Fashion. The Body of the Chair is not unlike that of the Hackney-Chairs of Paris, but it is larger, higher and lighter. It is made of Bambú's, a kind of Cane, very strong and light, laid a-cross each other in the Form of a Lattice, and tied together very strongly with Rattan; which is another sort of Cane very small but strong, creeping along the Earth, to the Length of eight hundred or a thousand Foot. This Lattice is covered from Top to Bottom with a Piece of coloured Linnen, Silk, or Woolen Cloth, according to the Season; over which, in rainy Weather, they put an Oil-Cloath [if we may call that so which is made of Taffaty.]

How carry'd.

This Chair which is of a convenient Size for sitting at Ease, is carried by Men like our portable Chairs or Sedans. If there be but two Chairmen, the Ends of the Poles rest upon their Shoulders; but if it be a Sedan with four Chairmen, then the Ends of the Poles as well before as behind, pass thro' two running Knots of a strong pliable Cord, hung by the middle to a thick Stick, Stick, whoſe Ends reſt on the Shoulders of the Chairmen, (G) and then there are commonly eight in order to relieve each other.

When to avoid the Heats, they travel in the Night, eſpecially along Mountains infeſted with Tygers, they hire Guards on the Spot with Torches; which ſerve both to light them and to ſcare thoſe wild Beaſts, who are naturally afraid of Fire. They are made of Branches of the Pine Tree, dried by the Fire, and prepared in ſuch a manner that the Wind and Rain do but make them burn the faſter, each Torch, which is ſix or ſeven Foot long, laſting near an Hour: and with the Help of four or five of theſe Guides, they travel all Night over the Hills, with as much Safety and Eaſe as at Noon Day in a plain Country; Wherefore in mountainous Countries theſe ſorts of Conveniencies are to be found at proper Diſtances. However, ſcarce any Body but thoſe ſent from Court, the Mandarins, and other great Lords, travel in this Manner during the Night; for having a great Train they have nothing to fear either from Tygers or Robbers.

The Nobility travel by Night in Summer-time.

The great Number of Villages upon the Roads, full of Pagods, is no ſmall Conveniency to Travellers. Over againſt theſe Pagods, and in the great Roads, one meets with a great many Monuments, called She-pey, with Inſcriptions on them; being great Stones generally of Marble, ſtanding upright upon Baſes of the ſame; wherein a Mortis being made, the Stones are fixt in by means of Tenons cut at the Ends, and joined together without farther Trouble. Some of theſe Stones are eight Foot high, two broad, and almoſt one thick; tho' commonly the Height is not above four or five Feet, and the other Dimenſions in Proportion.

Monuments on the Roads called She-pey.

The largeſt of all are erected on a Stone Tortoiſe, in which the Chineſe Architects (if they deſerve that Name) have more Regard to Probability than the Grecian, who introduced Caryatides (H) and Supporters. Nay, what was ſtill more extravagant, ſome put Cuſhions on their Heads for fear ſuch heavy Burdens ſhould incommode them.

Some few of theſe She-pey are ſurrounded with large Halls; others to avoid Expence, are incloſed with a ſmall Brick Building, and covered with a neat Roof: they are exactly ſquare except towards the Top, which is ſomewhat rounded or covered with ſome Groteſque Figure, often cut out of another Piece of Stone.

When they are erected on Account of ſome Favour or Honours received from the Emperor, they carve two Dragons variouſly twiſted: The Inhabitants of the Cities erect them in Memory of their Mandarins, when they are ſatisfied with their Government. The Officers erect them to perpetuate the extraordinary Honours beſtowed on them by the Emperor, and for ſeveral other Reaſons.

One great Conveniency to thoſe that travel by Land in China is, the Eaſe and Safety where-with their Goods are carried by Porters, who are very numerous in every City, and have their Head, to whom Perſons apply; and having agreed for the Price, he gives them as many Tickets as they have hired Porters, by means whereof they are furniſhed in an Inſtant, and he becomes anſwerable for the Contents of their Bales. When the Porters have brought their Loads to the Place appointed, you give every one of them a Ticket, which they carry back to their Chief, who pays them with the Money you have advanced.

Goods carry'd from City to City by Porters.

In much frequented Roads, as for Inſtance, that over the Mountain of Mey-lin, (which ſeparates the Province of Kyang-ſi and Quang-tong,) there are in the Cities between which they paſs, a great Number of Officers, where all the Porters, both in the City and Country, give in their Names with good Security: ſo that if you have Occaſion for three or four hundred, they will provide them. Having applied to the Head of the Office, he makes out an exact Liſt in a Trice, of all you have to carry, whether they be Boxes or other things; and agrees with you for ſo much a Pound, the Price being commonly about ten Sols a hundred Weight for a Day's Carriage, which you pay before-hand, and then you have no farther Trouble: for the Principal gives every Porter his Load, with a Note of what it contains; and when you arrive at the City on the other Side, all that belongs to you is faithfully delivered by the Correſpondent Office. The Burden is faſtened by Cords to the Middle of a Pole of Bambû, the Ends of which are carried by two Men on their Shoulders; and if the Weight be too great, then they make uſe of four Men with two Poles. They are changed every Day, and obliged to make the ſame Stages with thoſe who employ them. When one Man carries a Bundle alone, he lightens his Load, by dividing it into two equal Parts, and faſtening them with Cords or Hooks, to the Ends of a flat Bambû Pole; afterwards he poiſes the Pole upon his Shoulders like a Ballance, which bends and riſes alternately as he goes along. When he is weary of carrying his Load on one Shoulder, he dexterouſly gives the Pole a twiſt round his Neck upon the other Shoulder, and by this Means ſome will carry a hundred and ſixty French Pounds ten Leagues in a Day; for as they are paid by the Pound, they carry as much as they can at a time.

Manner of hiring the Porters.

How they carry the Goods.

In ſome Provinces they make uſe of Mules for carrying the Bales and Merchandizes, but oftener Carts with one Wheel; which indeed are Wheel-barrows, excepting that the Wheel is very large and placed in the middle. On each end of the Axel-Tree, which comes out on both ſides, they place a Lattice, whereon they lay Loads of equal Weight. This Cuſtom is very common in ſeveral Parts of China; one Man only thruſts it forwards, or if the Load be heavy, another Man, Carts with one Wheel.

(G) The Chairmen muſt be ſuppoſed to follow one another, two before and two behind the Sedan, which is carried as it were in Slings; for ſuch the Stick and Rope ſeem to be by the Deſcription.

(H) Caryatides, is a ſort of Pilaſter repreſenting the Figure of a Woman without Arms, and cover'd with a Robe down to the Heels, and the Supporters Statues of Men.

Man, or elſe an Aſs, is put before to draw it, and ſometimes both. They have Axle-Trees reſembling, with the Wheel plac'd forward, but they ſcarce ever make uſe of them in Journeys. When the Loads are carry'd by Mules, the common Price for twenty five Days is four Taels and an half, or at moſt five, according to the different Seaſons and Price of Proviſions; return'd Mules may be hired a great deal cheaper. The Muleteers are oblig'd to maintain and bear their own Charges back, if no body hires them. Their Mules are very little if compared with thoſe of Europe, but they are very ſtrong; their uſual Load being from one hundred and eighty to two hundred Chineſe Pounds. The Cheneſe Pound is four Ounces heavier than ours.

Cuſtom-Houſes in China not ſevere.

There are Cuſtom-Houſes in China, but they are not ſo rigorous as thoſe in the Indies, (where Paſſengers are ſearch'd without regard to Decency or Shame) or indeed any where elſe; for they ſearch no Man's Perſon, and very rarely open the Bales. Nay, if a Man makes a tolerable Appearance, they not only forbear to open his Cheſt, but take nothing of him, We ſee plainly, ſay they, that the Gentleman is no Merchant.

There are Cuſtom-Houſes where they pay by the Lump, and then Credit is given to the Merchant's own Bill of Parcels. There are others that require ſo much a Load, which is eaſily ſettled. Even the Emperor's Kang-ho [or Travelling Order] does not exempt one from paying Cuſtom; nevertheleſs the Mandarin out of Reſpect lets him paſs, without requiring any thing: But at Pe-king they are generally more ſtrict.

The Bales of Goods, which come from, or are ſent to, the great Officers of the Court, have each a Fong-tyau paſted on it, which is a large ſlip of Paper, whereon is written the Time it was pack'd up, with the Name and Dignity of the Owner; and if theſe Officers are conſiderable, they dare not venture to open them.

Formerly the Cuſtom-Houſes were ſhut up, and the Mandarin belonging to them changed every Year. This Mandarin by his Employ was a conſiderable Officer, who had the right of Memorial, that is, to addreſs the Emperor immediately; but for twelve Years paſt the Emperor has committed the Care of the Cuſtom-Houſe to the Vice-Roy of each Province, who appoints a truſty Mandarin to receive the Cuſtoms; however, they have been oblig'd of late to appoint particular Mandarins for thoſe of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen, on account of the Trouble occaſion'd by the Sea Trade.

Poſt-Houſes.

In every Place, where there is a Poſt-Houſe, there is a Mandarin to take Care of it. All the Poſt-Horſes belong to the Emperor, and no body is to make uſe of them but the Couriers of the Empire, the Officers, and others who are ſent from Court. Thoſe who carry the Emperor's Orders are commonly Perſons of ſome Note, and attended by ſeveral Horſemen; the Orders are incloſed in a great Roll, cover'd with a piece of yellow Silk, and wrap'd in a Scarf, which hangs at their Backs. Their Horſes are but ordinary to look at, but they are very good, and capable of performing long Journeys, for they commonly ride ſixty or ſeventy Li's without changing them. One Poſt-Stage is call'd Chan; two Poſt-Stages two Chan.

Theſe Stages where they change their Horſes are not always of the ſame Length; the ſhorteſt contains fifty Li's, and rarely ſo few as forty. The ordinary Couriers carry their Wallet faſten'd upon their Back, and when they ride, it reſts upon a Cuſhion lying on the Horſes Buttocks. Their Wallets are not heavy, for they carry nothing but the Emperor's Diſpatches, or thoſe of the Sovereign Courts, or Advice from the Officers of the Provinces. They alſo carry privately the Letters of other Perſons; and in this conſiſts their Perquiſites.

The Roads greatly incommoded with Duſt.

The greateſt and almoſt the only Inconvenience in travelling, eſpecially in Winter time, and in the North Part of China, is the Duſt, for it ſcarce ever rains in that Seaſon; but there falls a great Quantity of Snow, in ſome of theſe Provinces, but not much at Pe-king. When the Wind blows very hard, it raiſes ſuch Clouds of Duſt, and that ſo frequently, that the Sky is darken'd with them, and one can hardly breathe. They are often obliged to cover their Faces with a Veil, or their Eyes with Glaſſes, fix'd in Leather or Silk, and ty'd behind the Head, whereby one may ſee and not be incommoded with the Duſt. As the Soil is very looſe, it eaſily flies off in Duſt, when there has been a want of Rain for any conſiderable time.

The ſame thing happens in other much frequented Roads of the Empire, where the continual Motion of ſuch infinite numbers of People as travel on Foot, on Horſeback, or in Waggons, raiſes a thick Cloud of very fine Duſt, which would blind them, if they did not take care to prevent it. The Southern Provinces are indeed free from this Inconvenience; but they have another to fear, which is the overflowing of the Waters, if they had not provided againſt it by building a vaſt Quantity of Wooden and Stone Bridges.

Of the NOBILITY.

Nobility not hereditary in China.

NOBILITY is not Hereditary in China, tho' there are Dignities belonging to ſome Families, which are beſtow'd by the Emperor on ſuch of them as he judges to have the greateſt Abilities. However illuſtrious any Man has been, nay, tho' he had arriv'd to the higheſt Dignity of the Empire, his Children have their Fortune to make; and if they want Parts, or love their Eaſe, they become like the common People, and are often obliged to follow the meaneſt Occupations. It is true that a Son may ſucceed to his Father's Eſtate, but not to

to his Dignities or Reputation, to which he muſt raiſe by the ſame Degrees as his Father did. For this Reaſon they place their chief Dependance on a conſtant Study, and they are ſure to be advanced, let their Condition be what it will, if they have a Diſpoſition for Literature. Thus one ſees every Day ſeveral very ſurprizingly jump into Honours, not much unlike the Eccleſiaſtics in Italy, who, tho' of the meaneſt Extraction, are allow'd to aſpire to the Prime Dignity in the Romiſh Church.

Superior Degrees of the Princes or Regulo's.

All the Inhabitants of China are divided into three Claſſes, the People, the Literati, and the Mandarins. None but thoſe belonging to the Family now reigning, have any Title of Diſtinction: theſe poſſeſs the Rank of Princes, in whoſe Favour five honorary Degrees of Nobility are eſtabliſh'd, much like thoſe of Dukes, Marquiſſes, Earls, Viſcounts, and Barons in Europe. Theſe Titles are granted to the Deſcendants of the Imperial Family, ſuch as the Children of the Emperor, and thoſe to whom he gives his Daughters in Marriage, who have Revenues aſſign'd them equal to their Dignity, but not the leaſt Power. However, there are Princes who are not at all ally'd to the Imperial Family; being either Deſcendants of the preceding Dynaſties, or ſuch, whoſe Anceſtors have acquired the Title by the Services done to the Public. The Provinces are govern'd ſolely by Mandarins, ſent thither by the Emperor, as has been already obſerv'd, after he has examin'd them himſelf.

The Prince now reigning is the third of the Family, which for ninety nine Years has govern'd all China and Tartary; but the fifth if you go back to his Great Grand-Father's Father. This latter having ſubdued his own Country, conquer'd alſo Eaſtern Tartary, the Kingdom of Korea, and the Province of Lyau-tong, beyond the great Wall; fixing his Court in the Capital, call'd Shin-yang by the Chineſe, and Mûkden (A) by the Manchew Tartars. They then gave him the Name Tay-tſû, which is conferr'd on all Conquerors, who are Founders of a Dynaſty; and as his Brothers, who were very numerous, had contributed very much by their Valour to the Conqueſt of ſo many Countries, he gave them Titles of Honour, creating ſome Tſin-vang, others Kyun-vang, and Pey-lê. The Europeans have thought fit to give theſe ſorts of Dignities the Appellation of Regulo's, or Princes of the firſt, ſecond, and third Rank. It was then determined, that from among the Children of every Regulo, one ſhould always be choſen to ſucceed his Father in the ſame Dignity.

Beſides theſe three the ſame Emperor created others of an inferior ſort, which are beſtow'd on the other Children who are moſt worthy. Thoſe of the fourth Rank, are call'd Pey-tſe; thoſe of the fifth Kong-hew, and ſo of the reſt.

Thoſe of inferior Degrees often very poor.

This fifth Rank is above that of the greateſt Mandarins in the Empire; but the Princes of the inferior Ranks have nothing to diſtinguiſh them, like the former, from the Mandarins, either in their Equipage or Habits, except a yellow Girdle, which is common to all the Princes of the Blood, as well thoſe who poſſeſs Dignities, as thoſe who have none; but theſe latter hide it, being aſham'd to let it be ſeen, when their Circumſtances are too low to afford an Equipage ſuitable to their Rank and Birth. For this Reaſon we ſhould have a falſe Notion of the Princes of the Blood in China, if we compare them to thoſe in Europe, and eſpecially France; where their Deſcent from ſo many Royal Anceſtors, raiſes them far above Perſons of the higheſt Diſtinction in the State: Beſides the ſmall number of them attracts greater Regard and Veneration, which increaſes in Proportion as they are nearer to the Throne. On the contrary, in China the Origin of the Princes of the Blood is at no great Diſtance, as being but five Generations backward; and yet their Number has increaſed to ſuch a Degree, in ſo ſhort a Time, as to amount at preſent to no leſs than two thouſand. Hence, as their Multitude puts them at a vaſt Diſtance from the Throne, they are little eſteem'd, eſpecially thoſe who, having neither Titles nor Employments, cannot make a Figure ſuitable to their Birth; which makes a great Difference between Princes of the ſame Blood. Polygamy cauſing the Princes to increaſe exceedingly, they hurt one another in Proportion as they multiply, for they have no Eſtates in Lands; and as the Emperor cannot afford Penſions to them all, ſome of them live in extreme Poverty, tho' they wear the yellow Girdle.

Princes of the Family of the Ming ſtill remaining.

Towards the End of the Dynaſty of the Ming, there were more than three thouſand Families of that Race in the City of Kyang-chew, ſeveral of whom were reduced to ſubmit upon Charity. The Banditti, who made themſelves Maſter of Pe-king, ſlew almoſt all thoſe Princes, which is the Cauſe that ſome Part of the City lies waſte; the few that eſcaped quitting the yellow Girdle, and changing their Names, mix'd themſelves with the People. But they are ſtill known to be of the Imperial Blood of the Ming; and one of them was a Servant of the Miſſionaries, in a Houſe belonging to our Society in that City, which was built by one of thoſe Princes; who, knowing that the Tartars ſought after him, betook himſelf to Flight and diſappear'd.

Wives and Children of Princes of the Blood.

The Princes, beſides their lawful Wife, have commonly three others, on whom the Emperor beſtows Titles, and whoſe Names are enter'd in the Tribunal of the Princes; their Children take Place next to thoſe of the lawful Wife, and are more reſpected than thoſe of common Concubines, of whom they may have as many as they pleaſe. They have likewiſe two ſorts of Servants, the one are properly Slaves, the others are Tartars, or Chineſe Tartarized; whom the Emperor beſtows upon them in a greater or leſſer number, according to the Dignity wherewith he honours the Princes of his Blood.

Their Equipage and Domeſtics.

Theſe latter make the Equipage of the Regulo, and are commonly call'd The Men of his Gate. There are among them conſiderable Mandarins, Vice-Roys, and even Tſong-tû's; who, tho' not Slaves like the firſt, yet they are almoſt equally ſubject to the Will of the Regulo, ſo long as he poſſeſſes his Dignity, and deſcend after his Death to his Children, in caſe they are honour'd with the ſame Dignity. But if one of theſe Princes is degraded from his Rank in his Life-time, or if his Dignity does not deſcend to his Children, this kind of Domeſtics is kept in reſerve; and they are beſtow'd on another Prince of the Blood, when his Houſhold is eſtabliſh'd, and he is raiſed to the ſame Dignity.

They are under great Reſtraints.

The Employment of theſe Princes of the five firſt Orders is moſt commonly to aſſiſt at public Ceremonies, and to appear every Morning at the Emperor's Palace; after which they retire to their own Houſes, and have nothing to do but to govern their Families, the Mandarins, and the other Officers of their Houſhold: but they are not allowed to viſit one another, nor to lodge out of the City without an expreſs Permiſſion.

It is eaſy to ſee for what Reaſon they are put under ſuch Reſtraints: it may ſuffice to ſay they have a great deal of time upon their Hands, and that moſt of them do not apply it to the beſt Advantage. However, ſome are employ'd in public Affairs, and do great Services to the Empire; ſuch was the thirteenth Brother of the preſent Emperor.

The Nobility of whom compoſed.

They reckon in the Rank of Nobility, Firſt, Thoſe who formerly have been Mandarins in the Provinces, whether they have been diſmiſſed from their Poſts, of which ſort almoſt all of them are, or have retir'd, either of their own Accord with the Emperor's Conſent, or elſe conſtrain'd thereto by the Death of a Parent; in which caſe a Mandarin ought to give public Proof of his Grief, by laying down his Office.

Secondly, Thoſe who not having Capacity enough to obtain the Literary Degrees, have yet by Favour or Preſents procur'd certain Titles of Honour, which give them a Priviledge of viſiting the Mandarins; and hence they are fear'd and reverenced by the People.

Thirdly, An infinite number of Students, who from the Age of fifteen or ſixteen to forty, come every third Year to be examin'd before the Tribunal of the Governour, who gives them a Subject to write upon. It is Ambition rather than the Deſire of Improvement, that keeps them ſo long at their Studies. Beſides the Degree of Batchelor, when they have attain'd it, exempts them from the Chaſtiſement of the Mandarin: They are alſo admitted to his Audience, to ſit in his Preſence, and to eat at the ſame Table; an Honour which is exceedingly priz'd in China, and ſeldom ever granted to any of the People's Claſs.

Family of Kong-ſii-tſe, the moſt noble in China.

The Family, at this Day accounted the moſt noble in China, and which, with reſpect to its Antiquity, is the moſt noble in the World, is deſcended from Confuçius, their celebrated Philoſopher. And indeed, properly, there are no hereditary Nobility beſides this Family, which has been continued in a direct Line for above two thouſand Years, from one of his Nephews; who is call'd on this Occaſion Shing-jin-ti-ſhi-ell, that is to ſay, The Nephew of the Great Man, or by way of Eminence, The Sage; for ſo the Chineſe call the Reſtorer of their Moral Philoſophy. And in Conſideration of this Original, the Emperors have conſtantly honour'd one of the Deſcendants of this Philoſopher with the Dignity of Kong, which anſwers to that of our Dukes or ancient Earls. He who is now living, paſſes thro' the Streets of Pe-king, with all the Honours due to his Rank, when he comes every Year from Kyo-few, in the Province of Shan-tong; which is the Birth Place of his illuſtrious Anceſtor, and always govern'd by a Mandarin of the ſame Family.

Titles of Honour conferr'd by the Emperor enobles.

One of the Principal Marks of Nobility is, the Titles of Honour beſtow'd upon Perſons of diſtinguiſh'd Merits by the Emperor, who ſometimes entails them for five, or ſix, or eight, or ten Generations, in Proportion to the Serivce done to the Public; and with theſe the Mandarins ſtile themſelves in their Letters, and on the Front of their Houſes. In Europe Nobility deſcends from Father to Son, but in China it ſometimes aſcends from the Son to the Father and Grand-Father; for when any one has ſignaliz'd himſelf by his extraordinary Merit, the Emperor is not contented to raiſe him to the Honours I have been ſpeaking of, but by diſtinct Patents extends them to his Father, Mother, Grand-Father and Grand-Mother: or to ſpeak more properly, he confers on each a particular Title of Honour, in acknowledgment of their Care in the Education of ſo great and uſeful a Man.

Nobility aſcends as well as deſcends.

Inſtance in the Caſe of P. Verbieſt.

I cannot give a more remarkable Inſtance than that of P. Ferdinand Verbieſt, a Flemiſh Jeſuit, Preſident of the Tribunal of the Mathematics at the Court of Pe-king; who being call'd to aſſiſt P. Adam Schaal, in the Reformation of the Kalendar, had Orders to make Tables of the Celeſtial Motions and Eclipſes, for two thouſand Years: wherein he apply'd himſelf with great Diligence, employing all the Mandarins of the firſt Claſs of the Aſtronomical Tribunal, to calculate the Revolutions of the Planets, according to the Rules he laid down. After he had finiſh'd this great Work, he reduced it to thirty two Volumes of Maps with their Explanations, and preſented them to the Emperor, in the Year 1678, with this Title, The perpetual Aſtronomy of the Emperor KANG-HI.

Hereupon that Monarch convened a General Aſſembly of the Mandarins of all Orders of the Princes, the Vice-Roys, and the Governors of Provinces; who were come to ſalute and rejoice with him, on occaſion of having declared his Son for his Succeſſor. He received the Preſent from Pere Verbieſt with a great deal of Pleaſure; and not only cauſed it to be placed among the Archieves of the Palace, but to reward his indefatigable Labour, made him Preſident of the Tribunal of the firſt Order, and gave him the Title of that Dignity. And tho' the Father by Petition remonſtrated, that the religious Profeſſion he had embraced would not permit him to accept of this Honour, the Emperor gave no heed to it; ſo that the Fear both of offending that Monarch, and of hurting the Progreſs of our Religion in the Empire, oblig'd him to receive the following Patent, which confers this Dignity upon him.

"We

" We the Emperor, by the Appointment of Heaven, ordain: The Conſtitution of a well govern'd State requires, that wor thy Actions ſhould be made known, and that the Services done to a State with a ready Will ſhould be rewarded, and receive the Encomiums they deſerve. It is alſo the Duty of a Prince who governs wiſely according to the Laws, to praiſe Virtue and exalt Merit: this is what we now do by theſe Letters patent, which, it is our will, ſhall be publiſhed throughout the Empire; that all our Subjects may know what Regard we have to Services performed with due Application and Diligence. Patent to enoble P. Verbiest.

" For this Cauſe, Ferdinand Verbieſt, to whom I have committed the care of my Imperial Kalendar, the Excellent Diſpoſitions, the Sincerity and Vigilance, which you have diſcovered in my Service, as well as the profouned Learning you have acquired by continually applying your Mind to all ſort of Sciences; have obliged me to place you at the Head of my Aſtronomical Academy. Your Care has anſwered our Expectation, and by labouring Night and Day, you have fully perform'd the Duties of that Office. In a word, you have happily brought your Deſigns to an End, with indefatigable Pains, of which we our ſelves have been Witneſs.

" It is proper, that during this great Feſtival, when my whole Empire is aſſembled to teſtify their Joy, I ſhould make you ſenſible of my Imperial Favour, and of the Eſteem I have for your Perſon: For this Reaſon, by a Special Grace, and of our own Accord, we grant you the Title of GREAT MAN, (K) which ought to be famous every where; and we ordain, that this Title be ſent into all Parts of our Empire, there to be publiſhed.

" Aſſume new Vigour for our Service: This Title of Honour, which begins in your Perſon, extends to all your Kindred and thoſe of your Blood. You have deſerved, by your Care and your extraordinary Application, this Encomium, as well as Dignity; and your Merit is ſo great, that it fully amounts to the Honour we confer on you. Receive then this Favour with due Reſpect: you are the only Perſon on which I have conferred it; let it therefore be a new Motive to employ all your Talents and all the Faculties of your Mind, in our Service."

The like Titles of Honour, as already obſerved, aſcend to the Anceſtors of him who receives them: all his Relations are proud of them; they cauſe them to be written in ſeveral Places of their Houſes, and even upon the Lanthorns that are carried before them when they walk in the Night-time, which gains them great Reſpect. As Pere Verbieſt was a European, he had no Relations in China to partake of this Honour; but very luckily for our Religion, all the Miſſionaries, as well Jeſuits as others, paſs'd for his Brothers, and were conſidered under the ſaid Title by the Mandarins. This Quality of Great Man gain'd the Biſhop of Heliopolis an eaſy Admiſſion into China; and moſt of the Religious caus'd it to be inſcribed on the Door of their Houſe. All the Miſſionaries partake of it as his Brothers.

After having thus honour'd Père Verbieſt, the Emperor conferr'd the ſame Titles on his Anceſtors, by ſo many Patents, which he cauſed to be drawn up: viz. one for his Grandfather Peter Verbieſt; another for Paſchaſia de Wolff his Grandmother; a third for Louis Verbieſt his Father; and the fourth for Ann Vanherke his Mother; whereof I ſhall only produce thoſe for the two firſt, which will be a ſufficient Specimen of the Chineſe Genius. His Anceſtors made noble alſo.

The Patent granted to P. Verbieſt's Grandfather was expreſſed in theſe Terms:

" We the Emperor, &c. The Honours which we grant to thoſe, who by their Merit have been raiſed to the Dignities of Mandarins, and the chief Magiſtrates, ought to be aſcribed to the Care of their Anceſtors, as their original; ſince it was owing to the Inſtruction, Education and good Examples received from them, that they practiſed Virtue, and became worthy of thoſe Honours. His Grandfather's Patent.

" For this Reaſon, being willing to aſcend to the Fountain of Merit, I extend my Favours to you, Peter Verbieſt, who were the Grandfather of P. Verbieſt, whom I have honoured with the Title of, &c. Your Virtue, like a well planted Tree, has taken deep Root, and will never fall: It ſtill upholds your Poſterity, and continues in your Grandſon, who by his extraordinary Merit, has made known to us what yours was. For this Reaſon, conſidering you as the Origin of his Greatneſs, by a particular Grace, I confer on you the ſame Titles of Honour.

His Grandmother's Patent was to this Senſe: " We the Emperor, &c. When according to the laudable Cuſtoms of our Empire, we would reward the Deſerts of thoſe who have faithfully ſerved us, and, by thoſe Rewards, excite them to continue their Services to us; it is juſt that part of the Glory, which thereby redounds to them, ſhould paſs to their Anceſtors. His Grandmother's Patent.

" Wherefore, in Conſideration of the Care you took in the Education of P. Ferdinand, who ſo worthily acquits himſelf in the Charges and Employments which I have entruſted to his Care, I confer on you by theſe Preſents, the Title given to the Wife of him, who is a Mandarin of the firſt Rank, under the Stile of, &c. Enjoy this Title of Honour, which exalts the Care you have taken in the Education of your Children, and will excite the Care of others; when they ſhall ſee, that our Imperial Favours extend even to thoſe who have any way contributed to Virtue, and to the Merit of Perſons whom we honour. Your Poſterity will thereby become more illuſtrious, and have for you the greater Veneration; for this Reaſon it is that we are willing by theſe Patents to raiſe the glory of your Name."

(K) I ſuppoſe the Word in the original Chineſe is Ta-jin, which ſignifies Great Man, a Title of Honour, as appears from ſeveral Places of this Work.

From

From what had been ſaid it appears, that, excepting the Deſcendants of Confucius, and the Princes belonging to the reigning Family, no Perſon is noble in China, but in conſequence of the Emperor declaring his Merit, or advancing him to a Rank which he thinks him worthy of; all who have not taken Degrees being reckon'd Plebeans. And hence, as there is no ſuch thing as an Ancient and Hereditary Nobility in Families, there can be no Fear of their eſtabliſhing an Authority in the Provinces dangerous to that of the Sovereign.

Of the Fertility of the Lands; of Agriculture, and the Value ſet on thoſe who apply themſelves thereto.

The Soil of China productive every where.

IN an Empire of ſuch vaſt Extent, as we have obſerved this to be, the Nature of the Soil cannot be every where the ſame; accordingly it differs in China, in proportion as the Lands are more or leſs Southward. But ſo indefatigably induſtrous and inured to Labour, are the Huſbandmen, that every Province is very fruitful; and there is ſcarce one but what will yield Subſiſtance for an inconceivable Number of Inhabitants.

Beſides the Goodneſs of the Land, the prodigious Number of Canals, wherewith it is interſperſed, contribute not a little to it's Fertility; and tho they reap ſo many different Sorts of Grains, that great Quantities are uſed for making Wine and ſtrong Waters, yet when Scarcity is apprehended in any Place the more experienced Mandarins forbid the making ſuch Liquors for a Time. Agriculture is in great Eſteem; and the Huſbandmen, whoſe Profeſſion is look'd upon as the moſt neceſſary one in a State, are of a conſiderable Rank; for they are preferr'd to Merchants and Mechanics, beſides having large Privileges.

Manured with Ordure,

The Attention of Huſbandmen is chiefly employ'd in the Cultivation of Rice. They manure their Land extremely well, gathering, for that purpoſe with extraordinary Care, all Sorts of Ordure, both of Men and Animals, which they truck for Wood, Herbs, or Linſeed-Oil. When they are not employ'd in the Fields, they go into the Mountains to cut Wood for this Sort of Traffic, or elſe cultivate their Kitchen Gardens; for the Chineſe are very far from preferring the Agreeable to the Uſeful. They very ſeldom employ their Land for unprofitable Uſes, ſuch as Flower-Gardens, or fine Walks; believing it more for the Public Good, and what is ſtill dearer to them their private Intereſt, that every Place ſhould be ſown in order to produce uſeful Things.

This kind of Manure, which elſewhere would burn up the Plants, is very proper for the Lands of China, where they have an Art of tempering it with Water before they uſe it. They gather the Dung in Pails, which they commonly carry cover'd on their Shoulders; and this contributes very much to the Cleanneſs of their Cities, whoſe Filth is thus taken away every Day.

and the Hair of Animals.

In certain Places, as in the Province of Che-kyang, when they ſow Rice, they buy Balls of Hogs, or even human Hair, which according to them give Strength to the Land, and makes the Rice grow better. For this reaſon Barbers are very careful to ſave the Hair which they ſhave off Heads, to ſell to the Inhabitants of thoſe Parts, who come to purchaſe it, for about a Half penny a Pound, carrying it away in Bags; and you may often ſee Barks loaded with it.

Lime mixt with Water.

When the Plant begins to ear, if the Land be watered with Spring Water, they mix quick Lime with it; ſaying, that it kills Worms and Inſects, deſtroys Weeds, and gives a Warmth to the Ground, which contributes much to it's Fertility.

The Mountains cultivated.

This Country, like all others, has its Mountains and Plains, which latter are all cultivated; but one ſees neither Hedges nor Ditches, nor ſcarce any Tree; ſo fearful they are of loſing an Inch of Ground. In ſeveral Provinces the Land bears twice a Year, and even between the two Crops, they ſow ſmall Grains and Pulſe. The Provinces which lie to the North and Weſt, as Pe-che-li, Shan-ſi, Shen-ſi and Se-chwen, produce Wheat, Barley, ſeveral kinds of Millet, Tobacco, Peas that are always green, alſo black and yellow Peas, which ſerve inſtead of Oats to feed their Horſes; they likewiſe produce Rice, and that in ſeveral Places where the Earth is dry, but then not ſo plentifully; beſides it is harder, and requires more boiling then the Rice of the Southern Provinces, eſpecially Hu-quang, Kyang-nan and Che-kyang, which produce great Quantities, becauſe the Lands lie low, and have Plenty of Water.

All Grain tranſplanted.

The Huſbandmen ſow their Grain at firſt without any Order; but when it has ſhot forth about a Foot, or a Foot and a half high, they pluck it up by the Roots, and making it into a ſort of ſmall Sheaves, plant it by a Line, and checquer-wiſe; to the end that the Ears, reſting upon each other, may ſtand more firmly, and reſiſt the Violence of the Wind.

Manner of Levelling the Land.

But before the Rice is tranſplanted, they are careful to level the Land, and make it very ſmooth, after the following Manner. Having plow'd the Ground three or four Times ſucceſſively always up to the Ankles in Water; they break the Clods with the Head of their their Mattocks; then by the help of a wooden Machine (on which a Man ſtands upright and guides the Buffaloe that draws it) they ſmooth the Earth, to the end that the Water, ſo neceſſary to the Rice, may be every where of an equal Height, inſomuch that the Plains ſeem more like vaſt Gardens than open Fields; the Plains in thoſe Provinces, where they are mingled with Hills and Mountains, are ſometimes barren, but the greater part have good Soil, and are cultivated to the very Edges of the Precipices.

Mountains cut into Terraſſes.

It is very agreeable to behold in ſome Places Plains three or four Leagues in Length, ſurrounded with Hills and Mountains, cut, from the Bottom to the Top, into Terraſſes three or four Foot high, and riſing one above another, ſometimes to the number of twenty or thirty.

Theſe Mountains are not generally rocky as they are in Europe, the Soil being light, porous, and eaſy to be cut; and ſo deep in ſeveral Provinces, that one may dig three or four hundred Foot without meeting with the Rock.

When the Mountains are rocky, the Chineſe looſen the Stones, and make little Walls of them to ſupport the Terraſſes; then they level the good Soil, and ſow it with Grain. So painful a Taſk ſhews how laborious the Chineſe are, which will appear ſtill more plainly from what I am going to ſay.

Method for watering the Terraſſes and higher Grounds.

Tho' in ſome Provinces there are barren and uncultivated Mountains, yet the Valleys and Fields, which ſeparate them in a vaſt number of Places, are very fruitful, and well cultivated; there being not an Inch of arable Land, but what is cover'd with fine Rice, the Chineſe having been induſtrious enough to level all the unequal Places that are capable of Culture.

The Huſbandman divides that Part of the Land, which is of the ſame Level, into Plots, and that along the Edges of the Valleys, which is unequal, into Stories, in form of an Amphitheatre; and as the Rice will not thrive without Water, they make Reſervoirs at proper Diſtances, and different Hights to catch the Rain Water, and that which deſcends from the Mountains, in order to diſtribute it equally among all their Rice-Plots: never grudging their Pains or Fatigue, either, in letting the Water run down from the Reſervoir above to the Plots below, or in cauſing it to aſcend from the lower Reſervoirs, Story by Story, even to the higheſt Plots. For this Purpoſe they make uſe of certain Hydraulic Engines, to convey the Water from Place to Place, continually, for moiſtening the Ground; inſomuch that on the one hand the Huſbandman is almoſt ſure every Year to find a Harveſt proportionable to his Induſtry and Labour; and on the other, the Traveller receives every Moment new Pleaſures in beholding thoſe charming Fields and Valleys, which, tho' uniformly green, preſent ſo many Scenes wonderfully diverſify'd by the various Appearances of the Mountains that ſurround him; and will be every Inſtant agreeably ſurpriz'd by a new Landſkip, offering to his View a conſtant Succeſſion of verdant Amphitheatres, as he proceeds on his Journey.

Engine, for raiſing the Water, deſcribed.

This kind of Engine, which they make uſe of, is very ſimple, both with reſpect to its Make and the manner of playing it. It is compoſed of a Chain, made of Wood, reſembling a Chaplet or Pair of Beads, ſtrung as it were with a great number of flat Boards, ſix or ſeven Inches ſquare, and placed at equal Diſtances, parallel to each other. One half of this Chain is laid in a Trough or Gutter, made of three Planks, which is cloſed up with a fourth; on the Outſide whereof the other half of the Chain lies. At the lower End of the Gutter, or Tube, is a ſmooth Cylinder or Barrel, whoſe Axis is fix'd in the two ſides thereof; and to the upper end is faſten'd a ſort of Drum, ſet round with little Boards, to anſwer thoſe of the Chain, which paſſes round both it, and the Cylinder: ſo that when the Drum is turn'd, the Chain turns alſo, and conſequently the lower end of the Gutter or Tube being put into Water, and the upper or Drum-end ſet to the hight where the Water is to be convey'd, the Boards filling exactly the Cavity of the Tube, muſt carry up a continual Stream of Water, ſo long as the Machine is in Motion; which is perform'd three Ways: Firſt, with the Hand, by means of one or two Handles apply'd to the ends of the Axis of the Drum. Secondly, with the Feet, by means of certain large wooden Pegs, about half a Foot long, ſet round the Axel-tree of the Drum, for the Purpoſe. Theſe Pegs have great longiſh Heads, rounded on the outſide, that is, of a proper Shape for applying the Soles of the naked Feet; inſomuch that one or more Men, according to the number of the Rows of Pegs, either ſtanding or ſitting, may with the greateſt Eaſe put the Engine in Motion, and raiſe a continual Stream of Water; their Hands being employ'd all the while, the one in holding an Umbrella, and the other a Fan. Thirdly, By the Aſſiſtance of a Buffaloe, or ſome other Animal, made faſt to a great Wheel, about four Yards in Diameter, placed horizontally; round its Circumference are fix'd a great number of Pegs or Teeth, which, tallying exactly with thoſe in the Axel-tree of the Drum, turn the Machine, tho' much larger, with a great deal of Eaſe.

Uſeful in cleanſing the Canals.

When a Canal is to be cleans'd, which often happens, it is divided at convenient Diſtances by Dikes; and every neighbouring Village, being allotted its Share, the Peaſants immediately appear in Companies, with their Chain-Engines, juſt now deſcrib'd, to raiſe the Water out of the Canals into the Fields. As the Banks are very high, they place three Engines one above another, whereby the Water is convey'd from one to the other; this Labour, tho' long and painful, is ſoon ended by means of the multitude of Hands employ'd therein.

Water conveyed over the Mountains.

Tho' in ſome Parts, as the Province of Fo-kyen, the Mountains, which are not very high, are contiguous to each other, and almoſt without any Valleys between; yet they are all cultivated by the Art the Huſbandmen have to convey the Water, in what Quantity they pleaſe, from Mountain to Mountain, through Pipes made of Bambu.

The Harveſt often deſtroy'd by Locuſts.

The continual Labour and Pains of theſe poor People are oft times render'd ineffectual, eſpecially in ſome Provinces, by the great number of Locuſts, which deſtroy the Fruit of the Earth. It is a dreadful Plague, if we may judge of it from a Chineſe Author: "There appears, "(ſays he) a prodigious multitude which covers all the Sky, being ſo thick together, "that their Wings ſeem to touch, and their Number ſo great, that in lifting up your Eyes, "you would think you ſaw over your Head very high green Mountains, [that is his Expreſ-"ſion] and the Noiſe they make in flying, is like the Sound of a Drum."

The ſame Author obſerves that this incredible Quantity of Locuſts does not appear but when the Inundations are follow'd by a very dry Year; and, philoſophizing in his own way, he pretends, that the Spawn of the Fiſh being left upon the Ground, and afterwards hatch'd by the Heat of the Sun, produce this prodigious multitude of Inſects, that deſtroys, in a ſhort time, the Hopes of the moſt plentiful Harveſt.

It is then that one beholds the wretched Huſbandmen ſweat all the Day, underneath the burning Sky, to drive away theſe Inſects, with Clouts which they ſpread over their Crop. This deadly Plague is very common in Shan-tong, in the time of a great Drought; but ſometimes it does not extend above one League, the Harveſt being very good in the reſt of the Province.

Agriculture held in great Eſteem.

That which makes theſe People undergo ſuch incredible Fatigues in cultivating the Earth, is not barely their private Intereſt; but rather the Veneration paid to Agriculture, and the Eſteem which the Emperors themſelves have always had for it, from the Commencement of the Monarchy. The common Opinion is that it was firſt taught by Shin-nong, one of their firſt Emperors, who is reverenced to this Day as the Inventor of an Art ſo uſeful to the Public; which has ſtill gain'd farther Credit from one of their Emperors, who was taken from the Plow to ſit upon the Throne, as the Story is related in the Books of their ancient Philoſophers. According to them the Emperor Yau, who began to reign 2357 Years before Chriſt, and ſat on the Throne ſo long, having appointed the ſeveral Tribunals of Magiſtrates ſtill ſubſiſting, had thoughts of freeing himſelf from the Weight of the Government. On this account he conferr'd with his principal Miniſters, who reply'd, he could not do better than to commit the Care of the Empire, to the eldeſt of his Children, who was a wiſe Prince of a good Diſpoſition, and of great Hopes. But Yau more thoroughly acquainted, than his Miniſters, with the Genius of his Son, who was crafty and full of Diſſimulation, look'd upon their Counſel to be the Effect of a fooliſh Complaiſance; wherefore, without coming to any Concluſion he broke up the Aſſembly, and put off the Buſineſs to another time.

A Huſbandman choſen by Yau for his Succeſſor.

Some time after (having then reign'd ſeventy Years) he cauſed one of his moſt faithful Miniſters to be call'd; and ſaid to him, "You are endow'd with Probity, Wiſdom and Expe-"rience, I believe you a fit Perſon to fill my Place, and accordingly appoint you to it. Great "Emperor, (reply'd the Miniſter) I am altogether unworthy of the Honour you beſtow on "me; and I want the Qualifications requiſite for an Office, whoſe Dignity is of ſo exalted a "Nature, and Duties difficult to diſcharge. But ſince you are deſirous of finding out a Perſon "worthy to ſucceed you, and able to preſerve the Peace, Juſtice and good Order, which you "have already introduc'd into your Dominions; I aſſure you, with the greateſt Sincerity, that "I know of none more capable than a young Huſbandman, who is yet unmarry'd. He "is no leſs belov'd than admir'd by all who know him, for his Probity, Wiſdom and "Evenneſs of Temper; conſidering the Lowneſs of his Circumſtances; and that he lives in "a Family where he ſuffers intolerably from the ill Humours of a fretful Father, and the Fury "of a Mother, who ſets no Bounds to her Severity. His Brothers are ſo haughty, inſolent, "and quarrelſom, that no body has been able to live with them hitherto; he alone has had "the Art to find Peace, or rather to bring it into an Houſe compoſed of ſuch fantaſtic and "unreaſonable Creatures. I judge, Lord, that a Man, who can conduct himſelf with ſo much "Wiſdom in a private Condition, and joins to the Sweetneſs of his Temper, ſuch Addreſs, ſuch "Labour, and ſuch an indefatigable Application, is the moſt capable of governing your "Empire, and preſerving the wiſe Laws eſtabliſh'd therein."

Yau, equally charm'd with the Modeſty of the Miniſter, who refuſed the Crown, and with his account of the young Huſbandman, order'd him to ſend for the latter, and oblig'd him to reſide at Court; where the Emperor obſerv'd all his Conduct for ſeveral Years, and in what manner he acquitted himſelf in the Employments which he beſtow'd upon him. At length, finding himſelf declining with Age, he ſent for him, and ſpoke thus, "Shun (for that was his "Name) I have for a long time made a Trial of your Fidelity, in order to ſatisfy myſelf "that you will not baulk my Expectation, but govern my People with Wiſdom. I therefore "give up to you my whole Authority; be rather their Father than their Maſter: and remember "that I make you Emperor, not for the People to be your Servants, but to protect them, to "love them, and to relieve them in their Neceſſity. Reign with Equity, and render them "the Juſtice they expect from you."

Books of Agriculture written by the Emperor Yu.

This Choice of an Emperor out of the Country, has inſpir'd the Chineſe with a great Eſteem for Agriculture. Yu, who ſucceeded Shun, came to the Throne after the ſame Manner. At the beginning of the Empire ſeveral low Countries were ſtill cover'd with Water, and it was he who found out the Art, by means of Canals, to drain off the Water into the Sea, and afterwards made uſe of them to render the Soil fruitful. He wrote ſeveral Books con-concerning the manner of cultivating Land, by dunging, tilling, and watering it; which induc'd Shun to appoint him for his Succeſſor.

So many Books written upon ſo uſeful a Subject, by an Emperor, have contributed much to raiſe the Credit of Agriculture, as they ſee it has been thought worthy the Care and Application of a great Prince.

Agriculture promoted by Emperorors.

Several other Emperors have expreſſed their Zeal for this Art: Kang-vang, who was the third Emperor of the Chew, cauſed the Land to be meaſured and ſurveyed by Chau-kong, one of his Miniſters; he himſelf viſited all the Provinces in his Dominions, and cauſed Landmarks to be fixed, to prevent Diſputes and Differences among the Husbandmen. Chau-kong heard their Complaints, and adminiſtred Juſtice under a Willow Tree; which was had in Veneration for a long time among the People.

eſpecially by King-vang and Ven-ti.

King-vang, who was the twenty fourth Emperor of the ſame Family, and reigned at the ſame Time that Confucius was born, being 531 Years before the Chriſtian Æra, made a new Diviſion of the Lands, and renewed the Laws that had been made for promoting Agriculture. In a Word, no Emperor has raiſed its Eſteem to ſo great a Pitch as Ven-ti, who reigned 179 Years before Chriſt; for this Prince, perceiving that his Country was ruined by the Wars, aſſembled his Council to conſult on the Means to reſtore it to its former Condition, and engage his Subjects to cultivate the Land; he himſelf ſet them an Example, by ploughing, with his own Hands, the Land belonging to his Palace, which obliged all the Miniſters and great Men of the Court to do the ſame.

Feſtival in its Honour.

It is thought that this was the Original of a great Feſtival that is ſolemized every Year in all the Cities of China, on the Day that the Sun enters the fifteenth Degree of Aquarius; which the Chineſe look upon as the beginning of their Spring.

The Ceromny deſcribed.

On this Day the Governor, or the Chief Mandarin, comes out of his Palace, carried in his Chair, preceeded by Banners, lighted Torches, and divers Inſtruments. He is crowned with Flowers, and marches in this Equipage towards the Eaſtern Gate of the City, as it were to meet the Spring: being attended with ſeveral Litters painted and adorned with Variety of Silk-Tapeſtry, exhibiting various Figures, and the Portraits of Illuſtrious Perſons, who had practiſed Huſbandry, with Hiſtories relating to the ſame ſubject. The Streets are covered with Tapeſtry, and at proper Diſtances, Triumphal Arches are erected; They alſo hang out Lanthorns, and make Illuminations.

Among the Figures, there is a Cow of Earthern-Ware, ſo monſtrouſly large, that forty Men can hardly carry it. Behind the Cow, whoſe Horns are gilt, is a young Child with one Foot naked, and the other ſhod: him they call the Genius of Labour and Diligence, who ſtrikes the earthen Cow inceſſantly with a Rod, as tho' it were to make it advance. All the Husbandmen follow with their Inſtruments; after whom proceed Companies of Maſquers and Comedians, acting Plays.

In this manner they march to the Governor's Palace, where they ſtrip the Cow of her Ornaments, and drawing out of her Belly a prodigious Number of ſmall Cows made of Clay, diſtribute them among the Multitude, as well as the Fragments of the Cow which they break in Pieces. Afterwards the Governor makes a ſhort Diſcourſe, recommending the Care of Huſbandry as one of the things moſt conducive to the Good of a State.

The Attention of the Emperors and Mandarins to the Cultivation of the Land is ſo great, that when Deputies arrive at Court from the Vice-Roys, the Chineſe Monarch never forgets to demand in what Condition the Fields appeared to them: And the falling of a ſeaſonable Shower furniſhes a proper Occaſion for viſiting a Mandarin, to compliment him thereupon.

Ceremony of the Emperor ploughing in Spring.

Every Year in Spring, the Emperor (according to the Cuſtom of the antient Founders of this excellent Monarchy) goes himſelf in a ſolemn manner to plough a few Ridges of Land; in order to animate the Husbandmen by his own Example, and the Mandarins of every City perform the Ceremony. Yong-ching, who is now upon the Throne, declared, that as ſoon as the Time of Mourning was expired, he would duly obſerve this ancient and laudable Cuſtom; having a few Months before publiſhed an Inſtruction ſigned with the red Pencil, that is, with his own Hand, to exhort the People to apply themſelves to Husbandry without Interruption.

The Order obſerved in this Ceremony, is as follows, at the Beginning of the Chineſe Spring, which falls in the Month of February, the Tribunal of the Mathematics having received Orders to find out the proper Day for the Ceremony of Tillage, fixt on the twenty-fourth of the ſecond Moon; whereof the Tribunal of Rites gave Notice by a Memorial to the Emperor, in which were ſet forth the following Particulars to be obſerved by him, preparatory to this Feſtival: Firſt, that he ſhould appoint twelve illuſtrious Perſons to attend, and plow after him, viz. three Princes, and nine Preſidents of the ſovereign Courts; or the Aſſiſtants of the latter, in Caſe they were too old or infirm.

Directions to be followed by the Emperor.

Secondly, This Ceremony does not ſolely conſiſt in the Emperor's ploughing the Earth, in order to ſtir up Emulation by his own Example; but it alſo includes a Sacrifice, which He, as chief Pontif, offers to Shang-ti, to procure Plenty from him in favour of his People. Accordingly in preparing for the Sacrifice, he ought to faſt and obſerve Continence the three preceding Days; both the Princes and Mandarins, who accompany his Majeſty, ought to prepare themſelves in the ſame manner.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, On the Eve of the Ceremony, his Majeſty is to ſend ſeveral Lords of the firſt Quality to the Hall of his Anceſtors, to proſtrate themſelves before their Tablet; and give them Notice, as tho' they were yet living, that the next Day he will offer the Great Sacrifice.

Preparations. Theſe are in Brief, the Directions of the Tribunal of Rites to the Emperor. It likewiſe preſcribes the Preparations to be made by the different Tribunals; one is obliged to prepare the Sacrifice; another to compoſe the Formula, which the Emperor repeats when he makes the Sacrifice; a third to carry and ſet up the Tents, under which the Emperor is to dine, in Caſe he ſo orders it; a fourth is to aſſemble forty or fifty Huſbandmen venerable for their Age, who are to be preſent when the Emperor ploughs the Ground, with forty of the younger Sort to make ready the Plough, yoke the Oxen, and prepare the Grain that is to be ſown. The Emperor ſows five Sorts of Grain, ſuppoſed to be the moſt neceſſary; under which all the reſt are comprized, as Wheat, Rice, Beans, Millet, &c. and a kind of Millet called Kaulyang.

Emperor offers Sacrifice. Theſe are the Preparations. On the twenty-fourth Day of the Moon the Emperor went with his whole Court, in his Habit of Ceremony, to the Place appointed, to offer to Shang-ti the Spring Sacrifice; by which he is implored to increaſe and preſerve the Fruits of the Earth: for this Reaſon the Offering is made before they put their Hand to the Plough. The Place is a little Hillock made of Earth, a few Furlongs diſtant from the City to the South. On the Side of this Elevation (which ought to be fifty Foot four Inches high) is the Spot which is to be ploughed by the Imperial Hands.

Ploughs a Field, After the Emperor had offered Sacrifices, he deſcended with the three Princes and nine Preſidents, who were to plough with him. Several great Lords carried the valuable Cheſts, which contain'd the Grains that were to be ſown. All the Court attended with profound Silence; then the Emperor took the Plough and tilled the Ground ſeveral times backwards and forwards. When he quitted it a Prince of the Blood held it, and ploughed, as did all the reſt in their Turns. After having ploughed in ſeveral Places, the Emperor ſowed the different Grain; and the Day following the Husbandmen by Profeſſion, (forty-four of whom were old and forty-two young Men) finiſhed the Remainder of the Field which was left untilled. The Ceremony concluded with the appointed Reward which the Emperor beſtowed upon each of them; conſiſting of four Pieces of dy'd Cotton to make Cloaths.

which is often viſited by the Governor of Pe-king. The Governor of Pe-king goes often to viſit this Field, which is cultivated with great Care, and examines all the Ridges thoroughly, to ſee if he can meet with any uncommon Ears, ſuch as they reckon good Omens: On which Occaſion he gives Notice that he found a Stalk, for Inſtance, that bore thirteen Ears. In the Autumn, the ſame Governor gets in the Grain in yellow Sacks, which are ſtowed in a Granary built for that Purpoſe, call'd the Imperial Magazine. This Grain is kept for the moſt ſolemn Ceremonies: for when the Emperor ſacrifices to Tyen or Shang-ti, he offers it as the Fruit of his own Hands; and on certain Days in the Year he preſents it to his Anceſtors, as if they were ſtill living.

Fine Regulation of Yong-ching, to encourage Agriculture. Among ſeveral good Regulations made by the ſame Emperor, he has ſhewn an uncommon Regard for the Husbandmen. To encourage them in their Labour, he has ordered the Governors of all the Cities to ſend him Notice every Year, of the Perſon of this Profeſſion, in their reſpective Diſtricts, who is moſt remarkable for his Application to Agriculture; for unblemiſhed Reputation; for preſerving Union in his own Family, and Peace with his Neighbours; for his Frugality and Averſion to all Extravagance.

Upon the Report of the Governor, the Emperor will advance this wiſe and diligent Huſbandman to the Degree of a Mandarin of the eighth Order, and ſend him Patents of an honorary Mandarin. Which Diſtinction will entitle him to wear the Habit of a Mandarin, to viſit the Governor of the City, to ſit in his Preſence, and take Tea with him. He will be reſpected all the reſt of his Days, and after his Death will have funeral Obſequies ſuitable to his Degree; and his Title of Honour will be written in the Hall of his Anceſtors. What Joy muſt this afford the venerable old Man and his whole Family! beſides the Emulation ſuch a Reward excites among the Husbandmen, the Emperor ſtill adds freſh Luſtre to a Profeſſion which is of ſo great Importance to the State, and has always been had in Eſteem thro' the Empire.

Of the Ingenuity of Mechanics, and the Induſtry of the common People.

The People divided into three Claſſes. THE People, as before obſerved, are diſtinguiſhed into three ſorts of Profeſſions: that of the Husbandmen, which is in great Eſteem; that of Merchants, of whom I ſhall ſpeak, when I come to treat of the Chineſe Trade; and that of Mechanics, who being conſtantly employed in the manual Arts, help theſe to ſupply Neceſſities and Conveniencies of Life.

The common People cannot provide for their own Maintainence without a continual Toil; and there is ſcarce any Nation more laborious and temperate than this. A Chineſe will ſpend whole whole Days in digging the Earth, often up to the Knees in Water; and in the Evening will think himſelf happy with a little boiled Rice, Pot-Herbs, and ſome Tea.

It muſt be obſerved, that the Chineſe always boil their Rice in Water, it being the ſame to them as Bread is to us, without ever cloying. They are inur'd to Hardſhips from their Infancy, which greatly contributes to preſerve the Innocence of their Manners.

Ingenuity of the Chineſe.

The japann'd Works, the beautiful China-Wares, and the Variety of well-wrought Silks, imported from China, are a ſufficient Proof of the Ingenuity of the Natives. They are not leſs skilful in making Commodities in Ebony, Shells, Ivory, Amber, and Coral. Their Works in Sculpture, as well as their publick Buildings, ſuch as the Gates of great Cities, the Triumphal Arches, their Bridges, and their Towers, expreſs ſomething great and noble. In a Word, they ſucceed equally in all Kinds of Arts that are neceſſary for the common Uſes of Life; doing things with a certain kind of Elegance agreeable to their Taſte: and if they have not arrived at ſo great a Perfection as appears in ſeveral Works in Europe, 'tis becauſe they are reſtrained by the Chineſe Frugality; which ſets Bounds to the Expences of private Perſons.

They imitate any thing.

It is true their Invention is not ſo good as that of our Mechanics, but the Tools they make Uſe of are more ſimple; and they imitate, well enough, any Pattern that is brought them, tho' they never ſaw it before. Thus at preſent they make Watches, Clocks, Glaſs, Muſkets, Piſtols, and ſeveral other things which they had no Notion of formerly, or made but very imperfectly. There are Mechanics of all ſorts in every City; ſome of whom work in their Shops at their Work-Houſes, and others go about the Streets, offering their Service to ſuch as want it; but the greater Part are employed in private Houſes. For inſtance, if you want a Suit of Cloaths, the Taylor comes betimes in the Morning to your Houſe, and returns home in the Evening: It is the ſame with reſpect to other Mechanics, who all bring their Tools along with them, even to the Smith with his Anvil and Stove, to make things of common Uſe.

Itinerant Barbers.

A great Number of Barbers are ſeen in the Streets, with a kind of little Bell to give Notice of their Approach: They carry on their Shoulders a Stool, their Baſon, their Pot and Fire, with a Towel and Clouts; and immediately in the Street, in the middle of a Square, at the Door of a Houſe, or wherever elſe it is deſired, they ſhave the Head very dexterouſly, leaving only a long Lock of Hair behind, according to the Cuſtom introduced by the Tartars: They ſet the Eyebrows in odrer, clean the Ears with proper Inſtruments, ſtretch out the Arms, rub the Shoulders, and do all this for eighteen Deniers [or leſs than a Half-penny] which they receive with a great many Thanks, and then ring the Bell again in queſt of another Job.

Many get their Living by hiring Vehicles for carrying one thro' the City, particularly at Peking; where you find in all Squares and at the Corners of Streets, Horſes ready ſaddled, Mules and Chairs, fifty or a hundred of which may be had any time at a moderate Price.

All People, even the old and blind, employ'd.

They have Recourſe to all manner of Contrivances, for means of Subſiſtence; and as there is not a Spot in all the Empire that lies untilled, neither is there one Perſon, Man or Woman, tho' ever ſo old, deaf or blind, but what may eaſily gain a Livelihood. They ſcarce ever make uſe of any thing to grind their Corn in China but Hand-mills; which requiring nothing more than the motion of the Arms, employs an infinite number of People. This is not for want of Water-mills, which are common on moſt of their Rivers, being uſed for grinding the Bark of Trees to make Paſtiles withal. The Wheel of theſe Mills is placed Horizontally, and has double Fellows, about a Foot, or a Foot and a half, from each other; which are united by little Boards, and diſpoſed obliquely in ſuch a Manner, that at the Top they leave a pretty wide Opening, and at the bottom a very narrow Cleft, while the Water, that falls like a Sheet, the height of two Foot on theſe little Boards, makes the Wheel turn ſwiftly round.

Water-Mills.

Their Shifts for a Livelihood.

The Chineſe will make a Profit of Things, which appear to others to be, quite uſeleſs: A great many Families in Pe-king ſubſiſt by ſelling Matches; others by picking up in the Streets little Rags of Silk, Wollen, Cotten, or Linnen; the Feathers of Fowls, Bones of Dogs, and Bits of Paper, which they waſh and ſell again. They even make ſale of Ordure, for which purpoſe a great Number of People in every Province carry Pails; [See p. 272] In ſome Places they go with their Barks into the Canals, which run on the Backſide of the Houſes, and fill them at almoſt every Hour of the Day.

Excrements ſold.

This Sight, in Cities ſo well governed as thoſe of China, is very ſurprizing to an European; but in this Country it may be properly ſaid, Lucri bonus Odor ex re qualibet. Gain has a good Smell let it come out of what it will. The Chineſe are not leſs aſtoniſhed to ſee the Water-bearers in Europe. The Peaſants come and buy it in their Houſes, endeavouring to foreſtal each other, and give in Exchange Wood, Oil, and Pulſe. There are in every Street Conveniencies for Paſſengers; whereof the Owners make a good Advantage by this ſort of Traffic.

Their Multitudes occaſion great Miſery.

Yet it muſt be owned, that notwithſtanding the great Sobriety and Induſtry of the Inhabitants of China, the prodigious Number of them occaſions a great deal of Miſery. There are ſome ſo poor, that being unable to ſupply their Children with common Neceſſaries, they expoſe them in the Streets, eſpecially when the Mothers fall ſick, or want Milk to nouriſh them; ſo that theſe little Innocents are in ſome ſenſe condemned to Death, as ſoon as they begin to live. In the great Cities, ſuch as Pe-king and Kan-ton, this ſhocking Sight is very common, but in other places it is very rare.

Children expoſed.

The Miſſionaries in populous Cities have Catechiſts, who, dividing the Place among themſelves, walk out every Morning to baptize a Multitude of dying Children. With the ſame View they have ſometimes prevailed on the unbelieving Midwives to permit Chriſtian Women to follow them to the Houſes where they are called; for it often happens that the Chineſe, not being in a Condition to maintain a numerous Family, engage the Midwives to ſtifle the Females in a Baſon of Water, as ſoon as they are born, on which Occaſion theſe Chriſtians take care to baptize them.

Mortgaging themſelves and Families.

The ſame Miſery produces a prodigious Multitude of Slaves, or rather Perſons who mortgage themſelves with a Condition of Redemption, a thing very common with the Chineſe; for among the Tartars they are truly Slaves. A great number of Men and Maid-Servants are thus bound in a Family, tho' there are ſome to whom they give Wages, as in Europe.

A Man ſometimes ſells his Son, and even himſelf and Wife, at a very moderate Price; but if he can he choſes to pawn his Family only. It often happens that a great Tartarian Mandarin, or Chineſe Tartariſed, (that is, liſted under the Tartar Banner) who has a Parcel of Slaves for his Servants, is himſelf a Slave to ſome Court-Lord; to whom, from time to time, he makes a Preſent of conſiderable Sums. A poor Chineſe, when he gives himſelf to a Tartarian Prince, if he has Merit, may hope to be a great Mandarin very ſoon; but this is not ſo common under the preſent Dynaſty as formerly: if he be deprived of his Office he returns to his Maſter to ſerve in certain honourable Functions.

Slavery in China very eaſy.

When rich Folks marry their Daughters, they give them ſeveral Families of Slaves, in Proportion to their Wealth. It often happens that they give them their Liberty; and ſome have half their Freedom, on condition that they pay Yearly a certain Sum. If any of them grow rich by their Induſtry, or Buſineſs, their Maſter does not ſtrip them of their Goods, but is contented with large Preſents; and lets them live in Credit, without conſenting however to their Redemption. Theſe Slaves are of an approved Fidelity, and inviolably attached to their Maſter; who on his ſide uſes them as his own Children, and often truſts them with the moſt important Affairs. As to his Authority over his Slaves, it is confined to Matters relating to his Service; for ſhould it be legally proved, that a Maſter had abuſed his Power, by taking criminal Liberties with the Wife of his Slave, he would be ruin'd beyond Remedy.

Of the Genius and Character of the Chineſe.

THE Chineſe in general are of a mild, tractable, and humane Diſpoſition. There is a great deal of Affability in their Air and Manner, wherein we ſee nothing that is either harſh, rough, or paſſionate: This Moderation is remarkable among the Vulgar themſelves: I was one Day (ſays "Pere de Fontaney) in a very narrow and deep Road, "where, in a ſhort time, there happen'd a great Stop of Carts. I expected they would have "fallen into a Paſſion, given one another abuſive Language, and perhaps come to Blows, "as is common in Europe; but was much ſurpriz'd to ſee that they ſaluted each other, "ſpoke mildly, as if they had been old Acquaintance, and lent their mutual Aſſiſtance to "make way". (A)

The Chineſe affable, mild, and humane.

Above all things, they ſhew a great Deference and Reſpect for their old Men, of which the Emperor himſelf ſets the Example. An inferior Mandarin of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, about a hundred Years old, came to Court the firſt Day of the Chineſe Year, to ſalute the late Emperor Kang-hi; who, tho he had deſigned to ſee Nobody that Day, gave Orders to admit him. As the good old Man was but indifferently clad, every one was forward to lend him Garments. Being conducted into the Emperor's Apartment, his Majeſty, who was ſitting on an Eſtrade after the Tartarian Manner, roſe up and went to meet him; receiving him with great Tokens of Affection. The Mandarin was going to fall on his Knees, but the Emperor immediately raiſed him, and graciouſly taking him by both his Hands, "Venerable Old Man, ſaid he, I will admit you henceforth into my "Preſence as often as you come to ſalute me; but I acquaint you, once for all, that I "exempt you from all Sorts of Ceremony. As for me, I will riſe upon your Arrival, and "go to meet you; but it is not to your Perſon that I do this Honour, it is to your Age: "and to give you real Marks of my Affection, I from this time appoint you Chief Preſident of the Tribunal of the Mathematics": This compleated the Happineſs of the old Man, who never taſted ſuch perfect Joy before.

Have great Reſpect for old Men.

Inſtance in the late Emperor.

When we have to do with the Chineſe, we ſhould take care of being too haſty or warm; the Genius of the Country requires that we ſhould command our Paſſions, and act with a great deal of Calmneſs. The Chineſe would not hear in a Month what a French Man could ſpeak in an Hour. We muſt ſuffer with Patience this Phlegm, which ſeems more natural to them than any other Nation. Not that they want Fire and Vivacity; but they learn betimes to become Maſters of themſelves, and are vain of being more polite, and more civiliz'd than other People.

How Strangers ſhould behave in converſing with them.

It is a difficult Matter for a Stranger to conform himſelf to their Notion of Politeneſs and Civility. Their Ceremonies are on many occaſions tireſome, and full of Conſtraint; it being one Fatigue to learn, and another to practiſe them. But this Trouble regards only the Be-

Their Ceremonies irkſome to us.

(A) See ſomething of this kind in that Father's Travels. p. 51.

Behaviour towards ſome, to whom uncommon Veneration is due, on certain particular Occaſions; as the firſt Viſits, a Mandarin's Birth-Day, &c. for after two Perſons have ſeen each other ſeveral Times, they lay aſide all Reſerve, and grow as familiar as the People of Europe; ſo that if you ſhould begin to uſe Ceremonies, they are the firſt as will ſay, Pú-yau-tſo-he, Make no Stranger of me: No Compliments, No Compliments.

Chineſe full of Reſentment when thorowly provoked.

Tho' the Chineſe are mild and peaceable in Converſation, and when they are not provoked, they are exceeding violent and revengeful when they are offended. The following is an Inſtance: In a certain Maritime Province it was diſcover'd that the Mandarin had applied to his own Uſe, great Part of the Rice ſent thither by the Emperor in a Time of Scarcity, to be diſtributed to every Family in the Country; the People accuſed him before a Superior Tribunal, and proved, that out of the four hundred Loads of Rice received, he had only delivered out ninety; upon which he was immediately depriv'd of his Office.

Pleaſant Inſtance.

When he had left the City to go on Board a Ship, he was greatly ſurpriz'd, inſtead of finding in his Paſſage Tables loaded with Perfumes, and new Boots for Change, (as is cuſtomary for thoſe who gain the Love and Eſteem of the People) to ſee himſelf incompaſſed with a prodigious Multitude, not to do him Honour, but to inſult and reproach him for his Avarice. Some invited him, by way of Deriſion, to ſtay in the Country till he had eaten all the Rice, the Emperor had intruſted him with, for the relief of his Subjects; ſome dragg'd him out of his Chair, and broke it; others fell upon him, tore his Garments, and ſilken Umbrella in Pieces; in ſhort, all followed him to the Ship, loading him with Injuries and Curſes.

Deliberate in their Revenge.

Tho the Chineſe, are naturally vindictive when urged by Intereſt, yet they revenge themſelves in a methodical Manner. They diſſemble their Reſentment; and as they rarely take violent Meaſures, eſpecially People of any Figure, they preſerve, even with their Enemies, ſo fair an Outſide, that one would imagine they were inſenſible: but when an Opportunity of deſtroying their Enemy offers, they immediately ſieze on it; and their having ſeemed ſo patient, was only with a Deſign to ſtrike the ſurer Blow.

Very Litigious.

In ſome Diſtricts the People are ſo very litigious, that they mortgage their Lands, Houſes, Goods, and all that they have, for the Pleaſure of going to Law, and procuring the Baſtonado to be given to their Enemy: and it ſometimes happens that the Defendant, by giving a larger Sum privately to the Mandarin, finds Means to eſcape the Puniſhment himſelf, and cauſe the Blows to fall on the Back of the Plantif. Hence ariſe mortal Enmities amongſt them, which ſtick in their Hearts till they find an Opportunity of ſatisfying their Revenge.

One of their Methods, tho rarely practiſed, is to fire their Enemy's Houſe in the Night-time; by their Laws, thoſe who are convicted of this Crime are puniſhed with Death, and the Mandarins are very expert in diſcovering the Authors. However, many abhor ſuch Villanies, and become ſincerely reconciled with their Enemies.

Exceeding modeſt.

Their Modeſty is ſurprizing; the Literati always appear with a compoſed Air, without uſing the leaſt Geſture, but what is ſtrictly agreeable to the Rules of Decency. It ſeems to be natural to thoſe of the Female Sex, who live in a conſtant Retirement, and are decently covered even to their very Hands, which never appear, being conſtantly hid within their long and wide Sleeves; ſo that in preſenting any thing, even to their Brothers or Parents, they lay it on the Table with the Hand always cover'd for their Relations to take it.

Intereſt their darling Vice.

Intereſt is the Grand Foible of the Chineſe, with whom you muſt act all ſorts of Parts, even that of being diſintereſted. When they have any Gain in View, they employ all their Cunning, artfully to inſinuate themſelves into the Favour of Perſons, who may forward their Buſineſs, and endeavour to gain their Friendſhip by frequent Services; aſſuming all ſorts of Characters with ſurprizing Addreſs, and turning to their advantage the moſt trifling Occaſions to obtain their Ends. Intereſt is the Spring of all their Actions; for when the leaſt Profit offers, they deſpiſe all Difficulties, and undertake the moſt painful Journeys to procure it. In a word, this puts them in a continual Motion, fills the Streets, the Rivers, and the high Roads with infinite Numbers of People, who paſs and repaſs, and are always in Action.

Have learn'd Deceit from the Europeans.

Tho', generally ſpeaking, they are not ſo deceitful and knaviſh as P. Le Comte repreſents them, it is however true that Honeſty is not their favourite Virtue; eſpecially when they have to do with Strangers, whom they ſeldom fail to cheat if they can, and then brag of it. Some of them are ſo impudent as, when detected, to plead in Excuſe, their want of Dexterity; "You ſee I am but a Bungler, ſay they; You are more dextrous than "I; Another time I will not venture to meddle with an European": And in reality it is ſaid, that ſome Europeans have taught them their Trade.

Merry Story of an Engliſh Captain.

Nothing can be merrier than what happen'd to a Captain of an Engliſh Ship. He had bargained with a Chineſe Merchant of Kan-ton for ſeveral Bales of Silk; and when they were ready, he went with his Interpreter to the Merchants Houſe, to ſee if the Silk was in a good Condition. On opening the firſt Bale it proved to his liking, but the reſt contained nothing but rotten Silks Upon which growing very angry, he reproached the Chineſe in the ſevereſt Terms for his Diſingenuity and Knavery; while the other heard him very unconcerned, and only made this reply; Blame, Sir, ſaid he, your Rogue of an Interpreter, for he proteſted to me that you would not examine the Bales.

This

Some of their little knaviſh Tricks.

This knaviſh Wit is found chiefly among the Vulgar, who have Recourſe to a thouſand Tricks to adulterate every thing they ſell. Some have the Art to open the Breaſt of a Capon, take out all the Fleſh, fill up the Hole, and then cloſe it ſo nicely that the Cheat is not perceived till the Fowl comes to be eaten. Others counterfeit the true Hams ſo exactly, by covering a Peice of Wood with a ſort of Earth, and then wrapping it in Hogs Skin, that the Deceit is not diſcovered till it is ſerv'd up at the Table, and going to be carv'd. However, it muſt be confeſs'd they ſeldom practiſe theſe Tricks on any but Strangers; and in other Places [diſtant from the Sea-coaſt] the Chineſe themſelves will hardly believe them.

Robbers uſe Craft inſtead of Violence.

Robbers ſcarce ever make Uſe of Violence, endeavouring to gain their Ends by Subtilty and Craft; for ſome follow the Barks and hire among thoſe who draw them along the Imperial Canal, in the Province of Shan-tong; where, being changed every Day, the Thieves are not eaſily known: In the Night they ſlip into the Barks, and by the Smoke, as is reported, of a certain Drug which they burn, cauſe thoſe on Board to ſleep ſo ſoundly, that they have Time enough to ſearch all Places, and carry off what they will, unperceived. Some of theſe Thieves will dog a Merchant two or three Days together till they find a proper Opportunity to do their Buſineſs.

Moſt of the Chineſe are ſo ſwayed by Intereſt, that they can ſcarcely conceive a thing is ever undertaken with any other View: Hence it ſeems almoſt incredible to them, that the Miſſionaries ſhould have no other Motive in leaving their Country, Friends, and all that is dear to them in this World, than to glorify God and ſave Souls. They know that it is not Neceſſity that makes them run the Danger of the Sea to get to China, ſince they ſubſiſt without asking any Favour, or expecting the leaſt Aſſiſtance; nor the Deſire of Riches, ſince they are Witneſſes to the Miſſionaries Contempt of them: Some therefore are ſimple enough to imagine, that they come to bring about a Revolution, and by their Intrigues to make themſelves Maſters of the Empire, as happen'd in the Affair of Yang-quang-ſyen (B). However their Diſintereſtedneſs is one of the moſt prevailing Motives, with many, to embrace their Religion.

Chineſe very anxious about their Coffins.

The extreme love of Life is another Foible, wherein the Chineſe exceed almoſt all other Nations; tho' there are ſome, chiefly Females, who make away with themſelves, either thro' Anger or Deſpair: and indeed the Generality, eſpecially among the Poor, ſeem leſs afraid of Death, than of wanting a Coffin after it. It is aſtoniſhing to ſee how careful they are in this Reſpect: Thoſe who have but nine or ten Piſtoles in the World will lay it out on a Coffin, above twenty Years before they want it; looking upon it as the moſt valuable Moveable in their Houſe. However, it muſt be confeſſed, that the Chineſe, for the moſt part, when dangerouſly ill, are willing enough to die, and even to be told they are near their End.

Proud and conceited of themſelves,

To omit nothing of the Character of the Chineſe, I muſt add, that there is no Nation more proud of their pretended Grandeur, and their aſſumed Preheminence over all others. This Haughtineſs, which is born with them, inſpires even the Rabble with the greateſt Contempt for all other Nations. They are ſo full of their own Country, Cuſtoms, Manners, and Maxims, that they cannot be perſuaded there is any Thing good out of China, or any Truth but what their learned Men are acquainted with. However, they have ſeen their Miſtake a little, ſince the Europeans came among them; tho', when they firſt ſaw them, they asked if they had any Cities, Towns, or Houſes in Europe.

tho' ignorant of the World.

Our Miſſionaries have often been Witneſſes of their Surprize and Confuſion on Sight of a Map of the World. One Day ſome of the Literati deſiring P. Chavagnac, to ſhew them ſuch a Map, they ſought a long while for China; and at length took one of the two Hemiſpheres for it, which contains Europe, Africa, and Aſia; ſuppoſing America appeared too large for the reſt of the World. The Father let them alone for a while in their Error, till one of them deſiring an Explanation of the Letters and Names in the Map: You ſee EUROPE, ſaid the other, AFRICA and ASIA; In ASIA here is PERSIA, the INDIES and TARTARY. Where then is CHINA, cry'd they? It is this little Corner of the Earth, reply'd he, and theſe are the Bounds of it: Upon this they look'd aſtoniſh'd at one another, ſaying in Chineſe, Syaute-kin, It is very ſmall.

Wedded to their own Faſhions.

How far ſoever they fall ſhort of the Perfection, to which Arts and Sciences are brought in Europe, there is no getting them to do any thing in the European Manner; the Chineſe Architects could hardly be prevailed on to build the Church, which is in the Palace, according to the Model brought from Europe.

Their Ships are very ill built, and they admire thoſe that come from Europe; but when you talk of their imitating them, they are ſurprized at the Propoſition: It is according to the Faſhion of China, ſay they. But it is worth nothing, ſay you. It matters not, reply they; ſince it is uſed in the Empire it is ſufficient, and it would be a Crime to vary from it.

But this Anſwer, made by their Carpenters, proceeds not merely from their Fondneſs for their own Cuſtom, but partly thro' Fear they ſhould not pleaſe the European, who employs them, ſo effectually when they follow his Method as their own; for thoſe who are Artiſts readily undertake and perform the Work let the Model be what it will, provided there is Money to be gotten, and you have Patience to give them Directions.

(B) Pray muſt not every Proteſtant think theſe Suſpicions of the Chineſe very wiſe and juſt, ſince they have the ſame Notions themſelves, not without the moſt convincing Reaſons, dear Experience; nay, they have been charged already, as well as the Bonza's, with fleecing their Proſelytes.

In a Word, to finiſh the Character of the Chineſe, it is ſufficient to ſay, that tho' they are vicious they naturally love Virtue, and thoſe who practiſe it: tho' they are not chaſte themſelves they admire thoſe that are, eſpecially Widows; and when they find any that have liv'd a continent Life, they preſerve their Memory by Triumphal Arches, and honour their Virtue by laſting Inſcriptions. It is not decent for a Woman of Credit to marry again after her Husband is dead. Great Admirers of Virtue.

As they are ſubtil and crafty, they know how to carry a fair Outſide, and covet their Vices with ſo much Cunning, that they conceal them from the Public. They have the greateſt Reſpect for their Parents, and thoſe who have been their Maſters. They deteſt every Action, Word, and Geſture that ſeems to betray Anger, or the leaſt Emotion; but they alſo know perfectly how to diſſemble their Hatred. They are not permitted to carry Arms even when they travel, that being a Privilege peculiar only to the Soldiery. All their Eſteem and Ardour are engroſſed by the Sciences, which are the Foundation of their Nobility; becauſe, as I ſaid before, all their Honours and Preferments are derived from thence. They do not glory in their Vices;

Of the Air and Phyſiognomy of the Chineſe: their Faſhions; their Houſes, and elegant Furniture.

WE muſt not judge of the Air and Phyſiognomy of the Chineſe by the Pictures on their japan'd Works and China-Ware. Tho' they are ſkilful in painting Flowers, Animals and Landſkips, they are very ignorant in drawing Human Figures, maiming and disfiguring themſelves in ſuch a Manner that they look more like Scaramouches than Chineſe.

It is true however, that as Beauty depends upon Taſte, and conſiſts more in Imagination than Reality, their Notion of it differs ſomewhat from that of the Europeans; for, generally ſpeaking, that which ſeems beautiful to us is agreeable to their Taſte, and that which appears beautiful to them appears equally ſo to us. That which they chiefly admire, as making a perfect Beauty, is a large Forehead, a ſhort Noſe, ſmall well cut Eyes, a large and ſquare Face, great broad Ears, a middle-ſized Mouth, and black Hair; for they cannot bear the Sight of yellow or red-hair'd People. However, there muſt be a certain Proportion among the ſeveral Features to render the whole agreeable. A Chineſe Beauty.

A fine eaſy Shape is no Charm among them, becauſe their Garments are wide, and not fitted to the Body, as thoſe of the Europeans; they think a Man well made, when he is large and fat, and fills his Chair with a good Grace. Their Shape.

Their Complexion has been miſrepreſented by thoſe who have ſeen only the Southern Parts of China; for tho' the exceſſive Heats which prevail there, eſpecially in Quang-tong, Fo-kyen, and Yun-nan, give the Mechanics and Peaſants an Olive or brown Complexion, yet in the other Provinces they are naturally as white as the Europeans; and generally ſpeaking, their Phyſiognomy has nothing diſagreeable in it. Their Complexion.

The young People, commonly to the Age of thirty, have a very fine Skin, and beautiful Complexion, as well as the Literati and the Doctors; theſe latter, eſpecially if they are of baſe Extraction, never pare the Nails of their little Fingers, affecting to let them grow an Inch long, or more, with a Deſign to let People ſee that they are not driven by Neceſſity to work for their Living. As for the Women they are commonly middle ſiz'd, their Noſes ſhort, their Eyes little, their Hair black, their Ears long, and their Complexion ruddy; there is a certain Gayety in their Countenance, and their Features are regular. The Doctors affect long Nails. Features of the Women.

It is affirm'd that they rub their Faces every Morning with a kind of Paint, to make them look fair, and give them a Complexion; but that it ſoon ſpoils their Skin, and makes it full of Wrinkles. They paint.

Among the Beauties of the Sex, ſmall Feet is not the leaſt; when a Girl comes into the World, the Nurſes are careful to bind their Feet very cloſe, to prevent their growing. The Chineſe Ladies all their Lives after feel this Conſtraint impoſed on them in their Infancy, their Gate being ſlow, unſure, and diſagreeable to Foreigners: yet ſuch is the Force of Cuſtom, that they not only willingly undergo this Inconvenience, but they increaſe it, by endeavouring to make their Feet as little as poſſible; thinking it an extraordinary Charm, and always affecting to ſhew them as they walk. Small Feet a great Beauty.

The Chineſe themſelves are not certain what gave Riſe to this odd Cuſtom. The Story current among us, which attributes the Invention to the ancient Chineſe, who, to oblige their Wives to keep at home, are ſaid to have brought little Feet into Faſhion, is look'd upon as fabulous by ſome. The far greater number think it to be a politic Deſign, to keep the Women in continual Subjection. It is certain, that they are extremely confin'd, and ſeldom ſtir out of their Apartment, which is in the moſt retired Place in the Houſe; having no Communication with any but the Women-Servants. However they have generally ſpeaking the common Vanity of the Sex, and tho' they are not to be ſeen by any but their Domeſtics, they ſpend ſeveral Hours every Morning in Dreſſing and ſetting themſelves out. Chineſe Ladies under great Reſtraints.

Their Head Attire.

Their Head-dress usually consists in several Curls, interspers'd with little Tufts of gold and silver Flowers, Some adorn their Heads with the Figure of the Fong-whang, a fabulous Bird, of which the Ancients speak many mysterious things. It is made of Copper or Silver, gilt, according to the Quality of the Person; its Wings are stretch'd gently over the fore part of their Head-dress, and embrace the upper part of their Temples. Its long spreading Tail makes a sort of Plume on the Top of the Head; the Body is placed over the Forehead; the Neck and Beak hang down upon the Nose: but the Neck is join'd to the Body by a secret Hinge, that it may easily play and vibrate at the least Motion of the Head, whereon the Bird is supported by the Feet, which are fix'd in the Hair. Women of the first Quality sometimes wear an Ornament of several of these Birds, interwoven together, which forms a sort of Crown, the Workmanship whereof alone is very costly.

The young Ladies commonly wear a kind of Crown, made with Paste-Board, and cover'd with a beautiful Silk; the Fore-part whereof rises in a Point above the Fore-head, and is cover'd with Pearls, Diamonds and other Ornaments. The Top of the Head is adorn'd with natural or artificial Flowers, mix'd with little Bodkins, with Jewels on their Points. Women who are advancing in Years, especially those of the common sort, are contented with a piece of very fine Silk, wound several times about the Head, which they call Pau-tew, that is to say, A Wrapper for the Head.

Uncommon Modesty of their Looks and Dress.

But what adds much to the natural Charms of the Chinese Ladies, is the uncommon Modesty which appears in their Looks and Dress. Their Gowns are very long, and cover them from Head to Foot, so that nothing is seen but their Faces. Their Hands are always conceal'd within their wide long Sleeves, which would almost drag on the Ground, if they did not take care to hold them up. The Colour of their Garments is either red, blue or green, according to their Fancy; only, scarce any but Ladies advanc'd in Years wear violet or black.

The Fashions in China never alter.

What I here call the Fashion, is very different from the Idea which that Word carries in Europe, where the manner of Dress is subject to many Changes: but it is not so in China; nor is there any thing that more shews the good Order and Uniformity of the Government, even in the most trifling Matters, than the Fashion as to Dress having been always the same, from the Commencement of the Empire, to its Conquest by the Tartars; who have changed nothing of the ancient Usages among the Chinese, except in obliging them to dress after their Manner.

Habit of the Men.

The Garb of the Men is suited to the Gravity they affect; it consists in a long Vest, extending to the Ground, one of whose Lappets folds over the other, the upper one reaching to the right side, where it is fasten'd with four or five gold or silver Buttons, not far asunder. The Sleeves, which are wide towards the Shoulder, grow narrower gradually towards the Wrist-bands, and end in the Shape of a Horse-shoe, covering all their Hands, except the ends of their Fingers. They gird themselves with a broad silken Sash, whose ends hang down to the Knee; and fasten to it a Case, containing a Purse, a Knife, and two small Sticks, which serve for a Fork, &c. Formerly the Chinese did not carry a Knife, and to this Day the Literati very rarely do.

Their Summer and Winter Cloaths.

In the Summer they wear under the Vest a pair of Linnen Drawers, which they sometimes cover with another pair of white Taffety; and during the Winter they put on Breeches of Sattin, quilted with Cotton or raw Silk, but if it be in the Northern parts they are made of Skins, which are very warm. Their Shirts, (being of different kinds of Cloth, according to the Season) are very wide and short; and to keep their Garments from Sweat in Summer, several wear next their Skin a silken Net, which hinders their Shirt from sticking to it. During this last Season they go with their Neck quite bare, but in Winter wear a Collar, made either of Sattin, or Sable, or the Skin of a Fox, and fasten'd to their Vests; which in Winter are lin'd with Sheep-Skin, tho' some are only quilted with Silk and Cotton. People of Quality line them quite thro' with the rich Sables brought from Tartary, or fine Fox-Skin with a Border of Sable; in Spring they have them lin'd with Ermin. Over the Vest they wear a Surtout with short Sleeves, that are lin'd or border'd after the same manner.

Confined to certain Colours.

All Colours are not suffer'd to be worn indifferently by the People; none but the Emperors and Princes of the Blood may wear yellow Garments. Sattin, with a red Ground, is affected by certain Mandarins on days of Ceremony; but they are commonly dress'd in black, blue, or violet: and the People are generally clad in blue or black Callico.

They shave the Head.

Heretofore they oyled their Hair very much, and were so exceeding fond of this Ornament, that many chose to die rather than shave their Heads after the Tartarian Fashion; though their new Masters did not meddle with the other Customs of the Nation. However, at present they let Hair enough grow on the hind part or Top of the Head, to braid into Tresses.

Their Hats or Caps.

In Summer they wear a kind of small Hat or Cap, shap'd like a Funnel; it is cover'd on the outside with Rattan, very curiously work'd, and lin'd with Sattin. At the Top is a large Lock of Hair, which spreads over it to the very Edge. This Hair, which is mighty fine and light, grows on the Legs of a certain kind of Cows, and is dy'd of a very bright red; it is very much used, and allow'd to be worn by all sorts of People.

There is another sort of Cap proper to the Mandarins and Literati, which the People dare not wear; it is of the same Fashion with the former, but made of Paste-Board, between two pieces of Sattin; that on the inſide is commonly red or blue, and the outſide Sattin is white, cover'd with a large Lock of the fineſt red Silk. People of Diſtinction often make uſe of the firſt ſort, eſpecially when they ride, or in foul Weather; becauſe it keeps out Rain, and defends the Head both before and behind from the Sun.

This Plate is humbly inscribed to the Honourable EDWARD CARTERET Esq^r. Post Master General by his most dutiful & most obedient humble Servant Edw: Cave

Winter-Caps.

In Winter they wear a very warm ſort of Cap, edged with Sable, Ermin, or Fox-Skin, the Top of which is cover'd with a Lock of red Silk. This edging of Fur is two or three Inches broad, and looks very handſome, eſpecially when made of the fine black ſhining Sable, which is ſold at forty or fifty Taëls.

They wear Boots in all Seaſons.

The Chineſe, eſpecially thoſe of any Quality, dare not appear in Public without Boots; theſe Boots are generally of Silk, particularly Sattin, or of Callico, and fit exactly, but have no Tops nor Heels. When they go long Journeys on Horſeback, their Boots are of Neats or Horſe-Leather, ſo well dreſs'd that nothing can be more pliable. Their Boot-Stockings are of Stuff, ſtitch'd, and lin'd with Cotton, whereof part comes above the Boot, and has a broad Border of Pluſh or Velvet. But theſe, tho' very commodious for keeping the Legs warm in Winter, are almoſt intolerable in hot Weather: for which Reaſon they have another cooler Sort; but it is not much uſed among the People, who often, to ſave Expence, have ſomething of this kind made of black Cloth. Perſons of Quality wear ſuch in their Houſes, made of Silk, which are very neat and handſome.

Viſiting-Habits.

When they go abroad, or make a Viſit of any Conſequence, over their under Garments, which are uſually of Linnen or Sattin, they wear a long ſilk Gown, commonly blue, with a Girdle about them; and over all they have a ſhort Coat of a black or violet Colour, reaching only to their Knees, but very wide, with large and ſhort Sleeves: alſo a little Cap, ſhap'd like a ſhort Cone, and cover'd with looſe waving Silk or red Hair; laſtly, Stuff Boots on their Legs, and a Fan in their Hand.

Their Houſes and other Buildings.

The Chineſe love to be neat in their Houſes, but they have nothing very magnificent. Their Architecture is not the moſt elegant, nor have they any regular Buildings, except the Emperor's Palace, ſome public Edifices, the Towers, Triumphal Arches, the Gates and Walls of the great Cities, the Dikes, Cauſeways, Bridges, and Temples of the Bonzas. The Houſes of private Perſons are very plain, for they have no regard to any thing but Conveniency. The Rich adorn theirs with Japan Work, Sculpture and Gildings, which render them very pleaſant and agreeable.

The Walls.

They commonly begin with erecting Pillars, and placing the Roof thereon; for the greater part of their Buildings being of Wood, they ſeldom lay the Foundation deeper than two Feet. They make their Walls of Brick or Clay, tho' in ſome Places they are all of Wood. Theſe Houſes are generally nothing but a Ground-floor, excepting thoſe of the Merchants, which have often one Story above it, call'd Lew, where they place their Goods.

The Roof.

In the Cities almoſt all the Houſes are cover'd with very thick Ridge-Tiles; they lay the convex Side downwards, and cover the Chinks where the Sides meet, by laying on others in a contrary Poſition. The Spars and Joiſts are either round or ſquare: upon the Spars they lay either very thin Bricks, in the Shape of our large ſquare Tiles, or elſe ſmall pieces of Boards, or Matts made of Reeds, which are plaiſter'd over with Mortar; when it is a little dry, they lay on the Tiles, which thoſe who are able to be at the Expence, join together with Roche-Lime.

The Timber-Work within.

In moſt of their Houſes after paſſing through the Porch, you enter into a Hall, facing the South, about thirty or thirty five Feet long; behind the Hall there are three or five Rooms in a Range from Eaſt to Weſt, whereof the middlemoſt ſerves for an Inner-Hall. The Roof of the Houſe is ſupported by Pillars, in ſuch ſort, that if the Hall be thirty Feet long, it will be at leaſt fifteen broad, and then there will be twenty four Pillars forward, and as many backward, with one at each end. Theſe Pillars, which are commonly ten Feet high, are erected on Stone Baſes, and ſupport great Beams, laid lengthwiſe; and between every two Pillars they place a croſs Beam, and on the two Pillars at the Ends, they lay other Pieces of Wood, which ſupport the Timber-Work of the Roof, this done they begin to build the Walls.

The Front.

The Magnificence of the Houſes, according to the Chineſe Taſte, uſually conſiſts in the Thickneſs of the Beams and Pillars, in the Excellency of the Wood, and in the fine Carvings on the Gates or Doors. They have no Stairs but the Steps at the Entrance of the Houſe, which is raiſed a little above the Level of the Ground; but along the Front there is a cloſe Gallery, about ſix or ſeven Feet wide, and lin'd with fine hewn Stone.

Houſes of the common People.

There are ſeveral Houſes whoſe middle Doors anſwering one another, diſcover on entering a long ſeries of Apartments. The Houſes of the Vulgar are made of unburnt Bricks, only in Front they are caſed with burnt Bricks; in ſome Places they are made with tempered Clay, and in others of nothing but Hurdles cover'd with Lime and Earth; but in Houſes of Perſons of Diſtinction, the Walls are all of Ground-Bricks, very artificially carv'd. In the Villages, eſpecially of ſome Provinces, beſides being very low, the Houſes are generally made of Earth, and the Roofs ſo obtuſe, or elſe round, ſo much by Degrees, that they ſeem to be flat. They are compoſed of Reeds cover'd with Earth, and ſupported by Matts of ſmall Reeds that lie upon the Rafters and Joiſts. In ſome Provinces inſtead of Wood they burn Pit-Coal, or elſe Reeds or Straw. As they make uſe of Stoves with very ſmall Chimneys, and ſometimes none at all, when Fires are made in any place, beſides the Kitchen, one is almoſt ſtifled with the the Smoke; eſpecially if the Fewel be Reeds, which is unſupportable to thoſe who are not uſed to it.

Houſes of the Nobility, and Tribunals.

The Houſes of the Nobility and rich People do not deſerve to be mention'd, in compariſon of ours; it would be an Abuſe of the Term to call them Palaces, they being nothing but a Ground-Floor, raiſed ſomething higher than common Houſes; the Roof is next, and has ſeveral Ornaments on the Top. The great number of Courts, and Apartments for lodging their Domeſtics, makes amends for their want of Beauty and Magnificence; not that the Chineſe hate Pomp and Expence, but the Cuſtom of the Country, and Danger of appearing extravagant, reſtrain them contrary to their Inclination. The Tribunals of Juſtice are not more pompous: the Courts are large, the Gates lofty, and ſometimes adorn'd with elegant Carvings; but the Inner Halls and Chambers of Audience are neither magnificent nor very neat.

Palaces of the Quan.

It muſt be confeſſed, however, that the Palaces of the chief Mandarins, and the Princes, as well as of thoſe who are rich and in Power, are ſurprizing for their vaſt Extent. They have four or five Courts, with as many Ranges of Buildings in each. Every Front has three Gates, that in the middle is the largeſt, and both ſides of it are adorn'd with Lions of Marble. Near the great Gate is a Place, inclos'd with Rails, finely japan'd with either red or black; on the ſides are two ſmall Towers, wherein are Drums and other Inſtruments of Muſic, on which they play at different Hours of the Day, eſpecially when the Mandarin goes in or out, or aſcends the Tribunal.

The Form of them.

On the inſide there appears firſt a large open Place, where thoſe wait who have any Caſe or Petition to preſent; on each Side are ſmall Houſes, ſerving as Offices for the Officers of the Tribunal: Then there appear three other Gates, which are never opened but when the Mandarin aſcends the Tribunal; the middlemoſt is very large, and none but Perſons of Diſtinction paſs through it. Beyond this is another large Court, at the End whereof is a great Hall, wherein the Mandarin adminiſters Juſtice; laſtly, follow ſucceſſively two very neat Halls, for receiving Viſits in, furniſhed with Chairs and Variety of other Moveables. Such are generally the Tribunals of the great Mandarins.

The Officers juſt now ſpoken of are a kind of Notaries, Clerks, &c. there are ſix Sorts of them, each employed in Buſineſs of the ſame kind with one of the ſix Supreme Courts at Pe-king; ſo that a private Mandarin does all that in little, in his Tribunal, which ſome time or other he will be called to do in one of the Supreme Courts, with reſpect to the whole Empire. They are maintained at the public Expence, and their Places are for Life; ſo that Buſineſs goes on without Interruption, tho' the Mandarins are often changed, either by being caſhier'd, or removed into other Provinces.

You afterwards paſs into another Court, with a Hall much handſomer than the former, where none but particular Friends are admitted, ſurrounded by Out-Houſes for the Mandarins's Domeſtics. Beyond this Hall is another Court, where is the Apartment of the Women and Children, with a great Gate to it, thro' which no Man dares to enter. This Part is very neat and commodious, being furniſhed with Gardens, Woods, and Lakes, and every thing that is delightful to the Eye. Some delight in artificial Rocks and Mountains, pierced thro', and full of Windings like a Labyrinth, to take the freſh Air in. When they have Room enough, they make little Parks to keep Deer, and Ponds for Fiſh and Water-Fowls.

Fine Palace at Kan-ton.

The Palace of the Tſyang-kun, or General of the Tartarian Troops at Kan-ton, is thought to be one of the fineſt in all China; it was built by that rich and powerful Prince called Ping-nan-vang, that is, The Peace-maker of the South. The Emperor Kang-hi had made him in ſome Sort King of Kan-ton, for his Services in reducing ſome of the Southern Provinces under the Dominion of the Tartars: but forgetting his Duty a few Years after, he and all his Family fell into Diſgrace; being forced to ſtrangle himſelf with a Scarf of red Silk, preſented him by a Gentleman of the Emperor's Bed-Chamber, ſent Expreſs from Pe-king.

Chineſe Notion of Building.

The Chineſe Notion of Beauty and Magnificence, with regard to their Palaces, is very different from the European: for tho' the Largeneſs of the Courts and Buildings beſpeaks them to be the Habitation of Perſons of Diſtinction, yet an European is not at all affected with this Sort of Magnificence; which only conſiſts in the Number and Extent of the Courts, the Largeneſs of the principal Halls, the Thickneſs of the Pillars, and a few Pieces of Marble rudely cut.

Marble ſeldom uſed by them.

Marble is very common in the Provinces of Shan-tong and Kyang-nan, but the Chineſe don't know the Value of it; for they ſeldom make uſe of it but for lining Canals, or building Bridges and Triumphal Arches, in Tables for Inſcriptions, in their Pavements, the Threſholds of their Gates, and the Foundations of ſome of their Temples.

Not curious in adorning their Houſes within.

The Chineſe are not curious like the Europeans, in adorning and beautifying the Inſide of their Houſes, where neither Tapeſtry, Looking-Glaſſes, nor Gildings are to be ſeen: for as the Emperor owns the Palaces of the Mandarins, whoſe Offices are no more than Commiſſions, that are taken away when they commit any Fault; and as they are not fixed in any Place, be their Conduct ever ſo unblameable, but when they leaſt think of it are removed into another Province; they do not care to be at any great Expence in furniſhing a Houſe, which they are in danger of leaving every Minute. Beſides, as Viſits are never received in the Inner Appartments, but only in the great Hall before the Houſe, it is not ſurprizing that they are ſparing of Ornaments; which wou'd be, in ſome meaſure, uſeleſs, as not being ſeen by Strangers.

The

The principal Things, that ſet off their Halls and Apartments, being kept with a great deal of Care, appear exceeding neat and agreeable to the Eye: Such as, large ſilk-Lanthorns, painted, and hanging from the Cieling; Tables, Cabinets, Screens, Chairs, Japan'd with their beautiful red and black Varniſh, which is very tranſparent, ſo that the Veins of the Wood appear through it, and as bright as a Looking-Glaſs; Variety of Figures, in Gold and Silver, or other Colours painted upon this Japan, give it a new Luſtre; moreover, the Tables, the Bouffets, and the Cabinets, are adorned with that fine China-Ware, which is ſo much admired, but could never yet be imitated in Europe. Their principal Furniture and Moveables.

Beſides, this they hang up, in ſeveral Places, Pieces of white Sattin, on ſome of which are painted Flowers, Birds, Mountains, and Landſkips: On others are written, in large Characters, Moral Sentences taken from their Hiſtories, and generally couched in obſcure Terms, bearing a different Senſe from the natural; theſe Sentences are commonly two and two together, and conceived in the ſame Number of Words. Some are contented with whitening or papering the Walls of their Rooms, wherein the Chineſe are very skilful. Pictures.

Tho' they never are ſeen in their Bedchambers, where it wou'd be unpolite to conduct a Stranger, the Beds, eſpecially of the Nobility, are curious and handſome: the wooden part is painted, gilt, and carved: the Curtains vary according to the Seaſon; during Winter, in the Northern Provinces, they are of double Sattin, and in Summer, either of plain white Taffety adorned with Flowers, Birds, and Trees, or of very fine Gauze; which is both open enough to let the Air through, and cloſe enough to keep off the Gnats, that are extreamly troubleſome in the Southern parts. The common People uſe, for the ſame purpoſe, a very thin Cloth made of a ſort of Hemp; their Mattreſſes are very thick, and ſtuffed with Cotton. Their Beds and Curtains.

In the Northern Provinces they make Places of hollow Bricks, in the form of Beds, which are larger or ſmaller according to the Number of the Family: Beſide it is a ſmall Stove, of Charcoal, whoſe Flames and Heat are diſperſed to all parts by Pipes, terminating in a Funnel, which carries the Smoak thro' the Roof. In the Houſes of Perſons of Diſtinction the Stove comes through the Wall, and the Fire is lighted on the Outſide; by which means the Bed, and even the whole Houſe, is warmed; ſo that they have no occaſion for the Feather-Beds of Europe. Thoſe who are afraid of lying on the hot Bricks, hang a ſort of a Hammock over them, made of Cords or Ratan, and not unlike the Sacking of our Beds. Stove Beds.

In the Morning every thing of this kind is taken away, and Carpets or Matts put in their Room, on which they ſit. As they have no Chimneys, nothing can be more convenient; for the whole Family work upon them, without feeling the leaſt Cold, or being obliged to wear furred Garments. The meaner Sort dreſs their Victuals, warm their Wine, and prepare their Tea (for the Chineſe drink every thing hot) over the Mouth of the Stove. The Beds belonging to the Inns are much larger, that there may be Room for ſeveral Travellers at a time. Their Conveniences.

Of the Magnificence of the Chineſe, in their Journeys; in their Public Works, ſuch as, Bridges, Triumphal Arches, Towers, Walls of Cities; in their Feaſts, &c.

THE Magnificence of the Emperor and his Court, and the Riches of the Mandarins ſurpaſs all that can be ſaid of them; one is ſurpriſed at firſt to ſee nothing but Silks, Porcellaine, Cabinets and other Furniture, which make a more glittering Appearance, than the common Manufactures of Europe. But the principal Magnificence of the Chineſe Lords is not ſeen in their Houſes; for they commonly neglect themſelves at home, from whence the Laws baniſh Luxury and Pomp, permitting them the Uſe thereof only when they are ſeen in publick, when they make or receive Viſits, or when they go to Court, and are admitted into the Emperor's Preſence. Chineſe Magnificence public not private.

I have already ſpoken of the pomp of the Mandarins, and the numerous Train of Officers attending them. Military Men, who travel commonly on Horſeback, no leſs affect an Air of Grandeur. Indeed their Horſes are not very beautiful, but their Harneſs is exceeding ſumptuous, the Bitts and the Stirrups being either Silver or gilt. The Saddle is very rich; the Reins of the Bridle are made of coarſe, pinked Sattin two fingers broad. From the upper part of the Cheſt hang two great Locks of fine red Hair (ſuch as their Caps are cover'd with) ſuſpended by Iron-rings either gilt or ſilvered. Their Retinue conſiſts of a great number of Horſemen, part going before, and part behind them; without reckoning their Domeſtics, who are clad either in black Sattin or dyed Callico, according to their Maſter's Quality. State of the Military Quan when they travel.

But the Chineſe Magnificence never appears with ſo much Splendor, as when the Emperor gives Audience to Ambaſſadors; or when ſitting upon his Throne he beholds at his Feet the principal Lord of his Court, and all the great Mandarins in their Habits of Ceremony, paying him Homage. It is a Spectacle truly Auguſt, to ſee a prodigious Number Magnificence of the Court on State days of Soldiers under Arms; an inconceivable Multitude of Mandarins, with all the Marks of their Dignity, each placed according to his Rank, in exact Order; the Miniſters of State, the Preſidents of the Supreme Courts, the Regulo's and Princes of the Blood; the whole appearing with extraordinary Grandeur, and conveying a moſt lofty Idea of the Sovereign, to whom ſuch profound Reverence is paid. There is no Diſpute about Precedence, but every one knows his diſtinct Place; the Name of each Office being ingraven on Copper-Plates faſtned into the Marble Pavement.

In Europe People are not fond of making a great Figure upon the Road, inſtead of which they are commonly unprovided, and have nothing in Order; but the Cuſtom is otherwiſe in China, where a great Mandarin always travels in State. If by Water, his own Bark is very ſplendid, ſailing at the Head of a great Number of others, which carry his Attendants. If he goes by Land, beſides the Domeſtics and Soldiers who precede and follow him with Spears and Enſigns, he has for his own Perſon a Litter, a Chair carried by Mules, or eight Men, and ſeveral led Horſes; making Uſe of theſe Vehicles by turns, according to his Fancy and the different Changes of Weather.

Canals numerous in China.

I have already obſerved that China is full of broad Canals, which often run in a ſtrait Line; there is commonly in every Province a great River, or broad Canal, ſerving for a Highway, with Cauſeways on each Side, caſed with flat Stones or Marble.

Great Canal.

That which is called the Great Canal croſſes the whole Empire from Kan-ton to Pe-king; and nothing can be more commodious than to travel the ſix hundred Leagues from the Capital to Ma-kau, as if he were all the while in his own Houſe, without going above one Day's Journey by Land over the Mountain Mey-lin, that ſeparates the Provinces of Kyang-ſi and Quang-tong; tho' the whole may be performed in a Bark, eſpecially when the Waters are high.

Imperial Barks deſcribed.

For this reaſon, the Mandarins who go to take poſſeſſion of their Governments, and the Meſſengers ſent from Court, moſt commonly travel by Water: Being furniſhed with Barks maintained by the Emperor, which are equal in Bigneſs to one of our third-rate Men of War. Theſe Imperial Barks are of three different Sorts, nor can any thing be more neat; for they are painted, gilt, embelliſh'd with Dragons, and japan'd both within and without. Thoſe of the middle Size, which are moſt in Uſe, are above ſixteen Feet broad, fourſcore long, and nine in Depth from the Deck. As to the Form, they are ſquare and flat, excepting that the Forepart is ſomewhat rounded.

Appartments

Beſides what the Maſter has for himſelf and his Family, (viz. his own Cabbin, a Kitchen, and two large Places, one before, the other behind,) there is a Hall about ſix or ſeven feet high, and eleven broad; next an Anti-Chamber, and two or three other Rooms; likewiſe a Furniture and Embelliſhments.

Bye Place without Ornaments, all upon the ſame Deck, which make up the Mandarin's Apartment. It is all japan'd with the beautiful red and white Varniſh, and the Sides as well as Cieling adorn'd with plenty of carv'd Work, Painting and Gildings; the Tables and Chairs are japan'd red or black. The Hall has Windows on each Side, which may be taken away upon occaſion; and inſtead of Glaſs they make uſe of very thin Oyſter-ſhells or fine Stuffs, done over with ſhining Wax, and embelliſh'd with Flowers, Trees, and variety of Figures. The Deck is ſurrounded with Galleries, for the Sailors to go backward and forward without incommoding the Paſſengers.

The Hold.

Over this Apartment is a ſort of Platform, or Terraſs, open on all Sides, ſet apart for the Muſic, which conſiſts of four or five Hands, whoſe Harmony can raviſh nothing but the Ear of a Chineſe. Underneath is the Hold, divided into ſeveral little Chambers for ſtowing the Baggage. The Sails are made of Mats, and conſiſt of ſeveral oblong Squares, which folding like a Fan, take up little or no Room. They are very convenient, becauſe they are better than any other for ſailing near the Wind; beſides, if the Braces happen to break, no Inconvenience ariſes from thence to the Bark.

Sails.

To puſh forward theſe great Barks, they make uſe of long thick Poles, ſhap'd like a Gibbet, or the Letter T, thruſting one End to the Bottom of the Water, and applying their Shoulder to the other; or elſe they employ Oars of ſeveral Shapes, but the common ſort is a long Pole made like a Shovel at one end, with a Hole in the middle, to receive the Pegs fixed on the Side of the Bark. There are others whoſe Extremities, being continually moved to the right and left in the Water, like a Fiſh's Tail, cut it obliquely, in the ſame manner as your Birds of Prey do the Air, when they fly with their Wings extended, making uſe of their Tails for Oars. This Method is the more convenient, as the Rowers take up little or no Room in the Bark, for they are ranged on the Sides upon Planks. Their Oars, which do the Office of a Rudder, ſeldom break; and, tho' never taken out of the Water, conſtantly force the Bark forward.

Some of theſe Barks are hauled along with Ropes, when the Wind is contrary, or they are obliged to go againſt the Stream. Theſe Ropes in ſome places are made of Hemp, and in other of very long and fine Splinters of Cane twiſted, which are exceeding ſtrong, and never rot with the Water.

Barks attending the Quân in their Travels by Water.

Among the Barks that follow the great Mandarins, there is always one, at leaſt, called the Hoa-ſhe-chwen, or Bark of the Proviſions; on board which is the Kitchen, the Eatables, and the Cooks. Another is full of Soldiers for the Convoy; a third, much more ſmall and light, may be called the Harbinger, becauſe its Buſineſs is to haſten before to give Notice, and cauſe every thing to be prepared that there be no Occaſion to wait. Theſe Barks have their Rowers, and in caſe of Neceſſity, are alſo drawn with a Rope along the Bank by Men, who are furniſhed by the Mandarin of each City, and changed every Day. The Number of theſe Supplies is determin'd by that of the Horſes appointed by the Kang-ho, or Patent of the Emperor, viz. three Men for every Horſe: Hence if eight Horſes are appointed for an Envoy, they ſupply him with twenty four Men to draw the Bark.

are

Guards along the Roads by Water.

All along the Roads by Water, there is, at the End of every League, a Tang, or Guard, who, if there be Occaſion, are to give Notice to each other by Signals. In the Day time, the Signal is a thick Smoak, made by burning Leaves and Branches of Pine, in three ſmall Stoves, ſhaped like Pyramids, and open at the Top; in the Night the Signal is given by ſhooting off a ſmall Cannon. The Soldiers of every Tang, who are ſometimes ten, ſometimes five, or leſs, according to the Place, uſually ſtand in a Rank along the River ſide, out of Reſpect to the Mandarin, one of them bearing an Enſign diſplay'd, and the reſt with their Arms in their Hands.

If the Bark carries an Envoy, they put at the Head and Stern four Lanthorns, with theſe Words in great Characters of Gold, King-chay-ta-jin, that is, The Great Envoy from the Court: Theſe are accompanied with Flags and Streamers of Silk, of ſeveral Colours, waving in the Wind.

Their Duty.

Every Morning and Evening, when they heave and caſt Anchor, the Guard ſalute the Mandarin with a diſcharge of their Fire-Arms, followed by the Sound of Trumpets. Towards Night-fall they light the Lanthorns at the Head and Stern, as well as thirteen others of a ſmaller Size, hung in the Form of a Chaplet, by the Side of a Maſt, viz. ten in a perpendicular Line, and three above them croſs-wiſe.

When the Lanthorns are lighted, the Captain of the Place appears with his Company oppoſite to the Barks, and with a loud Voice calls over the Names of the Men whom he hath brought to watch and ſtand Centry all Night; then the Maſter of the Bark pronounces a long Harangue to the Soldiers, reminding them of all the Accidents that are to be feared, as Fire, Thieves, &c. and that if any of them ſhould happen, they muſt be accountable for it.

The Soldiers at the end of every Article give a great Shout; after which they withdraw to form a Guard, leaving one of their Company to ſtand Centry, who walks to and fro on the Quay, continually ſtriking two Pieces of Bambû againſt each other, to ſignify his Vigilance, and that he is not aſleep. Theſe Centries are relieved every Hour, performing by turns the ſame Duty, and making the ſame Noiſe the whole Night: If he be a principal Mandarin, or a great Court-Lord, they pay him the ſame Honours.

Form of the larger Canals.

The great Number of Canals to be ſeen in China is ſomething very extraordinary: They are often lined on each Side to the height of ten or twelve feet, with fine ſquare Stone, which in many Places ſeem to be a kind of grey Marble, of the Colour of Slate. The Banks of ſome of the Canals being twenty or twenty five foot high on each Side, there is need of a great number of Chaplet-Engines to raiſe the Water into the Fields.

Some run above ten Leagues in a ſtrait Line; as that from Sû-chew to Vû-ſi-hyen. In like manner the Canal to the Northweſt of the City Hang-chew extends very far in a Right-line, and is every where more than fifteen Toiſes in Breadth; it is lin'd on each Side with hewn Stone, and border'd with Houſes cloſe together, and as full of People as thoſe in the City. Both Sides of the Canal are cover'd with Barks, and in Parts where the Bank is low and flooded, there are flat Bridges of great Stones ſeven or eight foot long, placed three and three in form of a Cauſeway.

Smaller Canals.

The great Canals in every Province diſcharge their Waters into ſeveral ſmall ones on each ſide; which afterwards forming a great number of Rivulets, are diſperſed in the Plains, and reach to the Villages, and often to the great Cities. From Space to Space they are cover'd with Bridges of three, five, or ſeven Arches; that in the middle is ſometimes thirty ſix, nay forty five Foot wide, and ſo high, that Barks may paſs through, without taking down their Maſts; thoſe on each ſide are ſeldom leſs than thirty, and diminiſh in proportion to the Slopings of the Bridge.

Bridges.

Some of one Arch.

Some of theſe Bridges have but one Arch, which is ſemicircular, and built of arched Stones, five or ſix Foot long, and only five or ſix Inches thick; ſome of them are Polygonal. As theſe Arches are not very thick at Top, they cannot be ſtrong, but then Carts never paſs over them, for the Chineſe make uſe only of Porters to carry their Bales. Several Bridges inſtead of Arches have three or four great Stones placed on Piers, like Planks; many of them being ten, twelve, fifteen and eighteen Feet long. There are a conſiderable number of this ſort neatly built over the Great Canal, whoſe Piers are ſo narrow that the Arches ſeem to hang in the Air.

How they build their Bridges.

It is no hard matter to learn how the Chineſe build their Bridges, for, having finiſh'd the ſides of the Arch next to the Land, when the Bridge is to have only one Arch, or raiſed the Piers when it is to have ſeveral, they then take Stones four or five Foot long, and half a Foot broad, and place them alternately upright and croſswiſe, in ſuch a manner that the Key-Stones may be laid horizontally. The Top of the Arch is commonly no thicker than one of theſe Stones; and becauſe the Bridges, eſpecially when they have but one Arch, are ſometimes forty or fifty Foot wide between the Piers, and conſequently much higher than the Cauſeway, the Aſcent on each end is by very flat eaſy Stairs, with Steps about three Inches thick; tho' it would be difficult for Horſes to paſs over ſome of them. The whole Work is generally well contrived.

Many Beautiful Bridge near Pe-king.

Many of these Bridges are very handsome. That call'd Lû-ko-kyau, two Leagues and a half Westward of Pe-king, was one of the finest that ever was seen, before part of it was broken down by a Land-flood. The whole was of white Marble well work'd, and very curiously built. There were on each side seventy Pillars, separated by Cartridges of fine Marble, whereon were delicately carved Flowers, Foliages, Birds, and several sorts of Animals. On each side of the Entrance of the Bridge on the East-end, there were two Lions of an extraordinary Size, on Marble Pedestals, with several little Lions in Stone, some climbing on the Backs of the great ones, some getting off them, and others creeping between their Legs; at the West-end, on Marble Pedestals also, stood the Figures of two Children, carv'd with the same Skill.

Public Monuments

Among the public Works ought to be rank'd the Monuments which the Chinese have erected almost in every City to eternize the Memory of their Heroes; that is to say, the Captains, Generals, Princes, Philosophers, and Mandarins, who have done Service to the Public, and signalized themselves by great Actions.

There is for Instance, near the City of Nan-hyong, in the Province of Quang-tong, an high Mountain (A), (from whence proceed two Rivers) which was formerly inaccessible, till a Ko-lau, born in that Country, undertook to cut a Passage through it, for the Sake of Travellers. To perpetuate the Memory of so signal a Benefit received from that great Man, they erected a Monument on the Top of the Mountain, and placed his Statue there, before which they burn Perfumes. They reckon more than eleven hundred Monuments erected in Honour of their Princes, and illustrious Men, renown'd for Knowledge or Virtue. The Women participate of this kind of Glory; History taking Notice of several, who have merited and obtain'd the like Titles of Honour, and whose Heroic Virtues are daily celebrated in the Works of their most famous Poets.

erected in Honour of Women as well as Men.

Triumphal Arches.

These Monuments consist principally in Triumphal Arches, call'd Pay-fang, and Pay-lew, which are very numerous in every City. Many of them are very clumsily made, and deserve little Notice; but others are worth Attention. Some are wholly of Wood, except the Pedestals, which are of Marble. Those at Ning-po have generally three Gates, that is, a large one in the middle, and two small ones on the sides; the Peers or Jambs are square Pillars or Posts consisting of one Stone; the Entablature is composed of three or four Faces, generally without any Projection, or Moulding, except the last or the last but one, which is in place of a Frieze, and has some Inscription engraven on it.

Their Architecture.

Instead of a Cornice, the Piers support a Roof, that makes the Top of the Gate, and is only to be described by the Pencil, our Gothic Architecture itself not having any thing so odd in it. Every Gate consists of the same Parts, which differ only in Size, and tho' of Stone, are join'd together by Tenons and Mortises, as if they were made of Wood. The Rails or Breast-Walls of the Bridges on the Canals, are in the same Taste, being large square Pannels of Stone, fix'd in Grooves cut in the Posts for that purpose.

Their Ornaments.

These Triumphal Arches, which are seldom above twenty or twenty five Feet high, are set off with Figures of Men, Antics, Flowers, and Birds, jutting out beyond the Arch in various Attitudes, with other Ornaments indifferently well carv'd; The Relievo is so great, that many of them seem to be almost seperated from the Work: among the rest are several small Cordons or Pieces of Net-work, pierc'd very artificially. In a word, these Pageants, tho' slight enough, have their Beauties; and several of them placed at certain Distances in a Street, especially if it be narrow, discover something grand, and make an agreeable Show.

City Walls,

I have already given some Account of the Chinese Magnificence, with respect to public Works, in speaking of the Walls and Gates of Pe-king; and as many Cities have the like, I shall only add, that their Walls are so high, that they hide the Buildings, and so broad that one may ride on Horseback upon them. Those of Pe-king are made of Brick, and forty Feet high; they are flank'd at the distance of every twenty Toises, with small square Towers kept in good Repair; and in some places have great Ramps, that the Cavalry may get upon them.

and Gates.

As for the Gates, tho' they are not adorn'd with Figures in Basso Relievo, like other public Works, the Sight is extremely affected by the prodigious Height of the two Pavilions that form them; by their Arches, that in some places are of Marble; by their Thickness, and by the Strength of the Work.

Towers.

The Towers, call'd Pau-ta, erected in almost every City, are some of their greatest Ornaments; they consist of several Stories, one less than another the higher they go, with Windows on every Side. The most famous Structure of this kind, is that in the City of Nan-king, in the Province of Kyang-nan, commonly call'd, The Great or Porcelain Tower, which I have already spoken of in the Beginning of this Work; but as P. le Comte has given a more exact Description of it, it deserves to be repeated here:

Porcelain Tower at Nan-king.

" There is (says he) without the City, and not within it, as some have written, a Temple, " call'd by the Chinese, The Temple of Gratitude, built by the Emperor Yong-lo. It is erected " on a Pile of Bricks, which form a great Perron, surrounded with Rails of unpolish'd " Marble, and a Stair-Case of ten or twelve Steps. The Hall, which serves for the Temple, " is a hundred Feet high, and standing on a small Marble Basis, no more than a Foot " in height, but jutting out two Feet beyond the rest of the Wall all round. The Front is " adorn'd with a Gallery and several Pillars. The Roofs (for according to the Custom of " China

(A) The Mountain meant here, is doubtless the famous Mey-lin, mention'd p. 286 and often before, particularly p. 115.

" China, there often are two, one bearing on the Wall, the other covering that again) are of " japan'd Tiles, green and ſhining. The Joyners Work on the Inſide is painted, and adorn'd " with an infinite number of Pieces, engaged, in different manners one within another; which is " no ſmall Ornament among the Chineſe. It is true that this Foreſt of Beams, Joiſts, Rafters, " and Spars, that appear on all ſides, has ſomething very ſingular and ſurpriſing; becauſe one " is apt to imagine that there is a great deal of Labour and Expence in Works of this " kind: tho' in reality the Confuſion proceeds from the Ignorance of the Workmen, who " have not yet diſcover'd that lovely Simplicity, wherein the Strength and Beauty of the " European Buildings conſiſt.

" The Hall has no Light but what it receives through the Doors, of which there are on " the Eaſt-ſide three very large ones, leading into the famous Tower I am going to ſpeak " of, which makes part of the Temple. It is an Octogon, about forty Feet in Diameter, ſo " that every Side of it is fifteen Feet in length. It is encompaſs'd on the Outſide by a " Wall of the ſame Figure, which is two Toiſes and an half diſtant from the Edifice, and " at a moderate Height ſupports a Roof, cover'd with japan'd Tiles, that ſeems to proceed " from the Body of the Tower, and makes underneath a very handſome Gallery. The " Tower has nine Stories, each adorn'd with a Cornice, three Feet above the Windows; " and a Roof like that of the Gallery, except that it does not jut out ſo far, as not being " ſupported by a ſecond Wall: Theſe Stories grow ſmaller, as the Tower riſes higher, and " leſſens in Circumference. The Wall on the Ground-Floor is at leaſt twelve Feet thick, " and eight and an half high, caſed with Porcelain. It is true, the Rain and Duſt have " impair'd its Beauty, but yet it is ſtill entire enough to ſhew that it is made of China " Ware, tho' of a coarſe ſort, for it is not probable Bricks would have continued three " hundred Years in ſo good Condition.

" The Stair-Caſe, which is made on the Inſide, is ſmall and inconvenient, becauſe the " Steps are extremely high. Every Story is ſeparated by thick Beams, plac'd croſs-ways, " which ſupport a Floor, and form a Room, the Cieling of which is adorn'd with variety of " Paintings, if the Chineſe Painters be capable of embelliſhing an Apartment. The Walls " of all the upper Stories are full of ſmall Niches, containing Images in Baſſo-relievo, which " make a very pretty ſort of Inlaid Work. The wohle is gilded, and ſeems to be of Marble, " or poliſh'd Stone, tho' I believe it to be nothing but Brick made in a Mould; for the " Chineſe are ſurprizingly ſkilful in ſtamping all ſorts of Figures on their Bricks: the Earth of " which, being extremely fine and well temper'd, is much fitter than ours for taking the " Impreſſion of the Mould.

" The firſt Story is the higheſt of all; the reſt are of an equal Height. As I reckon'd " one hundred and ninety Steps, almoſt every one ten Inches thick, which I meaſur'd exactly, " they muſt make one hundred and fifty eight Feet; if to this we add the Height of the " Perron, the ninth Story which has no Steps, and the Roof, the Tower will be from the " Ground about two hundred Feet high.

" The Top of all the Work is one of its greateſt Beauties; for it is a thick Maſt, reaching " from the Floor of the eighth Story, whereon it ſtands, more than thirty Foot above the " Roof. It ſeems to be incloſ'd in a large Iron Hoop of the ſame Height, which winds round " it [like a ſpiral Line or Screw] at the Diſtance of ſeveral Feet; ſo that it looks like a ſort " of hollow Cone, pierced through, riſing in the Air, with a golden Ball on the Top " of an extraordinary Magnitude. This is what the Chineſe call the Porcelain Tower, though " ſome Europeans perhaps will name it a Brick Tower; but let that be as it will, it is certainly " the beſt contriv'd, moſt ſolid, and magnificent Work in all the Eaſt."

Temples of the Bonzas.

Among the moſt ſumptuous Buildings of the Chineſe we ought not to omit their Temples or Pagods, erected to fabulous Divinities by the Superſtition of the Princes as well as of the People. Of theſe there is a prodigious number in China, and the moſt celebrated are built in barren Mountains, to which however the Induſtry of the Natives has given the Beauties and Conveniencies deny'd them by Nature: the Canals cut at a great Expence to conduct the Water from the Heights into Baſons and Reſervoirs appointed for that Purpoſe; The Gardens, Groves, and Grottos, made in the Rocks for Shelter, againſt the exceſſive Heat of a burning Climate, render theſe Solitudes charming.

The Structure conſiſts partly of Porticos, pav'd with large ſquare poliſh'd Stones, and partly of Halls, and Pavilions, which ſtand in the Corners of Courts, and communicate by long Galleries, adorn'd with Statues of Stone, and ſometimes of Braſs. The Roofs of theſe Buildings ſhine with beautiful Tiles japan'd green and yellow; and are adorn'd at the Corners with Dragons of the ſame Colour, projecting forward.

There are few of theſe Pagods but what have a great Tower, ſtanding by itſelf, and terminating in a Dome, to which they aſcend by a handſome Stair-Caſe that winds round about it. A ſquare Temple commonly occupies the middle of the Dome, which is often adorn'd with Moſaic Work, and the Walls cover'd with ſtone Figures of Animals and Monſters in Relievo.

This is the Form of moſt of the Pagods, which are larger or ſmaller, according to the Devotion and Abilities of thoſe who have contributed towards building them. Theſe are the Habitations of the Bonzas and Idol-Prieſts, by whom all ſorts of Frauds are practiſed, to impoſe on the Credulity of the People; who come from far in Pilgrimage to theſe Temples conſecrated ſecrated to the Devil (A): but as the Chineſe are not very conſiſtent in the Worſhip they pay to their Images, it often happens that they ſhew but little Veneration either for their Gods or his Miniſters.

Generally the Bonzas are in great Contempt, nor will any Chineſe of Faſhion embrace their Condition; ſo that being almoſt all taken from the Dregs of the People, they are often, to encreaſe their number, oblig'd to buy young Children, whom they bring up in their way of Life, in order to ſucceed them in the Miniſtry.

Feſtivals of the Chineſe.

In ſpeaking of the Magnificence of the Chineſe, I ſhould omit what is very eſſential, if I ſaid nothing of their Feſtivals, whereof principally two, are celebrated with vaſt Expence. The one is the Beginning of their Year, and the other, which falls on the fifteenth of the firſt Month, is call'd The Feaſt of Lanthorns. By the Beginning of the Year I mean the End of the twelfth Moon, and about twenty Days of the firſt Moon of the following Year, which is properly their Vacation-Time. Then all Buſineſs ceaſes, they make Preſents, the Poſts are ſtopp'd, and the Tribunals are ſhut up throughout the Empire. This is what they call the Shutting up the Seals; becauſe at this Time they, with a great deal of Ceremony, ſhut up the little Coffer, wherein the Seals of each Tribunal are kept. This Vacation laſts a whole Month, and is a Time of great Rejoicing; eſpecially during the laſt Days of the old Year, which are celebrated with great Solemnity. Their inferior Mandarins go to ſalute the Superiors, the Children their Fathers, the Servants their Maſters, &c. This is what they call taking Leave of the Year. In the Evening all the Family meet together, and a great Feaſt is made.

That of Lanthorns.

In ſome Places a very odd piece of Superſtition prevails, for they will not ſuffer a Stranger among them, nay not one of their neareſt Relations; for fear that the Moment the new Year begins, he ſhould catch the good Luck which was to light on the Houſe, and carry it away with him, to the Prejudice of his Hoſt. On this Day therefore every one keeps cloſe at home, and rejoices with none but his own Family; but on the Morrow, and the following Days, they expreſs Signs of extraordinary Joy, for all the Shops are ſhut, and every body is wholly taken up with Sports, Feaſts and Plays. The poorer ſort on this Day put on the beſt they have; while ſuch as can afford it dreſs themſelves richly, and viſit their Friends, Relations, eldeſt Brothers, Patrons, and all thoſe they have any Intereſt in. They act Plays, treat each other, and mutually wiſh all kinds of Proſperity; in a word, all the Empire is in Motion, and nothing is heard of but Mirth and Pleaſure.

Another Feſtival of Lanthorns.

The fifteenth of the firſt Month is likewiſe a ſolemn Feſtival, when all China is illuminated, and to look from ſome high Place ſeems to be on Fire. It begins on the thirteenth in the Evening, and continues to the ſixteenth or ſeventeenth. Every Perſon, both in City and Country, on the Sea-Coaſt, or on the Rivers, lights up painted Lanthorns of ſeveral Faſhions; even the pooreſt Houſes that are, have them hanging in their Courts, and at their Windows, every one being deſirous to diſtinguiſh himſelf. Thoſe uſed by the Poor do not coſt much, but the Rich lay out ſometimes two hundred Franks in Lanthorns; and the chief Mandarins, the Vice-Roys, and the Emperor, three or four thouſand Livres.

This being a Spectacle free for every body, the People flock thither from all Parts of the City, and the more to ſatisfy their Curioſity, the Gates are left open every Evening: They are even permitted to enter into the Tribunals of the Mandarins, who adorn them in a ſplendid manner, to ſhew their Magnificence.

The Lanthorns deſcribed.

Theſe Lanthorns are very large, the Frames of ſome, containing ſix Panes, being of japan'd Wood, adorn'd with Gildings. Theſe Panes conſiſt of fine tranſparent Silk, whereon are painted Flowers, Trees, Animals, and human Figures; which being diſpoſed with Art, receive as it were Life from the great number of Lamps and Candles, wherewith the Lanthorns are lighted up. Others are round, and made of blue tranſparent Horn, very beautiful to the Sight. The Top of this Machine is adorn'd with Variety of carved Works, from the Corners whereof hang ſeveral Streamers of Sattin and Silk of divers Colours.

Moving Figures.

Several of them repreſent Sights purpoſely to amuſe and divert the People; there you ſee Horſes galloping, Ships ſailing, Armies marching, People dancing, and ſeveral other things of the ſame Nature; the reſpective Figures being put in Motion by means of imperceptible Threads, manag'd by Perſons unſeen. Some by Shadows repreſent Princes and Princeſſes, Soldiers, Buffoons, and other Characters; whoſe Geſtures are ſo conformable to the Words of the Operator, who moves them with extraordinary Art, that one would think they really ſpoke. Others carry a Dragon ſixty or eighty foot long, full of Lights from the Head to the Tail, which they cauſe to wind and turn like a Serpent.

Splendid Fire-works.

But what gives a new Splendor to this Feaſt is the Fire-Works, which are plaid off in all Parts of the City; and wherein the Chineſe are thought to excel. P. Magalhaens relates, that he was extreamly ſurpriſed with one he ſaw, repreſenting a Vine-Arbor, which burn'd without conſuming; and the Foot of the Vine, the Branches, Leaves, and Grapes conſumed exceeding ſlowly: The Grapes appeared red, the Leaves green, and the Colour of the Stem was imitated ſo artificially, that any Perſon might have been deceived. But the Reader will be better able to judge of theſe Fire-Works from the Deſcription of one which the Emperor Kang-hi cauſed to be play'd off for the Diverſion of his Court; whereat the Miſſionaries, who were of his Train, were preſent.

(A) The hard Names beſtow'd by the Author will not take off the Reſemblance between the two Religions. Their Practice is the very ſame, they only differ as the Objects of their Worſhip.

It

It began by ſetting Fire to half a dozen Cylinders planted in the Earth: theſe ſpouted Flames in the Air, which at the Height of twelve Foot fell down again in golden Rain or Fire. This was follow'd by a ſort of Bomb-Cart ſupported by two Stakes or Pillars, from whence proceeded a Shower of Fire with ſeveral Lanthorns; many Sentences wrote in large Characters; the Colour of burning Sulphur; and half a dozen branched Candleſticks in the Form of Pillars, conſiſting of ſeveral Rings of Lights, one above another, which caſt a white or ſilver Flame, and in a Moment turn'd Night into Day. At length the Emperor, with his own Hands, ſet Fire to the Body of the Machine, which preſently became all in a Blaze, being eighty Feet long, and forty or fifty broad: The Flame having caught hold of ſeveral Poles, and Paper Figures placed on all Sides, a prodigious Quantity of Squibs flew up into the Air, and a great number of Lanthorns and Branches were lighted all over the Place. This Show laſted for half an Hour; and from time to time there appeared in ſome Places violet and bluiſh Flames, in the Form of Bunches of Grapes, hanging on a Vine-Arbor, which, joined to the Splendor of the Lights, that were like ſo many Stars, yielded a very agreeable Spectacle.

There is one very remarkable Ceremony obſerved at this Feſtival: In moſt Houſes the Head of the Family writes in large Characters on a Sheet of red Paper, or japan'd Board, the following Words, Tyen-ti, San-kyay, She-fan, Van-lin, Chin tſay: the Senſe of which is, To the true Governour of the Heaven, the Earth, the three Limits, (that is, the whole World) and of the ten thouſand Intelligences, (that is, an innumerable Multitude.) This Paper is either put in a Frame, or paſted on a Board; at Court they place it on a Table, on which is ſet Corn, Bread, Meat, or ſome other Thing of that Nature, and then proſtrating themſelves on the Earth, offer Sticks of Paſtil. Odd Ceremony.

Of the Ceremonies obſerved by the Chineſe in their Compliments, Viſits, Preſents, Letters, Feaſts, Marriages, and Funerals.

1. Their SALUTATIONS and COMPLIMENTS.

THERE is nothing in which the Chineſe ſeem more ſcrupulous than in their Ceremonies and Compliments. They are perſwaded that a due Attention in performing the Duties of Civility goes farther than any thing elſe to purge the Mind of a certain Roughneſs that is born with us; to infuſe a Sweetneſs of Temper, and to maintain Peace, good Order, and Subordination in a State: It is, ſay they, by Modeſty and Politeneſs in civil Society, that Men are diſtinguiſhed from Brutes. Chineſe fine Notion of Civility.

Among their Books, containing the Rules of Civility, there is one which has upwards of three thouſand, every thing being ſet down at large. The common Salutations, the Viſits, the Preſents, the Feaſts, and whatſoever is done in public or private, are rather ſo many ſtanding Laws, than Faſhions gradually introduced by Cuſtom. Almoſt the whole of theſe public Ceremonies may be reduced to the Manner of bowing, kneeling down, and proſtrating one or more times, according to the Occaſion, Place, Age or Quality of the Perſons; eſpecially in viſiting, making Preſents, or treating Friends. Their Ceremonies have the Force of Laws.

Foreigners, who are obliged to conform to theſe fatiguing Ceremonies, are frighten'd with them at firſt; whereas the Chineſe, who are brought up to them from their Infancy, inſtead of being diſcouraged, are greatly pleaſed with them, and believe that for want of the like Education other Nations are become barbarous. And, that the Obſervation of theſe Cuſtoms may not wear out in time, there is a Tribunal at Pe-king, whoſe principal Buſineſs is to preſerve the Ceremonies of the Empire; wherein it is ſo ſtrict that it will not exempt even Strangers from the Obligation: for which Reaſon, before the Ambaſſadors are introduced to Court, the Cuſtom is to inſtruct them privately for forty Days together, and exerciſe them in the Ceremonies of the Country; much after the ſame manner as our Comedians practiſe before they come to act their Parts on the Stage. All even Strangers and Ambaſſadors oblig'd to comply with them.

It is reported that one of the former Czars of Ruſſia, having in a Letter to the Emperor of China beſought his Majeſty to pardon his Ambaſſador, if, for want of being well acquainted with the Cuſtoms of the Empire, he committed any Blunder; the above mentioned Tribunal, called Li-pû, reply'd genteely in theſe Terms, (which the Miſſionaries at Pe-king tranſlated faithfully by the Emperor's Order) Legatus tuus multa fecit ruſtice; Your Ambaſſador has done many things in a very unpolite Manner. Inſtance.

This Affectation of Gravity and Politeneſs appears ridiculous at firſt to an European; but he muſt comply with it, unleſs he has a mind to paſs for a Clown. After all, every Nation has its Genius and Manners; nor ought we to judge of them according to the Prejudice of Education. If on comparing the Cuſtoms of China with ours, we are tempted to look upon ſo wiſe a Nation as fantaſtic; the Chineſe in their Turns, agreeable to their own Notions of things, look upon us as Barbarians: But both are miſtaken, moſt Actions of Mankind being indifferent in themſelves, and ſtanding juſt for nothing but what People pleaſe to make of them: hence that which is look'd upon as a mark of Honour in one Country, is a ſign of Contempt in another. In many Places it is an Affront to a Gentleman to take An Apology for the Chineſe Ceremonies.

take him by the Beard; in others it is a Mark of Veneration, and ſignifies that the Perſon who does it has ſome Favour to aſk. The Europeans riſe up and take off their Hats to receive Viſitors: the Japaneſe on the contrary neither move nor uncover, but only pull off their Shoes and Stockings; and in China it is a great Rudeneſs to talk bare-headed to any Perſon whatever. Plays, and Inſtruments of Muſic, are almoſt every where Signs of Joy, yet in China they are uſed at Funerals.

Therefore, without either praiſing or blaming the Cuſtoms which diſguſt us, it is ſufficient to ſay, that theſe Ceremonies, however forbidding they may ſeem to us, are look'd upon by the Chineſe as very eſſential to the good Order and Peace of the State. It is a Taſk to learn them, and a Science to be Maſter of them; but they are brought up to them from their Infancy, ſo that, however irkſome they may prove at firſt, they at length become natural to them.

The Behaviour even to the Vulgar regulated.

All things being thus regulated as to Ceremonies, every body is ſure not to fail in the ſmalleſt Duty of Civil Life. The Grandees know the Reſpect due from them to the Emperor and the Princes, and in what manner they ought to behave to each other; even the Mechanics, the Peaſants, and the very Dregs of the People perform all the Formalities preſcribed them, and in their Meetings obſerve Politeneſs and Complaiſance; as will appear from the Account I am going to give of theſe Ceremonies.

Ceremony of ſaluting the Emperor.

On certain Days the Mandarins go to ſalute the Emperor in their Robes of Ceremony; and if he does not appear himſelf, they do reverence to his Throne, inſtead of his Perſon. While they wait for the Signal to enter the Court of the Chau, facing the Hall of the Throne, they ſit on their Cuſhions in the Court, before the South-Gate of the Palace, which is pav'd with Bricks, and as clean as a Room. The Cuſhions vary according to the Degree of the Mandarin: thoſe who are intitled to one, for all are not, have it in Summer of Silk, the Colour making the Diſtinction, though the Difference of the Rank appears chiefly from the middle of the Cuſhion; and in the Winter they uſe Skins, which are diſtinguiſh'd by the Price. In this great multitude, where one would expect to meet with nothing but Confuſion, every thing is admirably well regulated, and perform'd in the greateſt Order; for as each knows his Place, there are no Diſputes about Precedence.

Every one accountable for a Breach of the Ceremonial.

When the Body of the late Empreſs was carrying to be interr'd, one of the Princes of the Blood calling a Ko-lau to ſpeak with him, the Ko-lau approach'd, and having anſwer'd him on his Knees, the Prince left him in that Poſture without bidding him riſe. Next Day a Ko-li accuſed the Prince and all the Ko-lau's before the Emperor; the Prince for ſuffering ſuch a conſiderable Officer to appear before him in ſo humble a Poſture; and the Ko-lau's, chiefly him who kneel'd down, for diſhonouring the higheſt Poſt in the Empire, and the reſt for not oppoſing, or at leaſt giving the Emperor Notice of it. The Prince excuſed himſelf, in that he was ignorant of what Cuſtom or the Law directed in the Caſe, and did not require that Submiſſion; but the Ko-li in Anſwer alledged a Law of an ancient Dynaſty: Whereupon the Emperor order'd the Li-pû [or Tribunal of Ceremonies] to ſearch for ſuch Law in the Archives, and in Caſe it could not be found, to make a Rule on that Head, which might take place for the future.

Formality of complimenting the Emperor on the Choice of an Empreſs.

The Ceremonial is likewiſe regulated, on all other Occaſions, which the Grandees may have to compliment the Emperor: Such for Inſtance (and it is the only one I ſhall mention) was that when the preſent Emperor [Yong-ching] declar'd the Choice he had made of one of his Wives for Empreſs. Immediately two of the moſt conſiderable Doctors, who are Members of the great Council, were deputed to make the Compliment, (for to them only it belongs to compoſe theſe pieces of Eloquence) and remit it to the Tribunal of Rites; who, as ſoon as they receiv'd it, prepar'd themſelves for the Ceremony.

On the Day appointed, in the Morning, there was carry'd, to the firſt or Eaſtern Gate (*) of Palace, a kind of ſquare Table, on the Corners whereof were erected four Pillars, which ſupported a ſort of Dome: This little portable Cabinet was ſet off with yellow Silk and other Ornaments. At the prefixed Hour a neat little Book (wherein was written the Compliment that was compoſed for the Emperor, with the Names of the Princes, Grandees, and thoſe of the ſupreme Courts, who came in a Body to perform this Ceremony) being plac'd on the Table, ſome Mandarins, clad ſuitably to their Office, took up the Machine, and went forward. All the Princes of the Blood with the other Princes and Noblemen had gone before, each according to his Rank, and waited near one of the inner Gates of the Palace. The reſt of the great Officers, ſuch as the Prime Miniſters, the Doctors of the firſt Rank, the Preſidents of the ſupreme Courts, and the other Tartarian and Chineſe Mandarins, as well Literary as Military, all magnificently dreſs'd in their Habits of Ceremony, follow'd the Table on Foot, every one in his proper Place. Several muſical Inſtruments made a very agreeable Concert, the Drums and Trumpets reſounding from different Parts of the Palace. They began the Proceſſion; and when they were near the Gate call'd U-mwen, the Princes join'd them, placing themſelves at their Head. In this manner they walk'd together as far as the great Hall of Audience (†), which having entred, they took the Compliment off the portable

Table,

Table, and plac'd it on another Table, prepar'd for that Purpoſe, in the middle of the Hall. Then all being rang'd in handſome Order, and ſtanding in their proper Places, they made their uſual Reverences before the Imperial Throne, as if his Majeſty had been there himſelf; that is, they fell upon their Knees, ſtruck their Foreheads three times againſt the Ground with great Reſpect, and then roſe up again, performing the ſame Ceremony three times. After this, every one keeping in his own Place with great Silence, the Muſic began to play again; and the Preſidents of the Tribunal of Rites acquainted the chief Eunuchs of the Preſence, that all the Grandees of the Empire beſought his Majeſty to come and ſit down on his precious Throne. Theſe Words being carry'd to the Emperor, he appear'd and aſcended the Throne; when immediately two Doctors of the firſt Rank, appointed for that Purpoſe, having advanced near the Table, made ſeveral Reverences on their Knees; and then riſing up, one of them took the little Book, and read diſtinctly with a loud Voice the Compliment made by this Auguſt Company to his Majeſty, which was not very long. As ſoon as the Doctors had finiſh'd it, and retired to their Places, the Emperor, deſcending from his Throne, return'd to his Apartment.

After Noon the Princeſſes of the Blood, the other Princeſſes, and Ladies of the firſt Quality, with the Wives of all the great Mandarins, above-mention'd, went every one, according to their Rank and Dignity, towards the Palace of the Empreſs, no Lord or Mandarin daring to appear; they were conducted by a Lady of Diſtinction, who on this Occaſion perform'd the part of a Miſtreſs of the Ceremonies, as the Preſidents of the Tribunals had done that of Maſters.

As ſoon as all the Ladies were arriv'd near the Empreſs's Palace, her firſt Eunuch preſenting himſelf, the Miſtreſs of the Ceremonies addreſs'd him in this Manner: "I humbly beſeech "the Empreſs, (ſaid ſhe) in behalf of this Aſſembly, to condeſcend to come out of the Palace, "and place herſelf on the Throne." The Women's Compliment is not carry'd in a ſmall Book like the Emperor's, but they preſent a Leaf of a particular ſort of Paper, whereon it is written, with Variety of Ornaments about it. The Empreſs accordingly came out; and being ſeated on her Throne, erected in one of the Halls of her Palace, after the Paper was preſented, the Ladies ſtanding up made two Curteſies, like thoſe made by the Women of Europe, which is the Faſhion in China. This Reverence is call'd Van-fo; Van ſignifying ten thouſand, and Fo Happineſs, or Good Luck; Van-fo, All Happineſs attend ye.

The Women ſalute by a Curteſy.

In the Beginning of the Monarchy, when Simplicity reign'd, Women were permitted, in making a Curteſy to a Man, to uſe theſe two Words, Van-fo: but afterwards, when the Purity of Manners began to corrupt, this ſort of Addreſs to Men was not thought decent in Women, whoſe Salute to them was confined to the mute Curteſy; and to deſtroy the Cuſtom entirely, they were not permitted to ſay the Words even in ſaluting one another. The Ladies having made the two Curteſies, fell on their Knees, and knock'd their Fore-head once againſt the Ground, as the Tribunal of Rites had preſcrib'd; they then roſe and ſtood up in the ſame Order with profound Silence, while the Empreſs deſcending from the Throne withdrew.

It is not at all ſtrange that there ſhould be a Ceremonial regulated for the Court; but the Surprize is, that they ſhould go ſo far as to eſtabliſh particular Rules for the Behaviour of private Perſons towards one another, when they have any Buſineſs, either with their Equals or Superiors. No Perſon whatever can diſpenſe with theſe Rules, but, from the higheſt Mandarin to the meaneſt Mechanick, every one obſerves punctually the Subordination that Rank, Merit, or Age require.

Form of Salutation uſed by the Men.

The common way of Saluting, is to clap the Hands together before the Breaſt, moving them in an affected Manner, and to bow the Head a very little, ſaying Tſin-tſin; which is a Word of Compliment, of an unlimited Signification. When they meet a Perſon to whom they ought to pay greater Deference, after joining their Hands, they firſt lift them up, and then let them fall almoſt to the Earth, bowing their Body very low at the ſame time. When two Perſons who are acquainted meet, after a long Separation, they both fall on their Knees and bow to the Earth, then riſe up again, and perform the ſame Ceremony two or three times. They commonly make uſe of the Word Fo in their Civilities: if any Perſon is newly arriv'd, the firſt Queſtion they aſk him, is Na-fo, that is, If all things have happen'd well in his Journey; when they are aſk'd, How they do, they reply, Kau lau-ye hung-fo, Very well, Thanks to your abundant Felicity; when they ſee a Man who is in Health, they accoſt him with Yung-fo, which is as much as to ſay, Proſperity is painted on your Face, or You have a happy Countenance.

Complimental Expreſſions, even among the Peaſants and common People.

Regard is had to the Rules of Civility no leſs in the Villages than the Cities; and whether they are walking together, or ſaluting each other, they always make uſe of Terms full of Reſpect and Complaiſance. When, for Example, one takes any Pains to pleaſe them, Fey-ſin, they ſay, You are laviſh of your Heart; If you have done them any Service, the Expreſſion is, Sye-pû-tſin, My Thanks can never have an end; If they hinder a Perſon ever ſo little who is buſy, Fan-lau, ſay they, I am very troubleſome; Te-tſwi, I have committed a great Fault in taking this Liberty; When one is beforehand in doing them a Kindneſs, they cry, Pû-kan, Pû-kan, Pû-kan, I dare not, I dare not, I dare not, that is to ſay, ſuffer you to take ſo much Trouble on my Account; If you ſpeak the leaſt in their Praiſe, they reply, Ki-kan, How dare I! meaning, How dare I believe the Things you ſay of me! When they take Leave of a Friend who has been at Dinner with them, they ſay, Yew-man, or Tay-man, We have receiv'd you after a very ordinary manner; we have treated you after a very ordinary manner. The Chineſe have always in their Mouths ſuch Words as theſe, which they utter with an affected Tone; but it does not follow from hence, that they generally proceed from the Heart.

Precedence given to Age.

Among the common People, the chief Place is conſtantly given to the moſt aged; but if there are Strangers, it is beſtow'd on him who lives fartheſt off, unleſs his Rank or Quality requires it to be otherwiſe. In thoſe Provinces where the Right Hand is moſt honourable, (for in ſome the Left is ſo) they never fail to give it.

Salutation among the Great.

When two Mandarins meet in the Street, if their Rank be equal, they ſalute, without either leaving their Chair or riſing, by letting fall their join'd Hands, and afterwards lifting them up to the Head, which they repeat ſeveral times till they are out of each other's Sight: but if one of them be of an inferior Rank, he muſt ſtop his Chair, or alight, if he is on Horſeback, and make a profound Reverence; for which Reaſon the Inferiors avoid ſuch Rencounters as much as poſſible.

Of Children to Parents.

Nothing is comparable to the Reſpect which Children have for their Fathers, and Scholars for their Maſters, ſpeaking little, and always ſtanding in their Preſence; their Cuſtom is, eſpecially at the beginning of the Year, their Birth-Days, and on ſeveral other Occaſions, to ſalute them on their Knees, knocking their Foreheads ſeveral times againſt the Ground.

Moſt humble Terms uſed in Converſation.

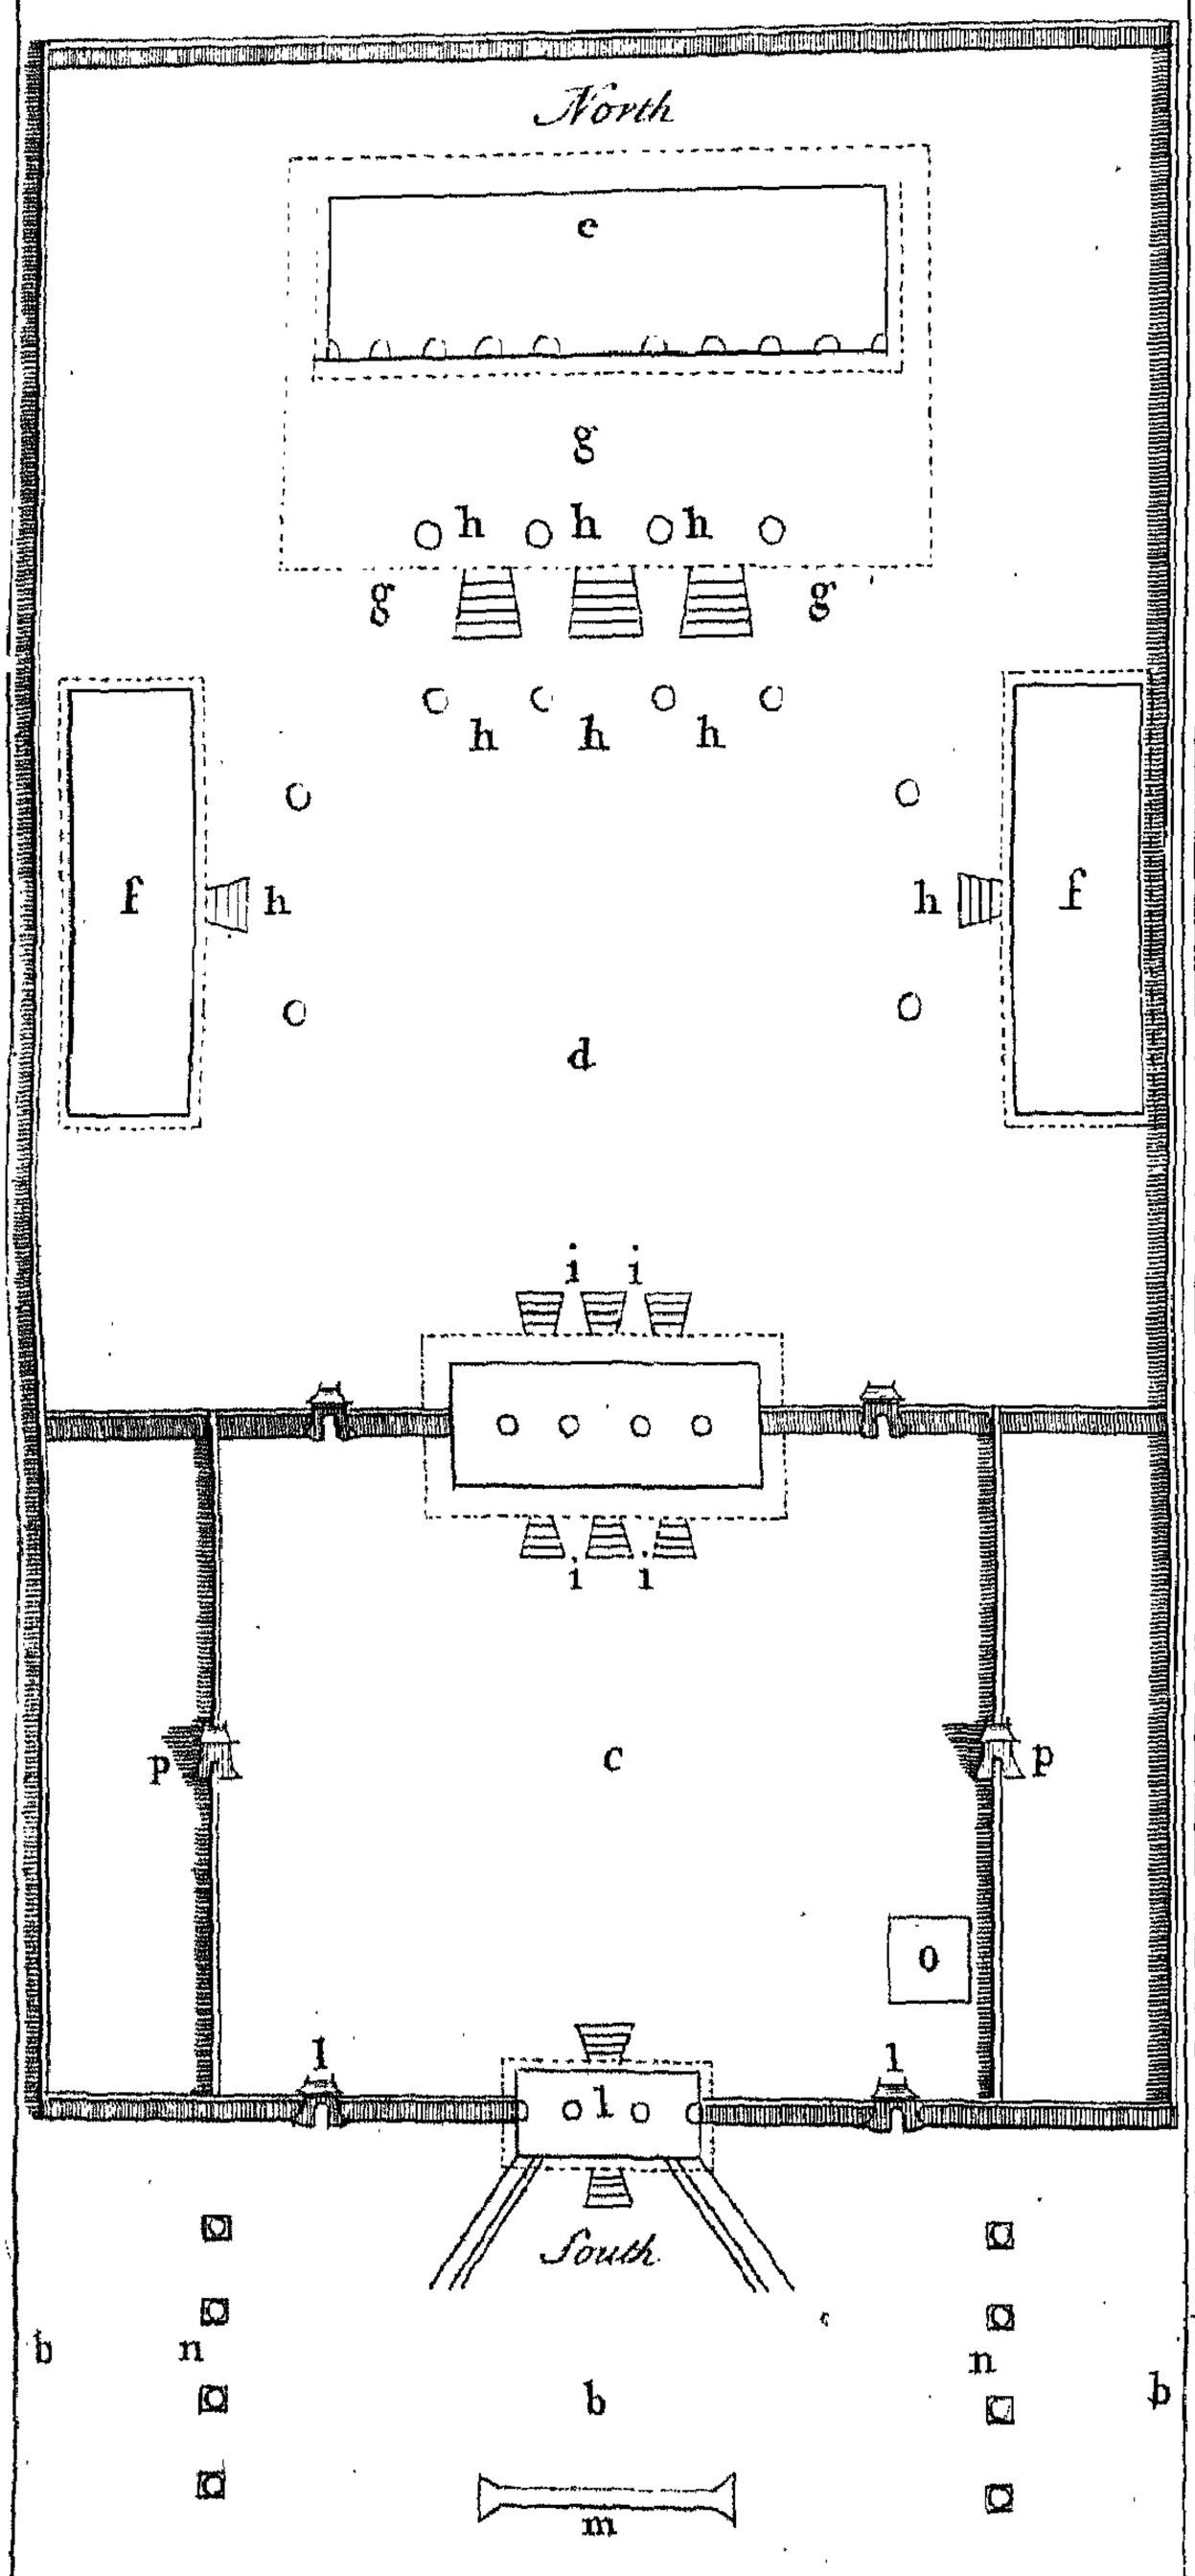
When the Chineſe converſe together, they expreſs themſelves in the moſt humble and reſpectful manner; and unleſs they are talking familiarly to intimate Friends, or Perſons of an inferior Rank, they never ſpeak in the firſt or ſecond Perſon: for to ſay I and You, would be a groſs Incivility; wherefore inſtead of I am very ſenſible of the Service that you have done me, they will ſay, The Service which the Lord, or the Doctor, has done for his meaneſt Servant, or his Scholar, has ſenſibly affected me. In the ſame manner a Son ſpeaking to his Father, will call himſelf his Grand-Son, tho' he is the eldeſt of the Family, and has Children himſelf.

Chineſe have ſeveral Names, given on various Occaſions.

They often make uſe of their proper Names to teſtify their great Reſpect; for it muſt be obſerv'd that the Chineſe have ſeveral Names, ſuitable to their Age and Rank. The Parents give their Child at his Birth the Name of the Family, which is common to all who are deſcended from the ſame Grandfire. About a Month after they give him a Diminutive or Milk-Name, as they term it, being commonly that of a Flower, Animal, or ſuch like thing. When he begins his Studies, he receives from his Maſter a new Name, which is join'd to the Family-Name, and this he is call'd by at School. Being arriv'd to Man's Eſtate, he takes among his Friends another Name; and this is it which he retains, and commonly ſigns at the end of his Letters or other Writings. In a Word, when he attains ſome conſiderable Office, he then aſſumes a Name agreeable to his Rank and Merit, which is the Name that Politeneſs requires to be uſed in ſpeaking to him. It would be an Incivility to call him by his Family-Name, unleſs the Perſon who did ſo were of a much ſuperior Rank.

Compliment paid a good Governor at parting.

Theſe polite and modeſt Manners, infuſed ſo early into the Chineſe, give them the moſt profound Veneration for their Governors, whom they look upon as their Fathers; but their way of expreſſing this Veneration ſeems to us very extraordinary. When the Governor of a City withdraws into another Province, after having acquitted himſelf in his Office to the public Satisfaction, the People ſtrive to pay him the greateſt Honours. For two or three Leagues together at certain Diſtances they fix Tables, on ſome of which (ſet round with long Pieces of Silk, that hang down to the Ground) they burn Perfumes and place Candleſticks, Wax-lights, Meats, Pulſe and Fruits; furniſhing others with Wine and Tea. As ſoon as the Mandarin appears, they fall on their Knees, and bow their Heads to the Ground: ſome weep, or at leaſt pretend to do ſo; others beſeech him to alight to receive the laſt Teſtimony of their Gratitude. They then preſent him with the Wine and other Proviſions prepar'd for him, and thus he is continually ſtopp'd as he advances. But the moſt pleaſant part of all is to ſee People drawing off his Boots, every now and then, to give him new ones. All the Boots that have touch'd the Mandarin, are held in Veneration by his Friends, who preſerve them as precious Relics in their Houſes. The firſt that are drawn off are by way of Gratitude put, in a ſort of Cage, over the Gate of the City through which he paſſed.



Way of ſaluting a Governor on his Birth Day.

In the ſame manner when the Inhabitants of any City would honour their Governor on his Birth-Day, the principal Perſons meet and go in a Body to ſalute him at his Palace. Beſides the common Preſents, they often take with them a long japan'd Box, adorn'd with Flowers of Gold, and divided into eight or twelve ſmall Cells, which are filled with ſeveral ſorts of Sweet-meats. When they are come to the Hall, where the Ceremony is to be perform'd, they all ſtand in a Rank, and make a profound Reverence; then they fall on their Knees, and bow their Heads to the Ground, unleſs the Governor prevents them, as he commonly does. Oftentimes the moſt conſiderable among them takes a Cup of Wine, and lifting it up on high, with both Hands offers it to the Mandarin, and ſays aloud, by way of wiſh; Fo-tſyû, This is the Wine that brings good Luck; Shew-tſyû, This is the Wine that brings long Life. Immediately after another advances, and holding up the Sweat-Meats, preſents them very reſpectfully, ſaying, This is the Sugar of long Life. Then others repeat the ſame Ceremonies three times, ſtill uttering the ſame Wiſhes.

But when the Mandarin has diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in an extraordinary manner by his Equity, Zeal, and Goodneſs to the People, and they are deſirous of giving a remarkable Teſtimony of their Gratitude, they have a particular way of letting him know how highly they eſteem his happy Government. The Literati cauſe a Garment to be made, conſiſting of ſmall Squares of Sattin, of various Colours, as red, blue, green, black, yellow, &c. and on his Birth-Day carry it with great Ceremony, accompanied with Muſick. Being arrived in the outward Hall, which ſerves for a Tribunal, they beſeech him to come out of the inner Hall into the public one; and then preſent this Garment, requeſting him to put it on. The Mandarin pretends to make a Difficulty of it, ſaying, that he is unworthy of ſuch an Honour; but at length giving way to the Intreaties of the Literati, and People who croud the Court, he ſuffers them to ſtrip off his upper Garment and cloath him with that which they brought with them. They intend by the various Colours to repreſent all Nations, who wear different Habits, and to ſignify that all People conſider him as their Father, and that he is worthy to be their Governor; for which Reaſon theſe Garments are called Wan-jin-i, that is, The Habits of all Nations. 'Tis true, the Mandarin never wears them except at this Time; but they are carefully kept in the Family, as a Mark of Honour and Diſtinction. They never fail to acquaint the Viceroy with it, and the News is often carried to the Supreme Courts. P. Contancin happen'd once to be preſent at this Ceremony, on going to pay his Compliments to a Governor on his Birth-Day.

Compliment of the Party colour'd Coat.

Signification of that Preſent.

All Viſits to a Governor, or other Perſon of Diſtinction, muſt be made before Dinner; or if the Perſon has eaten any thing, he ought at leaſt to abſtain from Wine: for it would ſhew want of Reſpect to a Man of Quality to appear before him with a Countenance which diſcovered they had been drinking; and the Mandarin would be offended, if the Viſitor ſmelled ever ſo little of Wine. However, when you pay a Viſit the ſame Day you receive one, it may be done after Dinner; for then it is a Sign of your Haſte to honour the Perſon who viſited you.

'Tis alſo an indiſpenſable Duty of the Literati, who alone are capable of having a Share of the Government, to pay extraordinary Honours to the ancient Legiſlators, and moſt famous Philoſophers of the Empire, eſpecially Confucius; who in his Life-time contributed greatly to eſtabliſh a perfect Form of Government, and left behind him the principal Maxims thereof. All that is to be done on ſuch an Occaſion is regulated by the Ceremonial of the Empire.

Honours paid ancient Legiſlators and Philoſophers.

In every City a Palace is erected, which ſerves for the Aſſemblies of the Literati, who have given it ſeveral Names, as Pwan-king, or the Royal Hall; Ta-ſhing-tyen, The Hall of Wiſdom, or Perfection; Ta-hyo, The Great College, [or School] Qua-hyo, The College of the Empire. On the Walls are hung divers ſmall Boards, gilt and japan'd, inſcribed with the Names of thoſe who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the Sciences, Confucius being at their Head; and all the Learned are obliged to honour this Prince of their Philoſophers, according to the following Ceremonies:

Hall of Kong-fu-tſe.

Thoſe who, after rigorous Examinations, are judged fit for the Degree of Syew-tſay, or Batchelors, go to the Threſhold of the Ti-hyo-tau, or Mandarin, with black linen Garments, and a common Cap on. As ſoon as they are admitted into his Preſence they bow themſelves, fall on their Knees, and then proſtrate themſelves ſeveral times, on the Right and on the Left, in two Lines; till the Mandarin gives Orders for preſenting them with the Habits proper for Batchelors, which conſiſt of a Veſt, a Surtout, and a ſilk Cap. Having put them on, they return in order to proſtrate themſelves again before the Tribunal of the Mandarin. From hence they march very gravely to the Palace of Confucius, where they bow their Heads four times to the Ground before his Name, and before thoſe of the moſt eminent Philoſophers, as they had done before in the Mandarin's Houſe. This firſt Devoir of the Batchelors is performed in a City of the firſt Rank, nor can any Perſon whatſoever be excuſed from doing it, unleſs he is in Mourning, or dangerouſly ill. When the Syew-tſay are return'd to their own Country, thoſe of the ſame Diſtrict go in a Body to proſtrate themſelves before the Governor, who expects them; and having received theſe new Marks of Honour in his Tribunal, he riſes, and offers them Wine in Cups, which he firſt lifts up in the Air. In ſeveral Places pieces of red Silk are diſtributed among them, of which they make a kind of Belt; they alſo receive two Wands adorned with Flowers of Silver, which they ſet on each of their Caps like a Caduceus; then they walk with the Governor at their Head to the Palace of Confucius, to finiſh the Ceremony with the uſual Salutation before mention'd. This is as it were, the Seal [or Teſt] which eſtabliſhes them, and puts them in Poſſeſſion of their new Dignity; becauſe then they acknowledge Confucius for their Maſter, and by that Action profeſs to follow his Maxims in the Government of the State.

Ceremony of the Batchelors ſaluting him.

Beſides this, the Emperors have order'd that the Doctors and Literati ſhould celebrate, as it were in the Name of the Empire, a Feſtival to that Great Man. Every thing is prepared the Evening before: a Butcher comes and kills a Hog, and the Servants of the Tribunal bring Wine, Fruits, Flowers and Herbs, which they place on a Table, ſet with Wax-Candles and Perfuming-Pans. On the Morrow, the Governors, Doctors and Batchelors, repair with Drums beating, and Hautboys ſounding to the Feaſt-Hall: where the Maſter of the Ceremonies, appointed to regulate the whole Affair, commands them ſometimes to bend forwards, ſometimes to kneel down, ſometimes to bow to the very Earth, and ſometimes to ſtand up.

Feſtival or Sacrifice in honour of Kong-fu-tſe.

When

When the Hour for beginning the Ceremony is come, the chief Mandarin takes ſucceſſively Meat, Wine, Pulſe, and preſents them before the Tables of Confuçius; the Muſic playing all the while to Verſes ſung in Honour of this great Philoſopher. They afterwards repeat his Encomium, which is ſeldom more than eight or ten Lines, in praiſe of his Knowledge, Wiſdom, and good Morals. The Formula is the ſame throughout all the Cities of the Empire; and theſe Honours, which are in Effect paid to all the Learned in the Perſon of Confuçius, inſpire the Doctors with great Emulation.

Honours paid to illuſtrious Perſons and Citizens.

The Ceremony is concluded with repeated Bows and Reverences at the Sound of Flutes and Hautboys, and with reciprocal Compliments among the Mandarins. Laſt of all, they bury the Blood and Hair of the Animal that has been offer'd; and burn in Token of Joy a large Piece of Silk, which is faſten'd to the end of a Pike, and hangs to the Earth in manner of a Streamer. They afterwards go into the ſecond Hall, to pay certain Honours to the ancient Governors of Cities and Provinces, who are famous for behaving well in their Employments. Then they paſs into a third Hall, where are the Names of Citizens illuſtrious for their Virtues and Talents, and there perform ſome farther Ceremonies.

Emperor Kya-tong's Addreſs to Kong-fu-tſe.

It is reported, that the Chineſe Emperor Kya-tſing, before he began his Studies, went to the Palace of Confuçius to offer him Preſents, and before his Tablet ſpoke to him in this manner:

"I, the Emperor, come this Day to offer Praiſes and Preſents, as Marks of my Reſpect "for all the ancient Doctors of our Nation, eſpecially for the Prince Chew-kong and Confu- "çius: I then, who do not ſurpaſs in Genius the leaſt of their Diſciples, am oblig'd to apply "my ſelf to the Works, that is, the Books left us by theſe great Men, and ſage Maſters of "Antiquity; and to the Collection of their Maxims, according to which Poſterity ought to "regulate their Manners. For this Reaſon, being reſolved to ſet my ſelf to ſtudy them on the "Morrow, I will ſeriouſly employ the whole Force of my Underſtanding to read them over "and over without ceaſing, as the leaſt of the Diſciples of theſe incomparable Doctors; in "order to inſtruct my ſelf thoroughly therein, and to finiſh happily the Courſe of my "Studies."

2. Their VISITS.

Certain Viſits indiſpenſible.

ONE Article of the Chineſe Politeneſs is to pay Viſits to each other, which on certain Days of the Year, and particular Occaſions that happen from time to time, are Obligations; eſpecially on Scholars with reſpect to their Maſters, and Mandarins with regard to thoſe that they depend upon. Theſe Days are the Birth-days, the beginning of the new Year, the Feſtivals at the Birth of a Son; when one of the Family marries, is raiſed to ſome Office, takes a long Journey, or dies, &c. Theſe Viſits, which there is no diſpenſing with on all ſuch Occaſions without ſufficient Cauſe, are commonly accompany'd with Preſents; conſiſting often of things of no great Value, which yet may be of Uſe to the Perſon they are preſented to, and contribute not a little to keep up the Ties of Friendſhip or Dependance. As for common Viſits there is no Time fix'd for them, and tho' they are made between intimate and familiar Friends, without Formality, yet Cuſtom and the Law oblige others to perform a great many Ceremonies, which at firſt are very irkſome to all but the Chineſe. When they make a Viſit they muſt begin by delivering to the Porter a Viſiting-Billet, called Tye-tſe, which conſiſts of a Sheet of red Paper, ſlightly embelliſh'd with Flowers of Gold, and folded up like a Screen. On one of the Folds is written their Name, with the Addition of ſome reſpectful Terms, according to the Rank of the Perſon who is viſited: They ſay, for Inſtance, The tender and ſincere Friend of your Lordſhip, and the perpetual Diſciple of your Doctrine, preſents himſelf in this Quality, to pay his Duty, and make his Reverence even to the Earth; which they expreſs by theſe Words, Tun-ſhew-pay. When the Perſon viſited is a familiar Friend, or an ordinary Body, common Paper will ſerve, only if he be in Mourning it ought to be white.

Tye-tſe, or viſiting Billets.

They ſerve inſtead of a Viſit.

A Mandarin ſometimes contents himſelf with receiving the Tye-tſe from the Porter, (which, according to the Chineſe manner, is the ſame as if he received the Viſit in Perſon) and deſiring the Viſitor, by a Servant, not to be at the Trouble to alight from his Chair: Then on the ſame Day, or one of the three following, he goes to return the Viſit, and preſent a Tye-tſe like that which he receiv'd. If he receives the Viſit, and the Viſitor is a Perſon of Diſtinction, his Chair is permitted to paſs thro' the two firſt Courts of the Tribunal, which are very large, as far as the Entrance of the Hall, where the Mandarin comes to receive him. When you enter into the ſecond Court, you find before the Hall two Domeſtics, who ſometimes hold the Umbrella, and great Fan, belonging to the Mandarin, inclining toward each other, in ſuch a Manner, that you can neither ſee the Mandarin, who advances to receive you, nor be ſeen by him: When you have alighted from the Chair, your Domeſtic withdraws, the great Fan that likewiſe conceal'd your Perſon, and then you are at a proper Diſtance from the Mandarin, to pay your Reverence.

Viſits receiv'd or paid by the Quân.

The Ceremonies on thoſe occaſions.

At this Inſtant begin the Formalities, which are ſet down at length in the Chineſe Memorial: where you may find the Number of Bows that you are to make; the Expreſſions you are to uſe; the Titles that you are to give; the mutual Genuflections; the ſeveral Turns you are to make, ſometimes to the right, ſometimes to the left; (for the Place of Honour is different in different Places;) the ſilent Geſtures by which the Maſter of the Houſe invites vites you to enter, saying nothing but Tsin-tsin; the decent Refusal to enter first, by saying Pû-kan, I dare not; the Salutation that the Master of the House is to make to the Chair you are to sit in, for he must bow respectfully before it, and dust it lightly with the Skirt of his Garment. As soon as you are seated, you are to declare, in a grave and serious manner, the Occasion of your Visit; and you are answered with the same Gravity, and a great many Bows. you are likewise to sit upright in your Chair without leaning against the Back; to look down a little without turning your Eyes either to one Side or the other, having your Hands stretched out upon your Knees, and your Feet placed exactly even. After a Moment's Conversation, a Servant finely dressed comes in, bringing as many Dishes of Tea as there are Persons; and here again you must be very careful to observe the Forms in taking the Dish, in putting it to your Mouth, and in returning it to the Servant. At length, the Visit being ended, you withdraw, making use of other Ceremonies. The Master of the House conducts you to your Chair, and when you are entred, advances a little, waiting till the Chairmen have taken it up; then being ready to depart, you bid him adieu, and he returns an Answer to your Civility†.

Visit from an Envoy to a chief Mandarin of a City.

These Ceremonies are observed with the greatest Strictness. When a King-chay, or Envoy from the Court, pays a Visit to the chief Mandarins of the Cities thro' which he passes, at setting out, about thirty Persons go before his Chair, marching two in a Rank; some with Copper-Basons in their Hands, which they beat at times like a Drum. Some carry Colours, and others small japan'd Boards, whereon are written in large Characters of Gold, King-chay-ta-jin, that is, The Lord, the Envoy from the Court. Some bear Whips in their Hands, others Chains. Many carry on their Shoulders certain Instruments, painted with variety of Figures, and gilt; some in the Form of huge Crosses, with Dragons Heads at the Top, and others like Vergers Staves. Among the rest there are some with high Caps of red Felt, in Form of a Cylinder, from which hang down two large golden Feathers, who are hired only to cry in the Streets, and bid the People clear the Way. At the Head of this Cavalcade is a Porter, or inferior Officer of the Tribunal, who carries in a large Letter-Case the Tye-tse, or Visiting-Billets, prepared for all the Mandarins and other Persons of Distinction whom he designs to visit. On each Side of the Chair walk two or four of the King-chay's Domestics finely dress'd, and several others close the March; for all the rest are occasionally hired to attend on him, while he stays in the City: besides, there are fifteen who never stir from House; six wait at the Door with Hautboys, Fifes and Drums, as if they were hired to deafen the Neighbourhood with the Noise of their Instruments, striking up every time any Person of Distinction enters or comes out of the House; the rest are employ'd within Doors.

The Order of his Procession thro' the Streets.

Reception given an Envoy by the Mandarins.

The Manner wherein the Mandarins are to receive an Envoy from the Court, is likewise accompany'd with Ceremonies, which they dare not omit. The Reader may form a just Notion of them, from the Reception given to P. Bouvet, at Nan-chang-fû. [See p. 59.] when he was sent, in this Quality by the Emperor, into Europe. He was accompanied by a chief Mandarin, named Tong-Lau-ya; and had made his Journey, partly on Horseback and partly in a Chair, as far as that City, where he was to embark. On their Arrival they found one of those large Barks representing a middle-rate Man of War, all painted and gilded, which was prepared for their Voyage. Before they went on Board, the Under-Secretaries of the Viceroy and great Mandarins, who had been sent to meet them, according to Custom, presented the Tye-tse, or Billets of Compliment, on Behalf of their Masters: who on their crossing the River, appeared on the Bank ready to receive them; and having invited them to Land, conducted them into a Kong-qûan, or great Palace, on the River-Side. When they were come into the middle of the second Court, the Viceroy and all the Mandarins that accompany'd him fell on their Knees, over-against the Great Hall, at the bottom of the Stair-Case, and enquir'd after the Emperor's Health; of which being inform'd by Tong-lauya, he and the Mandarins rose up. Then the Envoy entring the Hall (where two ranks of Chairs were prepared for the Company, who sat in the same Order as they enter'd) they were presented Tea after the Tartarian and Chinese Manner, which was drank in Form; that is to say, every one holding in his right Hand a Dish of Tartarian Tea, made a low Bow to the Viceroy who gave the Treat, both before and after they had drank. As for the Chinese Tea, the Custom is to take the Dish in both Hands, and making a low Bow to touch the Ground therewith: Then they drink it at several Sips, holding the Dish in their Left-hand. After this first Regale, the Viceroy and the General, rising up with the rest of the Company, presented the Envoy with Tye-tse, or Billets of the Presents (A), they were obliged to make them of Provisions to put into their Barks, and then invited them to sit at Table. The Dinner was prepared at the Bottom of the Hall, where there were two Rows of Tables, over-against each other; the Feast was partly after the Tartar and partly after the Chinese Fashion, so that a great Part of the troublesome Ceremonies observed at the Chinese Entertainments were dispensed with. The Feast being over, the Envoys re-imbarked, and in a little time the chief Mandarins sent them Visiting-Billets, and came presently in Person one after another. The Chi-fû, or Governor of the City, accompany'd by the two Chy-hyen, or Presidents of the two Inferior Tribunals, followed the Example of the chief Mandarins; and their Visits were attended with as many Tye-tse, or Billets of Presents, which they were to make of Provisions and Refreshments.

Billets of Presents.

(†) This sort of Ceremonious Visits, relates to Persons of equal Distinction, as that of one Mandarin to another, nearly of the same Order.

(A) Tye-tse seems to be a general Term for Billets, or Letters of any kind.

Preſents of a Vice-Roy.

In their Paſſage by Water, inſtead of Tables covered with Victuals, which the Mandarins of the Places keep in Readineſs to regale the King-chay, the Cuſtom is to ſend the ſame ſort of Proviſions on board the Bark that accompanies him. One may judge of the Nature of theſe Preſents by that of the Viceroy, the Liſt of which follows: viz. two Meaſures or Buſhels of fine white Rice, two Meaſures of Meal; one Hog, two Geeſe, four Fowls, four Ducks; two Bundles of Sea-Herbs, two Bundles of Stags Pizzles, which when pick'd and dry'd are deem'd in China exquiſite Eating; two Bundles of the Entrails of a certain Sea-Fiſh, two Bundles of dry'd Me-yu, or Ink-Fiſh, and two Jarrs of Wine. The Preſents of the other Mandarins were much of the ſame ſort. As it is cuſtomary in all the Cities that you paſs thro', to receive this kind of Preſents from the Mandarins, there is no occaſion to make any other Proviſion on board the Barks, becauſe there is enough and to ſpare for the Envoy and all his Attendants. When a Preſent is made, beſides the Tye-tſe, or Viſiting-Billet, they add a Li-tân; which is a piece of red Paper like the Tye-tſe, whereon is written the Name of him who offers it, and a Liſt of Particulars.

Li-tân or Bill of Parcels.

Cuſtomary to ſend back Preſents or receive only Part.

When he who makes the Preſent comes in Perſon, after the common Civilities, he offers you the Billet, which you take from him, and give to one of your Servants to keep, making a low Bow by way of Acknowledgement. The Viſit being over, you read the Billet, and take what you think proper: if you accept of every thing ſet down in the Liſt, you keep the Billet, and ſending another immediately to return Thanks, acquaint him that you accept of the Whole: If you detain but Part, you mention the Particulars in the Billet of Thanks; and in caſe you keep nothing at all, you ſend back the Billet and the Preſent, with a Billet of Thanks; upon which you write Pi-ſyê, that is, Theſe are precious Pearls, I dare not touch them.

Form of doing it.

If the Perſon thinks fit to ſend the Preſent by his Servants only, or if he ſends the things with the Billet, then you obſerve the ſame Ceremonies as when he offers it in Perſon: but if he ſends you the Billet before the things are bought, intending to buy thoſe you pitch on, you take a Pencil, and make Circles on the things you accept of, which are immediately bought and ſent to you. Then you write a Billet of Thanks, and mention what you have received, adding Yu-pi, that is, The reſt are precious Pearls. But when there is any Wine, the Servants never fail to eaſe themſelves of ſome part of the Weight, without its being perceiv'd till the Pots or Jarrs come to be open'd. On ſeveral Occaſions, when you accept of a Preſent, Complaiſance requires you ſhould ſend another in return; this is principally put in Practice, in the Beginning of the Year, in the fifth Moon, &c. When the Preſent comes from a Perſon conſiderable, either by Birth or Office, the Receiver makes a low Bow before it.

Formality in writing and ſending of Letters.

Even the Letters that are written by private Perſons are ſubject to a great number of Formalities, which often puzzle the Literati themſelves. If you write to a Perſon of Diſtinction you are obliged to uſe white Paper, with ten or twelve folds like a Screen; they are to be brought, with little Bags and ſlips of red Paper, which go along with the Letter. You begin to write on the ſecond Folding, and put your Name at the End. A great deal of pains muſt be taken about the Stile, which ought to be different from that uſed in common Converſation; Regard muſt alſo be had to the Character, for the ſmaller the Size the more reſpectful; there are proper Diſtances to be kept between the Lines, and Titles to be made Uſe of according to the Rank and Quality of the Perſons. The Seal, if any be uſed, is put in two Places, that is, over the Name of the Perſon who writes, and over the firſt Words of the Letter, but they are uſually contented with putting it on the little Bag which encloſes it. If the Writer is in Mourning, he puts a ſlip of blue Paper over his own Name. The Letter when written, is put in a little Paper-Bag, on the middle of which they paſte a ſlip of red Paper, the length of the Letter, and two Fingers broad, and write thereon Nwi-han, that is, The Letter is within. They then put it in a ſecond Bag, of thicker Paper than the former, with a Band of red Paper, as before, on which they put, in large Characters, the Name and Quality of the Perſon to whom it is addreſſed; and on the ſide, in ſmaller Characters, the Province, City, and Place of his Abode. The Openings at top and bottom of this ſecond Letter are paſted together very neatly, and the Seal impreſſed on both with theſe Words, Hû-fong, that is, Guarded and Sealed; alſo between both from top to bottom, they write the Year and Day, on which the Letter is delivered. When the Mandarins ſend any Diſpatches to Court that require more than ordinary Expedition, they faſten a Feather to the Packet, and then the Courier is obliged to travel Night and Day without ſtopping.

3. Their Feaſts and Entertainments.

Chineſe Feaſts.

THE Chineſe, as well as other Nations, often invite one another to Feaſts, wherein they make mutual profeſſions of Eſteem and Friendſhip; but it is chiefly in theſe Feaſts that Politeneſs, natural to the Chineſe, is troubleſome to Europeans, for the whole is made up of Ceremonies and Compliments. Their Feaſts are of two Sorts: the ordinary, conſiſting of about twelve or ſixteen Diſhes; and the more ſolemn, which require twenty four upon each Table, as well as more Formalities. When all Ceremonies are punctually obſerved, the Feaſt is preceded by three Tye-tſe, or Billets, ſent to thoſe who are invited: the firſt Invitation is made the Day or two Days before, but this laſt is rare; the ſecond in the Morning Morning of the Feaſt-Day, to put the Gueſts in mind, and intreat them not to fail coming; and the third, when every thing is ready, and the Maſter of the Houſe is diſpoſed, by a third Billet, carryed by one of his Servants, to let them know he is extremely impatient to ſee them.

The Feaſt Hall how ſet out.

The Hall, wherein the Feaſt is ſerv'd up, is commonly adorned with Flower-Pots, Pictures, China-Ware, and ſuch like Ornaments. There are as many Tables as there are Perſons invited; unleſs the Number of Gueſts obliges them to ſit two at a Table, for they rarely put three, at theſe great Feaſts. Theſe Tables are ranged in a Row on each Side the Hall, in ſuch a manner that the Gueſts face each other as they ſit in their Arm-Chairs. The fore-part of the Tables are ſet off with ſilk Ornaments of Needle-Work, reſembling thoſe belonging to our Altars; and tho' there are neither Table-Cloaths nor Napkins, the curious japanning makes them look very neat. The Ends of each Table are often covered with ſeveral great Diſhes, loaded with Meats ready carved, and piled up like a Pyramid, with Flowers and large Citrons on the Top; But theſe Pyramids are never touched, being only for Ornament, like the Figures made of Sugar at Feaſts in Italy.

Compliments before ſitting down to Table.

When he who gives the Entertainment introduces his Gueſts into the Room, he ſalutes them all, one after another; and then calling for Wine in a little Cup, either of Silver, precious Wood, or Porcelaine, placed on a little japan'd Salver, he takes it with both Hands, and bowing to all the Gueſts, turns towards the great Court of the Houſe, and advances to the Forepart of the Hall; when lifting up his Eyes and Hands, together with the Cup, towards Heaven, he ſtraitway pours the Wine on the Ground, by way of acknowledging that whatever he is poſſeſſed of is the Gift of Heaven. He then cauſes Wine to be poured into a China or Silver Cup, and after making a Bow to his principal Gueſt, places it on the Table, where he is to ſit. The Gueſt returns this Civility by endeavouring to hinder him from taking the Trouble, and at the ſame time cauſing Wine to be brought in a Cup, advances a few Steps; as tho' he would carry it to the Place of the Maſter of the Feaſt, which is always the loweſt, and who in his Turn prevents him with certain common Terms of Civility. Immediately after the Steward brings two ſmall Ivory Sticks, adorned with Gold or Silver, which ſerve inſtead of Forks, and places them on the Table, in a parallel Poſition, before the Chair, if there were not any placed before, as there uſually are. This done, he leads the chief Gueſt to his Chair, which is covered with a rich Carpet of flower'd Silk, and then making another low Bow (c), invites him to ſit: But the Gueſt does not comply, till after a great many Compliments, excuſing himſelf from taking ſo honourable a Place. The Steward next prepares to do the ſame to all the reſt, but they will by no means ſuffer him to take ſo much Trouble. It is obſervable that, according to the ancient Cuſtom of China, the firſt Place is given to Strangers, preferable to others; and amongſt Strangers, either to thoſe who come fartheſt off, or are moſt advanced in Years, unleſs ſome other Perſon of a conſiderable Diſtinction be in Company.

Comedy acted during the Feaſt.

All theſe Ceremonies being over, they ſit down to the Table; at which inſtant four or five Principal Comedians in rich Dreſſes enter the Hall, and making low Bows all together, knock their Foreheads four times againſt the Ground. This they perform in the midſt of the two Rows of Tables, with their Faces towards a long Table, ſet out like a Buffet, full of Lights and Perfuming-Pans. Then riſing up, one of them preſents the principal Gueſt with a Book, like a long Pocket-Book, containing, in Letters of Gold, the Names of fifty or ſixty Plays, which they have by heart, and are ready to act on the Spot. The chief Gueſt refuſes to chooſe one, and ſends it to the ſecond with a Sign of Invitation; the ſecond to the third, &c. but they all make Excuſes, and return him the Book; at laſt, he conſents, opens the Book, runs it over with his Eyes in an Inſtant, and pitches on the Play which he thinks will be moſt agreeable to the Company. If there be any thing in it not fit to be acted, the Player ought to apprize him of it; for inſtance, if one of the principal Perſons in the Play had the ſame Name with one of the Auditors: after which the Comedian ſhews the Title of the Play that is choſen to all the Gueſts, who teſtify their Approbation by a Nod.

Nature of their Plays.

The Repreſentation begins with the Muſic peculiar to that Nation: which are, Baſons of Braſs or Steel, whoſe Sound is harſh and ſhrill; Drums of Buffalo-ſkins, Flutes, Fifes, and Trumpets, whoſe Harmony can charm none but Chineſe. There are no Decorations for theſe Plays, which are acted during the Feaſt; they only ſpread a Carpet on the Floor, and the Commedians make uſe of ſome Rooms near the Balcony, from whence they enter to act their Parts. Beſides the Gueſts, there are commonly a great number of other Spectators, who, led by Curioſity, and known to the Servants, are let into the Court, from whence they can ſee the Play. The Ladies, who are willing to be preſent, are placed out of the Hall over againſt the Comedians, where, through a Lattice made of Bambû, and a ſort of Silken-Net, they ſee and hear all that paſſes without being ſeen themſelves. The counterfeit Murders, Tears, Sighs, and ſometimes Shrieks of theſe Players will inform an European, tho' ignorant of the Language, that their Plays are full of Tragical Events.

(c) There is no Mention here of a Steward bowing before, and indeed all thro' this Account of the Feaſt, the Maître d' Hotel, or Steward, ſeems to be confounded with the Maître de Feſtin, Maître de Maiſon, or Maître de Logis, the Maſter of the Feaſt, or Maſter of the Houſe, that is, the Perſon of Quality who gives the Entertainment; this appears alſo from P. Bouvet's Account of a Feaſt, which comes afterwards.

As

Order of the Feaſt.

As the Feaſt always begins with drinking unmixt Wine, the Steward, on one Knee, ſays to all the Gueſts with a loud Voice, Tſing Lau-ya, men kyu poy, that is, You are invited, Gentlemen, to take the Cup. On this every one takes his Cup in both Hands, and having firſt moved it up to his Head, and then down below the Table, they all put it to their Mouths at once, and drink ſlowly three or four times, the Steward all the while preſſing them to drink it up, after his example; turning the Cup upſide down to ſhew that it is quite empty, and that each of them ought to do the ſame. Wine is ſerved two or three times, and while they are drinking, on the middle of each Table is ſet a China-Diſh full of Meat ragou'd, ſo that they have no Occaſion for Knives; then the Steward invites them to eat, in the ſame Manner as he did to drink, and immediately every one takes ſome of the Ragou very dexterouſly. Twenty, or twenty four of theſe Diſhes, are ſerved up [on each Table] with the ſame Ceremony every time one is brought in, which obliges them to drink as often; but then they may do it as ſparingly as they pleaſe, beſides the Cups are very ſmall. The Diſhes are never taken away as they are done with, but continue on the Table till the Repaſt is over. Between every ſix or eight Diſhes they bring in Soop, made either of Fleſh or Fiſh, with a ſort of ſmall Loaves or Pies, which they take with their Chop-ſticks, to dip into the Soop, and eat without any Ceremony: Hitherto nothing is eaten but Fleſh. At the ſame time they ſerve up Tea, which is one of their moſt common Drinks, and taken hot as well as the Wine, the Chineſe never uſing to drink any thing cold; for this Reaſon there are always Servants ready to pour hot Wine into their Cups out of Veſſels for the purpoſe, and to put back that which is cold into others of China. When the Gueſts have quitted their Sticks, and done eating, they bring in Wine, and another Diſh; and then the Maſter of the Houſe invites them again to eat or drink, which is repeated every time a freſh Diſh is ſerved up. In ſerving up Victuals the Waiters order it ſo, that the twentieth or twenty fourth Diſh is placed on [each] Table, juſt in the time, when the Comedy is to break off. Afterwards Wine, Rice, and Tea, is preſented. Then riſing from the Table, the Gueſts walk to the lower end of the Hall, to pay their Compliments to the Maſter of the Feaſt; who conducts them into the Garden, or another Hall, to chat and reſt a little before the Fruit is brought in.

Ceremony of ſerving the Deſert.

In the mean time the Comedians take their Repaſt; and the Domeſtics are employed, ſome in carrying warm Water for the Gueſts to waſh their Hands and Faces, if they think fit; others to take the Things off the Tables, and prepare the Deſert; which likewiſe conſiſts of twenty or twenty four Diſhes of Sweetmeats, Fruits, Jellies, Hams, ſalted Ducks dryed in the Sun which are delicious eating, and ſmall Dainties made of Things which come from the Sea. When every Thing is ready, a Servant approaches his Maſter, and with one Knee on the Ground in a low Voice acquaints him with it, who as ſoon as every one is ſilent, riſes up, and very complaiſantly invites his Gueſts to return to the Feaſt-Hall; where being come, they gather at the lower end, and after ſome Ceremonies about the Places, take thoſe they had before. Now bigger Cups are brought, and they preſs you mightily to drink large Draughts; the Play alſo is continued, or elſe ſometimes to divert themſelves more agreeably, they call for the Book of Farces, and each chuſes one, which he acts very neatly. There is at this Service, as well as the former, five great Diſhes for State on the Sides of the Table; and while it laſts the Servants belonging to the Gueſts go to Dinner in one of the neighbouring Rooms, where they are very well entertain'd, but without any Ceremony.

Money gathered at the Deſert for Servants.

At the Beginning of this ſecond Service, every Gueſt cauſes one of his Servants to bring, on a Sort of Salver, ſeveral little Bags of red Paper, containing Money for the Cook, the Stewards (D), the Comedians, and thoſe who ſerved at the Table. They give more or leſs according to the Quality of the Perſon who made the Treat, but never any thing unleſs there is a Play. Every Domeſtic carries his Salver to their Maſter, who after ſome Difficulty conſents, and makes a Sign to one of them, to take, in order to diſtribute, it. Theſe Feaſts, which laſt about four or five Hours, always begin in the Night, or when it grows duſkiſh, and do not end till Midnight; the Gueſts ſeparating with the Ceremonies uſed in Viſits, already deſcribed. The Servants, who wait on their Maſters, walk before the Chairs, carrying great Lanthorns of Oil'd Paper, whereon their Quality, and ſometimes their Names, are written in large Characters. The next Morning each of them ſends a Tye-tſe, or Billet, to thank him who had entertained them ſo handſomely.

Account of a Feaſt by P. Bouvet.

P. Bouvet was at one of theſe Feaſts at Kan-ton, when he was ſent by the Emperor into Europe. He was invited, along with Tong-Lau-ya, [already mentioned, p. 297.] and two other Miſſionaries, by the Tſong-tû of the Province; and as the uſual Reſidence of that Mandarin was at Chau-king, he borrowed the Palace of the Tſyang-kyun for the Entertainment. Now, tho' the Ceremonies are nearly the ſame with thoſe already related, yet the Deſcription Bouvet gives of that Feaſt, in a Letter ſent juſt after into Europe, deſerves the Reader's Notice, on account of the Singularities which it contains. The Place where the Feaſt was made is a vaſt Edifice at the Bottom of two great ſquare Courts, compoſed of three large Halls, one behind the other, in ſuch a manner, that the middle communicates with Palace deſcribed.

(D) Orig. Maître d' Hotel. This Circumſtance proves what is obſerved in the former Note, for it is not to be ſuppoſed Money is gathered for the Maſter of the Feaſt, or Houſe, as well as his Servants; neither can we ſuppoſe two Maſters of the Houſe, as there may be Stewards, tho' we hear but of one before.

with the other two, by means of two long and wide Galleries, which have each their Courts on both sides. The Hall in the Middle, where the Feast was made, which is the largest and finest of the three, was remarkable for the Length, and extraordinary Thickness of the Pillars, Beams, and all the Wood-work in general. The Guests were received at their Arrival, in the first Hall, the Tsong-tû being at the trouble to go and meet the Principal as far as the Stair-Case to do them Honour: They also advanced a few Steps to meet the rest as they arrived; who, to return the Civility, having first saluted the Master of the Feast in particular, and the Company in general, afterwards went and saluted each in particular, according both to the Tartarian and Chinese Manner, and received from them a like number of Bows, with a surprizing Politeness. These Ceremonies being over, they took their Places in the Elbow-Chairs ranged in two parallel Lines, over against each other, waiting for the rest of the Guests; during which time Tea was served up, in the Tartarian and Chinese Fashions.

Manner of receiving the Guests.

Among those who were at this Feast, besides Tong Lau-ya, who conducted me, says P. Bouvet, and two other Missionaries who accompany'd me, all the General Officers of the Province were invited, viz. First, the Vice-Roy, the Tsyang-kyun, the two Tû-tong and the Yen-ywen (A), who were the most considerable Persons. Secondly, the Chief Mandarins of the Customs, who, as they are changed every Year, bear the title of King-chay, or, Envoys of the Court; for which reason the following Mandarins give Place to him. Thirdly, the Pû-ching-tsë, or Treasurer-general, the Ngan-cha-tsë, and the Tau: who tho' General-Officers and very considerable, yet being inferior in Rank to the former, sat in a different Line from them; that is, their Chairs were placed a little more behind; which Distinction was observed also at Table.

Chief Personages at the Feast.

When all the Guests were come, they went out of the first Hall into the second, where were two Rows of Tables over against each other, according to the Number of the Guests. On this Occasion, as well as on that of sitting down at the Table, many Bows were made after the Chinese manner; which done, the Tsong-tû, and the chief Mandarins following his Example, did the King-chay the Honour to invite them to sit at the uppermost Tables. Afterwards, agreeably to what is practised in the Feasts made after the Chinese Fashion, he took a full Cup of Wine, on a Salver, with both Hands, and addressing himself to me, stepp'd forward to place it on my Table, with a pair of Quay-tsë, or little Sticks used instead of Forks (B); but I went to meet, and hinder him from taking that Trouble. Then offering to do the same Honour to the rest of the Guests, they excused themselves in the same Manner, after which every one sat down at the Table designed for him. These Tables were all of the same Make, being square and japanned, to the Number of sixteen or eighteen, there having been so many Guests. There were two Rows of them opposite to each other, disposed in such a manner that the upper Tables, where the Persons of chief Distinction sat, were placed a little more forward than the lower Tables. They were all adorned before with Violet-coloured Sattin, imbroider'd with Golden Dragons with four Claws; and the Chairs, whose Arms and Back formed a kind of Semicircle in an oblique Position, were covered with the same sort of Furniture. As this Feast was interrupted, and divided, as it were, into two, that in the Morning was conducted without much Formality, but that in the Evening was accompany'd with all the Chinese Ceremonies; for which Reason, to give the Reader a just notion of them, I shall describe the latter.

Ceremonies on sitting down to Table.

Manner of ranging the Tables.

When the Guests went to the Entertainment in the Evening they found all their Tables double, that is to say, there was a second Table placed before each, set with a Banquet for State-sake, consisting of sixteen Pyramids of Flesh, other sorts of Meat and Fruit, &c. each Pyramid being a Foot and a half high, all adorned with Painting and Flowers. I call it a Banquet for State, because such Tables are set merely for Show, and to entertain the Eyes of the Company; who were no sooner sat down, but they were all taken away, and at the end of the Feast distributed to the Servants belonging to the Guests, or rather to the Chairmen and Under-Servants of the Tribunal. The other Table had upon the Forepart a small Pedestal [or Stand] on which were a little Brass Perfuming-Pan, a Box of Perfumes, a Vial of odoriferous Water, a Tube or Horn made of Agate, containing small Instruments, fit to put the Incense into the Perfuming-Pan, and to stir the Ashes. At each of the two Fore-corners of the Table was placed a small japan'd Board, named Wey, adorned on one Side with an Emblem, and on the other with some little Pieces of Poetry: The other Corners of the Table were furnished with three small China Plates, full of Herbs, Pulse, and Pickles, to procure an Appetite, between which there was a little Silver Cup on a Salver.

The Evening Entertainment.

As these Feasts are usually accompany'd with a Play, the Moment it began the Comedians, ready dressed, came in to act their Parts; when the Head of the Company, advancing to the upper Part of the Hall, presented me the Book, which contained a Catalogue of all his Plays, and desired me to mark that which I had a Mind should be acted: for they have commonly fifty or sixty by heart, any of which they are able to perform off hand. As I was an entire Stranger to this kind of Ceremony, and knew but little of their Language, I was afraid there might be something in the Chinese Plays, not fit for a Christian to hear; for which reason I acquainted Tong Lau-ya our Conductor, that Plays were not a Diversion agreeable to Persons of our Profession. Whereupon the Tsong-tû and the other Mandarins had the Complaisance to deny themselves of this

The Play proposed but laid aside.

(A) This seems to be the Superintendant of the Salt; called, elsewhere, Yuen-Yuen, perhaps by Mistake.

(B) These are by us commonly call'd Chop-Sticks, which Name I have sometimes given them.

this Amuſement, (tho' innocent enough, as I underſtood afterwards) and contented themſelves with a Concert of variety of Muſical Inſtruments, which, playing methodically and all together by Intervals, regulated the Time of each Courſe. During the Feaſt, all the Motions and Words, as well of the Servants as the reſt of the Company, were ſo very formal and affected, that were it not for the Gravity of the Company, an European at firſt Sight wou'd be apter to take it for a Play than a Feaſt, and have much ado to refrain from laughing.

Order of the Feaſt. The Feaſt was, as it were, divided into ſeveral Scenes or Courſes, each being open'd by a Piece of Muſic. The Preludes to the Feaſts, were two ſmall Cups of Wine, one after the other, containing about a Spoonful each, which two Maſters of the Ceremony invited us to drink, in behalf of the Tſong-tû: They kneeled down in the Middle of the Hall, ſaying very gravely with a loud Voice, Ta Lau-ya Tſing-tſyû, that is, My Lord invites you to drink; and after every one had drank part of his Cup, he cry'd a ſecond time Tſing-chau-kan, Drink it all, nay, even to the laſt Drop. This Ceremony is repeated during the time of the Feaſt, not only when there is an Occaſion to drink, but as often as a freſh Diſh is plac'd on the Table, or touch'd by the Gueſts. As ſoon as a freſh Diſh is plac'd, the two Maſters of the Ceremony kneeling down invite every one to take their Quay-tſe, or Chop-ſticks, and taſte the Victuals newly ſerv'd up; the Tſong-tû at the ſame time inviting them, they obey. The principal Diſhes of the Feaſt conſiſt of Ragous, Meats haſh'd, or boil'd, (with divers ſort of Herbs or Pulſe,) and ſerv'd up with the Broth, in fine China Veſſels almoſt as deep as wide.

The principal Meats.

Number and Order of the Diſhes, They place on each Table twenty ſuch Diſhes, all of the ſame Size and Shape: thoſe who ſerve them up, receive them at the lower end of the Hall, where as many Servants belonging to the Kitchen as there are Tables bring them, one by one upon japan'd Salvers, and preſent them on their Knees. The Domeſtics who received them, before they brought them to the Table, rang'd them four and four in a Row; ſo that at the end of the Entertainment all the Diſhes which remain'd on the Table form'd a kind of Square.

and Courſes. At the end of every Act of this Comic Feaſt, that is, at every fourth Diſh which appear'd on the Table, in order to diſtinguiſh the Courſes, they ſerv'd up a particular kind of Broth, and a Plate of Mazarine Tarts, but of a different Taſte: At length, the whole was concluded with a Diſh of Tea.

It was neceſſary to taſte every thing, and obſerve the ſame Ceremony, which ſeem'd to me very troubleſome, for it was the firſt time I had been at a Feaſt of this kind, though I had been often invited; but I always made ſuch Excuſes as ſatisfy'd thoſe who had done me that Honour. When there is a Play it is cuſtomary at the end of the Repaſt, as I already obſerv'd, for the Gueſts to make a ſmall Preſent to the Domeſtics in waiting. A Servant belonging to each of them brings in his Hand four or five ſmall Bags of Red Paper with a little Money in every one; and by his Maſter's Order lays them on a Table that is ſometimes plac'd at the lower end of the Hall, in the ſight of all the Company; while the Maſter, [of the Feaſt] by divers Signs, ſeems to accept of this Gratification for his People with a great deal of Reluctance. At length the Ceremony of the Feaſt concludes with a great many mutual Profeſſions of Thanks; and after a quarter of an Hour's Converſation, every one withdraws. The next Morning, according to Cuſtom, I ſent the Tſong-tû a Billet of Thanks for the Honours he had done me the Day before. Such are the Ceremonies which the Chineſe Politeneſs requires, and are almoſt conſtantly obſerv'd at their ſolemn Feaſts. However, the Tartars, who do not like Reſtraint, have retrench'd a great Part thereof; and tho' their Meat and Fiſh are cut in ſmall Pieces, their Cooks have ſuch an Art of ſeaſoning them, that they are very palatable.

Money gather'd for the Servants.

Chineſe Broths commended. Their Broths are exceeding good, and to make them they uſe the Fat of Hogs, which in China are very excellent, or elſe the Gravy of different Animals, ſuch as Pork, Fowls, Ducks, &c. and even in dreſſing their Haſhes or minced Meat, they boil it up in this Gravy.

Their Cooks preferr'd to the French. In every Seaſon of the Year they have ſeveral ſorts of Herbs (as well as Pulſe) not known in Europe, of whoſe Seed they make an Oil, which is much us'd in Sauces. The French Cooks, who have refin'd ſo much in every thing which concerns the Palate, would be ſurpriz'd to find that the Chineſe can outdo them far in this Branch of their Buſineſs, and at a great deal leſs Expence. They will hardly be perſuaded to believe that, with nothing but the Beans that grow in their Country, particularly thoſe of the Province of Shan-tong, and with Meal made of Rice and Corn, they can prepare a great many Diſhes quite different from each other, both to the Sight and Taſte. They vary their Ragous by putting in ſeveral ſorts of Spices and ſtrong Herbs.

Their moſt delicious Diſhes, Stags-Pizzles, and Birds-Neſts. The moſt delicious Food of all, and moſt uſed at the Feaſts of Great Men, are Staggs-Pizzles, and Birds-Neſts, which they carefully prepare. To preſerve the Pizzles, they dry them in the Sun in the Summer, and roll them in Pepper and Nutmeg. Before they are dreſs'd, they are ſoak'd in Rice-Water, to make them ſoft; and after being boil'd in the Gravy of a Kid, are ſeaſon'd with ſeveral ſorts of Spices.

Birds-Neſts. As for the Neſts they are found on the ſides of the Rocks, all along the Coaſts of Tong-king, Java, Kochin-China, &c. where they are built by Birds, which, as to their Plumage, reſemble Swallows, and are ſuppoſed to make them with the little Fiſhes they catch in the Sea. However that be, this is certain, that the Birds themſelves diſtill a viſcous Juice from their Beaks, which ſerves them inſtead of Gum to faſten their Neſts to the Rock. They have alſo been obſerv'd to take the Froth that floats on the Sea, wherewith they cement the Parts of their Neſts together, in the ſame manner as Swallows make uſe of Mud. This Matter being dry'd becomes ſolid, tranſparent, and of a Colour ſometimes inclining a little to green, but while freſh it is always white. As ſoon as the young ones have quitted their Neſts, the People of the Place are very eager to get them down, and ſometimes load whole Barks with them. They reſemble the Rind of a large candy'd Citron, in Shape as well as Size, and mix'd with other Meats give them a good Reliſh.

Rice Bread.

Tho' there is Corn every where in China, and great Plenty in ſome Provinces, yet they generally live upon Rice, eſpecially in the Southern Parts. They even make ſmall Loaves of it, which in leſs than fifteen Minutes are prepar'd in Balneo Mariæ, and eat very ſoft; the Europeans bake them a little at the Fire, and they are very light and delicious. Alſo in the Province of Shan-tong, they make a kind of a thin Wheaten Cake, which does not taſte amiſs, eſpecially when mix'd with certain Herbs for creating an Appetite. To grind their Corn, they make uſe of a very ſimple kind of a Mill, conſiſting of a round Stone Table, plac'd horizontally like a Mill-Stone, whereon they roul circularly a Stone Cylinder, which by its Weight bruiſes the Corn.

Corn-Mills.

Rice-Wine,

Tho' Tea, as I have ſaid, is their moſt uſual Drink, yet they often drink Wine, made of a particular kind of Rice, different from that which is eaten: There is a great Vent for it among the People. There are different Sorts, and various ways of making it; the following is one: They let the Rice ſoke in Water with ſome other Ingredients which they throw in, for twenty or thirty Days; afterwards boiling it till it is diſſolv'd, it immediately ferments, and is cover'd with a light Froth like that of our new Wines. Under this Froth is very pure Wine; and having drawn off the Clear into earthen Veſſels well glaz'd, of the Lees which remain they make a kind of Brandy, as ſtrong as the European, nay, it is ſometimes ſtronger, and will ſooner take Fire. The Mandarins make uſe of Wine at their Tables that comes from certain Cities, where it is reckon'd very delicious: that of Vû-ſi-hyen [in Kyang-nan] is in great Eſteem, owing its Excellence to the Goodneſs of the Water found there; but that brought from Shau-hing is in greater Requeſt, as being more wholeſome. Both theſe Wines are ſent all over China, and even to Pe-king itſelf.

how made;

Places moſt famous for it.

Mutton Brandy and Lambs-Wine.

They have a kind of Spirit or diſtill'd Water, ſaid to be drawn from the Fleſh of Mutton, which the Emperor Kang-hi drank ſometimes; but few make uſe of it beſides the Tartars, as it has a diſagreeable Taſte, and gets ſoon into the Head, being affirm'd to be very ſtrong. They have another very extraordinary ſort of Wine, which is made in the Province of Shen-ſi, and call'd Kau-yang-tſyew, or Lambs Wine. It is very ſtrong, and has a diſagreeable Smell; but among the Chineſe, or rather the Tartars, it paſſes for exquiſite Wine. None of it is carry'd into other Countries, but it is all conſumed at home.

4. Their MARRIAGES.

Marriage an indiſpenſible Duty among the Chineſe.

WE now come to their Marriages: The Laws regarding which, eſtabliſh'd by the Chineſe Policy, and particularly ſet down in the Ceremonial of the Empire, are regulated, Firſt, By the Grand Principle, which is as it were the Baſis of their Political Government; I mean the Veneration and Submiſſion of Children which continues even after the Death of their Parents, to whom they pay the ſame Duties as if they were living. Secondly, By the abſolute Authority that Fathers have over their Children; for it is a Maxim of their Philoſophy, that Kings ought to have in the Empire all the Tenderneſs of Fathers, and Fathers in their Families ought to have all the Authority of Kings. It is in Conſequence of theſe Maxims, that a Father lives in ſome ſort of Diſhonour, and is not eaſy in his Mind, if he does not marry off all his Children; that a Son is wanting in the principal Duty of a Son, if he does not leave Poſterity to perpetuate his Family; that an elder Brother, tho' he inherit nothing from his Father, muſt bring up the younger and marry them: becauſe if the Family become extinct thro' their Fault, their Anceſtors will be deprived of the Honours and Duties they are intitled to from their Deſcendants; and becauſe in the Abſence of the Father the eldeſt Son ought to be a Father to the reſt.

All Marriages made by the Parents.

In like manner the Inclinations of the Children are never conſulted in Matrimony, the Choice of a Wife belonging to the Father or the neareſt Relation of him that is to be marry'd; who makes the Match either with the Father, or Relations of the Maiden, paying a certain Sum to them (for in China the Daughters have no Fortunes) which is laid out in new Cloaths and other things for the Bride, who carries them with her on the Day of her Nuptials. This is the common Practice, eſpecially among Perſons of mean Rank; for the Grandees, the Mandarins, the Literati, and all rich People in general, expend much more than the Preſents they receive amount to. For the ſame Reaſon a Chineſe, who is in mean Circumſtances, often goes to the Hoſpital of Foundlings, and demands a Girl, in order to bring her up, that ſhe may be a Wife for his Son: Wherein he has three Advantages; he ſaves the Money that he muſt otherwiſe have given to purchaſe one; the Maid is educated as one of the Family; and is accuſtom'd by that means to have greater reſpect for the Mother-in-Law: there is Reaſon alſo to believe, that a Wife thus taken from the Hoſpital will prove more ſubmiſſive to her Huſband. It is very rare that any thing paſſes contrary to Decency, before the Nuptials, for the Mother, who never is from home, has always her Daughter-in-Law under her Eye; beſides, the Modeſty which prevails among the Sex in this Country, would alone be ſufficient Security againſt any ſuch Diſorder.

The Daughters have no Portions.

It

Strong Deſire of the Chineſe to leave Poſterity.

It is ſaid that ſometimes the Rich, who have no Children, pretend that their Wife is with Child, and go privately in the Night-time and fetch one from the Hoſpital, who paſſes for their own Son. Theſe Children, being ſuppoſed legitimate, purſue their Studies, and obtain their Degrees of Batchelor and Doctor, a Privilege which is deny'd the Children taken publicly from the Hoſpital. It is obſervable that, with the ſame View of leaving Poſterity, the Chineſe, who have no Male-Iſſue, adopt a Son of their Brother, or ſome of their Relation. They may alſo adopt a Son of a Stranger, and ſometimes give Money to the Relations; but, generally ſpeaking, theſe Adoptions require much Solicitation, and often the Credit of their Friends is employ'd to bring them about.

They adopt Children.

The adopted Child is intitled to all the Privileges of a real Son; he aſſumes the Name of the Perſon who adopts him, goes in Mourning for him after his Death, and becomes his Heir. And if it happen afterwards that the Father has Children of his own, the Son by Adoption ſhares the Inheritance equally with the reſt, unleſs the Father does ſomething more for his own Son. It is alſo with the ſame View of preventing the want of Poſterity, that the Chineſe are permitted by the Laws to take Concubines beſides their Lawful Wives. The Name of Concubine, or rather of Second Spouſe, is not at all reproachful in China, theſe ſort of Wives being inferior and ſubordinate to the firſt; but that which gave Occaſion to this Law, is not always the Motive that induces the Chineſe at preſent to take many Wives, for the being rich, and able to maintain them, is Pretence enough. However, there is a Law, that prohibits the People from marrying a ſecond Wife, unleſs the firſt has arriv'd to the Age of forty without having any Children.

Marry many Wives.

Marriage tranſacted by Match-makers or Go-betweens.

As thoſe of the Female Sex are always ſhut up in their Apartments, and Men not permitted to ſee and converſe with them, Matches are brought to a Concluſion ſolely on the Credit of the Relations of the Maid, or the Old Women, whoſe Buſineſs is to tranſact ſuch Affairs. Theſe the Parents are very careful to ingage by Preſents, to make advantageous Reports of the Beauty, Wit, and Talents of their Daughter; but they are not much rely'd on, and if they carry the Impoſition too far, will be ſeverely puniſh'd. When by means of theſe Go-betweens every thing is ſettled, the Contract ſign'd, and the Sums agreed upon, deliver'd, Preparations are made for the Nuptials; during which certain Ceremonies intervene, whereof the principal conſiſt in both Parties ſending reſpectively to demand the Name of the intended Bridegroom and Bride, and in making Preſents to their Relations of Silk, Callicoes, Meats, Wine, and Fruits. Many conſult the Fortunate Days, ſet down in the Kalendar, as proper for marrying on; and this is the Buſineſs of the Relations of the future Bride, to whom are ſent Rings, Pendants, and other Jewels of the ſame Nature. All this is done by Mediators, and by a ſort of Letters, written on both ſides; but it is what is practiſed only among the Vulgar, for the Marriages of Perſons of Quality are manag'd and conducted in a more noble manner, and with a true Magnificence.

Ceremony on the Marriage-Day.

The Day of the Nuptials being come, the Bride is put into a Chair, pompouſly adorn'd, and follow'd by thoſe who carry the Fortune ſhe brings; which among the Vulgar conſiſts of Wedding-Cloaths, laid up in Boxes, ſome Goods and Moveables, given by her Father. A Train of hired Men accompany her with Torches and Flambeaux, even at Noon-Day; her Chair is preceded with Fifes, Hautbois, and Drums, and follow'd by her Relations and the particular Friends of the Family. A truſty Servant keeps the Key of the Door belonging to the Chair, which he is not to deliver to any body but the Huſband, who waits at his own Door, richly dreſs'd, to receive his Bride; as ſoon as ſhe is arriv'd, he takes the Key from the Servant, and eagerly opening the Chair, is then a Judge, if he never ſaw her before, of his good or bad Fortune. There are ſome who, not content with their Lot, immediately ſhut the Chair again, and ſend back the Maid along with her Relations, chooſing rather to looſe the Money they gave, than be ty'd to ſo bad a Bargain; but this very rarely happens, by the Precautions that are taken. When the Bride is got out of the Chair, the Bridegroom placing himſelf at her ſide, they go both together into the Hall, to make four Reverences to Tyen; and having done the like to the Huſband's Relations, ſhe is put into the Hands of the Ladies invited to the Ceremony, with whom ſhe paſſes the whole Day in Feaſting and Diverſions, while the new-marry'd Man treats his Friends in another Apartment.

Privileges of ſecond Wives and their Children.

Tho, according to the Laws, the Chineſe can have but one lawful Wife, and in the Choice they make, have regard to Equality of Age and Rank, they are nevertheleſs permitted, as I before ſaid, to have ſeveral Concubines, whom they receive into the Houſe without any Formality: all they do on theſe Occaſions, being to ſign a Writing with their Parents, whereby, on delivering the Sum agreed upon, they promiſe to uſe their Daughter well. Theſe ſecond Wives are intirely dependant on the legitimate Wife, whom they reſpect as the only Miſtreſs of the Houſe. The Children born of a Concubine are alſo deem'd to belong to the true Wife, and have equally a Right to inherit; none but ſhe has the Name of Mother: and if the real Mother happen to die, they are not abſolutely oblig'd to go in Mourning for three Years, nor to be abſent from their Examinations, nor to quit their Offices and Governments, as it is cuſtomary to do at the Death of their Father, and the lawful Wife; however very few fail to expreſs that Token of Tenderneſs and Reſpect for their own Mother.

There are ſome, who piquing themſelves upon their Probity, and deſiring to gain the Reputation of good Huſbands, take no Concubines without the Permiſſion and Conſent of their Wives; perſuading them that their Intention in ſo doing is only to provide a greater number of Women for for their Service. Others take a Concubine only with a View of getting a Son, and the Moment he is born, if ſhe diſpleaſes their Wives, they ſend her away, and give her Liberty to marry whom ſhe thinks proper; or which is moſt uſual procure her a Huſband themſelves. The Cities of Yang-chew and Sû-chew, are famous for furniſhing great numbers of theſe Concubines: for which Purpoſe they bring up good handſome young Girls, whom they buy up elſewhere; teaching them to ſing, to play on Muſic, and in ſhort all ſorts of Accompliſhments belonging to young Gentlewomen, with a View to diſpoſe of them at a good Price to ſome rich Mandarin.

Girls educated and ſold for ſecond Wives.

The Men as well as Women, may contract Matrimony again, when Death has broken the firſt Bonds; but, tho' in the firſt Match they are oblig'd to regard Quality in their Wives, they ceaſe to be under the ſame Obligation, when they marry a ſecond time: being at Liberty to eſpouſe whom they think fit, and even to raiſe one of their Concubines to the Rank and Honours of a lawful Wife; but in theſe ſecond Nuptials there are but few Ceremonies obſerv'd.

Second Marriages.

As for Widows when they have had Children, they become intirely their own Miſtreſſes; ſo that their Parents cannot conſtrain them, either to continue in the State of Widowhood, or to marry anew. However, it is diſreputable for a Widow, who has Children, to marry a ſecond time, without great Neceſſity, eſpecially if ſhe is a Woman of Diſtinction: for tho' ſhe was marry'd but a few Hours, or but only contracted, ſhe thinks herſelf oblig'd to paſs the reſt of her Days in Widowhood, thereby to teſtify the Reſpect ſhe preſerves for the Memory of her deceas'd Huſband, or the Perſon to whom ſhe was engag'd. But it is otherwiſe with thoſe of a middling Condition, whoſe Relations being deſirous to get back part of the Sum that ſhe coſt her firſt Spouſe, may marry her again, if ſhe has no Male-Iſſue, and often force her to it; nay, ſometimes the new Huſband is actually procur'd, and the Money paid without her Knowledge. If there happen to be a Daughter yet unwean'd, by the Bargain, ſhe goes along with the Mother: who has no way of avoiding this Oppreſſion, unleſs her own Relations are able to maintain her, or ſhe either reimburſes thoſe of her deceaſed Huſband, or becomes a Bonzeſs; but the Condition of thoſe Nuns is ſo contemptible that ſhe cannot embrace it without diſhonouring herſelf. This violence is not ſo common among the Tartars. As ſoon as a poor Widow has been ſold in this Manner, they bring a Sedan, with a number of truſty Perſons, and carry her to her Huſband's Houſe. The Law, which forbids the ſelling of a Woman before the Time of their Mourning expires, is ſometimes neglected, ſo eager they are to get rid of them; however, when this Treſpaſs is complain'd of, the Mandarin muſt look to himſelf, if he has in the leaſt conniv'd at it.

diſreputable in Women who have Children.

Some forced to it by their Husband's Relations.

The Marriages duly ſolemniz'd, according to the preſcrib'd Ceremonies, cannot be diſſolv'd. The Law inflicts ſevere Penalties on thoſe, who proſtitute their Wives, or ſell them ſecretly to others. If a Woman elopes from her Huſband, he may ſell her, after ſhe has undergone the Correction appointed by the Law: on the other hand, if the Huſband abandons his Houſe and Wife, after three Years Abſence ſhe may preſent a Petition, laying her Caſe before the Mandarins, who, after they have naturally examin'd the whole Affair, may licence her to take another Huſband; but ſhe would be ſeverely puniſh'd if ſhe marry'd without obſerving this Formality. However, there are particular Caſes wherein a Man may divorce his Wife, ſuch as Adultery, which is very rare, by Reaſon of the Precaution taken with regard to Women; Antipathy or different Tempers; Exceſs of Jealouſy, Indiſcretion, or Diſobedience; Barrenneſs, and contagious Diſtempers: on theſe Occaſions the Law permits a Divorce, yet it ſeldom happens among Perſons of Quality; Examples of this kind being only to be found among the common People. If a Man, without lawful Authority, ſell his Wife, both he and the Buyer, with all thoſe who are any way concern'd in the Affair, are very ſeverely puniſh'd. (A)

A Man may ſell his eloping Wife.

A Wife may marry if the Husband abſents three Years.

Caſes of Divorce.

Bars againſt a Man's marrying.

There are other Caſes, wherein a Man cannot contract a Marriage, and which, if he ſhould, would make it null and void; viz.

A former Contract.

I. If a young Woman has been promiſed to a young Man, ſo far as that Preſents have been ſent and accepted by the Relations of both Families, ſhe cannot marry any other Perſon.

II. If any Deceit has been made uſe of, for Inſtance, if inſtead of a beautiful Perſon, who has been ſhewn to the Match-makers or Go-between, they ſubſtitute a diſagreeable one; or if the Daughter of a Freeman be marry'd to his Slave; or if a Man gives his Slave to a Free-Woman, and perſuades her Relations that he is his Son, or his Relation; in ſuch Caſes the Marriage is declared null, and all thoſe concern'd in the Fraud are rigorouſly puniſhed.

Impoſition in the Match.

III. A Literary Mandarin is not allow'd to marry into any Family of the Province or City where he is Governour; and ſhould he be found to tranſgreſs this Law, the Marriage would not only be null, but he would be condemn'd to be ſeverely baſtonado'd.

IV. During the time of Mourning for a Father or Mother, Marriage is prohibited their Children; nay if Promiſes were given before the Death, the Obligation ceaſes; and the young Man, who has loſt his Parent, ought by a Billet to acquaint the Relations of the betrothed Damſel: However, theſe latter do not on this Account think themſelves diſingag'd, but wait till the time of Mourning is expir'd, and write in their turns to the young Man, to put him in mind

Time of Mourning.

(A) This ſeems to claſh with what has been already related, p. 278, where the Men ſeem to have a Liberty of ſelling their Wives and Children. Perhaps Neceſſity may give them lawful Authority.

mind of his Promiſe; then indeed if he will not liſten to their Propoſal the Maid is at Liberty, and may be married to another. The caſe is the ſame if any extraordinary Affliction befals a Family; for inſtance, if the Father or near Relation is impriſon'd, the Marriage cannot take Effect till the Priſoner gives his Conſent; and then there is no Feaſting, nor any of the uſual Signs of Rejoicing at the Wedding.

Any very unfortunate Accident.

Relation-ſhip

V. Laſtly, thoſe of the ſame Family, or even Name, cannot marry, tho' ever ſo diſtant in point of Affinity. In like manner the Laws do not permit two Brothers to eſpouſe two Siſters, or a Widower to marry his Son to a Daughter of the Widow whom he takes to Wife.

Their Mournings and Funerals.

Ceremonies of Mourning, and at Funerals,

SINCE the Chineſe Policy has taken ſuch great Care in regulating the Ceremonies that are to accompany publick and private Actions, as well as all the Duties of Civil Life; and ſince the Ceremonial is ſo very particular in theſe Reſpects, it would be ſtrange if filial Piety ſhould be forgotten: on which, as I have obſerv'd more than once, the whole Frame of the Chineſe Government is built. Young Perſons being Witneſſes of the Veneration paid to deceas'd Relations, by the continual Honours that are done them, as if they were ſtill alive, become acquainted betimes with the Submiſſion and Obedience which they owe to their living Parents.

for what End initituted.

The ancient Sages were convinc'd, that the profound Reſpect which is infuſed into Children for their Parents, renders them perfectly ſubmiſſive; that this Submiſſion preſerves Peace in Families; that Peace in private Families produces Tranquility in Cities; that this Tranquility prevents Inſurrections in the Provinces, and eſtabliſhes Order throughout the Empire: for this Reaſon they have preſcribed the ſeveral Forms to be obſerved in the time of Mourning, and at Funerals, as well as the Honours to be paid to deceaſed Parents.

Term of Mourning for a Parent three Years.

The uſual time of Mourning ought to be three Years; but they commonly reduce them to twenty ſeven Months; and during this time they cannot exerciſe any public Office. So that a Mandarin is obliged to quit his Government, and a Miniſter of State the Adminiſtration of Affairs, to live retired, and give himſelf up to Grief for his Loſs; (unleſs the Emperor, for ſome extraordinary Reaſons, diſpenſes therewith, which very rarely happens;) nor can he reaſſume his Office till the three Years are expired. Their continuing ſo long in this melancholy Situation, is to expreſs their Gratitude for their Parents Care of them, during the three firſt Years of their Infancy; wherein they ſtood in continual Need of their Aſſiſtance. The Mourning for other Relations are longer or ſhorter, according to the Degree of Kindred.

Piety of Ven-kong on that Occaſion.

This Practice is ſo inviolably obſerved, that their Annals perpetuate the Piety of Ven-kong, King of Tſin: who being driven out of the Dominions of his Father Hyen-kong, by the Cunning and Violence of Li-ki, his Step-Mother, travell'd into ſeveral Countries to divert his Uneaſineſs, and avoid the Snares that this ambitious Woman was continually laying for him. When he was informed of his Father's Death, and invited by Mo-kong, who offer'd him Soldiers, Arms and Money, to put him in Poſſeſſion of his Dominions, his Anſwer was: "That "being as it were a dead Man, ſince his Retreat and Exile, he no longer eſteemed any "thing but Virtue and Piety towards his Parents; that this was his Treaſure, and that he "choſe rather to loſe his Kingdom, of which he was already diſpoſſeſs'd, than to be wanting "in thoſe laſt Duties, which did not permit him to take Arms at a Time deſtin'd to Grief, "and the Funeral Honours which he owed to the Memory of his Father".

White the Mourning Co'our.

White is the Mourning Colour both among Princes and the meaneſt Mechanics. Thoſe who wear it compleat, have their Cap, Veſt, Gown, Stockings, and Boots all white. In the the firſt Month after the Death of a Father or Morher, the Habit is a kind of hempen Sack of a bright red Colour, much like our packing Cloth; their Girdle is a ſort of looſe Cord, and their Cap, which is of a very odd Figure, is alſo of hempen Cloth. By this melancholy Attire and negligent Outſide, they affect to expreſs their inward Grief for the Loſs of what is moſt dear to them.

Their Coffins and manner of putting in the Corps.

They ſeldom waſh the dead Bodies, but dreſſing the Deceas'd in his beſt Cloaths, and laying over him the Enſigns of his Dignity, put him in the Coffin they have bought, or that he had order'd to be made in his Life time; about which they are extreamly anxious. [See p. 280.] Sometimes the Son will ſell or mortgage himſelf, to procure Money to buy a Coffin for his Father. The Coffins for thoſe in eaſy Circumſtances are made of Planks above half a Foot thick, and laſt a long time. They are ſo well daubed with Pitch and Bitumen on the inſide, and japan'd without, that no bad Smell can break thro' them. Some are finely carv'd and gilded all over; in a word, many rich Perſons lay out from three hundred to a thouſand Crowns, to purchaſe a Coffin of precious Wood, adorn'd with Variety of Figures. Before the Body is placed in the Coffin, they throw a little Lime at the Bottom; and after it is layed in, they put either a Pillow or a good deal of Cotton, in order to keep the Head ſteady. The Cotton and the Lime ſerve to ſoak up the Moiſture that may proceed from the Corps; they alſo put in Cotton, or ſuch like things, to fill up the Vacancies, and preſerve it in the ſame Situation. It would be, in their Opinions, an unheard-of Cruelty, to open a dead Body, and taking out the Heart and Entrails, bury them ſeperately; in like manner it would be a monſtrous thing to behold, as in Europe, the Bones of dead Perſons heaped one upon another.

They never open dead Bodies.

The

The Chineſe are prohibited from burying their Dead within the Walls of the Cities, or any inhabited Places, but they are permitted to keep them in their Houſes, incloſed in ſuch Coffins as I have deſcribed; which they often do for ſeveral Months, and even Years, like ſo much Treaſure, nor can the Magiſtrate ever oblige them to interr them. They may even tranſport them from one Part of the Empire to another; as is commonly practiſed, with regard not only to Perſons of Diſtinction who die in Employments out of their Country, but even among the richer ſort of People who die in a diſtant Province, which often happens to Merchants and Dealers. If a Son did not cauſe the Corps of his Father to be laid in the Tomb of his Anceſtors, he would live without Reputation; eſpecially in his own Family, who would refuſe to place his Name in the Hall where they pay them Honours. In carrying them from one Province to another, they are not permitted to bring them into, or paſs with them through, the Cities without an Order from the Emperor, but muſt keep on their way without the Walls.

May keep the Corps in their Houſes but cannot bury in Cities.

They do not bury ſeveral Perſons, tho' Relations, in the ſame Grave, ſo long as the Sepulchres keep their Form. They come ſometimes a great way to viſit them, and examine the Colour of the Bones, in order to diſcover whether a Stranger has died a natural or violent Death; but it is neceſſary that the Mandarin ſhould be preſent at the opening of the Coffin, and there are under Officers in the Tribunals, whoſe Employment it is to make this Enquiry, in which they are very ſkilful. Some indeed open the Tombs to ſteal Jewels or rich Dreſſes, but it is a Crime that is puniſh'd very ſeverely.

Do not bury many in the ſame Grave.

The Sepulchres there are built without the Cities, and as often as may be, upon Eminences; it is alſo uſual to plant Pine and Cypreſs Trees round them. About a League from every City one meets with Villages, Hamlets, and Houſes ſcatter'd up and down, diverſify'd with little Groves; alſo a great many Hillocks cover'd with Trees, and enclos'd with Walls, which are ſo many different Sepulchres, affording no diſagreeable Proſpect.

Places of Sepulture.

The Form of their Sepulchres is different in different Provinces; they are for the moſt part very prettily built in Shape of a Horſe-ſhoe, and well white waſh'd, with the Names of the Family, written on the principal Stone. The Poor are content to cover the Coffin with Stubble or Earth, raiſed five or ſix foot high like a Pyramid: Many incloſe the Coffin in a Place built with Brick, like a Tomb.

Form of their Tombs.

As for the Grandees and Mandarins, their Sepulchres are of a magnificent Structure: they build a Vault, in which they put the Coffin, and raiſe a Heap of temper'd Earth over it, not unlike a Hat in Shape, about twelve foot high and eight or ten in Diameter; covering it with Lime and Sand made into a Cement, that the Water may not penetrate, and planting it round with Trees of different kinds ranged in very nice Order. Near to it ſtands a large long Table of white poliſh'd Marble, whereon is a perfuming Pan, two Veſſels and two Candleſticks, which are alſo of Marble, and curiouſly made. On each ſide are placed in ſeveral Rows a great many Figures of Officers, Eunuchs, Soldiers, Lions, Saddle-Horſes, Camels, Tortoiſes, and other Animals in different Attitudes, diſcovering Signs of Grief and Veneration; for the Chineſe are ſkilful in imitating and expreſſing all the Paſſions in their Sculptures.

Sepulchres of the Great.

Many Chineſe, to give the greater Proof of their Reſpect and Tenderneſs for their deceaſed Fathers, keep their dead Bodies by them for three or four Years; and during the whole time of Mourning, their Seat in the Day is a Stool covered with white Serge; and in the Night they lie near the Coffin, on nothing but a Matt made of Reeds: they deny themſelves the Uſe of Meat and Wine, frequenting no Feaſts, nor any public Aſſemblies; and if they are oblig'd to go out of the City, which is not uſual till a certain time be over, the Chair they are carried in is ſometimes cover'd with white Cloth. The Tyau, or ſolemn Rites, which they render to the Deceas'd, commonly continue ſeven Days, unleſs ſome good Reaſon obliges them to reduce the number to three. During that time all the Relations and Friends, whom they take great care to invite, come to pay their laſt Duty to the Deceas'd; the neareſt Relations remaining together in the Houſe. The Coffin is expos'd in the principal Hall, which is hung with white Stuffs, ſometimes intermix'd with Pieces of black, and violet Silk, and other Ornaments of Mourning. Before the Coffin they ſet a Table, and place on it the Image of the Deceas'd; or elſe, a carv'd Piece of Work, whereon his Name is written, with Flowers, Perfumes, and lighted Wax-Candles on each Side.

Time of ſolem Rites.

Thoſe who come to make their Compliments of Condolence, ſalute the Deceas'd after the manner of their Country, proſtrating themſelves, and knocking their Foreheads ſeveral Times againſt the Ground, before the Table; on which they afterwards place Wax-Candles and Perfumes, brought with them according to Cuſtom. Particular Friends accompany theſe Ceremonies with Tears and Groans, which may be often heard at a great Diſtance. While they are performing theſe Duties, the eldeſt Son, attended by his Brothers, comes from behind a Curtain, which is on one Side of the Coffin, crawling on the Ground, his Face the very Picture of Grief it ſelf, and ſheding Tears, with a mournful and profound Silence. The Compliment is paid with the ſame Ceremony that is uſed before the Coffin; behind the Curtain are plac'd the Women, who ſend forth every now and then, very doleful Cries. The Ceremony being ended, they riſe up, and a diſtant Relation of the Deceas'd, or ſome Friend in Mourning, who receiv'd them at the Door, when they came in, performs the honours of the Houſe, and conducts them into another Apartment; where they are preſented with Tea, and ſometimes dry'd Fruits, or the like Refreſhments, after which he conducts them to their Chairs. Thoſe who live but a little Way from the City, come purpoſely to pay thoſe Rites in Perſon; and if they are hindred by the

the Diſtance of the Place, or ſome Indiſpoſition, they ſend a Servant with a viſiting Billet, and their Preſents, in order to make their Excuſe. The Children of the Deceas'd, or at leaſt the eldeſt Son, are afterwards obliged to return all thoſe Viſits: but then they are not under an abſolute neceſſity, of ſeeing ſo many Perſons; it being ſufficient to go to the Door of every Houſe, and ſend in a viſiting Billet by a Domeſtic.

The Funeral Proceſſion.

When the Day for the Funeral is fix'd, Notice is given to all the Relations and Friends of the Deceas'd, who are ſure to be there at the Time. The Proceſſion is begun by Men carrying various Paſtboard-Figures repreſenting Slaves, Tygers, Lions, Horſes, &c. Several Companies follow, marching two and two; ſome carry Standards, Flags, and Perfuming-pans full of Perfumes; others play doleful Tunes on divers muſical Inſtruments. In ſome Places the Picture of the Defunct is elevated above all the reſt, with his Name and Dignity written in large Characters of Gold; then follows the Coffin under a Canopy, in form of a Dome, made intirely of violet-colour'd Silk, with Tufts of white Silk at the four Corners, which are embroider'd, and very curiouſly intermix'd with Twiſt. The Machine whereon the Coffin is plac'd, is carry'd by ſixty four Men; But thoſe who are not able to bear the Expence, make uſe of one that does not require ſo great a Number of Bearers. The eldeſt Son, at the Head of the other Sons and Grandchildren, follows on Foot, cover'd with a Hempen Sack, and leaning on a Staff, with his Body bent as if ready to ſink under the Weight of his Grief. Afterwards appear the Relations and Friends all in Mourning; and a great Number of Chairs cover'd with white Stuff, wherein are the Daughters, Wives, and Slaves of the Deceas'd, who make the Air eccho with their Cries. Nothing can be more ſurpriſing than the Tears which the Chineſe ſhed, and the Cries they make at theſe Funerals (B); but the Manner, in which they expreſs their Sorrow, ſeems too regular and affected to excite in a European the ſame Sentiments of Grief that he is the Spectator of.

Entertainment at the Place of Burial.

When you are arrived at the Burying-Place, you ſee, a few Paces from the Tomb, Tables ſet in Halls built on purpoſe; and while the uſual Ceremonies are performing, the Servants prepare an Entertainment to regale the Company. Sometimes after the Repaſt, the Relations and Friends proſtrate themſelves again, knocking their Foreheads againſt the Ground; but moſt commonly they content themſelves with expreſſing their Thanks: which Civilities, the eldeſt Son, and the other Children return by exterior Geſtures, but with profound Silence. At the Burying-Places of great Lords, there are ſeveral Appartments; and after the Coffin is brought to be interred, many of the Relations ſtay there for a Month or two together, to renew their Grief every Day with the Sons of the Deceas'd.

At the Funerals of Chriſtans the Croſs is carry'd on a great Machine handſomly adorn'd, and ſupported by ſeveral Men, with the Images of the Virgin, and St. Michael the Archangel. The Reader will find an Account of the other Ceremonies in the Deſcription I ſhall hereafter give of P. Verbieſt's Burial (C). Thoſe that were obſerv'd at the Interment of P. Broglio appear'd ſo magnificent to the Chineſe, that they printed the Deſcription of them. The Emperor honour'd his Tomb with an Epitaph; and, to defray the Expence, ſent ten Pieces of white Cloth for Mourning, and two hundred Ounces of Silver, with a Mandarin and other Officers to aſſiſt on his Behalf at the Funeral.

Ceremonies obſerved on the Death of the Empreſs.

If at any Time Death attacks the Throne, the whole Empire goes in Mourning. When the Empreſs, Mother of the late Kang-hi, died, all went in deep Mourning for fifty Days; during which time, the Tribunals were ſhut up, and they never ſpoke of any Buſineſs to the Emperor. The Mandarins ſpent the whole Day at the Palace, intirely taken up with weeping, or at leaſt the Appearance thereof; ſeveral of them paſs'd the Night there, ſitting in the open Air, tho' it was very cold Weather: even the Emperor's Sons ſlept in the Palace without putting off their Cloaths. all the Mandarins on Horſeback, clad in white, and with few attendants, went for three Days together to perform the uſual Ceremonies before her Picture; and as the red Colour was prohibited, their Caps were ſtripp'd of their red Silk, and all other Ornaments. When her Corps was carry'd to the Place where ſhe was to lye in Public-State, the Emperor order'd that ſhe ſhould paſs through the common Gates of the Palace: affecting to ſhew by this how much he deſpis'd the ſuperſtitious Notions of the Chineſe, with whom, it is cuſtomary to make new Doors to their Houſes on purpoſe for carrying out the Bodies of their Relations to be buried; after which they cloſe them up again to prevent the Grief becoming exceſſive by too frequent a Remembrance of the Deceas'd, which would be renewed every time they paſs through that Door (D). Out of the City they built a vaſt and ſtately Palace (all of new Matts, with Courts, Halls, and Appartments) for the Body to remain in, till it was carry'd to the Imperial Burying-Place.

Extravagant Cuſtoms of the Tartars at the Funerals of their Princes.

Four young Ladies, who had ſerved her affectionately while ſhe liv'd, (being deſirous of bearing her Company in Death, that they might attend her likewiſe in the other World) had taken their Attire, according to an ancient Uſage of the Tartars, in order to go and ſacrifice themſelves before their Miſtreſſes Corps; but the Emperor, who diſapprov'd of ſo barbarous a Practice, prevented their putting it in Execution. He likewiſe prohibited, for the future, another extravagant Cuſtom among that People of burning the Riches, and even ſometimes Domeſtics of Great Men, along with their Bodies, on the Funeral Pile.

(B) The Iriſh ſtill put forth as many doleful Cries over the Dead as the Chineſe, and perhaps ſhed as many Tears; whether as unfeignedly I will not ſay, becauſe the Iriſh Mourners are for the moſt part hired.

(C) See Vol. 2. p. 20.

(D) According to this Account, the Cuſtom is grounded on Filial Affection, and not Superſtition.

The

The Procession at a Chinese Funeral

To the Revd. Nicholas Carter D.D. of Deal; & to James Carr Esqr. of the said Town, Collector of the Customs, this Plate is Inscribed.

The Ceremonies obſerv'd at the obſequies of the Grandees are very magnificent, as the Reader may judge, by thoſe perform'd at the Death of Ta-vang-ye, the eldeſt Brother of the late Emperor Kang-hi, at which ſome of the Miſſionaries were oblig'd to aſſiſt. The Proceſſion began with a Band of Trumpeters and Muſicians, after which marched two and two in the following Order: Ten Mace bearers, whoſe Maces were of gilt Copper; four Umbrellas, and four Canopies of Cloth of Gold; ſix unloaded Camels, with Sable-ſkins hanging at their Necks; ſix Camels carrying Tents and Hunting-Equipages, cover'd with great red Houſings, which trail'd upon the Ground; ſix Hounds led in a Leaſh; fourteen led Horſes unſadled, with yellow Bridles, and Sable-ſkins hanging down; ſix other Horſes carrying magnificent Portmanteau's full of Habits that were to be burnt; ſix other Horſes with embroider'd Saddles, gilt Stirrups, &c. fifteen Gentlemen carrying Bows, Arrows, Quivers, &c. eight Men bearing a couple Tartarian Girdles, from whence hung Purſes fill'd with Pearls; ten Men carrying in their Hands, Caps proper for every Seaſon; an open Chair, like to that in which the Emperor is carry'd in the Palace; another Chair, with yellow Cuſhions; the two Sons of the deceas'd Prince ſupported by Eunuchs, and weeping; the Coffin, with it's great yellow Canopy, carry'd by ſixty or eighty Men, cloath'd in Green with red Plumes in their Caps; the Ago in Companies ſurrounded with their Servants; the Regulos and other Princes; two other Coffins containing the Bodies of two Concubines, who were hang'd, that they might ſerve the Prince in the other World, as they had done in this; the Grandees of the Empire; the Chairs of the deceas'd Prince's Wife, and the Princeſſes, his Relations; a Multitude of People, Lama's, and Bonza's clos'd the Proceſſion. Funeral Proceſſion of Ta vang ye.

The eight Banners with all the Mandarins great and ſmall, were gone before, and rang'd themſelves in order of Battle, to receive the Body at the Entrance of the Garden, where it was to be depoſited till the Tomb was built; in a word, they reckon'd above ſixteen thouſand Perſons at this Ceremony.

The Duties and Honours that are paid by every Family to their deceas'd Anceſtors, are not ſolely confin'd to thoſe which regard the Mourning and Funeral; there being two other Sorts of Ceremonies that are annually obſerv'd with reference to them. The firſt are perform'd in the Tſe-tang or Hall of Anceſtors, in certain Months of the Year: for every Family whatever has ſuch a Place, built on purpoſe for this Ceremony, which is frequented by all the Branches thereof, amounting ſometimes to ſeven or eight thouſand Perſons; ſince ſome of theſe Aſſemblies have conſiſted of eighty ſeven Branches of the ſame Family. At this time there is no Diſtinction of Rank; the Mechanic, the Huſbandman, the Mandarin, are all confuſedly mixt together, and own one another; it is Age here that gives Precedence; the oldeſt, tho the pooreſt, having the firſt Place. Honours paid the Dead in the Hall of Anceſtors.

There is in the Hall a long Table ſtanding againſt the Wall, with Steps to go up to it, whereon commonly is plac'd the Image of the moſt eminent Anceſtor, or at leaſt his Name; and on ſmall Tablets, or little Boards about a Foot high, rang'd on both ſides, are written the Names of the Men, Women, and Children of the Family, together with the Age, Quality, Employment, and Day of the Deceaſe of each.

All the Relations aſſemble in this Hall in Spring, and ſometimes in Autumn. The Richeſt among them prepare a Feaſt: ſeveral Tables are loaded with Variety of Diſhes of Meat, Rice, Fruit, Perfumes, Wine, and Wax-Candles, and much the ſame Ceremonies perform'd, as their Children obſerv'd with Referrence to them while they were living, and are practis'd, in reſpect of Mandarins, on their Birth-Days, or when they take Poſſeſſion of their Governments. As for the Common People, who are not able to build proper Places for this Uſe, they content themſelves with hanging the Names of their neareſt Anceſtors in thoſe Parts of their Houſes, where they may be moſt in view.

The other Ceremonies are practis'd at leaſt once a Year, at the Burial-Place of their Anceſtors; which being without the City, and often in the Mountains, the Deſcendants, both Men and Children, reſort thither every Year. Some time in April they begin with plucking up the Weeds and Buſhes from about the Sepulchre; after which they expreſs Signs of Veneration, Gratitude, and Grief, according to the ſame Forms that were obſerv'd at their Death: they then place upon the Tomb, Wine and Victuals, with which they afterwards regale themſelves. and at their Burying-Places.

It cannot be deny'd but that the Chineſe carry their Ceremonies to Extremes, eſpecially with reſpect to honouring the Deceas'd; but it is a Maxim eſtabliſh'd by their Laws and Cuſtoms, that they ought to render the Dead the ſame Honours that were paid them when living.

Confuçius ſays, in the Book Lu nyu, that the ſame Duties muſt be paid to the dead as if they were preſent and alive. In explaining which Words one of his Diſciples tells us, that when his Maſter made the accuſtomed Offering to the Dead, he did it with great Affection; and to raiſe his warmth the more, he imagined that he ſaw them and heard them ſpeak; and becauſe they had been long dead, he often called them to mind. The Authority,

In the Book of the Li-ki, the famous Pe-hu-tung, who liv'd under the Dynaſty of the Han, (A) ſays, The Reaſon for making that little Repreſentation is, becauſe the Soul or Spirit of the Dead being inviſible, a Child ſtands in need of a ſenſible Object to put him in mind of his Parents, to attract his Eyes and Heart, and give him Conſolation. As after a Father is interr'd, nothing remains with the Children capable of fixing their Hearts, that Conſideration firſt induc'd them to make a Picture, in order to do him Honour. and Grounds for this Cuſtom.

(A) In the French the Empire of the Han-chau. See my Reaſon for not uſing this laſt Term, P. 136. Note (c).

The ancient Chineſe made uſe of a little Child, as a living Image, to repreſent the Deceas'd, in place of whom their Succeſſors have ſubſtituted an Image or Tablet; becauſe it is eaſier to procure a Tablet than a Child, as often as they have occaſion to make their Acknowledgments to their dead Relations, for the Life, Fortune, and good Education receiv'd from them.

Superſtitions added by the Bonza's.

It is true that Idolatry having been introduc'd in the Empire, the Bonzas, or Tau tſe, engag'd by views of Intereſt to deceive the People, have mingl'd with theſe Ceremonies ſeveral ſuperſtitious Practices: ſuch as, burning gilt Paper in the Form of Money, and even Pieces of white Silk, as if thoſe things could be of Service to them in the other World; and teaching that the Souls of the Deceas'd hover about the Tablets inſcrib'd with their Names, and feed on the Smell of the Meats, and Perfumes that are burnt. But theſe ridiculous Cuſtoms are very oppoſite to the true Chineſe Doctrine, and prevail only among an ignorant Multitude, who follow ſuch Sects; even the Bonzas themſelves, notwithſtanding the Corruptions they have introduc'd, always conſider the ancient Ceremonies as ſo many Signs of Filial Reſpect, which Children owe to their Parents.

Of the Priſons in China, and Puniſhments inflicted on Criminals.

Juſtice ſlow but ſure in China.

THOUGH Juſtice in China ſeems ſlow, by Reaſon the Proceedings are lengthen'd out, that Men may not be unjuſtly depriv'd of ſuch conſiderable Benefits as Life and Honour; yet Criminals are ſeverely puniſh'd, and the Penalty proportion'd to the Enormity of the Crimes.

Before the Criminal Matters come to a definitive Sentence, they commonly paſs thro' five or ſix Tribunals, ſubordinate to one another; which have all a Right to review the whole Proceedings, and to receive exact Information concerning the Life and Manners of the Accuſers and Witneſſes, as well as of the Crimes of the Perſons accuſed. This Dilatorineſs proves favourable to the Innocent, who by that means are ſeldom oppreſs'd, altho' they lie a long while in Priſon.

The Priſons more convenient and ſpacious than thoſe of Europe.

Theſe Priſons are neither ſo dreadful nor loathſome as the Priſons of Europe, and beſides are much more convenient and ſpacious. They are built almoſt in the ſame Manner, throughout the Empire, and ſituated at a ſmall Diſtance from the Tribunals. Having paſs'd thro' the firſt Door towards the Street, you meet with a long Paſſage, which brings you to a ſecond Door, leading into a Baſe-Court, which you croſs over to a third Door, belonging to the Jailor's Apartment. After that, you enter a large ſquare Court, on the ſides whereof are Priſoners Rooms, erected on large Pillars of Wood, which form a kind of a Gallery.

Criminals very cloſely confin'd.

At the four Corners are ſecret Priſons, wherein the more notorious Rogues are ſecur'd, who are never let out in the Day-time to converſe in the Court, as ſometimes the other Priſoners are; and yet Money will purchaſe this Liberty for a few Hours: but at Night they take care to load them with heavy Chains, which are faſten'd to their Hands, Feet, and Middle, ſqueezing the Sides ſo hard that they can ſcarcely ſtir. However, a little Money rightly apply'd may even ſoften this Severity of the Jailors, and make their Irons ſit eaſier. As for thoſe whoſe Faults are not very heinous, they have the Liberty of the Courts of the Priſon in the Day-time to walk about to take the Air; but in the Evening they are all call'd one after another, and ſhut up in a large dark Hall, or elſe in the little Rooms which they may hire for lodging more conveniently. A Centinel watches all the Night, to keep the Priſoners in profound Silence; and if the leaſt Noiſe is heard, or the Lamp which is to be kept lighted happens to be put out, immediate Notice is give to the Jailors, that they may remedy the Diſorder.

The Priſons well guarded.

Others are oblig'd to walk the Rounds continually, ſo that it would be in vain for any Priſoner to attempt an Eſcape; becauſe he would immediately be diſcover'd and ſeverely puniſh'd by the Mandarin, who viſits the Priſons very often, and ought always to be able to give an account of them: for if any fall ſick, he muſt anſwer for them, being oblig'd not only to provide them with Phyſicians and Remedies, at the Emperor's Expence, but alſo to take all poſſible Care for their Recovery. When any die, they are to inform the Emperor, who often orders the ſuperior Mandarin to examine, if the inferior have done their Duty. At theſe Times of viſiting, thoſe who are guilty of any capital Crime, appear with a melancholy Air, the Face pale and ghaſtly, the Head hung down, and the Feet trembling, whereby they endeavour to excite Compaſſion; but it is to no purpoſe, for the Deſign of their Impriſonment is not only to ſecure but alſo to afflict them, and become part of their Puniſhment.

Great Care taken of the Health of the Priſoners.

In large Priſons, ſuch as that of the ſupreme Court at Pe-king, Tradeſmen and Mechanics, as Tailors, Butchers, Sellers of Rice and Herbs, &c. are allow'd to enter, for the Service and Conveniency of thoſe who are detain'd in them: there are even Cooks to dreſs their Victuals, and every thing is done in order, thro' the Care of the Officers.

The Women's Priſon.

The Womens Priſon is ſeparate from that of the Men, and there is no ſpeaking to them but through a Grate, or at the Turning-Box, by which their neceſſaries are convey'd; but very rarely any Man goes near them.

In

In some Places when a Prisoner dies, his Body is not carry'd out thro' the common Door of the Prison, but through a Passage made in the Wall of the first Court, which serves only for the Dead. When Prisoners above the common Rank find themselves in Danger of Death, they desire, as a Favour, that they may go out before they expire, because they look upon it as an infamous thing for their Corps to be carry'd thro' that Passage, in so much that the greatest Curse a Chinese can bestow on the Person to whom he wishes ill, is to say, May you be dragg'd thro' the Prison-Hole.

Door for carrying out the Dead.

In China no Offences whatever escape Punishment, that of each being fix'd. The Bastonado is commonly apply'd for slight Faults, and the number of Blows proportion'd to the Quality thereof. It is the usual Chastisement inflicted by the Officers of War on the Soldiers, plac'd as Centinels in the Night-time in Streets and public Places of great Cities, who, when found asleep, are often punish'd on the Spot. If the number of Blows does not exceed twenty, it is accounted a Fatherly Correction, and is not disgraceful; for the Emperor himself causes it to be given to Persons of great Distinction, and afterwards sees and carries it to them as usual. A very small matter will incur this Fatherly Chastisement, as having filch'd any Trifle, us'd abusive Language, given a few Blows with the Fist; for if these Things reach the Mandarin's Ears, he immediately sets the Pan-tse at work, for so that Instrument is call'd. After the Correction is over, they are to kneel at the Feet of the Judge, bow their Bodies three times to the Earth, and thank him for the Care he takes of their Education. The Pan-tse is a thick Piece of split Bambû, (which is a hard, massy, and heavy sort of Cane) several Foot long; the lower end is as broad as one's Hand, the upper smooth and small, that it may be more easily manag'd.

The Bastonado.

for what Faults inflicted.

The Pan-tse or Instrument describ'd.

When the Mandarin sits in Judgment he has before him on a Table, a Case full of small Sticks, about half a Foot long, and two Fingers broad, and is surrounded by Officers, holding Pan-tse, or Battoons in their Hands; who, upon a Sign given by the Magistrate taking out and throwing down these Sticks, seize the Offender, and lay him along with his Face towards the Ground, pull his Breeches over his Heels, and as many small Sticks as the Mandarin throws on the Ground, so many Officers give him five Blows each, with the Pan-tse on the bare Skin. They are chang'd every five Strokes, or rather two strike alternately five Blows, that so they may fall the heavier, and the Correction prove more severe. However, it is observable that four Blows are always reckon'd as five, which they call the Grace of the Emperor, who as a Father, out of Compassion for his People, constantly lessens the Punishment something. There is a way of mitigating it also by bribing the Officers, who have the Art of making the Blows fall so lightly as to be scarcely felt. A young Chinese, beholding his Father condemn'd to this Punishment, and ready to suffer, threw himself upon him to receive the Blows; which Act of Filial Piety so affected the Judge, that he pardon'd the Father for sake of the Son.

Form of applying it.

A Mandarin has Power to give the Bastonado not only in his Tribunal, but also wherever he is, even out of his own District; for which Reason when he goes abroad, he has always Officers of Justice in his Train, who carry the Pan-tse. If one of the People happening to be on Horseback, when the Mandarin passes by, does not alight, or crosses the Street in his Presence, it is sufficient Offence to incur five or six Blows by his Order; which is executed so nimbly, that often the honest Man has got his due, before those about him know any thing of the matter. Masters give the same Correction to their Scholars, Fathers to their Children, and Noblemen to their Domestics, with this Difference, that the Pan-tse is neither so long nor so large.

The Pan-tse always carry'd before the Quân.

Another Punishment, less painful but more infamous, is the Wooden Collar, which the Portuguese call Cangue. This Kan ghe is composed of two pieces of Wood, hollow'd in the Middle, to fit the Neck of the Offender; and when he is condemn'd by the Mandarin, they take the two pieces of Wood, lay them on his Shoulder, and join them together. By this means the Person can neither see his Feet, nor put his Hand to his Mouth, so that he cannot come to his Victuals without some other Person feeds him. Night and Day, he carries this disagreeable Load, which is heavier or lighter, according to the Nature of the Fault. The Weight of the common sort of Kan ghe's is fifty or sixty Pounds, but some weigh two hundred; and are so grievous to Criminals, that sometimes through Shame, Confusion, Pain, Want of Nourishment, and Sleep, they die under them. Some are three Foot square, and five or six Inches thick.

The Kan ghe or Wooden Ruff.

The Criminals, however, find different ways to imitigate this Punishment, some walk in Company with their Relations and Friends, who support the four Corners of the Kan ghe, that it may not press their Shoulders; some rest it on a Table or on a Bench; others have a Chair made with four Pillars of an equal Height, to bear up the Machine; some lie on their Bellies and make use of the Hole, their Head is in, as a Window, through which they impudently gaze at all that passes in the Street. When they have fix'd the two pieces of Wood about the Neck of the Criminal, in the Mandarin's presence, they paste on each side over the Place where it joins, two long Slips of Paper, about four Inches broad, on which they clap a Seal, that the Kan ghe may not be open'd without its being perceiv'd. Then they write in large Characters the Crime for which this Punishment is inflicted, and the Time that it ought to last; for Instance: This is a Thief; this is a disorderly and seditious Person; this is a Disturber of the Peace of Families; this is a Gamester, &c. he shall wear the Kan ghe for three Months in such a Place.

Contrivances to make it fit easy.

The Offence written on it.

The

The Wearers expoſed in the moſt publicPlaces.

The Place, where they are expoſed, is generally at the Gate of a Temple which is much frequented, or at the Corners of crouded Streets, or at the Gate of the City, or in a public Square, or even at the principal Gate of the Mandarin's Tribunal. When the Time of Puniſhment is expir'd, the Officers of the Tribunal bring back the Offender to the Mandarin, who, after exhorting him to amend his Courſes, frees him from the Kan ghe, and to take his Leave of him for that Time, orders him twenty Strokes of the Pan-tſe: for commonly in China all Puniſhments, except Pecuniary ones, begin and end with the Baſtonado, in ſo much that it may be ſaid, the Chineſe Government ſubſiſts by the Exerciſe of the Battoon.

Women puniſh'd with it.

This Puniſhment is more common for Men than Women, nevertheleſs, an ancient Miſſionary, P. Contancin, viſiting a Mandarin of a City of the firſt Rank, found a Woman near his Tribunal carrying the Kan ghe. She was a Bonzeſs, that is, one of thoſe Females who live in a kind of Nunnery, where Entrance is forbid to all Perſons whatever; who employ themſelves in worſhipping of Images and in Labour; and who do not keep their Vows, yet are oblig'd to live a Life of Chaſtity while they continue there. This Bonzeſs being accus'd of having had a Child, the Mandarin cited her before his Tribunal, and after giving her a ſevere Reprimand, told her; that ſince ſhe could not live continently, it was fit ſhe ſhould quit the Convent, and marry. However, to puniſh her, he condemn'd her to carry the Kan ghe; and to the Note containing her Crime, it was added, That in Caſe any Perſon would marry her, the Mandarin would ſet her at Liberty, and give her an Ounce and an half of Silver, to defray the Expences. Of this Sum, which is equal to ſeven Livres and ten Sous French Money, fifty Sous were to hire a Chair, and to pay the Muſicians; and the five remaining Livres were for bearing the Expence of the Wedding-Feaſt, to which the Neighbours were to be invited. It was not long before ſhe met with a Huſband, who demanding her of the Mandarin, ſhe was accordingly deliver'd to him.

Other Puniſhments for ſlight Faults.

Beſides the Puniſhment of the Kan ghe, there are ſtill others, which are inflicted for ſlight Faults. The ſame Miſſionary entering into a ſecond Court of the Tribunal, found young People upon their Knees; ſome bore on their Heads a Stone weighing ſeven or eight Pound, and others held a Book in their Hands, and read very diligently. Among theſe was a young marry'd Man, about thirty Years old, who lov'd Gaming to exceſs, and had loſt part of the Money given him by his Father, to carry on ſome little Buſineſs. Exhortations, Reprimands, and Menaces, proving ineffectual, his Parents deſirous, if poſſible, to cure him of ſo pernicious a Vice, carry'd him before the Tribnnal. The Mandarin, who was a Man of Honour and Probity, having heard the Father's Complaint, caus'd the young Man to draw near; and, after giving him a ſevere Reprimand, as well as very good Advice, with regard to Submiſſion, was going to order him the Baſtonado; when his Mother entred of a ſudden, and throwing herſelf at the Mandarin's Feet, with Tears in her Eyes, beſought him to pardon her Son. The Mandarin being mov'd to Pity, order'd a Book to be brought, compos'd by the Emperor for the Inſtruction of the Empire, and opening it, choſe the Article which related to Filial Obedience. You promiſe me, ſaid he to the young Man, to renounce Play, and to liſten to your Father's Directions; I therefore pardon you this Time, but go kneel down in the Gallery on the ſide of the Hall of Audience, and learn by Heart this Article of Filial Obedience: you ſhall not leave the Tribunal till you repeat it, and promiſe to obſerve it the Remainder of your Life. This Order was punctually executed, the young Man remain'd three Days in the Gallery, learn'd the Article, and was diſmiſs'd.

Marking on the Cheeks, Baniſhments;

There are certain Enormities for which Offenders are mark'd on both Cheeks with a Chineſe Character, ſignifying thoſe Crimes; for others they are condemn'd to Baniſhment, or to draw the Royal Barks, which Servitude ſcarce ever laſts longer than three Years. As for Baniſhment it is often perpetual, eſpecially if Tartary is the Place of Exile; but before their Departure they are ſure to be drubb'd with a number of Blows proportionable to their Crimes.

Capital Puniſhment.

Strangling and beheading.

There are three different ways of puniſhing with Death, the firſt and mildeſt is Strangling, which is inflicted for the ſmaller ſort of Capital Offences; as, when a Man kills his Adverſary in a Duel. The ſecond is beheading, and this Puniſhment is inflicted for Crimes of a more enormous Nature, ſuch as Aſſaſſination. This Death is look'd upon as the more ſhameful, becauſe the Head, which is the principal part of a Man, is ſeparated from the Body; and that in dying they do not preſerve the Body as intire as they receiv'd it from their Parents. In ſome places they ſtrangle with a kind of Bow, the String of which being put about the Criminal's Neck, they draw the Bow, and by that Means choak him. In other Places they make uſe of a Cord, ſeven or eight Foot long, with a running Knot, in which the Neck being put, two Servants belonging to the Tribunal draw it hard at each End, and looſe it of a ſudden a Moment after; then they draw it as before, and the ſecond time they are ſure of doing the Criminal's Buſineſs. Perſons above the common Rank are always carry'd to the Place of Execution in Chairs, or cover'd Carts.

Form of Condemnation.

When the Criminal is to be condemn'd, the Mandarin orders him to be brought into the Tribunal, where commonly there is prepar'd a ſhort Repaſt; at leaſt before Sentence is given, they never fail to offer him Wine, which is call'd Tſi-ſeng (†). After the Sentence is read, the Criminal ſometimes breaks out into abuſive Language and Invectives againſt thoſe who condemn'd

(†) This Word Tſi [written in the French Tſi] is the ſame, with that made uſe of when they offer any thing to their Anceſtors. [Such naked Remarks, which are too frequent in this Author, can be of no great uſe to the Reader, without farther Explanation. All I can conjecture from it is, that Tſi-ſeng ſignifies offer'd or Offering Wine.]

condemn'd him; when this happens the Mandarin hears all with Patience and Compassion; but afterwards they put a Gag in his Mouth, and lead him to Execution. Some of those who go on Foot, sing all the Way, and drink chearfully of the Wine presented them by their Acquaintance; who wait their coming, in order to give them this last Proof of their Friendship.

Punishment of cutting in 10,000 Pieces.

There is another kind of Punishment which savours of Cruelty, and wherewith Rebels and Traytors are usually punish'd: this they call Cutting in ten thousand Pieces. The Executioner fastens the Criminal to a Post, and tearing the Skin off his Head pulls it over his Eyes: he mangles him afterwards in all Parts of his Body, which he cuts in many Pieces; and when he is tired with this barbarous Exercise, he abandons him to the Cruelty of the Populace and Spectators. This has been often practised under the Reigns of some Emperors, who are looked upon as barbarous; for according to the Laws, this third Punishment consists in cutting the Body of the Criminal into several Pieces, opening his Belly, and throwing the Carcase into the River, or a Ditch, as is done by great Malefactors.

None can be put to Death without the Emperor's express Order.

Unless in some extraordinary Cases, which are mentioned in the Body of the Chinese Laws, or wherein the Emperor permits Execution upon the Spot, no Mandarin or superior Tribunal can pronounce definitive Sentence of Death. The Judgments passed on all Persons for Crimes worthy of Death, are to be examin'd, agreed to, and subscrib'd by the Emperor. The Mandarins send to Court an Account of the Trials with their own Decision, mentioning the particular Law on which their Sentences is grounded; for instance, Such a one is guilty of a Crime, and the Law declares, that those who are convicted of it, shall be strangled, for which Reason I have condemned him to be strangled. These Informations being arrived at Court, the Superior Tribunal of Criminal Affairs, examines the Facts, the Circumstances, and the Sentence. If the Fact is not clearly stated, or the Tribunal has need of fresh Informations, it presents a Memorial to the Emperor, containing the Case and the Judgment of the inferior Mandarin, with this Addition: To form a right Judgment, it is necessary that we should be informed of such a Circumstance; therefore we are of Opinion that the Matter should be sent back to such a Mandarin, that he may give us such Light therein as we could wish to have. The Emperor makes what Order he pleases, but his Clemency always inclines him to do what is desired; that the Sentence, which concerns a Man's Life, may not be pronounc'd rashly, and without the most convincing Proof. When the superior Tribunal has receiv'd the Informations requir'd, it presents a second time its Deliberation to the Emperor, who either confirms the same, or else diminishes the Rigor of the Punishment; nay, sometimes he remits the Memorial, writing these Words with his own Hand: Let the Tribunal deliberate farther upon this Affair, and make their Report to me.

Mighty Tenderness for the Life of the Subject.

In China every thing is canvased with the strictest Care, when they are about condemning a Man to death. The Emperor [Yong-ching] gave Orders in 1725, that thenceforward none should be put to Death till after his Trial was presented to him three times. Agreeable to this Order the Criminal-Tribunal observe the following Method: Some time before the appointed Day, they cause to be transcribed in a Book, all the Informations that, during the Course of the Year, have been sent them from the inferior Judges, to which they join the Sentence given by each, and that of the Tribunal of the Court. This Tribunal afterwards assemble to read, review, correct, add, or retrench whatever they think fit. When every thing is settled two fair Copies are made out, one of which is presented to the Emperor for his private Reading and Examination; the other is kept to be read in the Presence of all the principal Officers of the Supreme Courts, that it may be amended as they shall advise. Thus in China the most vile and despicable Wretch enjoys a Privilege, which in Europe is granted to none but Persons of the greatest Distinction; namely, the Right of being judg'd and condemn'd by all the Houses of Parliament assembled in a Body (A.) The second Copy having been examin'd and corrected they present it to the Emperor; then it is written over again ninety eight times in the Tartarian Language, and ninety-seven in the Chinese: All which Transcripts being put into his Majesty's Hands, he gives them to be examin'd by his most skilful Officers of both Nations who are at Pe-king.

Dead Warrant.

When the Crime is very enormous, the Emperor, in signing the dead Warrant, adds: As soon as this Order shall be receiv'd, let him be executed without any Delay.

Execution-Day.

As for capital Crimes, which have nothing uncommon in them, the Emperor writes this Sentence underneath, Let the Criminal be kept in Prison till Autumn, and then be executed. For there is a fix'd Day in Autumn, whereon all Capital Offenders are put to Death.

Ordinary Kinds of Torture.

The ordinary Torture in China to extort Confession, is extremely acute and painful. 'Tis inflicted both on the Feet and Hands: for the former they make Use of an Instrument composed of three cross Pieces of Wood, of which that in the middle being fix'd, the two other move and turn about; in this Machine they put the Feet of the Criminal, and squeeze them so violently, that they make the Ankle Bone quite flat. They inflict it on the Hands by placing

(A) Nay, it is a much greater Privilege, and such as alone must convey a most noble Idea, both of the exceeding Happiness of the People and Mildness of the Government. For absolute and limited Monarchies are but Names, that is most limited and eligible, where the Constitution is best calculated for securing the Rights of the Subject, and preventing the Oppression of Ministers and Magistrates. Such is the Monarchy of China: where, the People are more free, from being in the most profound Subjection; and where, the most despotic Power in the Prince is reconciled, with the most perfect Liberty and Property of the Subject. A Paradox not to be solved on this Side of the Globe.

little Pieces of Wood between the Fingers of the Criminal, and tying them very hard with Cords, leave him for ſome time in this Torment. The Chineſe have Remedies to diminiſh and even ſtupify the Senſe of Pain during the Torture; others to heal the Priſoner who indeed recovers by their Aſſiſtance, ſometimes in a few Days, the former uſe of his Limbs (B). From the ordinary Torture I paſs to the extraordinary, which is inflicted for great Crimes, eſpecially High Treaſon, in order to diſcover the Accomplices, when the Fact has been proved; it conſiſts in making ſlight Gaſhes on the Offender's Body, and ſtripping off the Skin in narrow Slips like Fillets.

Extraordinary Torture.

Theſe are all the kinds of corporal Puniſhment appointed by the Chineſe Laws for Malefactors; tho' as I ſaid before, ſome Monarchs have inflicted others of a more inhuman Nature, but they have been deteſted by the Nation, and look'd upon as Tyrants for it: Such was the Emperor Chew, whoſe horrible Cruelties are mention'd in the Annals of the Empire. [p. 157.] This Prince, at the Inſtigation of Ta-kya, one of his Concubines, with whom he was deſperately enamour'd, invented a new kind of Puniſhment call'd Pau-lo: It was a column of Braſs twenty Cubits high, and eight in Diameter, hollow in the middle like Phalaris's Bull, with openings in three Places for putting in fewel. To this they faſtned the Criminals, and making them embrace it with their Arms and Legs, lighted a great Fire in the Inſide; and thus roaſted them till they were reduc'd to Aſhes, in the Preſence of that Monſter of a Woman who ſeem'd to take Delight in ſo dreadful a Spectacle.

Horrid Puniſhment invented by the Emperor Chew.

Of the Plenty which Reigns in China.

Great Plenty of all Things in China,

IT may be ſaid, without Exaggeration, that China is one of the moſt fruitful, as well as large and beautiful Countries in the World: A ſingle Province of it might make a conſiderable Dominion, and flatter the Ambition of no mean Prince. Almoſt all that other Kingdoms afford may be found in China, but China produces an infinite Number of Things, which are to be found no where elſe.

to what owe-ing.

This Plenty may be attributed as well to the Depth of the Soil, as to the painful Induſtry of the Inhabitants, and the great Number of Lakes, Rivers, Brooks, and Canals, wherewith the Country is water'd. There are few Cities or even Burroughs in the Southern Provinces, but what one may go to by Water, becauſe no Part is deſtitute of Rivers or Canals. Rice is ſown twice a Year in ſome Provinces, and is much better than that which grows in Europe. The Land produces various other Sorts of Grain, ſuch as Wheat, Barley, Millet of ſeveral kinds, Beans, Peaſe that are always green, beſides black and yellow Peaſe, which they make uſe of inſtead of Oats to feed their Horſes; but in the Southern Parts all theſe Grains are of no eſteem, in companion of Rice, which is their common Food, as Wheat is in the Northern.

Hogs Fleſh a great Dainty

Of all the Fleſh of Animals, eaten in Europe, that of Hogs is reckon'd moſt delicious by the Chineſe, eſpecially the Rich who love their appetites; they prefer it to all the reſt, and make it, as it were, the Foundation of their Feaſts. Almoſt all People keep Hogs in their Houſes, to fatten, for they eat them the year round; it muſt be own'd that they are far better taſted than thoſe in Europe, nor is there finer Eating in the World than a Chineſe Ham. Wild-Mare's Fleſh is alſo in great Eſteem; and beſides Fowls, Hares, Rabbits, and other Animals, that we have in Plenty, Stags-pizzles, (C) Birds-neſts already ſpoken of [p. 302.] Bears-Paws, and the feet of diverſe Wild Creatures, which are brought ready ſalted from Siam, Kamboya, and Tartary, are Dainties fit for the Tables of Great Lords. The People are very well pleas'd with the Fleſh of Horſes and Dogs, even tho they dye of Age or Sickneſs; nay, they do not ſcruple eating Cats, Rats, and ſuch like Animals, which are openly ſold in the Streets. It is very good Diverſion to ſee the Butchers, when they are carrying the Fleſh of Dogs to any place, or dragging five or ſix to the Slaughter: for all the Dogs, drawn together by the cries of thoſe going to be kill'd, or the ſmell of thoſe already ſlain, fall in a Body upon the Butchers, who are oblig'd to go always arm'd with a long Staff or Whip to defend themſelves from their Attacks; and to keep the Places cloſe ſhut where they kill them, if they wou'd do it undiſturb'd.

Dogs, Cats, and Rats eaten.

Beſides the domeſtic Birds, they have on the Rivers and Lakes great Plenty of Water-fowl, eſpecially Wild-ducks; the manner of taking which deſerves mention. They put their heads into the Shells of large Gourds, with holes made in them to ſee and breathe through; then going naked into the Water, they walk or ſwim ſo low that nothing appears but the Gourds. The Ducks being accuſtom'd to See Gourds floating on the ſurface, and to play about them, approach them without Fear; when the Duck-hunter, taking them by the Feet, pulls them under Water to prevent their making a noiſe, wrings their Necks, and faſtens them to his Girdle, purſuing his Exerciſe till he has gotten a great number.

Way of catching Wild-Ducks.

Game.

Game is exceeding plenty. In ſeveral parts of Pe-king, during the Winter, are to be ſeen great Heaps of Animals, and Fowl of various kinds, harden'd by the Froſt and free from Corruption. There

(B) If this be ſo, methinks the Chineſe Surgeons muſt far excel the European; and their Method of curing Wounds and Contuſions be well worth enquiring after.

(C) Theſe Dainties are in great Requeſt in ſeveral Parts of England, and are called Inch-pins in many Places.

There are a prodigious number of Bucks, Does, Wild-hores, Goats, Elks, Hares, Rabbits, Squirrels, Cats, Field-Rats, Geeſe, Ducks, Wood-cocks, Partridges, Pheaſants, Quails, and ſeveral other Creatures not to be met with in Europe, which are ſold exceeding cheap.

The Rivers, Lakes, Pools, and even Canals are full of all ſorts of Fiſh: nay, they abound in the very Ditches, which are made in the middle of the Fields to preſerve the Water, whereof the Rice ſtands in continual Need. Theſe Ditches are ſtock'd with the Water mixt with the Spawn of Fiſh, which, as we have already mention'd,[p. 19.] are carry'd in Boats into all Parts of China. The young Fry being ſmall, and almoſt imperceptible, are fed with Lentils that grow in the Marſhes, or yelks of Eggs, much in the ſame manner as domeſtic Animals are nouriſh'd in Europe; they preſerve the large Fiſh by means of Ice, and filling great Boats with them, carry them as far as Pe-king. There is ſcarce any ſort of Fiſh in Europe but what is to be met with in China, as, Lampreys, Carps, Soals, Salmons, Trouts, Shads, Sturgeons, &c. beſides a great many others of an excellent Taſte, quite unknown to us; whereof I ſhall mention a few by way of ſpecimen, it being impoſſible to give an account of all the different kinds. Fiſh.

One of thoſe in greateſt Eſteem, and which weighs about forty Pound, is call'd Cho-kya-yu, that is, the Armour-Fiſh; it is ſo nam'd becauſe its Back, Belly, and Sides, are cover'd with ſharp Scales, plac'd in ſtrait Rows, one over another, much like Tiles on the Roof of an Houſe. It is an admirable Fiſh, exceeding white, and taſtes not unlike Veal. In calm Weather they catch another ſort of delicate Fiſh, which the People of the Country call the Meal-Fiſh, on account of its extraordinary Whiteneſs, and becauſe the black Pupils of its Eyes are inclos'd with two Circles reſembling very bright Silver. There are ſuch prodigious Shoals of them in the Sea near the Province of Kyang-nan, that they commonly take four hundred Weight of them at one draught of the Net. Cho-kya-yu, or Armour Fiſh. Meal-Fiſh.

One of the beſt ſorts of Fiſh China affords, reſembles a Sea-Bream: it is caught in the fourth and fifth Moon, and commonly ſold for a little more than a Farthing a Pound, whereof it weighs five or ſix, and for about twice as much, twenty Leagues up the Country, where it is carried. When this Fiſhing time is over, there comes from the Coaſts of Che-kyang large Barks, loaded with another kind of freſh Fiſh reſembling New-foundland Cod; it is incredible what a Conſumption there is of them, in the proper Seaſon, along the Coaſts from Fo-kyen to Shan-tong, beſides the prodigious Quantity that is ſalted in the Country where they are caught. The plenty of this fiſhery appears in that they are ſold at a very low Price, notwithſtanding the Merchants are at great expence to procure them: for they muſt firſt buy a Licence of the Mandarin to trade, then they muſt hire a Bark, buy the Fiſh as ſoon as it is caught, and lay them in the Hold, on Beds of Salt, in the ſame manner as they pack up Herrings in Tuns at Diepe; by which means the Fiſh is tranſported into the moſt diſtant Provinces, even in the time of the greateſt Heats. There is likewiſe brought a ſurprizing Quantity of other Salt-fiſh from the Sea-coaſt, from the ſixth to the ninth Moon. In the Province of Kyang-nan, one meets with very large Fiſh, which, coming out of the Sea or yellow River, throw themſelves into vaſt Plains cover'd with Water; but matters are ſo ingeniouſly contriv'd (D), that the Water runs off as ſoon as the Fiſh are entred: ſo that being left on dry Land they are taken without Difficulty, ſalted, and ſold to the Merchants, who load their Barks with them at a very cheap Rate. Sort of Sea-Bream and Cod. Salt-Fiſh.

In the great River Yang tſe kyang, over againſt the City Kyew-kyang fû, where it is above half a League broad, they catch all ſorts of excellent Fiſh; and among others, one call'd Whang-yu, that is, the yellow Fiſh. It is of an extraordinary Size, (ſome of them weighing upwards of eight hundred Pound) as well as an exquiſite Taſte, nor is there any Fiſh in the World that eats more firm; they are caught only at certain Seaſons, when they come out of the Lake Tong-ting hû into this River. This Lake, which is alſo call'd the Lake of Zhau [or Jau chew] is form'd by the Confluence of four Great Rivers, each as large as the Loire, which come from the Province of Kyang-ſi. It is thirty Leagues in Circumference, and is ſubject to Storms like the Seas of China, it being the greateſt Lake belonging thereto: for almoſt every Province has Lakes of prodigious Extent, ſuch are the Hong-tſe Hû, the Ta Hû, the Poyang Hû &c. Whang yu. or Yellow Fiſh.

We have already ſpoken, in the general View of this Empire, of a very extraordinary Fiſh call'd the Golden or Silver Fiſh, which the Grandees keep in their Courts or Gardens as an Ornament to their Palaces; and P. Le Comte, from whom we gave the Account, adds ſome farther Particulars which ought not to be omitted. "Theſe Fiſh (ſays he) are commonly the length of "one's Finger, and proportionably thick. The Male is of a beautiful Red from the Head to "more than half way down the Body, and the remaining Part, together with the Tail, is gilded; "but accompany'd with ſuch a bright and dazling Luſtre, that our beſt Gildings fall vaſtly "ſhort of it. The Female is white, the Tail, and ſome part of the Body, having a perfect Reſem- "blance of Silver. The Tail of neither kind is ſmooth and flat, like that of other Fiſh, but forms "a ſort of Tuft, thick and long, which adds a particular Beauty to this little Creature, whoſe "Body beſide is finely ſhap'd. Thoſe who feed them ought to take great Care, becauſe they are "exceeding delicate, and ſenſible of the leaſt Injury from the Weather. They are kept in a very "large and deep Baſon; at the Bottom of which there is commonly put an earthen Pan, "turn'd upſide down, and made with Holes in it, that in hot Weather they may retire "and have a Shelter from the Sun. The Water is chang'd three or four times a Week, but Kin yu, or Golden Fiſh. exceeding beautiful, and tender; how kept and managed.

(D) This muſt be a very curious Contrivance; I wiſh the Author had given ſome Account of it.

" but in ſuch a manner, that the freſh runs in while the other runs out, that the Baſon may never " be dry; they likewiſe ſtrew on the Surface certain Herbs, which keep the Water always " green and cool. If they are oblig'd to tranſport the Fiſh from one Veſſel to another, great Care
Eaſily kill'd. " muſt be taken not to handle them, for thoſe which are touch'd die ſoon after or decay; there- " fore they make Uſe of a ſmall Net, the Mouth of which is faſten'd round a Hoop, wherewith " they take them up by degrees, the Threads being woven ſo cloſe together that they have time " to put them into freſh Water before the old runs out. A great Noiſe, like that of Guns or Thun- " der, a ſtrong Smell, or a violent Motion, hurts and ſometimes kills them; as I obſerv'd upon " the Sea, where we carry'd ſome of them, every time the Guns were fired, or Pitch and Tar
Their Food. " were melted. Beſides, they live upon almoſt nothing; the imperceptible Worms that are bred in " the Water, or the little earthy Particles mixt with it, are ſufficient to keep them alive. Never- " theleſs from time to time they throw in ſmall Bits of Paſte: but there is nothing better for " them than Wafers, which ſoak'd make a kind of Broth they are extremely fond of, being in " reality, very proper Food for ſuch delicate Creatures.

Very proli- fic. " In hot Countries they multiply exceedingly, provided the Spawn, that ſwims upon the Sur- " face of the Water, be carefully taken away; for otherwiſe they would devour it. Being plac'd in " a particular Veſſel expos'd to the Sun, it is kept there till the heat animates the young Fry. They " are at firſt quite black, which colour ſome always retain; but the reſt change by degrees to red or " white, to Gold or Silver, according to their different kinds. The Gold and Silver begin to " appear at the end of the Tail, and extend more or leſs towards the middle of their Bodies, " according to their reſpective Natures.

Further Remarks on the golden Fiſh. Some new Informations gain'd from the Chineſe, who deal in theſe ſmall Fiſh, and get their Livelihood by breeding and ſelling them, give me occaſion to make ſome farther Remarks:

Their Size. I. Tho' they are commonly no longer than one's Finger, ſome grow to the length and thick- neſs of the largeſt Herrings.

How diſtin- guiſhed. II. It is not the red or white Colour that diſtinguiſhes the Male from the Female: but the lat- ter are known by ſeveral ſmall white Spots about their Gills, and little Fins that are near them; and the Males, by having theſe places bright and ſhining.

III. Tho' the Tail is commonly in the ſhape of a Tuft, yet often it is like that of other Fiſh.

Food. IV. Beſides the ſmall Balls of Paſte above mention'd, they give them the yelks of Eggs boil'd hard, or lean Pork, dry'd in the Sun, and reduc'd to very fine Powder. They ſometimes put Snails into the Baſon where they are kept, becauſe their Slime, which ſticks to the ſides of the Veſſel is excellent Food for theſe little Creatures, who ſtruggle about getting to it. They are alſo very fond of little reddiſh Worms, found in the Water of ſome Reſervoirs.

How propa- gated. V. They ſeldom multiply after they are ſhut up in theſe Veſſels, becauſe they are too much confin'd: for if you would have them breed, you muſt put them in Reſervoirs, where the Water runs, and is deep in ſome Places.

VI. After the Water is drawn out of the Well, to fill the Veſſel where the Fiſh are put, it ought to be left to ſettle, five or ſix Hours, otherwiſe it would be too crude and unwholeſome.

VII. If you perceive that the Fiſh are ſpawning, which happens about the Beginning of May, you ſhould ſcatter Graſs upon the Surface of the Water that the Spawn may cling to it; and when you perceive the ſpawning is over, or that the Males ceaſe to follow the Fe- males, the Fiſh muſt be remov'd into another Veſſel, that the Spawn may be expoſed in the Sun for three or four Days: and at the End of forty or fifty Days, the Water muſt be chang'd, becauſe the ſmall Fry begin then to appear diſtinctly.

Theſe Remarks will not be uſeleſs, in caſe the Golden Fiſh ſhould ever be brought into Europe, as they have already been carry'd to Batavia by the Dutch.

Way of fiſh- ing with Birds. Beſides the Nets and Lines that are us'd by the Chineſe, the firſt in their great Fiſheries, the latter in their ſmall, they have another way of fiſhing, which is ſingular enough, and very diverting: for in ſeveral Provinces they rear a certain Bird reſembling a Raven, but the Neck is a great deal longer; the Beak alſo is long, ſharp, and crooked: It being a kind of Cormorant, which they teach to fiſh, much in the ſame manner as we bring up Dogs to catch Hares.

See the Fi- gure. In the Morning when the Sun riſes, one may ſee on the Rivers a conſiderable Number of Boats, and ſeveral of theſe Birds ſitting at the Head of them. Then the Fiſher-men turning their Boats about, at the Signal given by ſtriking the Water with an Oar, the Cormorants fly into the River, one here, another there, and diving to the Bottom, ſeize the Fiſh they light on by the middle; then riſing up again, they carry it to the Bark: where the Fiſherman receiving it, takes the Bird and holding its Head downwards, paſſes his Hand along the Neck to make it diſgorge the ſmall Fiſh that it had ſwalow'd, but is hindred from going into the Gullet by a Ring put on the lower Part of the Neck; which, after the fiſhing is quite over, they take off and give them ſomething to eat. When the Fiſh happens to be too large for one Bird, they mutually aſſiſt each other; one takes the Tail, another the Head, and bring it to the Boat to their Maſter.

Another way of fiſh- ing with Boards. There is another way of taking Fiſh, which is very ſimple, and gives but little Trouble; for this Purpoſe they make uſe of long narrow Boats, nailing on each ſide, from one end to the other, a Plank two Foot broad. This Plank is japan'd with very white ſhining Varniſh, and ſlants gently till it almoſt touches the Top of the Water; in the Night-time, when it is us'd, they turn it towards the Moon, that the Reflection may increaſe its Splendor: ſo that the Fiſh, which are ſporting, eaſily miſtaking the Colour of the japan'd Plank for that of the Water, leap often on that Side, and fall either on the Plank or into the Boat.

In

In ſome Places the Soldiers ſhoot the Fiſh very dexterouſly with Arrows, which are faſten'd to the Bow with a Pack-thread, as well to prevent their being loſt, as to draw out the Fiſh when it is ſhot. In other Places there is ſuch a great Quantity in the Mud, that Men ſtanding up to the Girdle in the Water, pierce them with a three-fork'd Spear. Shooting Fiſh with Arrows.

The Land is not leſs productive in the multitude and variety of Fruits, than the Rivers and Lakes are of Fiſh. Here are Pears, Apples, Peaches, Apricots, Quinces, Figs and Grapes, eſpecially a kind of excellent Muſcadine; likewiſe Nuts, Plumbs, Cherries, Cheſnuts, Pomegranates, and almoſt all other Fruits to be met with in Europe, beſides many other Sorts not to be found there at all. Variety of Fruit in China.

However it muſt be confeſs'd that none of theſe Fruits, except the Muſcadine-Grapes and Pomegranates, is to be compar'd to ours; becauſe the Chineſe are not ſo ſkilful as the Europeans in cultivating the Trees, and improving the Flavour of the Fruit: They have too much Occaſion for their Land to propagate Rice and Wheat; yet their Peaches are as good as ours, nay one kind of them is better. In ſome Places they are unwholeſome, and muſt be eaten ſparingly, becauſe they bring on a Dyſentery, which is very dangerous in China. Their Apricots would not be bad, did they but give them Time to ripen. but not ſo good as in Europe.

It is from China that our Oranges came, but we have only one Kind, whereas they have ſeveral excellent Sorts, eſpecially one, which is in great Eſteem: they are ſmall, and the Rind is thin, ſmooth and very ſoft. There is another Sort that comes from the Province of Fo-kyen, that has an admirable Taſte; they are larger, and the Rind is of a beautiful Red: The Europeans commonly ſay that a Diſh of theſe Oranges would become the toppingeſt Tables in Europe. They have larger at Kan-ton, which are yellow, agreeable to the Taſte, and very wholeſome; they give them even to ſick Perſons, roaſting them firſt in hot Embers, then cutting them in two, and filling them with Sugar; the Juice being reckon'd a great Pectoral. Others have a ſharp Taſte, and are us'd by the Europeans in Sauces. Oranges of ſeveral ſorts.

Limons and Citrons are very common in ſome Southern Provinces, and extraordinary large; but theſe are ſcarce ever eaten, being only made uſe of for Ornaments in Houſes, where they put ſeven or eight in a China Diſh, to pleaſe the Sight and Smell; however, they are exceeding good when candy'd. Another ſort of Limon, not much larger than a Walnut, is likewiſe in great Eſteem; it is round, green, and ſharp, being reckon'd excellent for Ragous. The Tree that bears them is ſometimes put in Boxes, and ſerves to adorn the outward Courts or Halls of Houſes. Limons and Citrons.

Beſides Melons of the European kind, there are two other Sorts in China; one of which is very ſmall, and yellow within, has a ſweet Taſte, and may be eaten Rind and all in the ſame manner as we ſometimes eat Apples. The other kind, which is call'd a Water-Melon, is very large and long; the Inſide is white, and ſometimes red, containing a ſweet cooling Juice, that quenches Thirſt, and never does any Harm, even in the hotteſt Weather. To theſe may be added another Sort ſtill better, which comes from a place in Tartary call'd Hami, at a great Diſtance from Pe-king. Theſe Melons have this peculiar Quality, that they keep freſh for five or ſix Months together; great Proviſion is made of them every Year for the Emperor: but we have already ſpoken of them elſewhere. Melons.

To the above-mention'd Fruits, which we are acquainted with, we ought to add thoſe that are known to us only by the Relations of Travellers, and ſeem to have been imported into China from the neigbouring Iſlands, where they are found in very great Plenty: I mean the Ananas, the Guavaes, the Bananas, the Cocoas, &c. But beſides all theſe ſorts of Fruit, which it has in common with other Countries, there are ſeveral others of a peculiar kind, and very good Taſte, not to be met with any where elſe; ſuch are the Tſe-tſe, the Li-chi, and the Long-yen (A), which I have already deſcrib'd. [See p. 8.] Uncommon Fruits.

The Plains are ſo much taken up with Rice, that there is ſcarce a Tree to be ſeen in them; but the Mountains, eſpecially thoſe of Shen-ſi, Ho-nan, Quang-tong, and Fo-kyen, are cover'd with Foreſts, containing large ſtrait Trees of all kinds, very proper to be uſed in public Edifices, and eſpecially for building Ships; there are Pines, Aſhes, Elms, Oaks, Palm-Trees, Cedars, and ſeveral others little known in Europe. Trees.

Other Mountains are famous for their Mines, containing all ſorts of Metals; for their Medicinal Fountains, Simples, and Minerals. There you meet with Mines of Gold, Silver, Iron, Copper, Tin, white Copper, Quickſilver, Lapis Armenus, Cinnabar, Vitriol, Allum, Jaſper, Rubies, Rock-Cryſtal, Load-Stones, Porphyry, and Quarries of different kinds of Marble. Mines.

The Mountains alſo, eſpecially thoſe in the Northern Provinces, afford vaſt Quantities of Pit-Coal, of which there is a very great Conſumption; it is black, and is found between the Rocks in very deep Veins: then being broken into Pieces, it is burnt in the Stove belonging to the Kitchen. Some pound it, and wetting the Duſt with Water, make it into Lumps, which ſort of Fewel is us'd eſpecially by the common People. This Coal is very difficult to light, but when once it has kindled, it caſts a great Heat, and laſts a long time. It ſometimes yields a very bad Smell, and will ſuffocate thoſe who ſleep near it, if they have not the Precaution to keep cloſe by them a Veſſel full of Water; which draws the Smoke in ſuch a manner that at length it ſmells as diſagreeably itſelf. Pit-Coal.

(A) In the Original Long ywen, but this ſeems to be a Miſtake, it being written Long yen, p. 8, as well as in the Explanatory Table of Terms.

Much us'd for Fewel.

The Cooks belonging to the Mandarins and other great Men commonly make uſe of it, as well as Mechanics: ſuch as Victuallers, Dyers, Black-Smiths, Lock-Smiths, &c. however theſe latter find that it makes the Iron hard: It is alſo much us'd in Wind-furnaces, for ſmelting Copper. Theſe Coal-Pits are likewiſe found in the high Mountains near Pe-king, and ſeem to be inexhauſtible, conſidering this great City and the whole Province have been conſtantly ſupply'd from thence; and yet there is not a Family, how poor ſoever, but what has a Stove heated with this ſort of Fewel, which laſts a great deal longer than Charcoal.

Herbs and Roots.

Their Kitchen-Gardens are well furniſh'd with Herbs, Roots, and Pulſe of all ſorts; beſides the Kinds that we have, they have many others we know nothing of, which are more valuable than ours. They cultivate them very carefully, as being in conjunction with Rice, the chief Food of the People: Every Morning an infinite Number of Waggons and Beaſts loaden with them enter Pe-king.

Salt,

As it would be difficult to tranſport Salt from the Sea-Coaſts into the Weſtern Parts bordering on Tartary, Providence has wonderfully ſupply'd their Wants in that particular: for beſide the Salt-Pits found in certain Provinces, there is in other parts a ſort of grey Earth ſcatter'd up and down ſeveral Diſtricts in Spots, containing between three and four Acres each, which yield a prodigious Quantity of Salt. The manner of getting this Salt out of the Earth is remarkable: they make the Surface of the Land as ſmooth as Glaſs, with a little ſloping, that the Water may not lie on it; and when the Sun has dry'd it very well, ſo that it appears white from the Particles of Salt which are mix'd with it, they take it up, and raiſe it in little Heaps, beating it very well all over, that the Rain may ſoak into it. Afterwards ſpreading it upon large Tables, that are a little inclining, and have Ledges about four or five Fingers high, they pour a certain Quantity of freſh Water thereon; which ſoaking through diſſolves all the Particles of Salt, and carries them along with it into a large Earthen Veſſel, whereinto it runs, Drop by Drop, by means of a little Tube made on Purpoſe. The Earth, thus drain'd, does not become uſeleſs, but is laid aſide, and in a few Days time becoming quite dry, they reduce it to Powder, and lay it in the ſame Spot from whence it was taken; where having lain ſeven or eight Days, it becomes impregnated as before with abundance of Saline Particles, which are again ſeparated from it in the manner as above.

how got out of the Earth, and prepar'd.

While the Men are working in this manner in the Fields, their Wives and Children are employ'd, in Huts built on the Place, in boiling the Salt Water, in very large, deep Iron Baſons, over an Earthen Stove; with Holes made in it, in ſuch manner that the Fire is communicated to all the Baſons alike, the Smoak being carry'd off by a long Funnel, made in form of a Chimney, at the end of the Stove. When the Water has boiled for ſome time, it grows thick, and changes by degrees into a very white Salt, which they ſtir inceſſantly with a large Iron Spatula, till it is quite dry. Whole Foreſts would ſcarce ſuffice to maintain the Fire neceſſary for the Salt which is making all the Year round; but as often there are no Trees in theſe Places, Providence ſupplies that Defect with large Quantities of Reeds, which grow in their Neighbourhood.

No Spices in China.

To ſay the Truth, the Soil of China produces no ſort of Spice, except a kind of Pepper, very different from that of the Eaſt-Indies; but the Chineſe meeting with it in Countries very near their own, procure it with ſo much Eaſe by their Commerce, that they have as great Plenty of it as if it grew at home.

Tho' moſt of the Neceſſaries of Life are found in all parts of the Empire, yet each Province yields ſomething different from, and in greater abundance than, another; as appears from the Geographical Deſcription already given of them.

Tartary, tho' full of Foreſts and Sand, is not intirely barren: for it furniſhes the fine Skins of Sables, Foxes, and Tygers, whereof the rich Furrs are made; plenty of Roots and Simples very uſeful in Phyſic; an infinite Quantity of Horſes for the Service of the Army; and numerous Herds of Cattle, which ſupply the Northern parts of China with Food.

Great Miſery in China not withſtanding ſo great Plenty.

Notwithſtanding this great Plenty it is however true, though a kind of a Paradox, that the moſt rich and flouriſhing Empire in the World is in effect poor enough; for the Land, though ſo very extenſive and fruitful, hardly ſuffices to ſupport its Inhabitants. One may venture to ſay, that to live comfortably they have need of a Country as large again: the City of Kan-ton only, where ſuch numbers of Europeans reſort every Year, contains more than a Million of Souls; and in a large Town, not above three or four Leagues diſtant, there are more People than at Kan-ton itſelf. Extreme Miſery forces them ſometimes to terrible Extremes; ſo that if one examines things at Kan-ton a little cloſer, he will not be ſo much ſurpriz'd at Parents expoſing ſeveral of their Children in the Streets, and giving their Daughters away for Slaves, or that ſuch an immenſe People ſhould be ſo much ſway'd by Intereſt. It is rather to be wonder'd at, that nothing more tragical happens; and that in a Time of Scarcity, when ſuch multitudes are ready to periſh with Hunger, they ſhould not have recourſe to violent Methods, as well as the People of Europe: the Hiſtories whereof furniſh us with many Examples.

Chineſe and Europeans compared.

Extraordinary Trees.

Tho' I have ſpoken a good deal already of the Animals and Trees to be found in China, yet I ſhall here give ſome farther Account of the more extraordinary Kinds: If I omit the reſt, it muſt be conſider'd that it is not my Deſign to write a Natural Hiſtory of the Empire, as has been already obſerv'd.

One

U-kyew-mû, or Tallow-Tree,

One of the moſt ſingular Trees, and which is not to be met with elſewhere, is the Tallow-Tree, call'd by the Chineſe U-kyew-mû, being very common in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, and Kyang-ſi. P. Martini has given a pretty exact Account of it in his Deſcription of the City of Kin-wha, in the Province of Che-kyang. This Tree, which he compares to our Pear-trees, and is ſometimes as tall as the larger ſort of them, has alſo a great reſemblance of the Aſpin, and Birch-Tree, at leaſt with reſpect to the Leaves, and long Stalks; but the Trunk and Branches are for the moſt part of the Shape of our Cherry-Trees. The Bark is of a whitiſh Grey, ſomewhat ſoft to the Touch. The little Branches are long, ſlender, flexible, and furniſh'd with Leaves only from the Middle to the End; where they grow in a ſort of Tuft, but more ſmall than elſewhere, and often turning at the Edges ſo as to appear hollow like a Gondola. Theſe Leaves are of a dark Green, ſleek on the upper part, and whitiſh underneath; very thin, dry, moderately large, and in form of a Lozenge, only the Angles on the ſide are rounded off, and the End lengthen'd into a Point. They are join'd to the Branches by long Stalks, dry, and ſmall; the Ribs of the Leaf, as well as its Fibres, are round, dry, and ſlender. In the latter Seaſon, that is, towards November and December, they become red before they fall off, as happens to the Leaves of the Vine and Pear-Tree.

its Fruit.

The Fruit grows in Bunches, at the Extremity of the Branches; to which they are join'd by a very ſhort woody Stalk, that ſeems to be a Continuation of the Branch itſelf. This Fruit is inclos'd in a hard, woody, brown Capſula, or Huſk, a little rough, and of a triangular Figure; the Angles being rounded off, much in the ſame manner as thoſe of the ſmall Fruit, or red Berries of the Privet or Prime-Print, vulgarly call'd Prieſt-Cap. Theſe Huſks or Caſes commonly incloſe three ſmall Kernels, each about the ſize of a Pea, and round, excepting on the Sides where they touch, which is a little flat. Every Kernel is inclos'd with a thin Covering of white Tallow, pretty hard. The Stalk divides itſelf, as it were, into three other ſmaller, or rather Strings; which paſs through the middle of the Fruit, between the three Kernels, in ſuch manner, that the ends of the Strings enter the upper ends of the Kernels, whereat they ſeem to hang. When the Huſk, which is compoſed of ſix ſmall hollow oval Leaves, begins to open and fall off, as it does by degrees, the Fruit diſcovering itſelf makes a very agreeable Sight, eſpecially in Winter-time; for then theſe Trees appear cover'd over with ſmall white Bunches, which one would take at a Diſtance for ſo many Noſegays. The Tallow that envelopes the Fruit, being broken off into one's Hand, eaſily melts, and yields a greaſy Smell, not much unlike that of common Tallow.

The Tallow where generated, its Qualities.

Before the Fruit is quite ripe, it appears round, which is probably the Reaſon why P. Martini ſays it is round; unleſs having examin'd only a few, that were not perfect in their Kind, he thought this to be their natural Figure: for in reality ſome are defective as to Shape, and beſides contain but one or two Nuts or Berries. The Nut has a pretty hard Shell including a kind of ſmall Kernel, about the Bigneſs of a large Hempſeed, which is cover'd with a brown Skin, and affords a great deal of Oyl; ſo that the ſame Fruit ſupplies the Chineſe both with Tallow for their Candles, and Oyl for their Lamps.

The Kernel of the Fruit yields Lamp Oyl.

The Candles made of the Tallow.

Theſe Candles are like the Segment of a Cone, which they light at the broad End; and the Wick is a little Stick, or hollow Reed, round which they wrap Cotton Thread, or elſe the Pith of a Ruſh of the ſame Bigneſs: this Ruſh ſerves alſo for the Wick of Lamps. One end of the Reed or ſmall Stick ſerves for lighting, and the other for fixing on the Candleſtick, which is made with a Point to enter into the Hollow of the Reed. This ſort of Candle, beſides being thick and heavy, readily melts when touch'd with the Hand. The Light it gives is pretty clear, but a little yellowiſh; and as the Wick is ſolid, and changes while burning into a hard Coal, it is not eaſily ſnuft, they uſing Cizars made for the Purpoſe.

The Tallow how ſeparated from the Fruit.

In order to ſeparate the Tallow from the Fruit, they pound the Shell and Nut both together, and boil it in Water; ſkimming off the Fat or Oyl as it riſes to the Top, which condenſes like Tallow when it is cold. To ten Pound of this Greaſe they ſometimes put three of Linſeed-Oyl, and a little Wax to give it a Body; whereof they make exceeding white Candles, tho' they alſo make red ones, by mixing Vermillion with the Compoſition.

The Cotton Shrub.

One of the moſt uſeful Shrubs in all China is that producing the Cotton; which the Huſbandmen, the ſame Day that they get in their Harveſt, ſow in the ſame Field, only breaking the Surface of the Ground with a Rake. After the Earth has been moiſten'd with Rain or Dew, there grows up by degrees a ſmall Shrub about two Foot high; the Flowers of which appear towards the beginning or middle of Auguſt, being generally yellow, but ſometimes red. This Flower is ſucceeded by a ſmall Button, growing in the Shape of a Pod of the Bigneſs of a Nut.

The Cotton grows in a Pod.

The fortieth Day after the Appearance of the Flower, the Pod opens of itſelf; and cleaving in three Places, diſcovers three or four little Bags of Cotton, extremely white, and of the ſame Figure as the Cod of a Silk-Worm. They are faſten'd to the Bottom of the open Pod, and contain Seed for the following Year. It is then time to get in the Crop; but in fair Weather the Fruit is left expos'd to the Sun two or three Days more, that ſo being ſwell'd by the Heat the Profit may be greater.

How ſeparated.

As all the Fibres of the Cotton are ſtrongly faſten'd to the Seeds which they incloſe, they make uſe of a ſort of Wheel to ſeparate them. This Engine conſiſts of two very ſmooth Rowlers, one one of Wood and the other of Iron, about a Foot long, and an Inch thick. They are plac'd ſo cloſe together that there is no Vacancy between; and while one Hand gives Motion to the firſt Rowler, and the Foot to the ſecond, the other Hand applies the Cotton, which, looſening by the Motion, paſſes on one ſide of the Engine, the Seed remaining on the other. Afterwards they card and ſpin the Cotton, whereof they make Callico.

The Tree Kû-ſhu,

There is another Tree call'd Kû-ſhu, reſembling our Fig-Tree, both with reſpect to the Wood of its Branches, and its Leaves; the Root commonly ſends forth ſeveral Stalks or little Trunks like a Buſh, and ſometimes only one. The Trunk of ſome is ſtrait, round, and nine or ten Inches thick. The Branches conſiſt of a light pithy Wood, and are cover'd with a Bark like that of the Fig-Tree. The Leaf is deeply indented, eſpecially in two Places, whereby it becomes as it were divided into three Leaves, curiouſly hollow'd on each ſide. In Colour on both ſides, as well as the Contexture of the Fibres, it reſembles the Leaf of the Fig-Tree; only it is larger, thicker, and rougher on the upper ſide, but the under ſide is very ſoft, being cover'd with a fine Down. Some of them are not hollow'd at all, and have the Figure of a longiſh Heart.

yields a ſort of Size for Gilding.

This Tree yields a Milk, made uſe of by the Chineſe in gilding with Leaf-Gold, which is drawn off in the following manner: They make in the Trunk one or more Horizontal and Perpendicular Inciſions, and in the Slit put the Edge of a Sea-ſhell, or ſome ſuch Receiver; into which the Milk diſtilling they afterwards put it all together, and in uſing it draw with a Pencil what Figures they pleaſe upon Wood or any other Matter whatever: this done they apply Leaf-Gold, which ſticks ſo firmly thereon that it never comes off.

The Tree Lung-ju-tſu.

The Tree, which the Chineſe call Lung-ju-tſu, has a Trunk as large as our biggeſt Plum-Tree. It divides betimes into two or three thick Branches, and theſe again into ſmaller. The Bark is of a reddiſh grey Colour, and ſpotted like the Filbert-Tree; but the Extremity of the Branches is knotty, crooked, rough, and full of Pith, like the Walnut-Tree. The Fruit is ſomewhat oval, and when green, nearly reſembles Cherries, both in Colour and Shape, as well as the Stalk; which laſt is green and ſtringy; extremely long, and divided into ſeveral Branches, each whereof has one of theſe Berries hanging at the end. The Skin of the Fruit in ſome Places is full of little red Spots, is pretty tough, and incloſes a greeniſh Subſtance, which when ripe becomes like Pap: they uſe it in Winter to rub the Hands with, and prevent Chilblains.

This Fruit has a very hard Stone, like a Cherry-Stone, but a little oblong, and indented with five, ſix, and ſometimes ſeven Furrows. This Stone receives its Nouriſhment through a pretty large round Hole, that grows ſtraighter, as it approaches the incloſed Kernel, which is ſmall, and cover'd with a blackiſh Skin, not ſo hard as that of the Pippin of an Apple. Of the Trunk of this Tree they make Boards for common uſes.

If the Chineſe delighted, as we do in Europe, to adorn their Gardens, and make fine Alleys, they might, by cultivating their Flowers, and employing certain Trees peculiar to their own Country, have very agreeable Walks; but as nothing ſeems to them more ridiculous than to walk backward and forward, merely for the ſake of Walking, they take no care to make uſe of the Advantages which Nature has beſtow'd upon them.

The Tree Mo-lyen.

Among the Trees that I am ſpeaking of, there is one call'd Mo-lyen, as thick as the ſmall of one's Leg; its Branches are ſlender, full of Pith, and cover'd with a red Rind, ſpeckled with whitiſh Spots, like a Filbert-Tree. They have not many Leaves, but to make amends for that Defect, they are very large, being broader towards the Top than in the Middle or lower part. They are thin and pretty dry; their Ribs and principal Fibres are cover'd with a fine whitiſh Down. They are join'd to the Tree by Stalks, which ſpread ſo much towards the Bottom, that it may be ſaid they embrace the Branch, and that the Branch proceeds from it, as out of a little Tube, making an Elbow in this Place.

From amidſt the Stalks proceed little Buds of an oval Figure, cover'd with Down; which, opening in December, or the Depth of Winter, become large Flowers, like the Mountain-Lilly, compoſed of ſeven or eight Leaves full of long Fibres, of an oval Figure, and pointed at the Extremities. Some of theſe Trees bear yellow Flowers, ſome red, and others white; the Leaves fall at the ſame time, and often even before the Flowers are open'd.

The Tree La-mwe.

Another Tree call'd La-mwe has ſome Reſemblance of our Bay-Tree as to the ſize and figure, as well as the ſhape of its Branches; which yet are wider, and furniſh'd with Leaves oppoſite each other, growing by Pairs on ſhort Stalks. The greateſt Leaves are almoſt as large as thoſe of the common Laurel, but neither ſo thick, nor ſo dry; growing leſs and leſs in proportion to their Diſtance from the end of the Branch. In the Depth of Winter there proceed from between the Leaves ſmall yellow Flowers, of an agreeable Smell, not much unlike that of the Roſe.

The Tree U-tong-ſhu.

Nothing can be fitter to adorn a Garden than the Tree call'd U-tong ſhu; which is very large, and reſembles the Sycamore; its Leaves are long, broad, and join'd to a ſtalk of a Foot in Length. This Tree is ſo buſhy, and crouded with Tufts, that the Rays of the Sun cannot penetrate. The manner of bearing its Fruit is very extraordinary: towards the end of Auguſt there grow at the extremities of the Branches, inſtead of Flowers, ſmall Tufts of Leaves, which are different from the reſt, being more white, ſoft, and not ſo broad. On the Edge of every Leaf are generated three or four ſmall Grains of the bigneſs of a Pea, containing a white Subſtance, of a Taſte not unlike the Kernel of a Hazle-nut before it is ripe.

The Tree call'd Cha-wha would alſo be a great Ornament for Gardens. There are four kinds of it, which bear Flowers, and reſemble our Spaniſh-Laurel in the Wood and Leaves: theſe latter do not fall off during the Winter. The Trunk is commonly as thick as one's Thigh. The Top is ſhap'd like the Spaniſh-Laurel. Its Wood is of a whitiſh Grey, and very ſleek. The Leaves, which are rang'd alternately on each ſide of the Branches, are as large as thoſe of the Spaniſh-Laurel, but of an oval Figure, pointed at the ends, and indented on the edges like a Saw; they are alſo more thick and firm, being of a dark Green on the upper ſide, like the Leaf of an Orange-tree, and yellow underneath, with pretty thick Stalks. The Tree Cha-wha.

At the Place where the Stalks join to the Tree proceed Buds of the Bigneſs, Figure, and Colour of a Hazle-nut; they are cover'd with fine white Hair, and have a Ground like that of Sattin. In the Month of December theſe Buds become Flowers, which are double and of a reddiſh Colour like ſmall Roſes; they are ſupported by a Calix or Cup, and join'd immediately to the Branch without any Stalks,

The Trees of the ſecond kind are very high: the Leaf is rounded at the end, and the Flowers, which are large and red, being intermix'd with the green Leaves, make a very agreeable ſhow. The two other kinds bear Flowers alſo, but they are ſmaller and whitiſh: the middle of this Flower is full of ſmall Filaments, which have each a yellow flat Top, much like thoſe in common Roſes, with a ſmall round Piſtil in the middle; at the bottom whereof is a ſmall green Ball, which as it grows, forms the Film, incloſing the Seed.

There is another remarkable kind of Tree, partaking ſomewhat both of the Juniper and Cypreſs; for which reaſon the Chineſe call it Tſe-ſong, that is, Juniper, and Ywen-pe, or Cypreſs. The Trunk, which is about a Foot and a half in Circumference, ſends forth Branches almoſt from the very Ground, ſubdivided into a great number of others, which ſtretching out at ſome Diſtance from the Trunk, form a thick green Buſh. The Tree is cover'd with a Multitude of Leaves, ſome like Cypreſs, and the reſt like thoſe of Juniper; that is to ſay, the latter are long, narrow, and ſharp, having this peculiarity, that they are diſpos'd along the Boughs in Rows four, five, or ſix in Number: ſo that looking on the Boughs from the end, they appear like Stars of four, five, or ſix Rays; the Leaves of the firſt Row covering thoſe of the under Rows ſo exactly, that thro' the Spaces between, one may ſee diſtinctly to the bottom of the Bough. The Boughs or Twigs, which are cover'd with theſe long Leaves, are found principally at the lower part of the Branches, for towards the Top you behold nothing but Cypreſs. The Tſe ſong or Ywen Pe, a very remarkable Tree. Odd Situation, Nature ſeems to have taken Pleaſure, in mingling theſe two ſorts of Leaves in ſuch a manner, that ſome Branches are entirely Cypreſs, and theſe are the more large and numerous; others intirely Juniper; ſome are half one and half the other: in ſhort, ſometimes one beholds a few Cypreſs Leaves grafted at the end of a Juniper Bough; at other times ſome ſmall Juniper Bough ſhooting from the bottom of a Cypreſs Branch. The Bark of this Tree is ſomewhat rugged and of a greyiſh brown Colour, inclining a little to the red in ſome Places. The Wood is of a reddiſh white, like that of the Juniper, with a ſpice of Turpentine in it. The Leaves, beſides the Smell of Cypreſs, have an aromatic Scent, but their Taſte is tartiſh and very bitter. The Tree bears ſmall round green Berries little larger than thoſe of Juniper; the Pulp is of an Olive green, and has a ſtrong Smell. The Fruit is join'd to the Branches by long Stalks of the ſame Nature as the Leaves: It contains two reddiſh ſeeds in the ſhape of Hearts, and as hard as Grape-Stones. The Trunk of ſome of theſe Trees is tall and ſlender, having Branches no where but at the top, which ends in a Point almoſt like the Cypreſs: there are others of the Dwarf-kind, growing no higher than ſeven or eight Foot; but as their Trunk and Branches are crooked and wrinkled, there is reaſon to believe the Chineſe ſtunt their Growth by cutting them. When the Tree is young, all the Leaves are long, like thoſe of Juniper; but when it is old, they reſemble the Cypreſs. Variety and Mixture of its Leaves.

I ſhould never have done were I to deſcribe the reſt of the uncommon Trees or Shrubs, to be met with in China; and yet I cannot poſſibly neglect to ſpeak of the famous Plant call'd Jin ſeng, which is ſo much eſteem'd in the Empire, where it bears a very great Price, and is conſider'd as the moſt excellent Cordial. It grows no where but in Tartary, for that which comes from the Province of Se-chwen is not worth mentioning. As P. Jartoux had full Opportunity and Leiſure to examine this Plant attentively on the Spot, when he aſſiſted in making the Map of the Country by the Emperors Order, he has drawn it according to its proper Dimenſions, and explain'd its Properties and Uſe as follows: The famous Plant of Jin ſeng.

" The moſt ſkilful Phyſicians of China, ſays he, mix it in all the Medicines they prepare " for the great Lords; the Price being too high for the common People; they pretend that it is a " Sovereign Remedy for Decays caus'd by exceſſive Labour, either of Body or Mind; that it " diſſolves Phlegm, heals the Weakneſs of the Lungs, cures Pleuriſies, ſtops Vomiting, ſtrengthens the Stomach and creates an Appetite; cures the Vapours, and ſhortneſs of Breath by " ſtrengthening the Breaſt; fortifies the Vital Spirits, generates Lympha in the Blood; in ſhort, " is good for Vertigo's and Dimneſs of Sight, and prolongs the Life of old Perſons. Its Medicinal Qualities.

" It is hardly to be imagin'd that the Chineſe and Tartars would ſet ſo great a value on this " Root, if it did not conſtantly produce good Effects; even thoſe who are in Health frequently " uſe it to ſtrengthen their Conſtitution. As for me I am perſwaded that if it was in the Hands " of Europeans, who underſtand Pharmacy, it would prove an excellent Remedy, after they had " examined the nature of it, and found the proper quantity to be given in different Diſorders. " It is very certain that it rarifies the Blood, as well as warms and puts it in motion; that it aſſiſts " Digeſtion, and ſtrengthens in a ſenſible manner. After having deſign'd what I ſhall deſcribe

" Reſt we had taken that Day: but four Days after, finding my ſelf ſo fatigu'd and exhauſted
" with Labour, that I could hardly ſit upon my Horſe, a Mandarin of our Company perceiving
" it, gave me one of theſe Roots, whereof I immediately took the half, and about an Hour after " my ſtrength return'd. I have often uſed it ſince, and always with equal Benefit; I like-
" wiſe obſerv'd that the Leaf, and eſpecially the Fibres, chew'd while it was freſh, produc'd very " near the ſame Effect.

Leaves preferr'd to Tea.

" We often made uſe of the Leaves of Jin ſeng inſtead of Tea, as the Tartars do; after " which I found myſelf ſo well, that I preferr'd them to the very beſt Tea. The Colour is alſo
" agreeable, and when one has taken it two or three times, both the Smell and Taſte prove " very grateful.

Decoction of the Root,

" As for the Root it requires a little more boiling than Tea, in order to draw it ſuffici-
" ently: this Practice is obſerv'd by the Chineſe when they give it to ſick Perſons, in which " caſe they ſeldom uſe above the fifth Part of an Ounce of the dry Root. As for thoſe who are " in Health, and take it by the way of Prevention, or for ſome ſlight Diſorder, I would not
" adviſe them to take more than a tenth Part of an Ounce at a time, nor ought they to uſe
" it every Day.

how prepar'd.

" The manner of preparing it is this: they cut the Root in ſmall Slices, and put them in an " earthen Pan well glaz'd, on which they pour a Gallon of Water; then taking care that the " Pan be cover'd very cloſe, they put it on a ſlow Fire, and when the Water is boil'd all away,
" to about a cup-full, it muſt be drank immediately. They then pour in the ſame quantity of " Water as before, and boil it after the ſame manner to extract all the Juice, and the ſpiritu-
" ous Parts of the Root that remain. Theſe two Doſes are taken one in the Morning, and the " other in the Evening.

Country where the Plant grows.

" With reſpect to the Places where this Root grows, it may ſuffice to ſay in general: that " it is found between the thirty ninth and forty ſeventh Degree of North Latitude, and between " the tenth and twentieth Degree of Longitude, Eaſt from Pe-king. Within theſe Limits there " is a long Chain of Mountains cover'd and ſurrounded with thick Foreſts, which render " them almoſt inacceſſible. On the Declivity of theſe Mountains, and in theſe thick Foreſts, on " the Brinks of the Channels, made by the Torrents, or about the Rocks at the Foot of Trees,
" and amongſt all ſorts of Herbs is the Jin ſeng found; but it is never to be met with in Plains
" Valleys and Marſhes, at the Bottom of theſe Channels, or in Places too much expoſed.
" If the Foreſt be conſum'd by Fire, this Plant does not appear again till three or four Years
" after, which ſhews that Heat is an Enemy to it; accordingly it hides itſelf from the Sun as " much as poſſible: whence it may be preſum'd, that if it is to be found in any other Country
" in the World, Canada is the moſt likely Place; whoſe Foreſts and Mountains, according " to the Report of thoſe who have lived there, very much reſemble theſe I am ſpeaking of.

Strictly guarded.

" The Parts where the Jin-ſeng grows, are ſeparated from Quang-tong, call'd Lyau tong in " our ancient Maps, by a Barrier of wooden Stakes, which encloſes that whole Province; in
" the Neighhourhood of which the Guards are continually patroling to hinder the Chineſe from " going out to ſeek this Root. But in ſpite of all their Vigilance, the Chineſe are tempted, by the " Thirſt of Gain, to ſlip into thoſe Deſarts, ſometimes to the Number of two or three thou-
" ſand; at the Hazard of looſing their Liberty and the Fruits of their Labour, if they are ſur-
" priz'd, either going out of the Province, or returning into it.

Army ſent to gather it.

" The Emperor chuſing that the Tartars, rather than the Chineſe, ſhould reap the Advan" tage made by this Root, gave Orders, in 1709, to ten thouſand Tartars to go and gather all
" the Jin-ſeng they could find; on Condition that each of them ſhould give his Majeſty two " Ounces of the beſt, and for the Remainder they were to be pay'd its Weight in fine Silver:
" by this means it was reckon'd that the Emperor got that Year about twenty thouſand Chineſe
" Pound Weight of it, which did not coſt him above the fourth part of the Value. We met
" by chance ſome of theſe Tartars in the middle of thoſe frightful Deſarts; whoſe Mandarins
" were not far out of our Road, and came one after another to offer us Oxen for our Subſiſ-
" tence, according to the Command they had receiv'd from the Emperor.

Order obſerv'd by the Military Botaniſts.

" The following, is the order obſerv'd by this Army of Herbaliſts: after they have divided the " Country according to their ſtandards, the Soldiers of each Company, being a hundred in Num" ber, extend themſelves in a Line, till they come to the Limits appointed them, leaving a certain
" Diſtance between every ten: then they carefully ſeek after the Plant, advancing inſenſibly on
" the ſame Point of the Compaſs; and in this manner they paſs over the ſpace of Country allotted " them, in a certain number of Days. When the time is expir'd, the Mandarins fixing their " Tents in Places, where there is good Paſture for their Horſes, ſend their orders to every Com" pany, and to know if their number be compleat; for in caſe any Perſon is wanting, as it often " happens, either by their ſtragling too far, or being devour'd by Wild-beaſts, they ſearch for " him a Day or two, and then fall to work again, in the ſame manner as before.

Gathering Jin ſeng hard Service.

" Theſe poor People ſuffer greatly in this Expedition, for they carry neither Tents nor Beds
" with them, every one being ſufficiently loaded with his Proviſion of Millet bak'd in an Oven,
" which is to ſerve him the whole Time of his Journey: ſo that they are oblig'd to ſleep under

" a Tree, covering themſelves with ſuch Branches or Pieces of Bark, as they can find. The " Mandarins ſend them, from time to time, Pieces of Beef or other Meat, which they devour " after they have warm'd it at the Fire. In this manner ten thouſand Men ſpent ſix Months " of the Year, and yet, notwithſtanding their Fatigues, they ſeem'd robuſt and good Soldiers. " The Tartars that attended us met with no better Treatment, having nothing elſe but the " Remainder of an Ox, that was kill'd every Day, after fifty Perſons had fed upon it.

" To give you ſome Idea of this Plant, ſo much eſteem'd by the Tartars and Chineſe, I ſhall Deſcription of the Plant. " explain the Figure, which I ſend herewith, and drew with all the Exactneſs poſſible.

" A. repreſents the Root of its natural ſize: when I waſh'd it I found it white, and ſome- See the Figure. " what rugged as the Roots of other Plants commonly are.

" B. C. C. D. repreſent the Stalk in its full Length and Thickneſs, which is ſmooth and almoſt " round; its colour is a pretty deep red, except towards the beginning, B. where it is whiter as being " near the Ground. The Point D. is a kind of Knot, form'd by the riſe of four Branches, which The Branches " proceed from it as from a Center, ſhooting ſtrait forward at equal Diſtances from each other.

" The lower Part of the Branch is green mix'd with white; the upper part is much like the " Stalk, that is, of a deep red, a little inclining to the Colour of a Mulberry, but towards the " Edges the two Colours gradually unite. Each Branch has five Leaves of the ſize and figure as The Leaves. " repreſented in the Plate. It is obſervable that theſe Branches are equally diſtant from each other " as well as from the Horizon, for they fill with their Leaves a round Space very nearly parallel " to the ſurface of the Ground.

" Tho' I have drawn but half of one of theſe Leaves F with any Accuracy, all the reſt may " eaſily be conceiv'd and finiſh'd from thence. I do not remember ever to have ſeen Leaves " of this Largeneſs ſo very thin, and of ſo fine a Contexture. The Fibres of it are very well " diſtinguiſh'd, and have on the upper part a few whitiſh Hairs. The fine Skin that is between " the Fibres riſes towards the Middle a little above them. The upper ſide of the Leaf is a " dark, and the under a whitiſh Green, a little ſhining: all the Leaves are curiouſly indented " at the Edges.

" From D the Center of the Branches of this Plant riſes a ſecond Stalk D E, very ſtrait The Fruit or " and ſmooth, of a whitiſh Caſt, from the Beginning to the End, where there is a Cluſter of Berry. " twenty four very round Berries, whoſe Skin is of a bright Colour, very fine and ſmooth, " incloſing a white ſoftiſh Pulp, which is not good to eat. I have only deſign'd two of them, " which are of their natural ſize, and are mark'd with the Figures 9, 9. As theſe Berries " were double, (for ſome of them are ſingle) each contain'd two rough Stones of the Bigneſs " and Shape of common Lentils, but ſeparated, tho' they lay on the ſame Level. This " Stone is not ſharp on the ſides like Lentils, but is nearly all over of an equal Thickneſs. " Every Berry adheres to a ſmooth Filament or Stalk, equal on all ſides, pretty fine, and of " the Colour of that of our ſmall red Cherries; which Filaments, proceeding like Rays from " the ſame Center, gave the Bunch of Berries its round Form. The Stone, which like the " Stone of other Fruit is hard, and incloſes a Kernel, always lies in the ſame Poſition with " the Filament that bears the Berry, whence it comes that the Berry, inſtead of being round, " is a little flat on each ſide. When it is double there is a little Dent between the two Parts, " of which it is compoſed; it has alſo a little Beard on the Top. When the Berry is dry, " there remains nothing but a wrinkled Skin, that adheres to the Stone, and becomes of " a dark red, almoſt black.

" As this Plant dies and grows again every Year, its Age is diſcover'd by the number Age of the " of Stalks already put forth, whereof there always remains ſome Sign, as may be ſeen in the Plant how " Figure at the ſmall Letters b, b, b; by which it appears that the Root A was in the ſeventh diſcover'd. " Year, and the Root H in the fifteenth. As for the Flower, having never ſeen, I cannot Its Flower. " deſcribe it: ſome have told me that it is white and very ſmall; others that the Plant " bears none, no body ever having ſeen any. I ſhould rather believe, that being very ſmall " and no way remarkable, it has not been minded: what confirms me the more in this " Opinion is, that thoſe who ſearch after the Jin ſeng, wanting nothing but the Root, deſpiſe " and reject all the reſt as uſeleſs.

" There are Plants which, beſides the Cluſters of Berries already deſcrib'd, have a Berry Other Species " or two altogether like the former, ſtanding an Inch, or an Inch and half, below the Cluſter; of the Plant. " and then they ſay one ought to obſerve the Rumb to which theſe Berries point, becauſe " they ſeldom fail to find another Root a few Paces from thence on the ſame Point of " the Compaſs or thereabouts. The Colour of the Berries, when there are any, diſtinguiſhes this " Plant from all others, and diſcovers it at once; but then it often happens that there are " none, tho' the Root be very old: ſuch was that mark'd in the Figure by the Letter H, " which bore none, tho' it was in its fifteenth Year.
